(2 S 3). The death of Abner could not long delay the fall of Eshbaal; two Benjamite captains shortly afterwards murdered him during his mid-day sleep, and brought his head to D. in Hebron. The king commanded the instant execution of the murderers, while Eshbaal's head was buried in the tomb of Abner (ch. 4). D., who had formerly led Israel to victory against the Philistines, was now recognized as the natural leader of the people; the elders of the nation assembled at Hebron, a solemn league was made, and D. anointed king over the whole of Israel. He is said to have been at this time 37 years of age (2 S 5<sup>4-5</sup>). The Chronicler gives an account of the bodies of men sent by the different tribes to make D. king, and of the three days' feast which they kept at Hebron (1 Ch 12<sup>23-40</sup>); but the language used is that of a later time, the numbers given are in most cases certainly too large, while the position assigned to the contingent of priests and Levites does not increase our confidence in the narrative.

Except for the important record of events in D.'s family, our accounts of his reign are fragmentary and incomplete; our history is not arranged in a strictly chronological manner, and the time and order of events must be to some extent a matter of conjecture. In spite of the prearrangement of 2 S 5, there can be little doubt that the Phil. wars were the first important events after D.'s accession by the whole nation. The task imposed on him by his election as king was that of freeing his country from Phil. domination. It was no longer possible for him to continue a vassal to a foreign power, nor were the Philistines likely to acquiesce, when without their consent he assumed sovereignty over all Israel. When, therefore, 'the Phil. heard that they had anointed D. king over Israel' (2 S 5<sup>17</sup>), they at once invaded the country. D. seems to have been unprepared, and was compelled 'to go down to the hold,' i.e. probably the old stronghold of Adullam, of such importance during his outlaw life, while the Philistines penetrated to the heart of the country and occupied Bethlehem and the Valley of Rephaim, probably between Bethlehem and Jerusalem (2 S 23<sup>3</sup>; so Stade, and Kittel who places the valley of Rephaim north of Jerusalem). Of the duration and progress of the war we have no certain information, but some detached notices of it have been preserved. It was while the Philistines had a stronghold at Bethlehem that the three 'mighty men' went day by day to the well by the gate, to bring D. a draught of water for which he had expressed a wish; but the gift obtained at such a risk was too precious to drink, and D. poured out the water as an offering to J<sup>u</sup> (2 S 23<sup>13-17</sup>). Other incidents of the war are recorded in 2 S 21<sup>16-22</sup>. At Gob D. was nearly slain in combat with a giant, but rescued by Abishai, and in consequence D.'s men declared that he should no longer risk his life in battle. On another occasion Elhanan of Bethlehem slew Goliath of Gath, and other feats of D.'s heroes are recorded (2 S 23<sup>8-12</sup>). A decisive battle was fought at Baal-perazim, where D., encouraged by an oracle, attacked his enemies, and dispersed them 'like a breach of waters,' and the images of the enemy were carried off as booty (2 S 5<sup>18-21</sup>, cf. Is 28<sup>21</sup>). Another decisive engagement took place in the valley of Rephaim. D. on inquiring of J<sup>h</sup> was bidden not to make a direct attack, i.e. from the south, but to take the enemy in the rear, and attack them when a rustling noise was heard in the Baca trees. He was again completely successful, and the Philistines were defeated from Gibeon to Gezer (1 Ch 14<sup>12-17</sup>, 2 S 5<sup>22-25</sup>). Following up his victories, D. destroyed the Philistine supremacy, taking from them, as is said, 'the bridle of the mother city' (2 S 8<sup>1</sup>). The importance of these victories must have been far greater than the scanty notices of them would at first suggest.

The nation was now freed from external oppression: the next task was to weld it into one whole. A great step towards this end was the capture of Jebus, and the creation of a new capital. A Can. tribe still unsubdued occupied the district between Judah and Benjamin, settled round the city of Jebus, from which they derived their name. The strong fortress of Zion, standing on the eastern ridge between the Kidron and the so-called Tyropean valley, protected their city (see JERUSALEM). Situated as it was in the centre of the land, and commanding the principal lines of communication between north and south, and between east and west, it was admirably suited for a capital; and here D. marched with his forces. The inhabitants, trusting in their strong walls, derisively declared that 'the blind and lame' would be sufficient to defend them. Nevertheless, the place was taken by storm (2 S 5<sup>6-10</sup>). According to 1 Ch 11<sup>9</sup> Joab was the first to scale the walls, and received in reward the post of commander-in-chief. The city was newly fortified, and here D. removed with his family and court. The importance of this step can hardly be overestimated. Gibeon of Saul and Hebron were merely tribal capitals; Jerus. stood on neutral ground, and was the capital of the whole nation, while, bordering alike on Judah and Benjamin, it would be regarded with favour by the king's own tribe and by that of his predecessor. The choice of the site is a signal proof of D.'s genius and statesmanship. Here gathered now inhabitants from all Israel, but mainly, no doubt, from Judah and Benjamin, while, to judge from the case of Araunah (2 S 24<sup>18-25</sup>), the original Jebusite population was allowed to retain its former possessions. The effects of the capture of Jerus. were felt beyond the borders of Israel. Hiram, king of Tyre, entered into friendly relations with D., and supplied him with builders and material for a palace in his new capital. In true Oriental fashion D. marked the fresh increase of his power by increasing his harem. While still in Hebron he had married four more wives, and had already six sons: Amnon the firstborn, the son of Ahinoam of Jezreel; Chileab the son of the prudent Abigail; Absalom the son of Maacah, daughter of Talmi, the Aramæan king of Geshur; Adonijah the son of Haggith; and the son of Abital, and Ithream the son of Bathsheba (2 S 3<sup>2-5</sup>; cf. 1 Ch 3<sup>1-8</sup>, where Daniel is put for Chileab). Michal, who had been restored to David, unfortunately bore no children, otherwise the grandson of Saul would have been the natural heir to the throne, and the subsequent disputes with regard to the succession would have been avoided. On removing to Jerusalem D. took fresh wives and concubines from this place, and the names of several more sons are recorded (2 S 5<sup>13-15</sup>, 1 Ch 3<sup>6-9</sup> 14<sup>3-7</sup>; on variations in the three lists, cf. Driver, Text of Sam.). We must not judge D. herein from a modern Western standpoint. In the East a man's wealth and power are to a great extent measured by the number of his wives and the size of his family; and by politic alliances, as, for example, with the daughter of the king of Geshur, D. increased his influence at home and abroad. At the same time he introduced into his capital the source of many of the dangers and corruptions of an Oriental court, and the evil was increased by the weak affection with which D. treated his favourite sons.

The next measure was to make the political capital also the religious centre of the nation; and for this purpose D. resolved to bring up to Jerus. the old sacred ark, which had for many years been left at Kiriath-jearim (1 S 7<sup>1</sup>, or Baal-judah (2 S 6<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jos 15<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ch 13<sup>8</sup>). Thither D. went with a large number of Israelites; the ark was drawn in a new cart, accompanied by two of its attendants, Uzzah and Ahio; while D. and his subjects marched behind to the strains of festal music. But at Nacon's three-jung-floor, probably not far from Jerus., Uzzah, while attempting to steady the ark, suddenly fell dead. Dismayed at this occurrence, D. was afraid to have so dangerous a symbol near him, and the ark was placed in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite, probably one of David's Philistine mercenaries. Three months later, however, on hearing that the ark had brought blessing upon this house, D. took courage to carry out his original design. This time the ark was safely carried in triumph into the 'city of David,' while the king himself, wearing a priestly linen ephod, danced in the procession before it. A tent had already been prepared for its reception in the citadel; here solemn sacrifices were offered, after which the people were dismissed with the king's blessing and gifts of food. When D. returned to his house, he had to meet the scoffs of Michal, who taunted him with his undignified appearance in the procession that day; but the king with true dignity rebuked her readiness to dance before J<sup>h</sup>, who had been above the house of Saul. To this irreverence of Michal's was attributed the fact that she remained childless: but she had at this time been married some fifteen or twenty years.

It is instructive to compare with the narrative of 2 S 6 the account given by the Chronicler of the bringing of the ark to Jerus. (1 Ch 18 15 16). The old history is largely rewritten to bring it into accordance with later ideas and institutions. An important place in the ceremonial is assigned to the priests, and the older version is conspicuous by their absence. Obed-edom of Gath becomes a Levitical musician and doorkeeper.

The contrast between the simple tent for the ark and his own palace suggested to D. the need of building some more permanent temple; but the king's adviser, the prophet Nathan, who had at first approved of the divine substance, subsequently induced D. to abandon it. Possibly, both prophet and people feared the effects of innovations in religious matters. Nathan's message to D. is contained in 2 S 7, a chapter which in its present form shows the influence of Deut., but is in the main of somewhat earlier date (see Budde). There we are told how Nathan, the night after his approval of D.'s design, received from God a message for the king. Never yet had J<sup>h</sup> required a temple of the judges of His people; tent and tabernacle had been sufficient hitherto. D. should not build a house for Him, He would build a house (i.e. a line of descendants) for D.; and though D.'s seed might need to be chastised, God's mercy should not depart from them, (v. 13, which speaks of D.'s successor, who was to build a temple for J', seems not to belong to the original form of the chapter; it weakens the antithesis of vv. 12 and 14). This message is followed by a beautiful prayer, in which D. thanks God for all His goodness to himself and his people.

It was not long after his settlement in Jerus. . . D., in remembrance of his covenant with Jonathan, inquired whether there remained yet any survivors of Saul's house, whom he might benefit for the sake of his friend. He was told that there was still a son of Jonathan, and at D.'s orders Mephibosheth or Meribaal (1 Ch 8<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>40</sup>) was brought from the house of Machir at Lo-debar; the property of Saul, apparently confiscated, was restored to him, and given to Ziba, a former servant of Saul's family, who was to till the ground for his master, while Meribaal dwelt at Jerus., where his conduct would be under the royal supervision, and ate at the king's table. Meribaal was lame, having been dropped by his nurse as she fled on hearing of the Israelite defeat at Mt. Gilboa. He was then five years old; now he is described as having a young son, an indication that these events took place some ten years after D. became king over all Israel. With other descendants of Saul, however, D. was compelled shortly afterwards to deal in a different manner. The land was afflicted with drought, and consequent famine, for three years, and D., on inquiring of the sacred oracle, was told that a curse of blood rested upon the land, because of an attempt made by Saul to exterminate the Gibeonites, an Amorite tribe bound by a covenant to Israel. The only compensation which the Gibeonites would accept was that seven of Saul's sons should be put to death; and D. delivered to them the two sons of Saul's concubine Rizpah, and five sons of his daughter Merab (MT wrongly Michal). These were . . . ed to J' in the sacred hill of Gil . . . . Text of Sam.), while the corpses were lovingly watched by the devoted Rizpah, till the first rains showed that the atonement was accepted. Then D., in recognition of the mother's devotion, gave orders for the burial of the . . . and the bones, as well as those of Saul and Jonathan, were interred in the ancestral sepulchre of Kish (2 S 21<sup>1-14</sup>). This occurrence must be placed after the recognition of Meribaal (v. 7), but before the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 16<sup>3</sup>). We have no right to blame D.'s action in this matter; he acted in accordance with the religious beliefs of his time, and with what he conceived to be the best interests of the nation; and, in spite of Shimei's reproaches, we may believe that D.'s contemporaries regarded the matter in the same light as himself.

Under D. the kingdom was more completely organized than it had been under his predecessor, and the administration was entrusted to royal officers (2 S 8<sup>16-18</sup>, 20<sup>23-25</sup>). Foremost of these was Joab the son of Zeruiah, D.'s nephew, who was commander-in-chief of the whole army; the scribe or chancellor, to whom belonged the control of all official documents, was Shisha (1 K 4<sup>3</sup>; corrupt readings in 2 S 8<sup>17</sup> 20<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ch 18<sup>16</sup>); the state historian or chronicler (māzār, i.e. remembrancer), Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud; Adoram controlled the levy, i.e. the forced service exacted by the king from his subjects; at the head of the priesthood, beside Abiathar, the representative of the house of Eli, stood Zadok, the ancestor of the later priestly house, but of his origin or appointment no authentic information is preserved, Ira, a Manasseite of the family of Jair, was another priest, and D.'s sons also performed priestly duties. Traces of a royal council are to be found in allusions to Ahithophel, D.'s counsellor (2 S 15<sup>12</sup>), and to Hushai, D.'s friend (ib. v. 37, cf. 1 K 4<sup>5</sup>). A very important institution was that of the royal body-guard, taking the place of the 'runners' of Saul (1 S 22<sup>1</sup>). The nucleus of it was doubtless David's old band, which had accompanied him during his wanderings and his residence at Gath. The technical name of this force was the Gibborim, heroes or mighty men; and their numbers were probably kept at the traditional 600. They were now largely recruited from the south of Palestine (1 S 30<sup>14</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>9</sup>), perhaps originally connected with Crete; hence the guards were commonly called the Cherethites and Pelethites (wh. see). That these were the same body as the Gibborim appears from 1 K 18<sup>10, 38</sup>. The text of 2 S 15<sup>18</sup> is too uncertain to form an argument to the contrary. The whole corps was under the command of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. Included in or distinct from this guard, was a select body of Thirty distinguished for special valour, over whom was Abishai, the brother of Joab; while Three warriors are named as ranking even higher than Abishai and Benaiah (2 S 23<sup>38-39</sup>, and cf. Driver, ad loc.). This guard of experienced soldiers formed the only standing army in the kingdom; and being stationed in the capital (cf. 2 S 11<sup>38</sup>, Neh 3<sup>18</sup>) they became a powerful support to the king's authority, and ensured the discharge of his orders. As will appear later, they played an important part at the accession of Solomon.

For war on a large scale the army still consisted of the whole male population of military age, who were summoned to . . . . of danger. The force seems to have consisted wholly of infantry, except for a few chariots and horses retained after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 S 8<sup>4</sup>). But when D.'s wars of foreign conquest began to involve protracted campaigns, and long absence from home, some new system became desirable. It was perceived to meet these requirements that D. . . . census, which was carried out evidently after the completion of the Syrian wars, for his officers travelled as far north as the Hittite city of Kadesh (2 S 24<sup>6</sup>, LXX. Luc.). The military aspect of this measure is clear from its being entrusted to Joab and the captains of the host (v. 4, 1 Ch 21<sup>2</sup>); but the census may have been also intended as a basis for a regular system of fixed taxation, to meet the needs of . . . government. The measure was . . . suspicion, perhaps as involving an . . . of royal authority, and even Joab protested against it; nevertheless, he carried out his task in 9 months and 20 days. A severe pestilence, which visited the land immediately afterwards, was regarded by D. and the people as a sign of the divine displeasure. We are told that the prophet Gad ordered D. the choice of . . . three years' famine (LXX, 1 Ch . . . before his enemies, or three days' pestilence; and that the king chose the last . . . to fall into the hand of God rather . . . But when the destroying angel reached Jerus., he was bidden, in consequence of D.'s penitence, to stay his hand; and D., at Gad's bidding, bought the threshing-floor of Araunah or Ornan (Ch) the Jebusite, and offered there a sacrifice, whereby he obtained from God mercy for the land (2 S 24). The place of sacrifice became afterwards the site of Solomon's temple (2 Ch 3<sup>1</sup>). The narrative shows that we must not expect to find for D.'s reign careful records of the numbers and divisions of the people. Yet such statistics are . . . by the Chronicler, who in his account of D.'s armies and officers (1 Ch 23-27) describes a far more numerous and elaborately organized body of religious and civil and military officials than is likely to have existed in the time of David. Fragments of old records may be incorporated in his work (e.g. 1 Ch 27<sup>25-31</sup>); but the older history shows no trace of the thousands of Levites, or of the bodies of 24,000 men continually under arms (1 Ch 27<sup>1-15</sup>) of which the later historian speaks.

Of most of D.'s wars we possess but a faint outline. The Ammonite war, on account of its length, is related at length. The complete victory over the Ammonites (2 S 23<sup>20</sup>) has been already named. For some unexplained reason D. made war on Moab, where his parents had formerly taken refuge, and, on conquering the country, treated it with great severity, putting to death two-thirds of the prisoners. The exploits of Benaiah (2 S 23<sup>20</sup>) may be referred to this campaign. Moab now became tributary. The next war was provoked by the Ammonites. Their king, Nahash, Saul's enemy (1 S 11), had shown himself friendly to D., and on his death D. sent an embassy of condolence to his successor Hanun. But Hanun, suspicious of D.'s intentions, and perhaps alarmed by the subjugation of Moab, dismissed the messengers with gross insults. The Ammonites knew that they must now prepare for war, and sought for alliances among the small Aramean kingdoms of Zobah, Beth-rehob, Maacah, and Tob, which were united in a common interest to check the Israel. Joab, with the Isr. army, marched out opposing him on both sides, divided his forces. With the picked troops he prepared to meet the Aramean allies, 83,000 strong, while the rest of the army he placed under the command of his brother Abishai, to confront the Ammonites. The rout of the Syrians by Joab was the signal for the flight of the Ammonites within the walls of their capital, and thus ended the first campaign. The next year Hadadezer, king of Zobah, summoned to his assistance allies from beyond the Euphrates. The whole Aramean force, under his general Shobach, was encamped at Helam, where D. himself, having crossed the Jordan at the head of the whole Isr. army, attacked them, and defeated them with great slaughter, Shobach being among the slain. All the chariot-horses which were captured were disabled, with the exception of sufficient for a hundred chariots. The summary (2 S 8<sup>5</sup>) seems to speak of another great victory won by D., when the Syrians of Damascus came to the assistance of Hadadezer. Zobah now made peace with Israel; prefects were appointed in Damascus and elsewhere, and, in addition to numerous presents, D. brought back to Jerus. the golden shields of Hadadezer's guard, and large quantities of brass from two of his treasure cities. An alliance was made between D. and Ton (2 S 8<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ch 18<sup>9</sup>), king of Hamath, and Hadoram (1 Ch 18<sup>10</sup>) the son of Ton was sent with gifts and greetings to David. These and other treasures, spoils taken from the Amalekites, D. is said to have sent to Jerus. (2 S 8<sup>10</sup>). Ammon remained unsubdued, but in a third campaign Joab besieged Rabbah, and at last succeeded in taking the city, part known as 'the city of waters.' As the fall of the city was now assured, Joab summoned D. from Jerus., that the king himself might have the glory of the conquest. D. advanced with a fresh army, and completed the victory. A large amount of spoil fell into his hands, including the costly gold crown of the idol Milcom (R.V.).

The prisoners, according to the Hebrew text of 2 S 8<sup>10</sup>, were tortured and treated with great cruelty. There are, however, difficulties about the rendering of the verse; a slight change of reading (see R.Vm) would give the meaning that they were made to serve (so H. Kautzsch). Stade regards the verse as a gloss. The conquests was that of D. in the Valley of Salt after his Syrian campaign (2 S 8<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ch 18<sup>10</sup>, Ps 60 title). By this conquest he obtained command of the ports on the Red Sea. Prefects were appointed in the cities, and for six months the population of Jerus. was increased (1 K 11<sup>12</sup>).

It now remains to relate certain events in D.'s own family which troubled the later years of his reign. During the Ammonite war, D., who had remained in Jerus., committed adultery with Bathsheba, the wife of one of his officers then serving before Rabbah. In hopes of covering up his guilt he sent for Uriah; but the latter, who had perhaps heard rumours of what had taken place, refused, on the plea of military duty, to see his wife. Thereupon D. sent orders to Joab to place Uriah in a post of danger, and ensure his death. When the husband was dead, and the time of mourning past, Bathsheba was taken into the royal harem. The story was doubtless not unknown in Jerus.; the moral sense of the people found expression through Nathan the prophet, who by means of a parable boldly rebuked David; and though on the king's confessing his guilt the prophet assured him of forgiveness, he predicted the death of Bathsheba's newly-born child. (2 S 12<sup>10-12</sup> are perhaps a later edition, a true comment on the subsequent history, for it has been pointed out that with the old Heb. ideas of guilt and penalty it is hardly consistent to regard the sin as forgiven [v. 13] while the curse remains. So Kuenen, Wellh., Stade.) In spite of all D.'s prayers and fastings, the child died; but in due time a second son was born to Bathsheba, the future king Solomon (2 S 11 12<sup>25</sup>).

It was probably not long afterwards that the fruit of D.'s evil example appeared. His eldest son Amnon outraged his half-sister Tamar, and when D. was greatly displeased, yet partly from his firstborn (13<sup>21</sup> LXX), partly perhaps from the remembrance of his own guilt, failed to punish the offender, the duty of avenging the maiden's wrong fell to her own brother Absalom. He waited his chance for two years, and then caused Amnon to be slain at a sheep-shearing feast, to which all the king's sons had been invited. Absalom fled to the court of his father-in-law, King of Geshur. D. mourned long for his son, then his longings turned to the son in exile; but out of season he could show severity. For three years Absalom remained in banishment; then Joab, divining the king's secret feelings, by the instrumentality of the woman of Tekoa procured his recall. For two years longer Absalom was excluded from the court, until he was compelled Joab to intercede for him, then he was brought to the king, and received a kiss of reconciliation (2 S 13. 14). After the death of Amnon, and probably also of Chileab, Absalom was the natural heir to the throne. He was now completely estranged from his father, and soon began to endeavor to win him. To impress the people, he issued a decree; to gain their favour, he would stand by the gate to meet all who came to the king with their suits, and lament that he was not king to do them justice. Thus he 'stole the hearts of the men of Israel.' There is no evidence that D., who used to 'execute judgments and justice to all his people' (2 S 8<sup>15</sup>), now neglected to do so. The stories of Nathan and the woman of Tekoa imply the contrary, but with the extension of the borders of Israel the number of suits may well have increased beyond the king's power to deal with them. We cannot say whether the crimes in the royal household had shaken the loyalty of the people,—in certain matters the nation at large did not show itself very sensitive to moral issues (2 S 16<sup>21-23</sup>),—but it is probable that at the removal of the capital to Jerus. was still a grievance, and the tribesmen of Judah seem to have considered themselves not sufficiently favoured by the king. Absalom made preparations for four years (15<sup>7</sup> LXX, Luc), then under pretence of a vow he visited the old sacred city of Hebron. Here he was joined by D.'s counsellor, Ahithophel of Giloh, perhaps the most able of D.'s advisers. Bathsheba (cf. 2 S 11<sup>3</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>), and her son, were proclaimed by Absalom throughout the country. D. was taken unawares by surprise, and resolved to withdraw at once from Jerus. If he escaped the first attack of the conspirators, he possessed better troops than were to be found on the other side. Delay would increase the difficulties of his position, and give his supporters time to rally. Leaving the palace in charge of ten concubines, he crossed the Kidron accompanied by his household and bodyguard, amid the weeping of the whole land, and took the road by Olivet to Jordan. Many traits of D.'s character are revealed during this flight,—the devotion which he showed to his followers, when Ittai of Gath, though but a short time in his service, refused to leave him; his piety and confidence, when he commanded the priests to carry back the ark, trusting to J', without any outward symbol of His presence; his craft and dissimulation, when he bade Hushai ingratiate himself with Absalom, and try to frustrate his plans; his prudence, in establishing communications between himself and the capital by means of Ahimaaz and Jonathan; his impetuous hastiness in judgment, when he promised Ziba the lands of Meribaal; and at the same time his submission and forbearance, when he endured the curses of Shimei because J' had bidden him, and urged that a Benjamite had more right than his own son to seek his life (2 S 15. 16<sup>1-24</sup>).

D.'s plan of meeting treachery by treachery was successful. By Ahithophel's advice, Absalom did take over his father's concubines as a token of succession to his throne; but, instead of pursuing D. at once, he accepted the counsel of Hushai, to wait till he could muster troops from the whole country. Ahithophel, who realized the artificial nature of the enthusiasm for Absalom, foresaw that this delay was fatal to the rebellion, and forthwith hanged himself. Warned by the two priests' sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, of the need of haste, D. and his followers crossed the Jordan in safety before daybreak. He took up his headquarters at Mahanaim, the former capital of Eshbaal, and there received support from Shobi, the son of his old protector the king of Ammon, who may now have been a vassal prince; from Machir, the guardian of Meribaal, and from a wealthy Gileadite named Barzillai (16<sup>15-17</sup>). Absalom was the first to act on the offensive, and crossed the Jordan with his army. D. was prevented from going into battle by the entreaty of the people, who urged that he was worth 10,000 of them; but he publicly charged his generals, Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, to deal gently with Absalom. Joab knew that he was strong enough to disobey, and that the death of the leader would put an end to the rebellion. D.'s soldiers were victorious, and Joab himself slew Absalom as he hung in the branches of a large terebinth. D. by the gate of Mahanaim awaited anxiously the issue of the day; then he forgot all else in his passionate grief for his ungrateful son. Joab, however, roused him to put his duty as a king above his private feelings as a father, and D. returned to the gate to receive the news of his servants who had risked their lives (18-19<sup>8</sup>).

Only tact and diplomacy were now required to bring about the king's return. Among the tribes of Israel a speedy revulsion of feeling took place, and they repented of their ingratitude to the king who had saved them from their enemies. But Judah still stood aloof; D. therefore sent to Zadok and Abiathar, to influence in his behalf the elders of his own tribe, and to urge them not to be behind the rest of Israel in bringing back their king. At the same time he sent a special message to Amasa, the son of his sister Abigail, whom Absalom had made commander-in-chief, and swore to give him the office now held by the self-willed Joab. The men of Judah were soon won over, and when, in response to their invitation, the king returned homewards, the tribe assembled at Gilgal on the Jordan to welcome him. Shimei came with them at the head of a thousand Benjamites, and implored D.'s pardon, which was freely granted. In spite of Abishai's remonstrance, D. would not have the day of his triumph marred by putting any man to death. To Meribaal, however, who also came to meet the king, D. gave less than justice. Meribaal charged Ziba with slandering him, and failing to provide him with an ass to follow D. in his flight; Ziba had said that his master was waiting in Jerus. in hopes of recovering his grandfather's throne. It was not easy to decide where the truth lay, and D. hastily dismissed the matter by bidding the two divide the land. The king appears in a more favourable light when he turns to reward his benefactors. He pressed the aged Barzillai, who accompanied him to Jordan, to come and live with him in Jerus.; and when Barzillai pleaded to be excused, on the ground of his great age, his son Chimham was allowed to take his place and be the recipient of the royal favours. But even before the king reached Jerus. it appeared that he had not succeeded in conciliating Judah without exciting the jealousy of the other tribes. While he had sent special messengers to his own tribesmen, he had taken no notice of the half-expressed goodwill of the rest of Israel. When therefore, at Gilgal, half the host of Israel came to escort D. home, they complained that the men of Judah had stolen him away; they had been slighted, although they had ten parts in the king, and the rights of the firstborn (2 S 19<sup>43</sup> LXX). A sharp dispute arose between the two sections of the nation, and a Benjamite, Sheba the son of Bichri, gave the signal for a fresh revolt. The men of Israel followed him, renouncing all part in the son of Jesse, while the men of Judah accompanied D. to Jerusalem. It was necessary to take immediate steps against the rebels. D. therefore bade Amasa assemble the forces of Judah within three days, thus tacitly depriving Joab of the supreme command. Amasa delayed beyond the appointed time, and D. was compelled to have recourse again to his old tried general. Joab (20<sup>6</sup> Pesh., MT Abishai) was bidden to take the royal bodyguard, 'the mighty men,' and pursue after Sheba. At Gibeon Amasa met him. It might have been expected how Joab would treat his rival; he took his opportunity to murder him, and then, with his troops, hastened to Abel-beth-maacah, a town in the far north of the country, where Sheba had taken refuge. To save the town the inhabitants delivered up Sheba's head, and the rebellion was at an end (19<sup>8-20<sup>22</sup></sup>). From 2 S 24<sup>18</sup> we infer with Ewald that Absalom's . . . for three months.

Some years must have elapsed before the closing scene of D.'s life. The old warrior, who at the time of Absalom's rebellion was never without resource, and had to be kept back by his soldiers from the battle, is now seen in the feebleness of extreme old age, kept within the palace, where no clothing will supply warmth to his bodily frame, and he is nursed by a fair young damsel of Shunem, named Abishag. He had neglected to make any definite arrangements with regard to the succession to the throne, but his eldest surviving son was generally regarded as the heir. This was Adonijah, a young man of great beauty, who had always been indulged by his fond father. Like Absalom before him, he assumed the state appropriate to the heir-apparent. On his side were most of D.'s older supporters, including Joab and Abiathar, but another party in the palace favoured Solomon, the son of D.'s favourite wife, Bathsheba. To the latter belonged the prophet Nathan, who perhaps felt that Adonijah was not the fittest man to rule, Zadok, the younger and probably rival priest, and Benaiah the captain of the bodyguard. An obvious danger awaited the unsuccessful aspirant to the throne after D.'s death (cf. 1 K 1<sup>21</sup>), and Adonijah resolved to make in good time a public declaration of his claims. He invited his supporters, including the king's sons and the royal officers of the tribe of Judah, to a feast at the sacred stone of Zoheleth, at the lower end of the Kidron Valley, and here the guests are said to have greeted Adonijah as already king. But tidings of this step were brought by Nathan to Bathsheba, and at the prophet's advice she informed the king, and reminded him of a promise that her son should reign. By agreement Nathan came in and confirmed her words, whereupon D. repeated with an oath to Bathsheba the promise that Solomon should succeed. Then, rousing himself to act, the old king commanded Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah to place Solomon on the royal mule, conduct him to the spring of Gihon, and solemnly proclaim him king. The support of Benaiah and the troops would make opposition useless. D.'s orders were carried out, Solomon was anointed, and a rejoicing crowd escorted the young king back to the city to set him on the royal throne. The shouts from Gihon, half-way up the Kidron Valley, had reached Adonijah at his feast, when Jonathan the son of Abiathar came in with news of Solomon's coronation. The guests fled, and Adonijah took sanctuary at the altar, but received from Solomon a promise of his life on condition of good conduct (1 K 1).

Our narrative in 1 K 21-12 gives us an unpleasant picture of D.'s last days. He is represented as counselling Solomon to do good to Barzillai, but not to let Joab or Shimei die in peace. The genuineness of the narrative is much disputed. Vv 2-4 are doubtless a later edition by a Deuteronomist editor; Wellh., Stade, Kautzsch reject the whole of vv. 1-9; but it seems more probable that vv. 5-9 formed part of the original document (so Kuenen, Budde, Kittel, Cheyne). Their historical character is another question, which can only be judged on subjective grounds. It is argued, with considerable exaggeration, that D. was too infirm to trouble about public matters, or to counsel his successor, and that another tradition gives us a religious song under the title of D.'s 'Last Words' (2 S 23<sup>1-7</sup>). We must not measure the advice ascribed to D. by our own standard. A young and untried ruler like Solomon might be endangered by opponents whom D. was strong enough to spare; and the king, who had delivered up to death Saul's seven sons to atone for their father's guilt, may have feared that the curse of Shimei, or the murders of Joab, unless avenged, would bring down on some other man. To us the words : "D.'s mouth do not appear seemly for a dying man, or in accordance with the noblest traits of D.'s character, it cannot be said they are impossible. Many would be glad to think that they are only due to the historian, who represented D. as the real author of some of Solomon's earliest acts, hoping to glorify the aged king, or else to clear the memory of the builder of the temple. It is easy to understand why a later historian preferred to ascribe to D. far nobler sentiments when he recorded the king's last words and his final charge to Solomon (1 Ch 28. 29).

D. is recorded to have reigned 7 years and 6 months in Hebron, and 33 years in Jerus. (2 S 2<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>4f</sup>, 1 K 2<sup>11</sup>). Forty years is a conventional round number in Heb. chronology, but the figure is approximately correct. Absalom, who was born in Hebron (2 S 3<sup>2</sup>), was grown up at the time of Amnon's outrage; his rebellion took place some 10 or 11 years later (13<sup>28-38</sup> 14<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>7</sup>), and, as was remarked above, several years must have intervened between this and D.'s death. Again, the Philistines and Moabites had been subdued before the Ammonite war; the marriage of Bathsheba took place in the third campaign against Ammon; and Solomon, her second son by D., was of full age when he came to the throne. Since D., when he first appears before Saul, is a tried warrior, he must have died at an advanced age. According to 2 S 5<sup>4f</sup> he reached 70 years. He was buried in the capital, which received from him the name of the 'city of David'; and after the return from exile the sepulchres of D. were still pointed out between Siloam and the 'house of the mighty men' (Neh 3<sup>15f</sup> ; cf. Ac 2<sup>29</sup>).

Later biblical writers and editors describe D. as he appeared to the Jews of their own age. To the compiler of the Books of Kings D. is a standard of piety, with whom his successors are compared, he is the king whose 'heart was perfect with J'' (1 K 14 etc.), 'who turned not aside save in the matter of Uria' the Hittite' (2b 15b) understood, passes entirely o the troubles in his family (see esp. 1 Ch 20). He represents the later years as absorbed in preparations for the temple, he has accumulated vast treasures, and he exhorts the people to give freely for the same purpose (1 Ch 22, 29). He arranges for the services of the future sanctuary, organizing the sacred choirs, and determining the courses of priests and Levites, porter- and treasurers (chs 22-26). Finally, he hands to Solomon the pattern of the temple, which has been revealed to him by God (28<sup>11-19</sup>), and admonishes his son on the sacred duty which has been laid upon him (22:19-24:10) in these chapters, as in many parts of the arrangements described for these vicies are those of Zerubbabel's temple, though on a grander scale. In the older records the only direct connexion between D. and the temple is that implied in his sacrifice at Araunah's threshing-floor (2 S 24<sup>18-25</sup>), and possibly in his dedication of his spoils (2 Ch. 8<sup>14</sup>). Older material may well underlie the narrative of the Chronicler or his authority, but for our knowledge of D. and his times we must rely entirely on the Books of Kings.

Allusion has been made earlier in this article to D's connexion with the Psalter. Minuter study makes it more and more difficult to conceive of him as the author of some of the most spiritual products of the OT religion. This is not merely on account of D's sins, acknowledged and repented of, but because of his crude ideas on religious matters which appear from time to time in the old records, and because the historians attribute to him, apparently without blame, both words and acts, which from the standard of a higher religion must be emphatically condemned. D. was first introduced to Saul as a minstrel; as a deviser of musical instruments he is named in Am 6<sup>8</sup>. The Lament over Saul and Jonathan, a secular song, reveals to us D's poetic power; as a composer of sacred poems he appears in the appendix to Samuel (2 S 22, 23<sup>1-7</sup>) and in Chronicles (esp. 1 Ch 16<sup>7-39</sup>). How much older this representation may be is hard to say; but it points to a tradition that D. was the father of Israel's psalms, and it would be rash to deny the fact that many of the psalms or portions of psalms of David are to be found in the Psalter. If such there be, we may expect to find them in the group of psalms which Ewald selected as being genuinely Davidic, viz. Ps 3, 4, 7, 8, 11, 15, 18, 19<sup>1-6</sup>, 24<sup>1-6</sup>, 7-10, 29, 32, 101, and the fragments 60<sup>6-9</sup>, 68<sup>13-18</sup>, 144<sup>12-14</sup>; but probably this list requires to be considerably reduced. By the titles 73 psalms are assigned to D, the principal ones being Ps 3-41 (omitting 10, 33) and 51-70 (omitting 66, 67). In the LXX the number is somewhat larger, the title 'to David' being added to 14 more (including 93-99 Heb.), but omitted in some MSS from 3 or 4 others. The following special occasions are named in the Heb. titles:—3, when he fled from Absalom; 7, concerning the words of Cush, a Benjamite; 18, when J<sup>h</sup> delivered him from his enemies and from Saul; 30, at the dedication of the House; 34, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech; 51, after his rebuke by Nathan; 52, when Doeg denounced him to Saul; 54, when the Ziphites betrayed his hiding-place; 56, when the Philistines took him in Gath; 57, when he fled from Saul, in the cave; 59, when Saul's messengers watched the house to kill him; 60, after the defeat of Edom in the Valley of Salt; 63, in the wilderness of Judah; 142, when he was in the cave.

The character of D. has been very variously estimated, exaggerated praise naturally producing a revulsion to the opposite extreme. Undue weight has often been attached to the description of D. as 'the man after God's own heart', but the phrase, which occurs only in 1 S 13<sup>14</sup> (quoted thence in Ac 13<sup>22</sup>), may be seen in the original context to denote one according to God's mind or purpose, one who possesses the necessary qualities for a ruler of Israel (cf. Jer 3<sup>15</sup>). It has been more difficult to apply this to D., on account of the different representations, found together in the Bible, but belonging to very different dates. The picture in Chron. of a Jewish saint has led many to censure unfairly the warrior king of a rude age. But if a critical examination of our authorities compels us to reject as unhistorical some pious deeds or noble words attributed to D., on the other hand it affords a more trustworthy standard by which to measure D.'s position among his contemporaries, and removes many of the glaring inconsistencies which have occasioned difficulties to students and historians.

We may first look at the darker side of his character and its numerous limitations, which show that he did not rise entirely above the level of the barbarous age in which he lived. His foreign wars are sometimes marked by very great cruelty. Even if the Ammonites were not tortured, yet in his desert raids no life was spared (1 S 27<sup>9ff</sup>), and the victories over Moab and Edom were followed by massacres. The story of the patriarch Jacob suggests that deception and cunning were part of the Isr. character; certainly they often appear in D.'s history. The deceit practised at Nob may be excused by his circumstances; his professions of loyalty to Achish (1 S 28<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>3</sup>) may have been cautious words used to one who has power to compel; but the continued fraud practised at Ziklag points to a man who was used to crooked dealing; he could induce Hushai to counteract Ahithophel's advice by mean and treacherous ways; and after his sin with Bathsheba he stooped to base and cowardly means to conceal his guilt and remove Uriah from his path. Moreover, D.'s religious beliefs fell far short of the teaching of the great prophets. If he did not himself worship idols, he at least allowed Michal to keep the teraphim in his house; and to determine the will of God he had constant recourse to the sacred ephod. He associated the worship of J' with His presence in the land of Israel, could think that J' had stirred up Saul to pursue him, and that His displeasure might be removed by the fragrance of a sacrifice (1 S 26<sup>19</sup>); and he put to death seven innocent men to procure J''s favour for the land (2 S 21<sup>1-14</sup>). And there are other blemishes in D.'s character. He can judge a case on the impulse of a moment (2 S 16<sup>4</sup>), or dismiss one but half heard (19<sup>20</sup>); and breaks out against Nabal into a passionate desire for vengeance. The great sins of his life, his adultery with Bathsheba and murder of Uriah, are perhaps but the common crimes of an Oriental despot; but, so far as we can judge, they were not common to Israel, and D. as well as his subjects knew of a higher moral standard. Lastly, his weakness in dealing with his own family is little to his credit. The imperious Joab is 'too hard' for him; Amnon and Adonijah are indulged and spoiled, and even the outrageous conduct of the former meets with no punishment; Absalom and Adonijah are allowed to declare their pretensions to the crown, while D. neglects to take proper measures to determine the succession to the throne. But in justice to D. it must be remembered that his family difficulties were in part the natural outcome of polygamy, and partly due to the state of culture of his time. In the East the same unwise and selfish love is still often manifested by a brave father to his children. The last charge to Solomon (1 K 2<sup>1-6</sup>) has been already sufficiently discussed.

It is now necessary to turn to the other side of the picture, remembering that we must not expect to find a saint, but a king, a hero, and a man. No testimony to D. could be more eloquent than that of the charm he exerted on all who had to do with him. Everywhere he inspires love and devotion. Jonathan is his closest friend; Saul, Michal, all Israel love him. It is the same in later years. Achish pronounces him blameless (1 S 29<sup>6-9</sup>); whatever D. does pleases the people (2 S 3<sup>36</sup>); the three mighty men risk their life to bring him a draught of water; his soldiers call him the 'lamp of Israel,' and will not let him endanger himself in battle (2 S 21<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>); Ittai of Gath will follow him in life or death (ib. 15<sup>21</sup>). Nor was this devotion and admiration undeserved. A brave and successful warrior, who had fought many a campaign against his country's foes, he safely led and ruled the rough men who gathered round him as an outlaw. His justice was experienced alike by Nabal's shepherds and his own followers (1 S 25<sup>7-15f</sup> 30<sup>28-25</sup>); his concern for his followers' lives is seen when he cannot drink the water from the well of Bethlehem. Hasty and passionate he could be, even in his zeal for justice (2 S 4<sup>9-12</sup> 12<sup>3f</sup>); but far more marked is his signal generosity. He spares Saul's life when he is in his power (1 S 24. 26), and laments for his death in a noble song (2 S 1); the messenger from Mt. Gilboa and the murderers of Eshbaal are put to death, when they think that they are bringing D. good tidings. He can bear with Shimei's curses during his flight, and forgive him freely on his return. For the sake of Jonathan he spares and shows favour to his son, and in the person of Chimham he repays the kindness of Barzillai. The warmth and tenderness of D.'s affection is revealed in his lamentation for his 'brother' Jonathan; and still more in his own family, as in his distress at the illness of Bathsheba's child, or at the death of Amnon and Absalom. Nor are higher elements wanting in D.'s religion; as may be seen from his simple but pious faith, when he dances before the ark, and is ready to abase himself before J' who has exalted him (2 S 6<sup>21</sup>); or still more when he prepares to leave Jerus. without the protection of the ark. He accepts his misfortunes with resignation, and acknowledges them as the consequence of his sins; while he retains his trust in God's goodness (2 S 12<sup>22f</sup> 15<sup>26f</sup> 16<sup>10-12</sup> 24<sup>14-17</sup>). And even in the record of his sin his better qualities come out; for not many rulers would have accepted such a plain rebuke, or manifested such sincere repentance. When compared with a Joab or a Gideon, we recognize the greatness of David's character.

But it is especially as a ruler that D. left his mark on his own generation and on posterity. He set himself to free his country from its enemies, to secure it against invasion, and to make the people one. Jerus. was virtually his creation; he strove to make it the religious and political centre of his kingdom; and the discontent of Judah bears witness to the zeal with which he laboured for the whole nation, and not only for his own tribe. His efforts were the more successful, because with remarkable penetration (cf. 2 S 14<sup>13</sup>) he always knew the right measures to adopt. He wins the Judæan elders by judicious reverts, but can wait at Hebron for Eshbaal's fall; he thanks the men of Jabesh-gilead, disavows all part in Abner's murder, retires from the first attack of Absalom, but keeps up communication with the capital. In all the varied difficulties of his eventful life he is never without resource. Nor was he negligent of the administration of his kingdom. It is said that he 'executed judgment and justice to all his people' (2 S 8<sup>15</sup>); and this statement is borne out by the readiness with which he listened to Nathan or the woman of Tekoa. Doubtless he once forced a census on an unwilling people, but except in one instance we never hear of him using his power for selfish ends.

In two respects the reign of D. became an ideal for later times. He was remembered as a just and patriotic ruler; and when oppression and injustice became only too common in Israel, the great prophets looked forward to a time when again a righteous king should sit on his throne (Jer 23<sup>5</sup>, cf. Is 16<sup>5</sup>); and the name of D. became the symbol of the ideal ruler of his line, who they believed must come (Jer 30<sup>9</sup>, Ezk 34<sup>23f.</sup> 37<sup>24f.</sup>), and who was afterwards termed the Messiah. Again, it was through D. that the group of Isr. tribes became a powerful nation, and extended its sway over the neighbouring peoples. Thus Israel began to feel that it had a mission in the world; and though D.'s empire began to melt away even before his successor's death, this conviction never died, even in the darkest hour. Still the people believed that in God's own time they would be called upon once more to subdue the surrounding nations (cf. Am 9<sup>12</sup>), or like a second D. to proclaim to heathen races JH's great and holy name (cf. Is 55<sup>3-5</sup>).

LITERATURE.—For the analysis of Samuel see esp. Wellhausen, 248-266, Kuenen, Uebersetzung (1890), I, 111-112, for the text, Driver, Text of the Bible, 2b, Proph. of Samuel, 111-112, of Chronicles, 2b, Proph. of Samuel, 111-112, tr. (1885), p. 171 ff. See, further, W. R. Smith, David, in Encycl. Brit.; Dillmann, Samuel, Philister und Hebr. History, Eng. tr. in 54-203; Kittel, Hist. of the Hebrew Chyene, Devout Study of Criticism (1892).

H. A. WHITE.

DAY (יֹם, hēma).—In Hebrew the word 'day' is frequently used in phrases such as 'day of distress,' 'of evil,' 'of calamity,' 'of death' (cf. 'day of salvation,' Is 49<sup>8</sup>), which for the most part explain themselves. It is also used more widely of time in general, esp. when some event is described vividly as that of a single day, e.g. Dt 16<sup>3</sup>, Jg 18<sup>31</sup>, Mal 3<sup>2</sup> (יֹם with infin. or perf., but not יָמִים), which refers to some particular day, 2 S 19<sup>19</sup> (20 Heb.), Est 9<sup>1</sup>). With the genitive we find the singular used to denote the birthday, or festival day, Job 3<sup>1</sup>, Hos 7<sup>5</sup>; and (2) the time of calamity or death, Jer 50<sup>31</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>25</sup>, 1 S 26<sup>10</sup>, Ps 37<sup>13</sup>, Job 18<sup>20</sup>. The plural 'days,' according to a very common idiom, denotes the lifetime, reign, or period of any one, Gn 26<sup>1</sup>, Jg 5<sup>6</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>21</sup>, Is 1<sup>1</sup> etc. Hence the repeated יָמֵי of K and Ch = Annals. With a local proper name the 'day' implies some notable battle, a signal judgment or disaster, e.g. Is 9<sup>4</sup> the day of the defeat of Midian; Ps 137<sup>7</sup> the day of the fall of Jerus.; Ezk 30<sup>9</sup> the day of Egypt; Hos 11<sup>1</sup> the day of Jezreel. With the prophets 'in that day' is a common formula in describing what is to come at some future period of blessing or retribution, Is 2<sup>11</sup>, Jer 4<sup>9</sup>, Am 2<sup>16</sup> etc. etc. Cf. also the phrases 'Lo, days are coming' (esp. in Jer and Am), and 'in the latter end of the days' (יְמֵי הַאֲחֵרִים), i.e. at the end of the period to which the prophet's vision extends, e.g. Gn 49<sup>1</sup> (the time of the settlement in Canaan), Dt 4<sup>30</sup> (Israel's repentance in exile), Hos 3<sup>5</sup>, Mic 4<sup>1</sup> (the Messianic period).

Many of these expressions have passed into the language of NT, e.g. 'in the days of Herod,' Mt 2<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>5</sup>; 'in these (those) days,' Lk 13<sup>31</sup> 21, Ac 3<sup>24</sup>; 'in the last days,' 2 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>, Ja 5<sup>8</sup>; also 'my day,' the day when Christ appeared among men, Jn 8<sup>56</sup>; 'the day of salvation,' the time during which salvation is offered to mankind, 2 Co 6<sup>2</sup>; 'the evil day' of trial and temptation, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>; 'in that day,' e.g. when Christ reveals Himself more fully to His disciples, Jn 14<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>. In particular, the last day of the present dispensation, when Christ shall return to earth for the final judgment, is described in various phrases:

'the day,' He 10<sup>25</sup>; 'that day,' Mt 7<sup>22</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>; 'the last day,' Jn 6<sup>39</sup> 11<sup>24</sup>; 'the day of judgment,' Mt 11<sup>22</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup>; 'the day of Christ,' Ph 1<sup>10</sup>; 'the day of the Lord,' 2 Th 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. Lk 17<sup>30</sup>, Ro 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, Rev 6<sup>17</sup> etc.; 'the day of God,' 2 P 3<sup>12</sup>.

Prob. it is with allusion to the 'day of the Lord' or 'the day of judgment' that St. Paul uses the phrase 'of man's day' (ὁ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἡμέρας) to denote mere human judgment (1 Co 4<sup>3</sup>).

The contrast between day and night gives rise to certain expressions. Thus 'day' is the period of time during which there is opportunity for working (Jn 9<sup>4</sup>, cf. 11<sup>9</sup>). Christians are said to belong to the day, since they should abstain from evil deeds, which are usually done under the cover of darkness, 1 Th 5<sup>5-8</sup>, cf. Ro 13<sup>13</sup>. On the other hand, this life, with its ignorance, trials, and difficulties, is contrasted with the future day of fuller knowledge (2 P 1<sup>19</sup>) and of completed salvation (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>). See also TIME; for the Creative 'Day' see COSMOGONY; and for Day of the Lord see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

H. A. WHITE.

DAY OF ATONEMENT.—See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

DAY'S JOURNEY (Gn 30<sup>38</sup> יָמֵי יוֹרָד, Jon 3<sup>4</sup> יָמֵי יוֹרָד, Lk 24<sup>4</sup> ἡμέρας ὁδοῦ).—When the making of a day's journey is mentioned, if any one, we are not to understand the person travelled for a day or for so many hours thereof. 'Day's journey' is no mere indication of time, but a real though very indefinite measure of space. Its length would vary according to the nature of the ground traversed; on a level plain it would be longer than over a country broken by hills or water-courses. Its distance would, again, be conditioned by the circumstances or capabilities of the traveller; a messenger on a hasty errand (cf. Gn 31<sup>28</sup>) would achieve better results than a caravan, the rate of which would be regulated by the slowest beast of burden. A sturdy courier, without undue exertion, might put 25 to 30 miles behind him in a day; while a caravan, with its encumbrances, would not be able to overtake more than about 20 miles at the most. The camel usually proceeds at a rate of about 2½ miles an hour, and as 6 to 8 hours would be sufficient for a day, a caravan (probably implied Lk 24<sup>4</sup>) might accomplish 15 to 20 miles; with much impedimenta, as recorded in the travels of the Israelites Nu 10<sup>38</sup>, the distance would necessarily be much less. In the present-day journey of 22½ miles is said to be the average distance of a caravan. We may, in connexion with the 'day's journey' an average distance of 20 to 25 miles. See further SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY.

A. GRIEVE.

DAYS MAN.—In 1 Co 4<sup>8</sup> 'man's judgment' is lit. 'man's day' (ἀνθρώπου ἡμέρα), and is so tr'd in Wyclif, Tind., Cov., and Rheims; for the word 'day,' or its equivalent, has been used in many languages in the sense of a day for hearing causes and judgment (See DAY). From 'day' in this sense was formed the word 'daysman,' after the example of craftsman, herdsman, and the like, to signify a judge, umpire, or arbiter. The oldest instance given in Oxf. Eng. Dict. is Plumpton Corresp. (1489) p. 82, 'Sir, the dayesmen cannot agree us'; the next, Coverdale's tr. of Job 9<sup>3</sup>, 'Neither is there any dayes man to reprove both the partes, or to laye his honde betwixte us,' from whom it has been retained in AV and RV.

J. HASTINGS.

DAYSPRING.—Job 38<sup>12</sup> 'Hast thou . . . caused the dayspring to know his place?' (שָׁמַר); Wis 16<sup>28</sup>

'at the day-spring pray unto thee' (πρὸς ἀνατολὴν φωτός, 'at the dawning of the day'); and Lk 17<sup>8</sup> 'the d. from on high hath visited us' (ἀνατολὴ ἐξ ὐψους). The word is of freq. occurrence for the dawn of day, as Eden, Decades (1555), p. 264, 'The day sprynge or dawninge of the daye gyveth a certeyne lyght before the rysinge of the soonne.' Davies (Bible Eng. p. 249) points out that virtually the same expression occurs in Jg 19<sup>25</sup> 'when the day began to spring, they let her go,' and 1 S 9<sup>25</sup> 'it came to pass about the spring of the day.' In Gn 32<sup>24</sup> the marg. has 'ascending of the morning' for 'breaking of the day'; and in Ps 65<sup>3</sup> east and west are called 'the outgoings of the morning and evening.'

J. HASTINGS.

DAY-STAR.—This is Wyclif's transl. of the Gr. φωσφόρος in 2 P 1<sup>12</sup>, and he has been followed by all translators. The Eng. word (in all VSS: RV here are two sep. words, 'day star,' RV 'day-star') was used in two senses. (1) It signified the planet Venus (Lat. Lucifer), that star which preceded or accompanied the rising of the sun, the morning star, as in Lydgate, Temple of Glas, l. 11, '... of sterres . . . O Venus . . . O mighti goddess, daister after nyght'; and Holland's Pliny, ll. 8, 'For all the while that shee [the planet Venus] shyneth in the morning, and riseth Oriental . . . the name of Lucifer (or Day Starre) as a second sun hastening the day.' (2) It was applied metaphorically to the sun, especially by Milton, as Paradise Lost, l. 115—

'So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams.'

In 2 P the word is used in the first sense, the morning star. The passage is therefore parallel to Rev 22<sup>16</sup> 'the morning star,' and 22<sup>16</sup> 'the bright, the morning star.' These passages, Plumptre thinks, are evidence that this had come to be recognized among the apostolic Christians as a symbolic name of the Lord Jesus as manifested to the souls of His people.

Wyclif has 'day-star' in Job 38<sup>32</sup> 'Whether thou bryngist forth Lucifer, that is, dai-sterre, in his tyme'; and it is found in Is 14<sup>12</sup> AVm and RV 'O day star,' AV text 'O Lucifer.' See LUCIFER.

J. HASTINGS.

DEACON.—The words διδκονος (-eiv-la) refer to service rendered without regard to the quality of the person rendering it. Thus the διδκονοι at a feast may be either bond or free; and any one doing such service is a διδκ. for the time being. Thus, in NT they are used—(1) of service generally (Ac 12<sup>25</sup>, Ro 15<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>); (2) of our Lord's work in particular (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>); (3) of the temporal ruler (Ro 13<sup>4</sup>) as θεοῦ διδκ.; (4) of the work of the apostles (e.g. Ac 17<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>): but in none of these places is there any trace of διδκονος as an official title. The transition is found Ro 12<sup>7</sup>, where the διακονία in contrast with προφήτεια, διδασκαλία, παράκλησις, seems to indicate specific services, though the διδκονος himself is not mentioned. (Cf. Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 193 f.).

Where do we first find official διδκονοι? In Ac 5<sup>8</sup> οἱ νεώτεροι are of course tacitly contrasted (as Lk 22<sup>26</sup>) with οἱ πρεσβύτεροι; but the parallel νεανίσκοι in 5<sup>10</sup> seems to show that the contrast is only of age, not of office. Coming to Ac 6, were 'the seven' deacons? Permanent officials of some sort they probably were; if we take account of St. Luke's way of recording 'beginnings' of movements.

For the common identification of them with the later deacons, we have (1) The general correspondence of their duties. (2) The word διακονεῖν τραπέζαις used of them, though this is balanced by διακονία τοῦ λόγου of the apostles themselves in the next verse. (3) Common opinion from Irenæus (Hæc. iii. 12. 10, iv. 15. 1 'Stephanus primus diaconus') onward. (4) The number of deacons limited to seven at Rome (Cornelius ap. Eus. HE vi. 43: also Soz. HE vii. 19, referring to Ac 6), and by Conc. Neocæs. Can. 15, also referring to Ac 6, though Conc. Trull. Can. 16 rejects it.

Against it, (1) They are nowhere in NT called διδκονοι, and Philip in Ac 21<sup>8</sup> is simply 'one of the Seven.' So neither is their work called διακονία. (2) The qualifications laid down Ac 6<sup>3</sup> for the seven are higher than those required by St. Paul, 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, for deacons. (3) Of the Seven, Stephen was largely a preacher, and Philip in Ac 21<sup>8</sup> (some twenty-five years later) holds the much higher rank of an evangelist. (4) The Seven evidently rank next to the apostles, and have much the same position at Jerusalem as the presbyters we find a little later. The arguments are not very strong either way; but, upon the whole, the adverse one seems the stronger, for this is a question on which tradition (150 years to Irenæus) would seem specially liable to slip. The Seven, then, would seem to have been neither (a) deacons, nor (b) temporary officers (Weizsacker), and concern us no further if they were (c) almoners pure and simple (Conc. Trull. supra), or (d) presbyters (Ritschl), though they may have been (e) the original from which both the two later orders diverged, of deacons and presbyters (Lange).

In any case, the first explicit mention of deacons (Ph 1<sup>1</sup>) is at Philippi, about A.D. 63; and again (1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>) at Ephesus a few years later. They are not mentioned with Titus in Crete, but afterwards every church seems to have had its deacons.

Concerning Jewish parallels to the office. The deacon has no likeness to the Levite, who was rather a porter of the temple, who looked after the beasts, and sang in the choir. Neither do the deacons resemble the single שׂוֹמֵר (Lk 4<sup>20</sup>, ὑπηρέτης) of the synagogue, who was more like our verger, opening and shutting the doors, cleaning the building, handing the roll of the Law to the reader, etc. The nearest Jewish parallel is the גַּבְיָן or collectors of the alms. This phrase, however, rather suggests the tax-gatherer (גַּבְיָן מַכְסִּים, 2 K 23<sup>35</sup> Targ., with which compare Clement, Ep. 42, misquoting Is 60<sup>17</sup>), than the deacon whose duties lay so much among the poor. Upon the whole, the office was substantially new.

Qualifications are laid down by St. Paul (1 Ti 3) first for the bishop, then for the deacon. Generically they are alike, but with clear specific differences. Each must be grave, temperate, and free from greed of money, the husband of one wife, and a good ruler of his own house. But while the deacon may serve, if there is no actual charge against him, the bishop must be ἀνεκκλητος—one against whom no just charge can be made. The deacon's temperance and gravity are emphasized for the bishop, who is further reminded that if he cannot rule his own house well, he cannot be trusted to rule the house of God. The deacon is specially told not to be double-tongued or a lover of dirty gain, whereas it is enough to say generally that the bishop is not to be a lover of money. Then the bishop must have συντριβὴν ὁμιλίας for dealing with other men. He must be able to teach others, whereas it is enough for the deacon to hold the mystery of faith in a pure conscience. He must also be a lover of hospitality, and a moderate and peaceable man, with some experience, and a good character even among the heathen.

Different qualifications point to different duties. The deacon's work evidently consists very much in visiting and relieving the poor, where his special temptations would be in one direction to gossip and slander, in the other to picking and stealing from the alms. If he uses his office well, he may look forward to a good footing towards God, and much boldness towards men. On the other hand, the teaching, the hospitality, and the general intercourse with Christians and heathens, which are so conspicuous in the bishop's work, seem no regular part of the deacon's.

Of the appointment of deacons we are told very little. In the case of the Seven (Ac 6), first the apostles lay down the qualifications required, then the Church elects seven, then the apostles approve and admit them. In the Pastoral Epistles St. Paul does not get beyond the first stage of laying down qualifications, though Timothy is plainly intended to approve the candidates, and there is no hint given that the Church did not elect them. The process would most likely be the same as for the bishops or elders.

H. M. GWATKIN.

DEACONESS.—See WOMAN.

DEADLY has now only an active meaning, 'causing death'; but formerly was passive also, 'subject to death.' Thus Wyclif's tr. of 1 Co 15<sup>53</sup> is, 'For it byhoueth this corruptible thing to clothe vncorruptioun, and this deedly thing to putte awei vndeedlinesse.' Wyclif has 'deadly' in all passages in which AV has 'mortal' (except that in Job 4<sup>17</sup> he omits the adj.), as well as often elsewhere, as He 7<sup>8</sup> 'heere deedi men taken tithis,' Ja 5<sup>17</sup> 'Elye was a deedi man lijk vs.' In AV d. occurs in this sense Rev 13<sup>3,12</sup> 'his d. wound was healed' (πληγή τοῦ θανάτου, RV 'death-stroke'); and as an adv. Ezk 30<sup>24</sup> 'a d. wounded man' (לְיָדוֹ).

J. HASTINGS.

DEAD SEA (Arab. Bahr Lūt, or 'Sea of Lot').—This remarkable inland lake lies in the deepest part of the depression of the earth's surface which stretches from the Gulf of Akabah northwards into the Jordan Valley (see ARABAH). The name 'Dead Sea' is not found in the Bible, and appears first to have been used in Gr. (θάλασσα νεκρά) by Pausanias and Galen, and in Lat. by Justin. In OT it is known as the Salt Sea (Gn 14<sup>3</sup>, Dt 3<sup>17</sup>) and as the Sea of the Arabah (Jos 3<sup>16</sup>). Both these names are appropriate and expressive of its physical conditions. With reference to its geographical situation, it is called the East Sea (Ezk 47<sup>18</sup>, Jl 2<sup>20</sup>). The name 'Asphaltites' given to it by Josephus (Ant. I. ix.) is derived from the deposits of bitumen which are found in some of the valleys entering the W. shore; and, lastly, the name Dead Sea (Mare mortuum) is used to indicate the absence of animal life in its waters. This is owing, not so much to the high salinity of the waters, as to the large proportion of bromide of magnesium which they contain. In the streams, often of a high temperature, which enter the lake to the S. of the promontory of El-Lisân, some living forms are exceedingly abundant, especially those of small fishes of the genus Cyprinodon. The name 'Bahr Lūt,' by which the Dead Sea is known amongst the Arabs, is a remarkable instance of the persistence of traditional names amongst these E. tribes, if, as is believed by not a few, it comes down to us through a period of nearly 4000 years, and has been preserved by the descendants of the patriarch Lot, who took possession of the territory of Moab and Ammon on the borders of the Arabian desert overlooking the Dead Sea basin, and who naturally associated this inland lake with the name of their progenitor who had lived on its shores (Gn 13<sup>14</sup>).

Physical Features.—The Dead Sea lies nearly N.-S. along a line corresponding to that of the Jordan Valley; its length is 47 miles, and its greatest breadth about 10 miles. It receives the waters of the Jordan from the N.; those of El-Hessi, El-Jeib, and El-Fikreh from the S.; those of the Kerak, Arnon (Mojib), Zerka Ma'in from the E., and the Kidron (En-Nar) and several lesser streams from the W.; and as the Dead Sea, like all salt lakes, has no outlet, the consequence is that the waters which enter it pass off in the form of vapour into the atmosphere. The quantity of water poured into the Dead Sea basin must be very great, especially during the months of April and May, when the Jordan is swollen by the melting of the snow in the Lebanon range; but such is the dryness of the air and the heat of the sun's rays in the Ghôr that this increased supply fails permanently to raise the level of the surface, which seems only to rise and fall within the limits of 10 to 15 ft., between the months of October and May, as estimated by Dr. Robinson from the position of the driftwood along the shore.

El-Lisân.—The Dead Sea is divided into two unequal portions by a remarkable promontory known as 'El-Lisân' (the tongue), which projects outwards from the E. shore for a distance of half the breadth of the lake. This promontory seems to be referred to in the passage describing the boundary of the lot of the tribe of Judah (Jos 15<sup>2</sup>, נֶחֱלֶה, 'tongue'). El-Lisân is composed, according to Lartet, of white calcareous marl with beds of salt and gypsum. It breaks off in a cliff facing the W., 300 ft. high and 9 miles long, terminating northwards at Point Costigan, and is connected with the Moabite coast by a narrow neck of marshy land. The terraced form, as well as the composition, of El-Lisân show that it was once part of the bed of the lake when its waters rose several hundred feet higher than at present; and it corresponds in character and composition to the terraced ridge of Khashm Usdum now to be described.

Khashm Usdum (or Salt-mountain).—This remarkable ridge follows the W. shore of the lake from Umm Zoghal southwards to the banks of Wady el-Fikreh at the S. margin of the Ghôr, a distance of 7 miles. Its upper surface is about 600 ft. above the lake, and seen from a distance appears flat; but it is deeply furrowed and seamed by streamlets, which have penetrated into the mass below. The upper part of Khashm Usdum is formed of strata of white saliferous and gypseous marl, the lower of solid salt-rock; and these materials are laid open to view in the nearly vertical cliff along which the ridge breaks off on the E. side. There can be no doubt that this terrace, like that of El-Lisân, and others to be found at intervals on both sides of the lake, were parts of the bed of the lake itself when its waters stood at a much higher level than at present. It is separated from the base of the limestone table-land by a valley of broken ground, strewn with blocks of rock, about half a mile in width, and eroded by torrential action.

The Ascent of Akrabim ('scorpions').—From the S. shore of the lake an extensive tract, composed partly of slime, partly of woods and pasture, extends as far as the semicircular terrace which bounds the Ghôr in that direction. This marsh is liable to floods, and its surface is strewn with trunks of trees brought down by the torrents. The terrace by which it is bounded is 500 ft. high, and is formed of marls overlaid by beds of sand, gravel, and loam, which extend southwards into the Arabah. They are deposits formed over the old bed of the lake when its waters were 500-600 ft. above their present level. The terrace seems to answer to the 'Ascent of Akrabbim' referred to in Jos 15<sup>8</sup> in connexion with the boundary of Judah. Robinson regards the terrace as marking the limits of the Jordan and the Arabah respectively: a view in which the present writer concurs.

Level of the Surface.—The Dead Sea was sounded in 1848 by Lieut. Lynch, who found that it descended to a depth of 1278 ft. at a point about 5 miles N. of Costigan. It is now known that the surface itself descends to a greater depth below that of the ocean than any sheet of water on the globe. This fact remained unknown until 1836-7, when H. von Schubert and J. v. Minckley visited Palestine, and made barometric observations in the Jordanic basin. These were followed and confirmed by Col. Wilson (now Gen. Sir C. W. Wilson) and the officers of the Ordnance Survey of Palestine by actual levelling from the shore of the Mediterranean to that of the Dead Sea itself, and have established the fact that the surface of the latter falls to a depth of 1292 ft. below that of the former. Nor is it surprising that this result was not detected before the barometer and the level were brought to bear on its determination; for there is nothing in the atmosphere around the lake which suggests to the traveller, by his sensations alone, that he sustains a more than ordinary atmospheric pressure; and the two seas being shut off from each other by a high table-land 50 miles across, comparison of levels by means of the eye is impossible. With the increase of barometric pressure there is a corresponding increase of temperature. Hence, while in winter snow frequently lies on the plateaux of Judæa and of Moab, it is unknown on the shores of the Dead Sea; and the Arab tribes go down to the Ghôr with their flocks of sheep and goats, and camp over the plain during the winter months. Thus when, in December 1893, the writer found himself standing on the edge of the terrace overlooking the Ghôr, he beheld at his feet a wide plain stretching away northwards towards the margin of the Dead Sea, and to a large extent green with vegetation and thickets of small trees. To the right in an open space were seen several large Bedâwin camps, from which the shouts of wild men, the barking of dogs, and the bellowing of camels ascended. Numerous flocks of black goats and white sheep were being tended by women in long blue cloaks; and on the party of travellers being observed, groups of merry children came tripping up towards the path accompanied by a few of the elders, and, ranging themselves in a line, courteously returned salutations. Here the Arabs remain enjoying the warmth of the plain all the increasing heat of the summer's sun calls them away to their high pasture grounds on the table-land of Edom and Moab. At a short distance farther towards the shore of the lake is the village of Es-Safieh, inhabited by a tribe of fellahin called the Ghawarnah, who by means of irrigation from the Wady el-Hessi cultivate with success fields of wheat, maize, dhurah, indigo, and cotton, while they rear herds of camels and flocks of sheep and goats. On the produce of these fields the Arabs largely depend for their supplies of food and raiment, which they obtain by a kind of rude, often compulsory, barter.

Boundaries of the Ghôr.—The Dead Sea basin and its ancient deposits are bounded along the E. by the high plateau of Moab, and on the W. by the nearly equally high table-land of Judæa. The plain of El-Anmîya in Moab reaches a level of 3100 ft. above the Mediterranean, and, consequently, of about 4400 ft. above the Dead Sea. The slopes of the escarpment along which the plateau breaks off are sometimes terraced, sometimes precipitous, and are eroded by numerous streams with thermal springs, of which that of the Zerkâ Main (or Callirhoë) is the most celebrated.

The W. slopes of the Ghôr are equally scarred by river courses which cut deep into the limestone strata, and have their sources in springs near the summit of the table-land. The cliffs of Râs Mersed, Engedi, and Masada,* the latter crowned by the ruined fortress, are prominent features of the W. shore; while the walled city of Kerak, the capital of Moab, crowns the heights on the E. side.

Geology.—Investigations by geologists in recent times have dispelled some of the old ideas regarding the origin of this mysterious inland lake. It is now known not to be the crater of a volcano, and it is almost equally certain that Sodom and Gomorrah were not overwhelmed in its waters. These researches have also resulted in showing that the area of the Dead Sea waters is not very different from what it was in the days of Abraham and Lot. It is now known, through the observations of Tristram, Lartet, Hull, and others, that the Dead Sea occupies a part of the trough, or depression in the crust, produced by subsidence along the line of a 'fault' or system of 'faults' (fractures accompanied by displacement of the strata) which has been traced from the G. of Akabah along the line of the Jordan-Arabah Valley to the base of Hermon (see ARABAH). This fracture was produced owing to the terrestrial movements which resulted in the whole region being elevated out of the sea after the close of the Eocene period. In consequence of this faulting and displacement, the formations on the opposite sides of the Ghôr do not correspond with each other; those on the E., or Moabite, side being more ancient than those on the W. side at similar levels. Thus, while the whole W. side of the Ghôr is formed of Cretaceous limestones, the flanks of the Moabite escarpment are composed of very ancient volcanic rocks at the base; overlain successively by Carboniferous and older Cretaceous beds, and only surmounted at a level of about 3000-4000 ft. above the lake by the Cretaceous limestones which come down to the water's edge along the W. shore.

The fundamental rocks laid open on the flanks of Jebel Shomar, a massive and precipitous mountain which rises behind Es-Safieh, and runs along the E. side of the Ghôr for several miles, are composed of great beds of volcanic materials (trachytes, tuffs, and sheets of porphyry, penetrated by numerous dykes). They have a slight dip northwards, and are overlain by red and purple sandstones and conglomerates of Carboniferous age ('Desert sandstone'), then by Carboniferous limestone forming the terrace of Lebrusch, and this by the red and variegated sandstones of Lower Cretaceous age ('Nubian sandstone') which form the greater part of the mountain flanks, and are ultimately overlain by the Cretaceous limestones composing the crest of the Moabite and Edomite escarpment.

Such is the general geological structure as far as regards the more ancient formations. The form and features of the Ghôr were created by rain and river action in comparatively recent times. At the latter stage, corresponding to the close of the Glacial epoch, the waters of the Jordanic Valley appear to have risen to such a degree as to have formed a lake whose area included those of Merom, Galilee, and the Dead Sea, and whose S. margin extended into the Arabah as far as the 'Ain Abu Werideh; thus producing a lake which had a length from N. to S. of 200 miles, and whose surface rose to the level of the Mediteranean. The evidence for this conclusion is to be found in the occurrence of terraces of lacustrine materials at intervals down the Arabah from 'Ain Abu Werideh, a locality nearly 40 miles S. of the margin of the Ghôr. These terraces contain numerous semi-fossil shells of the genera Melania and Melanopsis.* It is easy to understand that during the Glacial epoch the large rainfall and the melting of the snows of the Lebanon, accompanied by a climate less tropical than that which now prevails, may have added enormously to the supplies of water poured into the Dead Sea basin, thus raising the surface to the level indicated. With the subsequent diminishing rainfall, and the recurrence of sub-tropical conditions of climate, evaporation would gradually gain upon precipitation; and the surface of the waters, contracting stage by stage, would ultimately fall to their present limits, where evaporation and supply have nearly balanced each other. It was during such successive stages of diminution in volume, and lowering of the surface, that the terraces of lacustrine materials were formed, and converted into land surfaces; these commence at their highest limit with those of Abu Werideh, and are succeeded by others at lower and lower levels till the present margin of the Dead Sea shore is reached. The salinification of the waters necessarily accompanied this process; because the salts dissolved in the waters remained behind during the process of evaporation, and consequently tended to augment till saturation was reached. The Dead Sea waters, therefore, resemble those of all closed lakes which are more or less saline owing to similar causes.†

* The fortress of Masada was the last refuge of the band of Zealots of the Jews who defended themselves against Silva, the Roman general (A.D. 71), and at last destroyed themselves to escape capture (Jos. Wars, vii. viii. ix.).

LITERATURE. Conder, Tent Work, 1880; Hull, 'Arabia Petraea and Palestine', in Mem. PEF., 1888; Lartet, Voyage d'Exploration de la Mer Morte, 1890; Lynch, Recherches sur l'Extrême-Orient à la Jordan et Dead Sea, 1892; Robinson, ER, 1865; De Saulcy, Revue Archéologique de Syrie, 1858; Schubert, Reise in den Morgenland, 1837; Land of Israel, 2nd ed. 1872, Land of Moab, 1873, Fauna and Flora of Palestine, in Mem. PEF. 18<sup>64</sup>; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 490 ff. E. HULL.

DEAFNESS.—See MEDICINE.

DEAL.—A 'deal' is a part or share (A.-S. dael, Ger. theil), and it may be a large or small part. In mod. Eng. we are allowed to say only 'he gave a great deal, or a good deal, of trouble,' scarcely 'he gave a deal of trouble,' and never 'a small deal.' In older Eng. Chaucer could say (House of Fame, i. 331)—

'O, have ye men swich goodliheed
In speche, and never a deel of trouthe?'

And Latimer could represent philosophers saying that 'God walked up and down in Heaven, and thinketh never a deal of our affairs.' In AV deal is used in the phrase 'tenth deal' or 'tenth deals,' for Heb. mayy asdon, wherever that word occurs (RV 'tenth part' or 'tenth parts'). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

To 'deal' is to divide or distribute (A-S dealdan), as in 2 S 619 'he dealt smit' all the peop' to 'give a share'; 1 Cl 12, 15 'to be dealt to the glory'; and Ro 128 'according to God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.' Cf. Wyclif, Lk 618 'And whanne he hadde take the fyve loaves and twel feisch, he bilceld in to heuene, and blessede hem, and brak and delide to hise discipis, that thei schuld eaten.' Cf. also 'deale' in Coverdale, Dn 523 'Thy kyngdome shall be wroghte in me.' From this the verb passed into the sense of 'to deal with' a person, and then having been used in AV, 'I have dealt with him', it is freely found in AV as in mod. use, Ac 2, 344 'this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me' (Coverdale, Jac, RV 'made suit to me').

DEAR, DEARTH.—Dear is used in AV in two senses: (1) Beloved, as Eph 5<sup>1</sup> 'Be ye therefore followers of God as dear children' (ἀγαπητός, RV 'beloved'). In this sense is Col 1<sup>13</sup> 'the kingdom of his d. Son,' which AV, along with Cov., Cran., Gen., and Bishops, retained from Tindale, though Wyclif's 'the sone of his lounye' was nearer the Greek (ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ; Rheims, RV, 'the Son of his love'). See BELoved. (2) Precious, Ac 20<sup>24</sup> 'neither count I my life d. unto myself' (τιμῶς). Cf. Ps 72<sup>14</sup> Cov. 'deare shal their bloude be in his sight,' and 116<sup>15</sup> 'right deare in the sight of the Lorde is the death of his sayntes,' both preserved in Pr. Bk. version, the mss. 'that he counts it too precious to leave it' (116:15, 16).

Dearth.—That which is precious is rare, as 1 S 3<sup>1</sup> Cov. 'The word of y<sup>e</sup> Lorde was deare at the same tyme'; and from 'dear' in this sense was formed 'dearth' = scarcity, famine. Dearth occurs in AV Gn 41<sup>54, 55</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>33</sup>, 2 K 6<sup>28</sup>, Neh 5<sup>6</sup> (all  $\text{אָר}$ ), RV 'famine' in Gn, 2 K, keeping 'dearth' in 2 K, (Neh); Jer 14<sup>1</sup> ( $\text{אָרָה}$ , RV 'drought'); Ac 7<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>28</sup> ( $\text{אָרָה}$ , RV 'famine'); and RV adds Job 5<sup>22</sup> ( $\text{אָר}$ , AV 'famine'), though it retains 'famine' for the same Heb. in 30<sup>3</sup>. J. HASTINGS.

DEATH.—See ESCHATOLOGY, LIFE.

DEBATE.—To debate (fr. old Fr. debatre, Lat. de down, battere beat) now means to discuss, and a 'd.' is a discussion, which is expected to be amicable. But in earlier Eng. 'to debate' was to fight (cf. debate), and 'debate' was strife, quarrelling. The Geneva 'there was debate between the hearldmen of Abrams cattell, and the hearldmen of Lots cattell'; and Lk 12<sup>61</sup> Cov. 'Thynke ye that I am come to brynge peace upon earth—I tell you nay, but rather debate.' In this sense only is debate used in AV, whether as vb. or subst. As vb. Pr 25<sup>9</sup> 'Debate thy cause with יִי וְיָהוָה' (so RV), and Is 27<sup>8</sup> (RV 'contend'; both יָרִיב 'strive,' 'go to law'). As subst. Is 58<sup>4</sup> (קָדַח, RV 'contention'); Jr 23<sup>8</sup> 'A sinful man disquieteth friends, and maketh d. among them that be at peace' (ἐκβάλλει διαβολήν; cf. 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup> AVm, Tit 2<sup>9</sup> AVm, and see MAKEBATE); Ro 1<sup>30</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>30</sup> (ἐρις, RV 'strife'). J. CASTINGS.

DEBIR (דְּבִיר).—The king of Eglon, who acc. to Jos 10<sup>3</sup> joined other four kings against Joshua, but was defeated and put to death along with his allies at Makkedah.

DEBIR (דְּבִיר, Debir, Dabir).—1. The name is generally supposed to mean 'back'; hence= hindmost chamber, innermost room of a temple, and so it is used in 1 K<sup>6</sup> to denote the Holy of Holies. The city must have been a sacred one with a well-known temple. This is borne out by its two other names, Kiriath-beth-safer or 'Book-town' (Jos 15<sup>12</sup>, Sept. πόλις βιβλιακή), and Kiriath-sannah, 'city of instruction' (Jos 15<sup>48</sup>); and W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, 1894) has shown that in an Egyptian papyrus, known as the 'Travels of the Mohar,' which was written in the time of Ramses II. (B.C. 1300), and is a sarcastic account of an Egyptian traveller's misadventures in Canaan, reference is made to the town. The writer remarks: 'Thou hast not seen Kiriath-anab near Beth-thupar, nor dost thou know Adullam and Zidiputa.' We learn from the geographical list of Shishak that the last-named place was in the south of Judah, and the Egyptian Thupar, which is followed by the determinative of 'writing,' would represent a Hebrew Sopher or 'scribe.' As Anab is associated with Kiriath-sepher in Jos 11<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>40</sup>, we must conclude that the Egyptian writer has interchanged the equivalent terms Kiriath and Beth, and that the Massoretes have wrongly vocalised the second element in the name of the * Mount Seir, p. 99; Phys Geol Arabia Petraea, etc. pp 15-79.

↑ Water, those of the Dead Sea yield 24·5% lbs of salt in 100 lbs of water, those of the Atlantic yielding only 6 lbs. of salt in the same quantity; the former consist of chlorides of lime, magnesia, sodium, and potassium, and in smaller proportions of sulphates and bromides of the same substances. The large quantity of bromine (occurring as bromide of magnesium) has attracted the attention of naturalists, and is supposed to be a volcanic emanation.

city, which should be sōpher, 'scribe,' instead of sēpher, 'book.' It was a 'city of scribes,' where a library must have existed, filled with clay books inscribed with cuneiform characters similar to those found at Tel el-Amarna, and in the libraries of Assyria and Babylonia. The latter were usually established in the chamber of a temple.*

It is possible that the name of Kiriath-sannah may be found in one of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (see den orientalischen Sammlungen, in No. 199), where we read: 'The country of Gath-carmel has fallen away to Tagi, and the men of the city of Gath; he is in Beth-sani.' This would locate the city in the neighbourhood of Gath.

In the OT Debir is described as in the mountains of Judah, like Socoh and Eshtemo (Jos 15<sup>48-50</sup>), and not far from Hebron, from whence Caleb 'went up' to it (v. 15). It was in 'the Negeb' of Judah, and near it were 'the upper springs and the nether springs' of water. After leaving Lachish (Tell el-Hesi) and Eglon (Tell en-Najileh?), Joshua marched to Hebron, and then 'returned' to Debir (Jos 10<sup>38</sup>). Unfortunately, we do not enable us to fix the exact location of the city, though the expression 'went up' may imply that it lay to the north. This would certainly have been the case if it is the same as the Beth-sani of the Tel el-Amarna tablet. The identification with the modern Dhaheriyeh (from Arab. dhahr, 'back') rests upon a mistaken interpretation of the name of Debir: Petrie found there no traces of anything older than the Roman period.

Debir was taken by Othniel the Kenizzite, in return for which Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah in marriage (Jos 15<sup>15-19</sup>, Jg 1<sup>11-15</sup>). There must consequently be some error in the text of Jos 10<sup>38-39</sup>, where it is said that Joshua had already taken Debir, and destroyed all its inhabitants. Moreover, the city of Debir is not mentioned among the confederates in vv. 3, 5, where, on the contrary, Debir is stated to be the king of Eglon.

2. DEBIR (Jos 13<sup>26</sup>). The border of Debir (or Libeir) is stated to have formed part of the frontiers of Gad, not far from Mahanaim. If the reading Libeir is accepted, the place may perhaps be identified with Lodebar of 2 S 9<sup>4</sup>.

3. DEBIR in Jos 15<sup>7</sup> is described as in the direction of the north-eastern corner of Judah, towards the valley of Achor and Gilgal. The Sept. however, reads ἐν τῇ τέταρτῃ τῆς φάραγγος Ἀχὼρ, and the Vulg. has Debera. Acc. to Hupfeld (Ps 28<sup>2</sup>) and Wellh. (Sam. 145 n.) דְּבִיר here = westward.

A. H. SAYCE.

DEBORAH (דְּבוֹרָה 'a bee').—1. The nurse of Rebekah, died on Jacob's return to Can., and was buried under the terebinth ('Allon-bacuth') below Bethel (Gn 35<sup>8</sup> E). 2. The heroine of the great battle by the Kishon in which Sisera and his allies were defeated (Jg 4 and 5). After a period of oppression and insecurity, which had lasted since the days of Shamgar (Jg 5<sup>6</sup>), and had fallen heavily upon the tribes bordering on the plain of Jezreel, D., a woman of martial and determined spirit, together with Barak, resolved to free their people from the oppression of the Canaanites. Issachar, their tribe (Jg 5<sup>14</sup>), had been the principal sufferer, but could not cope with the enemy unaided. Accordingly, the summons was sent round to all the tribes,* claiming their assistance in the cause of J' the national God. Ephraim, Benjamin, West Manasseh, Zebulun, Naphtali, with their chiefs, rallied round Issachar; Reuben, Gilead (= Gad), Dan, and Asher refused to respond (Jg 5<sup>12-13</sup>). For the first time after the settlement in Canaan the tribes of Isr. acted in something like a national unity: it was the genius and courage of D. that united this united action. To meet the Isr. army, Sisera, king of Canaan, under the leadership of Sisera, marched to the attack; the battle took place in the neighbourhood of Taanach and Megiddo, along the right bank of the Kishon (Jg 5<sup>19</sup>). A great storm came on, and the swollen torrent worked havoc among the Can. forces, so that it seemed as if the powers of nature were fighting against them (Jg 5<sup>20-22</sup>); Sisera had to seek safety in flight. A woman had successfully initiated the war, and a woman brought it to a victorious conclusion. Jael, by a bold stratagem, slew Sisera with a shattering blow from a tent-mallet as he stood drinking in her tent (Jg 5<sup>24-27</sup>).

Such is the history of the event which has made D. famous among the women of the Bible, as it may be gathered from the song in Jg 5. This splendid ode was prob. not written by D. herself; the verbs in v. 7b are to be rendered by the 2nd pers. rather than by the 1st; cf. v. 12. V. 1 merely says, 'then sang D. and Barak,' a remark due to the later editor. But the song may well be the work of a contemporary, as its style and contents suggest: it may claim, therefore, to be the highest authority for the events which it records.

Another account, a prose version, is contained in chapter 4. The two accounts agree in the main features, but exhibit considerable differences in detail. In 4<sup>2-22</sup> D. is styled both prophetess and judge, while her seat is 'under the palm-tree of D., between Ramah and Bethel, in the hill country of Ephraim,' whither the children of Israel resorted for judgment.

It is here implied that her authority had been long established, and that it extended over Israel ('she was judging Israel at that time,' 4<sup>4</sup>). This generalization of her position reflects the theory of the compiler of Judges—a late writer.† Further, her seat is placed in the S., in the territory of Benjamin, far from the area of the troubles. This necessitates distant negotiations with Barak, and introduces serious difficulties into the narrative. It is possible that D.'s connexion with Ramah and Bethel may be due to a confusion based on Gn 35<sup>8</sup>, for which, again, the compiler may be responsible. We may conclude from 4<sup>6-9</sup> that her home was somewhere near Kadesh, the city of Barak;‡ thus both would belong to Issachar (as 5<sup>15</sup>), the chief sufferer under the oppression. See BARAK.

In the prose version (4<sup>4-22</sup> in the main) she is styled a prophetess. Thus, in the manner of prophecy, she announces the plan of the attack (4<sup>6-7a</sup>), promises success (v. 7b), and declares who shall carry off the honours of the victory (v. 9). All these are features not found in ch. 5, and as coming from ch. 4 must be pronounced of inferior historical value.

For the other divergences connected with the mention of Jabun, the position of the battle, the deed of Jael, the authorities must be consulted.

1 u. versetzt u. erklart, 18-17 (Königsberger Studien, 1); Budde, Richt. u. Sam 63-72, 101-107; M. Vernes

* A full discussion of the meaning of the name is given by Moore (Judges, p. 25 ff.), who formerly connected דְּבוֹרָה with דְּבַר 'border, frontier.' Kiriath-sepher would on this etymology be 'a suitable enough meaning. But for phonetic reasons, it stands in the way Moore has now abandoned this derivation.

† Except Simeon and Levi. Judah is not mentioned; it had not entered into any close connexion with the other tribes, and was cut off from them by a line of Canaanite strongholds (Jg 12<sup>9-13</sup>, Jos 9<sup>17</sup>).

‡ Jg 4<sup>13</sup> 23 24 51. 21b belong to the Deuteronomie compiler of Jud. 4<sup>13</sup> 23 24 51. 21b, hence some think that both are names of the same person, and that Barak was Deborah's husband. This is merely a fancy

3. Deborah (AV Debora), the grandmother of Tobit, To 1<sup>8</sup>.
G. A. COOKE.

לָקַח (ask) obtains from the context the sense of borrow in Ex 22:4, 2 K 4:3 EV, and similarly the Hiph. may = lend in 1 S 1:28 RVm.

ii. In History.—1. Causes of Debt.—There is no trace in OT of any system of commercial credit. Loans of money or large purchases on credit do not occur as ordinary and natural incidents of trade. Debt (except of the most temporary character, see below on Pledges, and on Gn 38<sup>18</sup>; and cf. Ex 22<sup>14</sup>) is an exceptional misfortune; it is always the poor man who borrows, Ex 22<sup>25</sup>. The existence of a developed credit system in Babylonia is no proof of the existence of any similar system in Israel. In such, as in many other matters, it is as precarious to argue from Babylon to Israel as it would be now from England to Afghanistan. This absence of com-debtors resort to David in his exile.

iii. In the Law, Prophets, etc.—The necessity of borrowing is regarded as a misfortune, sometimes a punishment for sin (Dt 15<sup>25</sup> 28<sup>12</sup>, 44), oftener undeserved, and therefore entitling the borrower to assistance. His richer brethren should assist him with loans (Dt 15<sup>1-11</sup>), even in view of the approaching year of release (Ps 37<sup>26</sup> 112<sup>5</sup>, Pr 19<sup>17</sup>); without interest (Ex 22<sup>25</sup> [JE], Dt 23<sup>20, 21</sup> [Eng. 15, 20], Lv 25<sup>36, 37</sup> [H], Ps 15<sup>5</sup>, Pr 28<sup>3</sup>, Ezk 18<sup>1-7</sup> 22<sup>12</sup>, Neh 5). Nowack, i. 354, and Benzinger, 350, understand that Ex 22<sup>25</sup> only forbids excessive usury (B. takes <sup>25b</sup> as gloss), so that the absolute prohibition of interest first appears in Dt. Such prohibitions do not extend to loans to foreigners. No provision is made in the law for the recovery of debt, but non-payment of debt is condemned in Ps 37<sup>21</sup>. Both the law and the prophets are chiefly concerned to protect the debtor. The law restricts the exaction of pledges: a widow's clothing (Dt 24<sup>17</sup>), the nether or upper millstone (Dt 24<sup>9</sup>), the widow's ox (Job 24<sup>3</sup>), should not be taken in pledge. The creditor (Dt 24<sup>10-13</sup>) may not go into the debtor's house to fetch a pledge, but must wait outside till the debtor brings him a pledge of the debtor's choosing (Dillm., Benz.). This pledge would often consist of clothing (Am 2<sup>8</sup>, Pr 26<sup>10</sup> 27<sup>13</sup>, Job 22<sup>6</sup>); and what not be kept owing? (Ex 22<sup>26</sup> [JE], Dt 24<sup>1</sup>). Pledges are rather demanded than approved of; a pious Israelite would not require a pledge (Job 22<sup>9</sup> 24<sup>9</sup>), or, at any rate, would promptly restore it (Ezk 18<sup>17-18</sup> 33<sup>15</sup>)—whether with or without payment is not obvious. The law also limits claims on debtors by the laws of Jubilee and of the Seventh Year. In Ex 23<sup>10, 11a</sup> (JE) the land is to be released (תשקט 'thou shalt release it'), i.e. left fallow, every seventh year; cf. Lv 25<sup>1-7</sup> (H). This provision does not occur in Dt, but Dt 15<sup>1-6</sup> appoints a release, שמיטה, of debt every seventh year. This שמיטה has been understood (a) as a cancelling of interest during the seventh year, which is impossible in view of the absolute prohibition of interest in the immediate context; (b) as moratorium, the creditor being forbidden to demand payment during the seventh year, but being allowed to do so at its close; (c) as an absolute and final cancelling of debt, as in Solon's χρεὼν ἀποκοπή. In any case, some relief in the matter of debt would be specially welcome for the year during which the land lay fallow. The שמיטה did not extend to foreigners.

As the debtor or his family might be sold to pay debt (cf. above and Lv 25<sup>39-47</sup>, Is 50<sup>1</sup>), the provisions for the humane treatment of Heb. slaves, for their release in the seventh year (Ex 21<sup>2</sup>), or (with the land) at the Jubilee (Lv 25<sup>39-55</sup>), are a further limitation of the rights of creditors.

iv. Actual Practice.—Apart from Neh 5 and the vague engagement in Neh 10<sup>31</sup> we do not read of these benevolent laws being observed. Probably, they were never consistently enforced as public law for any long period. When the Jews conceived themselves bound by the letter of the law, they at once devised a means of systematically evading the Deuteronomic שמיטה. This and other laws represent a standard favoured by public opinion and sometimes observed by generous and pious Israelites (Ezk 18<sup>7</sup>). Creditors generally took pledges, required sureties, exacted interest, and seized the land, family, and person of their debtors. Is 24<sup>2</sup> mentions the giver and taker of usury as social types. The warnings against suretyship (Pr 6<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 20<sup>16</sup> 22<sup>26</sup> 27<sup>13</sup>) indicate severe treatment of debtors; according to Pr 22<sup>7</sup> the borrower is the slave of the lender, and Jer 15<sup>10</sup> indicates a bitter feeling between borrower and lender quite at variance with the ideal of charitable loans.

B. APOCR. AND NT.—No actual case of debt occurs in either. Both, like OT, inculcate duty of lending and paying (Sir 29, Lk 6<sup>34-35</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8</sup>). Mt 6<sup>12</sup> suggests a generous treatment of debtors. Sir 18<sup>33</sup> points out the danger of borrowing.

In NT debt occurs chiefly in the parables, The Two Debtors (Lk 7<sup>41-42</sup>), the Two Creditors (Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>). In the latter we find that, as in Greece and Rome, the slave could have property of his own, and thus become a debtor to his master. The treatment of a defaulter is entirely at his master's disposal. Here too, however, the person of the ordinary debtor may be seized for debt. In the parables of the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>) and Pounds (Lk 19<sup>11-27</sup>), and the narratives of the Cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21<sup>12-13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15-18</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45-46</sup>), we come upon the advanced commercial system of the Rom. Empire, with money-changers, bankers, and commercial usury, which Christ mentions without condemning. In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>) we trace a credit system in connexion with agriculture. Interest is not condemned in NT.

LITERATURE.—See commentaries on passages cited, esp. Driver on Dt 15<sup>1-6</sup>, and sections on debt in Heb. Arch. of Benzinger and of Nowack. W. H. BENNETT.

DECALOGUE.—The law of the Ten Words, virtually a translation of the original Heb. name עשרת הדיברות Dt 4<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>, cf. Ex 34<sup>28</sup>) is the most suitable title of the ethical code prefixed to the Sinaitic legislation. The name 'Ten Commandments' is a less accurate rendering, and it pre-judges the disputed question as to whether all of the ten words are of the nature of commandments. It is also called the Testimony (עדות Ex 25<sup>21</sup>), and the Covenant (ברית, Dt 9<sup>9</sup>).

The accounts of the first publication of the D.

contain a variety of extraordinary particulars in attestation of its immediate divine origin and of its sovereign authority. The nation gathered at the foot of Sinai to receive a revelation (Ex 19<sup>17</sup>). Amid thunder and lightning, and with the sound of a trumpet, the Lord descended upon the smoking mount (19<sup>18-20</sup>), and from thence proclaimed the words of the law in articulate tones in the ears of the terrified people (20<sup>18</sup>, Dt 4<sup>12</sup>). The words thus uttered by the very voice were thereafter graven by the very finger of God on two tables of stone (Ex 31<sup>18</sup>, Dt 4<sup>13</sup>). These tables, which were broken by Moses on witnessing the temporary apostasy of the people (Ex 32<sup>19</sup>), were replaced by another pair on which God had promised to rewrite the former words (Ex 34<sup>1</sup>), and which were thereafter deposited in the ark with a view to their safe-keeping and in token of their paramount importance (Dt 10<sup>5</sup>).

In consideration of these details, in which so much stress is laid on the authority of the D. and on the precautions taken for preserving it in its purity, it is remarkable that the Pent. contains two versions of it which exhibit not a few, or altogether unimportant, variations—the classic version, as it may be called, of Ex 20<sup>2-17</sup>, and the less-regarded version of Dt 5<sup>3-21</sup>. The principal differences occur in the reasons annexed to the ten commandments. Under the fourth Dt founds the duty of Sabbath observance, not upon the example of the God of Creation who rested from His works on the seventh day (Ex 20<sup>11</sup>), but upon the dictates of humanity and of gratitude. 'Observe the Sabbath-day to keep it holy . . . that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and J' thy God brought thee out thence by a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore J' thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath-day' (Dt 5<sup>12-15</sup>). The fifth commandment, in the Deuteronomic text, sanctions filial conduct with the promise of prosperity as well as of long life (5<sup>16</sup>). In the tenth, it may be added, Dt has a different order from Ex—the wife being placed at the head of the series, while the coveting of the neighbour's field, which would count for much with a peasant people, is expressly prohibited (5<sup>21</sup>).†

That the Exodus version of the D. is on the whole superior to, i.e. older and purer than, the text of Dt, is the opinion of the great majority of modern scholars, including Delitzsch, Dillmann, W. R. Smith, Driver.‡ For this opinion the principal ground is that the variations in Dt are obviously a personal contribution from this author, some being mere amplifications in his wonted style, others instances of the intrusion of his characteristic ideas or expressions (cf. Dillmann, Exod. p. 200; Driver, LOT p. 31).

* The account in Ex of the Sinaitic revelation is highly compressed, and does not contain all the details which are given in Dt. The latter version is more fully developed, and is more complete in its details; but this is not decisive as to its date—one section regarding it as derived by the Deuteronomist from older sources (Driver, LOT p. 30), while other parts are clearly derived into the E stratum after the formulation of the Decalogue of Dt (Meisner, Der Dekalog p. 11). The J narrative is more prominent in Ex 32-34, and has often been alleged to see forth an older summary as the kernel of the legislation (see infra). This latter inference, apart from other grounds, is rendered very precarious by the fact that a great part of the original contents of J is no longer before us. The final redaction does not determine whether the words were rewritten by God (Ex 34<sup>1</sup>) or by Moses (Ex 34<sup>28</sup>).

† Other Dt variations are multiplication of connecting particles, and of details (the ox and the ass entitled to Sabbath rest), verbal changes ('observe' for 'remember' in c. 4, 'desire' for 'covet' in the main body of c. 10), and allusive phrases ('As the Lord thy God commanded thee' in cs. 4 and 5).

‡ Wellhausen, however, 'protests against the a priori and consistent preference of the Exod. text,' Comp. d. Hex.; and evidence that his view is spreading is furnished by the argument of Meisner's painstaking monograph (Der Dekalog).

In opposition to the traditional conception of the D. as strictly Mosaic, three theories are widely represented in modern criticism—(1) that it is a prophetic compendium or manifesto belonging at the earliest to the 8th cent. B.C.; (2) that it is in substance Mosaic, but that it was enlarged at a later period by the addition of one or more commandments, or at least (3) of amplifications and sanctions of the original 'words.'

(1) Against the Mosaic origin it is argued that the tradition does not consistently maintain its claim, but alternatively exhibits a summary of a widely different character (Ex 34<sup>40</sup>) as the Mosaic D. (Wellhausen, Comp. d. Hex. p. 331 ff.)*; that the ancient 'Book of the Covenant' shows no connection with its content (Baentseh, Das Bundesbuch, p. 92 ff.), and especially that both in general spirit and in detail it is out of harmony with the essentially ritualistic religion of pre-Mosaic times (following Wellhausen, Kayser, op. cit. 98). Upon this it is sufficient here to observe that the cardinal assumption of this group of scholars, viz. that the D. was impossible before the prophetic teaching of the 8th cent., is based upon the part played by the prophets in the character of the OT religion. Assuredly, the prophets did not first enunciate, but inherited, the doctrine that true religion utters itself in morality; and it is an obvious inference from the broad facts of the tradition that this fundamental idea was affirmed by and descended from Moses. That as the founder or reformer of a religion he should have embodied its leading principles in 'terse' sentences is not only possible but probable, and the testimony to the fact that in the D. we possess such a summary is too strong to be set aside in the interests of a historical theory.†

(2) A second group of critics, while admitting 'Moses in the name of JHWH' as the author of such a law as is contained in the ten words' (Kuenen, Rel. Isr., Eng. tr. i. p. 285), support the contention of the first group, that one or more of the commandments are post-Mosaic. The main objection to the Mosaic origin of c. 4—that it presupposes conditions of agricultural life unlike those under which Moses could have conceived and uttered it (cf. e.g. Hib. Lect. p. 554; cf. Script. Heb. p. 139)—is at the most valid against certain of the amplifications. More serious is the case against the Mosaic origin of c. 2, founded on the fact that its prohibition of graven images was disregarded in the time of the judges and of the early monarchy, that the prophets of the Northern Kingdom offered no opposition to the cult of the golden calves, and that the prophetic conscience appears first to have revolted against it in the 8th cent. in Judah (Kuenen, Rel. Isr., Eng. tr. i. 283 ff.). To this it is replied, in general, that the non-observance of a religious law is no proof of its non-existence; and, in particular, that the central sanctuaries possessed by the tribes of Eli, David, and Solomon, the prohibition must have been early operative as a part of the pure Mosaic system (cf. Kittel, op. cit. Eng. tr. i. pp. 248, 249). It may be added that contact with Egyptian idolatry is likely to have made Moses recoil from the worship of other gods, and it is at least possible that c. 2 is a development by the prophetic school of a consequence originally only latent in the Mosaic prohibition of the worship of other gods.

(3) A third view leaves undisturbed the tradition that Moses was the author of an essentially spiritual and ethical code of ten precepts, but alleges the probability of this having originally existed in a briefer form, to which from time to time various reflexions and promises were added which brought them into line with the mind and will of the people. This view is supported by scholars since Ewald (Gesch. Isr. ii. 231), commandments 2, 3, 4, 5 originally wanted the 'reasons annexed,' while 10 may have stopped at 'house.' It is strongly supported by the variations of the two texts, and seems irresistible in consideration of the fact that c. 4 is in accordance with Gn 1<sup>1-28</sup>. It may be added that the terser version gives a better balance to the two tables, and was more suited to the capacity of the popular memory: and in particular that it represents material common to, and thus attested by, the joint testimony of the two divergent recensions.*

The division of the D. into its ten constituent parts has occasioned considerable difficulty. The three systems, as adopted by different religious communities, may be thus re-presented—

|                                 | Greek and Reformed. | R. C. and Lutheran. | Jewish. |
|---------------------------------|---------------------|---------------------|---------|
| God the Deliverer out of Egypt. | Preface             | Preface             | c. 1.   |
| Prohibition of polytheism.      | c. 1                | c. 1                | c. 2.   |
| Prohibition of graven images.   | c. 2                | c. 2-3              | c. 3-9. |
| * Prohibitions of covetousness. | cs. 3-9             | cs. 9               | c. 10.  |
|                                 | c. 10               | c. 10†              |         |

The classification of the commandments is suggested by their distribution between the two tables. Obviously, they fall into two groups—(1) the first six (1-6), which define certain duties which men owe to God, and (2) the last four (7-10), which define certain duties which men owe to their fellow-men. It has, however, been frequently pointed out that, in the antique mode of thought, Ethical duty was more closely allied to the religious than

* The so-called Jahwistic D., first indicated by Goethe, has been finally reconstructed by Wellhausen as follows (Isr. Gesch. p. 66):—

1. Thou shalt not worship any strange god.
2. Thou shalt not make unto thee molten gods.
3. Thou shalt keep the feast of Unleavened Bread.
4. All the first-born are mine.
5. Thou shalt keep the feast of Weeks.
6. Thou shalt keep the feast of Ingathering in the fall of the year.
7. Thou shalt not mingle leavened bread with the blood of my sacrifice.
8. Thou shalt not retain until the morning the fat of my feast.
9. Thou shalt bring the best of the first-fruits of thy field to the house of JHWH thy God.
10. Thou shalt not see a kid in its mother's milk.

In Ex the code really contains 12 precepts, hence there is no agreement as to the selection to be made. It may be noted that it is not claimed that it is Mosaic, but only that it is older than the D. of Ex 20 (cf. Smend, Religionsgesch. p. 47).

† Of this evidence an important element is the tradition that two tables of stone containing the D. were placed by Moses in the ark (Ex 40<sup>20</sup>, Dt 10<sup>1</sup>). The arguments used to discredit the tradition are set forth fully by Stade, Gesch. d. V. Isr. i. p. 457 ff., where its existence is explained by the supposition that the ark originally contained sacred stones associated with the presence of JHWH. But surely Mosaicism cannot have bequeathed to posterity as its most precious legacy a stone-fetish (see ARK OF THE COVENANT).

The original sequence of the 'words' is disturbed in LXX, where the two commandments which bear upon the life of the family (5 and 7) are brought together, and the sixth becomes the eighth. In NT the order is variable, but usually the seventh precedes the sixth (Mt 19<sup>18</sup>, Ro 13<sup>9</sup>).

The classification of the commandments is suggested by their distribution between the two tables. Obviously, they fall into two groups—(1) the first six (1-6), which define certain duties which men owe to God, and (2) the last four (7-10), which define certain duties which men owe to their fellow-men. It has, however, been frequently pointed out that, in the antique mode of thought, Ethical duty was more closely allied to the religious than

* The view that the 'torso' was the original D. is assailed by Meisner on the ground that the irreducible minimum of the words of the first table has been 'amundated' by Dt (Deut. p. 10), but it is at least as probable that the vocabulary of Dt was enriched by the original D.

† While the R.C. and Luth. Churches agree in subdividing the prohibitions of covetousness, the former makes c. 9 protect the neighbour's wife, the latter his house.

and that the first five commandments are ably grouped as precepts of piety, the which may fairly be assigned to the one clear. The first, while not unambiguously sounding the monotheistic note, at least excludes polytheism from Israel. The second prohibits the worship of the true God under a visible form—idolatry. That the third had an equally definite aim is probable, and it is a plausible suggestion that its point was directed against the use of God's name in spiritualistic and other magical rites (Smend), though name—as y. In the noticed the two remarkable features of c. 2, the profound insight into the law of heredity, and the intimation that the soul's rest is the love of God; the Deut. grounding of c. 4, which breathes compassion towards man and beast; and the confident assertion in c. 5 of the doctrine of temporal retribution.

The laws of probity take under their protection human life (c. 6), the institution of property (c. 8), and character or conduct at the roots of wrong-doing (c. 9), the lawless desire. They may be further classified as they condemn criminality in act (cs. 6-8), in act (c. 9), in thought (c. 10).

From this brief sketch of the contents of the D. we may obtain an impression both of its nature and its importance. Its first distinction is the brief compass of the ten words it lays down the fundamental articles of religion (sovereignty and deity of God), and asserts the claims of morality in the spheres of human relationship (home, calling, society). Its ethical precepts are the most far-reaching and the most indispensable. It is, again, a further testimony to the moral value of the code that it provided forms capable of receiving fuller content than that which it held. But the sovereign distinction lies less in its exaltation of the foundations of religion and of the landmarks of morality, than in its representation of religion and morality as knit together by a vital and indissoluble bond. The D. is, in brief, the charter of ethical piety, or, in other words, the great pre-Christian advocate for righteousness as the highest form of ritual. In an age of the world's history when popular religion found satisfaction in an ethically indifferent ceremonialism, in a country where Mosaic sanction was claimed for an elaborate system of sacrifices and festivals, the D. excluded from the summary of duty almost every reference to this class of obligations, and made it clear that what God above all required was justice and mercy. Consistently with this, the one religious duty, narrowly so called, which finds a place in the code, is Sabbath observance; for this commandment not only had in view the provision of an opportunity for meditation and worship, but was equally conceived, if we may follow Dt., as a beneficent institution founded in compassion toward the weary and heavy laden.

The limitations of the D. lie on the surface. Its brevity forbids us to expect exhaustiveness, and, as a fact, its ethical requirements may almost all be connected with the single virtue of justice. Wisdom and fortitude, which figure prominently in the Greek scheme of virtue, are not mentioned, and even in the prohibitions of adultery and covetousness it is less temperance or self-control than justice that appears to interpose to forbid the sin. Again, it followed from the universal character of the people to whom it was first given, that the D. should be elementary in its teaching. They were children who had need to be taught the first principles of the oracles of God. The demands are not very high-pitched: with the exception of the tenth, the moral precepts belong exclusively to the region of conduct where actions condemned by the conscience as sins are also punished by the state as crimes. Further, of the ten, eight are prohibitions, two only are positive injunctions. And here in the principal limitation of the D. In the main a condemnation of superstition and crime, and as such of the highest value in the training of a primitive people, it does not meet the demand of the enlightened conscience for a positive moral ideal. For this we must advance to Christ's interpretation or revision of the Decalogue.

The frequent references of Christ to the D. are marked by two main features—(1) a hearty recognition of its divine origin (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>); (2) a purpose of so interpreting it, as to widen their range and exalt their demands. Its inadequacy as an ideal, due to its preponderantly negative character, He rectified by condensing the law into the two positive commandments to love God with all our heart, mind, and strength, and ourselves (Mt 22<sup>36-40</sup>). The words of Jesus lean on the D. to construct with scarcely a gap the D. according to Christ. The following are the principal additions: C. 1. Thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>). C. 2. They that worship, worship in spirit and truth (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>). C. 3. Swear not at all (Mt 5<sup>34</sup>). C. 4. The Sabbath was made for man (Mk 2<sup>27</sup>). C. 5. Duty to parents paramount over other religious obligation (Mt 15<sup>4-6</sup>). C. 6. Murder includes anger (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). C. 7. Adultery includes lust (5<sup>28</sup>). Of c. 8 we have not Christ's exact words, but the absence is readily explained by the fact that c. 10 had already extended the prohibition of theft in the spirit of the teaching of Jesus. Similarly, the false witness of c. 9 is referred to a foul heart (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>), while the idle is included in condemnation with the calumnious word (12<sup>37</sup>). Of Christ's definite consciousness of a mission to handle the D. in the light of the final revelation there is further evidence in His announcement of the new commandment of brotherly love (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), by which He re-emphasizes the nature of the positive ideal substituted for the warnings of the second table.*

Of the apostolic references to the D. those of St. Paul are most noteworthy. Like Jesus, he employs it as a standard to test conduct and measure wickedness. He says: "The law to have been communicated to Moses by angelic mediation (Gal 3<sup>19</sup>, cf. He 2<sup>2</sup>). What Paul held as to the place of the D. in the Christian dispensation is a question of some difficulty. He nowhere draws a distinction between the ceremonial and the moral elements of the Mosaic law, and declares that, while the former are repealed, the latter remain binding: his general thesis is that the law as such has no longer dominion over the Christian (Ro 7<sup>4</sup>). But as certainly it follows for St. Paul that the Christian, while placed in a new attitude to the law, voluntarily and joyfully re-subjects himself to its ethical commandments. Filled by the 'animated will' towards his fellow-men as to which it is a small thing to forbear from injustice, as required in the second table of the ancient law (Ro 13<sup>9</sup>).

In Christian theology the D. is commonly regarded as a revelation, or as a representation of the fundamentals of religion and morality. It is the most important part of the Old or legal economy, and as such was designed to show the path of duty, to deepen the sense of guilt, and to awaken a profound sense of human inability. The question of its continued validity for the Christian, while capable of being diversely ground, possesses practical importance only in the case of c. 4, where the issue is whether the Sabbath is to be kept as a divine command or as a measure of Christian feeling, energetically maintained by Luther, and favoured in the Federal School of Reformed theology, is most in harmony with the Pauline doctrines of law and Christian liberty. See LAW.

* The perfection of the D. was a favourite thesis of 17th cent. orthodoxy as against the Socinians and Arminians, who declared that Christian ethics added three principles—abnegatio nostri, tolerantia crucis propter Christum, imitatio Christi. The orthodox view was that it did not require to be supplemented or corrected, but only properly interpreted, to furnish the full Christian ideal (see Turretin, Theol. Elenc. Inst. Locus 11).

LITERATURE.—Ewald, Hist. of Israel; Kuenen, Religion of Israel; Oehler's OT Theology; W. R. Smith, art. 'Decalogue' in Encycl. Brit.; W. R. Smith, Composition des Hex.; Driver, LOT; H. Schultz, Die Decalogen-Exegese; Smend, Lehrbuch der AT; Deusch, Das Bundesbuch; Meisner, Die Decalogen-Exegese; Kittel, Hist. of Israel; Deut., in Deut.; Montefiore, Hibbert Lect.; Harper, Deut. For the treatment of the D. in the old polemical divinity, reference may be made to F. Turretin, Institutio Theologiae Elencticae; H. Grotius, Explicatio Decalogi; and Cocceius, De Sabbato; for homiletical treatment, to R. W. Dale, The Ten Commandments. W. P. PATERSON.

DECAPOLIS (Δεκάπολις), 'ten cities,' Mt 4<sup>25</sup>, Mk 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>31</sup>.—A region of allied cities (see PALESTINE) E. of Jordan in Bashan, but including Bethshean W. of the river. Such leagues existed in other parts of the Roman Empire for purposes of trade and of defence. The mention of swine kept by the people of Decapolis suggests the presence of a Gr. colony; and the region had a Gr.-speaking population, mingled with natives, as early as the time of Herod the Great. The cities of Decapolis, according to Pliny (HN v. 18), were Scythopolis (Beisân), Hippos (Susieh), Gadara (Umm Keis), Pella (Fahul), Philadelphia ('Ammân), Gerasa (Jerâsh), Dion (Adân), Canatha (Kanawât), Damascus, and Raphana. The region thus included all Bashan and Gilead. In the Onomasticon (s.v.) it is defined as the region round Hippos, Pella, and Gadara. (Cf. further, Schürer, HJP II. i. 94 ff.; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 593 ff.)

C. R. CONDER.

DECEASE.—In OT Is 26<sup>14</sup> only, 'they are deceased.' The Heb. is rephâ'im (רֵפְאִים), 'shades,' which RV translates 'they that are deceased' in Job 26<sup>5</sup>, Ps 88<sup>10</sup>. See REPHAIM. In NT 'decease' is used as an intrans. vb. in Mt 22<sup>25</sup> 'the first, when he had married a wife, deceased' (ἔτελεύτω, 'come to an end,' used with θανάτω, Mt 15<sup>4</sup>). Cf. Fuller, Holy War (1639), III. x. 132, 'Queen Sibyll who deceased of the plague.' The subst. is found Lk 9<sup>31</sup> 'his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem,' and 2 P 1<sup>15</sup> (both ἐξόδος, exodus, 'outgoing'; used of death also Wis 3<sup>2</sup> 7<sup>6</sup>, Sir 38<sup>25</sup>; cf. ἐξόδος='entering into' the world, Ac 13<sup>24</sup>).

J. HASTINGS.

DECEIT.—The misleading of another by word or deed, in which case it is equivalent to falsehood (Pr 14<sup>25</sup>, Hos 12<sup>7</sup>); or the overreaching of another, as when a false balance is used. Every kind of wickedness, as a rule, involves deceit, since the just and holy must be assumed as a mask, in order to gain credit with men, and make the accomplishment of the evil design possible (Pr 12<sup>20</sup> and 26<sup>24</sup>). D. shows itself not merely in isolated acts, but also as a settled habit of mind (Jer 23<sup>20</sup>). It is so characteristic an element of evil that it is frequently used in Scripture as synonymous with it (Ps 119<sup>145</sup>, Jer 7<sup>5</sup>).

W. MORGAN.

DECEIVABLENESS.—Only in 2 Th 2<sup>10</sup> 'With all d. of unrighteousness' (RV 'deceit'). The adj. 'deceivable' also occurs only once, Sir 10<sup>19</sup> 'a d. seed.' The meaning is 'able to deceive,' 'deceitful'; and that is the usual meaning of the words, as 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> Tind. 'we followed not deceivable fables,' and Gouge (1653) on He 3<sup>14</sup> 'Sin prevails the more by the deceivableness thereof.' But Milton uses the adj. in the sense of 'liable to be deceived' in Samson Agonistes, 942, 'blind, and thereby deceivable.'

J. HASTINGS.

DECENTLY.—'Decent' and 'decently' have deteriorated with use. From Lat. decens, they expressed originally that which is becoming, as Latimer, 1st Serm. bef. Edw. VI. (1547) 'God teacheth what honour is decete for the kyng'; and generally that which, by being seemly, adds lustre, hence comely, handsome (cf. Lat. decus), as Pref. to Pr. Bk. (1549) 'this godly and decent Order of the ancient Fathers'; Bacon, Essays, p. 177, 'the Principall part of Beauty is in decent motion'; Milton, Il Pens. 36—

Now, the meaning is no more than 'fair,' 'passable,' as Darwin, Life, i. 151, 'If I keep decently well.' In AV 'decent' does not occur, and 'decently' only 1 Co 14<sup>40</sup> 'Let all things be done d. and in order,' for which all previous VSS have 'honestly,' after Vulg. decenter; richtig (Gr. εὐσχημένως, which occurs in 1 Th 4<sup>12</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>12</sup>, where all Eng. VSS have 'honestly,' with 'decently' in AVm of Ro 13<sup>13</sup>). J. HASTINGS.

DECISION.—1. The decision of questions of right between man and man necessarily depends on the form of authority recognized in each successive stage of society. In the nomadic condition a patriarchal government is tempered by custom and the counsels of tribal headsmen. It can scarcely be altogether as a reflection from later times, that Moses continually appears in the Pentateuch accompanied by elders. The appointment of the 70 is distinctly described as designed to afford relief to the leader in the decision of cases of dispute between Israelites (Nu 11<sup>16-17</sup>). The judges appear as dictators, who would necessarily add to their military rule the administrative and judicial functions that accompany supreme power, though the local influence of heads and families must always have tempered their authority. It is as judge to settle disputes that Samuel is represented as making his circuit of Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah (1 S 7<sup>16</sup>, which is of late origin). The kings of Judah and Israel were supreme judges. A judicial decision is the typical instance of Solomon's wisdom (1 K 3<sup>16-22</sup>). After the Captivity, since the Jews were now a subject race, the supreme authority for the decision of important cases rested with an alien government; but the transformation of the nation into a Church led to the private settlement of internal affairs on the advice of the scribes. The development of the synagogue may have given shape to this method, the local court of elders settling minor cases. The formation of the Sanhedrin at Jerus. as both a civil and an ecclesiastical court led to the decision there of cases affecting Judæa, though with various powers at different times, the Romans recognizing the legal authority of this court, but requiring cases of life and death to be referred to the procurator (Jn 18<sup>31</sup>). Our Lord instructed His disciples to avoid litigation and to settle disputes with their brethren privately, or, if that were impossible, by reference to the Church as a court of judgment (Mt 18<sup>17</sup>). St. Paul expostulated with the Corinthians for resorting to the heathen law courts on account of quarrels among themselves, directing them to appoint their own judges within the Church (1 Co 6<sup>1-5</sup>).

2. The decision of questions of perplexity in early times was determined by casting lots, with the conviction that what seemed to be chance with man was really directed by God (Pr 16<sup>33</sup>). This method was employed in the division of the land (Jos 14<sup>2</sup>, P), and in the cases of Achan (Jos 7<sup>14</sup>), Saul (1 S 10<sup>21</sup>), Saul and Jonathan (14<sup>40</sup>). The Urim and Thummim and the ephod seem to have been used for casting lots (Ex 28<sup>30</sup>, Nu 27<sup>21</sup>, 1 S 23<sup>6</sup>). This method of decision was missed at the restoration but its recovery anticipated (Ezr 2<sup>68</sup>, Neh 7<sup>68</sup>). The prophets, however, did not encourage it. Under the influence of the inspiration they enjoyed, the oracle was obtained more directly. Thus, unlike the choice of Saul, the choice of David was made by means of the prophetic spirit in Samuel (1 S 16<sup>1-13</sup>). Kings would resort to prophets for advice on questions of going into battle, etc., e.g. the case of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, in which the contrast between the lying spirit of the false prophet and the true spirit of the genuine prophet of J<sup>n</sup> is illustrated (1 K 22<sup>1-28</sup>). The decision of the prophet is clearly distinguished from divination, witchcraft, dealings with familiar spirits, and attempts to consult the dead—dark practices which are severely condemned (Dt 18<sup>9-12</sup>). In NT the lot reappears, not only in the case of the division of the garments of Jesus among the Rom. soldiers (Mk 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34</sup>, Jn 19<sup>24</sup>), but also in a solemn decision of the Christians as a means of obtaining a successor to Judas. In this case, however, it only decides between two men, each of whom has been chosen after careful investigation has proved him to possess the qualities essential to apostolic office, and then with prayer for divine guidance (Ac 1<sup>21-26</sup>). Doubts have been thrown on the wisdom of this course. It is a significant fact that it never seems to have been followed in subsequent elections of church officers in the apostolic Churches.

For Valley of Decision see JEHOSEPHAT (VALLEY). W. F. ADENEY.

DECK.—To deck (=Lat. tegere, Ger. decken, Eng. thatch) is simply 'to cover,' hence the 'deck' of a ship. Thus Cov. has (Hag 1<sup>8</sup>) 'Ye decke youre selves, but ye are not warme' (Gen., AV, and RV 'Ye clothe you'). In this sense possibly is Pr 7<sup>16</sup> 'I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry' (עֲרֵב, LXX τέτακα, Vulg. intexui). But Luther has 'Ich habe mein Bette schon geschmucket,' Wyc. 'I have arrayed,' and it is certain that by 1611 'deck' had taken on the sense of decorate, no doubt through confusion with that word, with which it has no proper connexion. Thus Pr. Bk. (1552) Com. Service (Keeling, p. 191), 'when a man hath prepared a rich feast, decked his table with all kind of provision, so that there lacketh nothing but the guests to sit down.' In this sense 'deck' is used elsewhere in AV. J. HASTINGS.

DECLARE, DECLARATION.—The oldest meaning of the vb. 'declare' is to make clear (de-clarus), explain, expound, as in the Title of Tylle's ed. of Tindale's NT, 'declaryng many harde places conteyned in the texte.' So perhaps Dt 1<sup>5</sup> (see Driver). Elsewhere in AV 'declare' is the tr. of a great number of different Heb. and Gr. words, but its meaning is probably never more precise than 'make known,' as Ps 50<sup>6</sup> 'the heavens shall d. his righteousness,' Ac 17<sup>28</sup> 'Whom therefore ye worship, him d. I unto you' (RV 'set forth'), Ito 1<sup>4</sup> 'declared to be the Son of God with power . . . by the resurrection from the dead.' And this is the meaning of declaration in its few occurrences, Job 13<sup>17</sup>, Est 10<sup>2</sup> (RV 'full account'), Sir 43<sup>8</sup>, Lk 1<sup>1</sup> (RV 'narrative'), 2 Co 8<sup>13</sup> (RV 'to shew'). J. HASTINGS.

DECLINE.—In AV to 'decline' is always (except Ps 102<sup>11</sup> 109<sup>23</sup>) used in the original but now obsolete sense of 'turn aside.' Thus, Job 23<sup>11</sup> 'His way have I kept, and not declined' (RV 'turned not aside'); Ps 119<sup>21</sup> 'yet have I not declined from thy law' (RV 'swerved'; so 119<sup>157</sup>); Pr 7<sup>25</sup> 'Let not thine heart decline to her ways' (so RV). In Ps 102<sup>11</sup> 'My days are like a shadow that declineth,' and 109<sup>23</sup>, the image is of the shadow which lengthens as the sun goes down, till at last it vanishes into night. RV adds Jg 19<sup>8</sup> 'until the day declineth' (see AVm), 2 K 20<sup>10</sup> 'It is a light thing for the shadow to decline ten steps' (AV 'go down'), and Jer 6<sup>4</sup> 'the day declineth' (AV 'goeth away'). Tennyson combines both meanings (Locksley Hall, l. 43)—

'Having known me, to decline
On a range of lower feelings and a narrower heart than mine.'

J. HASTINGS.

DEDAN, דֶּדָן, LXX Δαδάν, Δεδάν (in Is, Jer, Ezk, Δαδάν), according to Gn 10<sup>7</sup>, a son of Raamah, one of the sons of Cush. In Gn 25<sup>3</sup> he is named along with Sheba, as in Gn 10<sup>7</sup>, but is represented, not as a Cushite, but as a Keturaean. Dedan is in this latter passage a son of Jokshan, son of Abraham by Keturah; but according to Josephus (Ant. I. xv. 1) he was the son of Shuah (or Sous), another of Keturah's sons. The Shuhites were neighbours of the Temanites (Job 2<sup>11</sup>) in North-Western Arabia. There are traces still of the ruins of a city Daidan in that region, and the Sabæan inscriptions mention the Dedanites as a tribe.

The Dedanites were entered as an important commercial people, carrying on an extensive caravan trade with Damascus and Tyre. They frequented the highway that ran through the Arabian desert as they journeyed northward with their wares, and when driven back by a hostile force they were thrown upon the charity of their southern neighbours of Tema (Is 21<sup>13</sup>). According to Jeremiah 25, they formed an Arabian tribe alongside of Tema and Buz, and were accustomed on their business to pass through the land of Edom. The Dedanites share in the judgments which fall upon the Edomites and upon the kings of Arabia. In all these prophetic passages, as in the OT generally, Arabia designates, not the whole of the peninsula now known by that name, but merely the northern part, colonized by the Ishmaelites and Keturaean descendants of Abraham. In Jer 25<sup>23</sup> the reference to Dedan follows immediately upon the mention of the kings of Tyre and Sidon, and the coast beyond the sea. This does not seem to require the locating of Dedan by the sea-coast. The connexion with Tyre is quite sufficient to justify such an arrangement. Besides, the order in which the countries and peoples are named in vv. 20-23 is evidently in a broad way from west to east, with an excursion midway northward and then southward, from Edom to Tyre and back again to Arabia. In Ezk 25<sup>13</sup> Dedan is described as forming the extreme south of Edom, as Teman represents the farthest north. This may only mean that the country of the Dedanites constituted the southern frontier of Edom. The destruction of all Edom is described as a desolation extending from Teman to Dedan. In Ezk 27<sup>40</sup> Dedan is spoken of as carrying to the market of the wealthy and luxurious Tyre precious cloths for chariots or saddle cloths for riding. From the place which it occupies in this passage, it is evidently to be regarded as a country of Northern Arabia. If we accept the correction of some of the ablest modern critics in the reading of v. 19, we find the mention of Dedan preceded by a reference to Southern Arabia; while v. 21 names Arabia, in the narrower acceptance of Northern Arabia, and the princes or Kedar. This precisely suits the locality assigned in other passages to the Keturaean Dedanites.

Considerable difficulty has arisen over the only other allusion to Dedan in the OT, to which we have not yet referred. In Ezk 27<sup>15</sup> we read: 'The men of Dedan were thy traffickers; many isles were the mart of thine hand: they brought thee in exchange horns of ivory and ebony.' The ivory and ebony are represented as tribute due to the supreme importance of Tyre as mistress of the commercial world. There is no reason why the Dedanites of Northern Arabia should not have acted as intermediaries in transporting to the western markets the products of the far East. But the mention of the isles is supposed to make the assumption of a Dedanite people on the sea necessary. The LXX reads Rhodiens, R (7) and D (7) in the writing of Heb. being easily mistaken for one another. In this case, however, it has all the appearance of a correction made by the Gr. translators, so as to make the whole verse refer to islands and islanders. But the order in which the names are given in this passage seems unfavourable to such a view. The list of those who brought their goods to the market of Tyre begins with Tarshish in the far West, passing on to Javan, Tubal, Meshech (Asia Minor and the coasts of the Black Sea), Togarmah (Armenia). With Dedan there is clearly a fresh start made, whether we understand it of Rhodes or of a part of North-Western Arabia. But if in v. 16 we read Edom instead of Aram (Syria), where again only the interchange of R and D is required, we have in vv. 16-18 the order from south to north (Edom, Judah, Damascus). Seeing, then, that Dedan lay south of Edom, it would form the appropriate 'point' for this second list.

Thus in the prophetic passages the only theory that easily and naturally fits into the text is that which places Dedan on the south border of Edom, and regards the Dedanites as a Keturaean tribe, occupying a position along-side of other allied tribes in the north-west of Arabia. The only trace, therefore, that we have of a Cushite Dedan is in Gn 10<sup>7</sup>. It is quite impossible to conjecture with any confidence how it came about that both Sheba and Dedan should be names recurring in two families so far removed from one another as that of the Cushite Raamah and that of the Keturaean Jokshan. Possibly, a branch of the Keturaean Dedanites may have settled among Cushites near the Persian Gulf, and, while retaining their ancestral name, may have been included in the genealogy with their Cushite neighbours. It is, however, difficult to assume that the same had happened with respect to the sons of Sheba.

The Dedan of the Edomite border is placed by Eusebius in the neighbourhood of Phana, on the east of Mount Seir, between Petra and Zoar, the ancient Punon or Phunon, at which the Israelites encamped during their wanderings (Nu 33<sup>42f</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Besides Dillmann and Delitzsch on Gn and Is, and Davidson on Ezk, see Winer, Realwörterbuch,<sup>3</sup> 263 f., whose article is much more complete. Steiner (Schenkel, Bibl. lexicon, 1. Handwörterbuch, 266). See also J. MACPHERSON.

DEDICATION.—The idea of withdrawing (persons, places, things) from a common and setting apart to a sacred use, which seems to be the original connotation of the important Sem. root qāṭ, is embodied in various expressions of EV, such as consecrate, dedicate, devote, hallow (holy, etc.), sanctify. Of the first two we may say that the general usage is to apply 'consecrate' and 'consecration' to the setting apart of persons, and 'dedicate' and 'dedication' to the setting apart of things. Accordingly, we read of silver being 'dedicated unto J<sup>h</sup>' (Jg 17<sup>3</sup>), so that it could no longer be used for other than sacred purposes, of 'vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass (נְחֹשֶׁת)' so dedicated or set apart by David (2 S 8<sup>10</sup>. 11 = 1 Ch 18<sup>10</sup>. 11, 1 K 7<sup>51</sup> = 2 Ch 5<sup>1</sup>), just as we read of the dedication of a bowl 'of the first (quality) of copper (נְחֹשֶׁת)' to Baal-Lebanon (CIS, Tab. iv.; cf. Mesha's inscription, lines 17, 18, נְחֹשֶׁת כְּלֵי vessels of J<sup>h</sup> dedicated to Chemosh). The same Heb. word is used of the dedication of the 'tent of meeting' (Ex 29<sup>4</sup>, EV 'sanctify'), of the altar of burnt-offering (Ex 29<sup>30</sup>), and of other parts of the furniture (Ex 40<sup>10</sup>), all as described in Lv 8<sup>10f</sup>. In another ref. to this dedication (so EV, but RVm dedicated, Nu 7<sup>84</sup>. 88) we first meet with the נִדְּחָן danukhan (for wh. see Dillmann in loco, Jo. Selden, De Synedrüs, 1679, bk. iii. p. 148 ff., and the next art.). Other dedication ceremonies in OT are the dedication of Solomon's temple, related in detail, 1 K 8 (where note v. 63 נִדְּחָן, énekalvisev, EV dedicate, but v. 64 נִדְּחָן, éylasev, EV hallow), the dedication of the second temple (Ezr 6<sup>16</sup> 17)* and of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12<sup>27</sup>). The last interest, moreover, as showing that of buildings of a more secular character was also the occasion of a dedicatory service. That this holds good, even of a private house, is to be inferred from Dt 20<sup>5</sup>. For much curious information on this practice among other ancient peoples, and on its continuation in later times, see Selden, op. cit. (cf. CONSECRATION).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

DEDICATION, THE FEAST OF THE (τὰ ἐγκαίνια Jn 10<sup>22</sup>, ὁ ἐγκαίνισμός τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου 1 Mac 4<sup>56</sup>), was instituted by Judas Maccabæus (B.C. 164) in commemoration of the purification of the temple and altar after they had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 4<sup>59</sup>). It was to be 'kept from year to year by the space of eight days from the five and twentieth day of the month Chislew' (about the time of the winter solstice). The Feast of the Ded. is only once mentioned in NT (Jn 10<sup>22</sup>), and in this passage there is an incidental reference to the season of the year, apparently to explain why it was that Jesus was walking under cover instead of in the open air. This is one of the numerous instances in which the author of the Fourth Gospel shows a close acquaintance with Jewish customs. Westcott thinks that the title chosen by our Lord in Jn 9<sup>5</sup> may refer to the lighting of lamps at this feast, no less than to the ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles. This illumination was so prominent a feature in the Feast of the Ded. that it was sometimes called the Feast of Lights (Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 7). Josephus, however, does not mention the illumination in private houses, which has been a marked feature of the feast from the end of the 1st cent. to the present time. According to Maimonides, every house should set up at least one light. Those who did honour to the command should set up a light for each person in the house, and those who did more honour still should begin with one light for each person, and double the number each night (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loco). Another school directed that eight lights should be used on the first night, and the number increased by one each night. The feast lasted eight days. The reference in 2 Mac 10<sup>6</sup> seems to show that the points of resemblance between some of the ordinances of this feast and the Feast of Tabernacles were noted, but were designed from the first. The Feast of Dedication, however, was unlike the great feasts, in that it could be celebrated anywhere and did not require the worshipper to go up to Jerusalem.

The words of the Jews in Jn 10<sup>24</sup> would naturally be suggested by the direction which this feast would give to men's thoughts. The hymn which is at present used in Jewish synagogues during its continuance records the successive deliverances of Israel, and contains a prayer for yet another.

J. H. KENNEDY.

DEEM was once in freq. use, but is now almost extinct. Even in AV it occurs but twice, Wis 13<sup>2</sup> 'deemed either fire or wind or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven, to be the gods which govern the world' (ἐνθουσαν, RV 'thought'), and Ac 27<sup>27</sup> 'the shipmen deemed (ἀπονόου) that they drew near to some country,' though Wyclif has the word and its . . . , and uses it with fine effect. Thu. . . . 'for he that etith and drynkith unworthili etith and drinkith dome to hym, not wiseli demynge the bodi of the Lord. And if we *demed*en wiseli us silf we schulden not be demed, but while we ben demed of the Lord we ben chastid, that we be not dampned with this world.' RV gives 'surmised' for 'deemed' in Ac 27<sup>27</sup>, but 'deemed' for 'as' in Ezr 2<sup>63</sup>, Neh 7<sup>64</sup> 'therefore were they deemed polluted and put from the priesthood' (Heb. simply 'and were polluted from the priesthood'). J. HASTINGS.

* The title of Ps 30 most probably refers to the dedication by Judas Maccabæus (see Baethgen in loco, and next art.).

DEEP.—The adj. is used fig. in the sense of 'profound' without any thought of malevolence, as Ps 92<sup>5</sup> 'Thy thoughts are very deep'; Ec 7<sup>24</sup> 'that which is far off, and exceeding deep' (עֲמִקָּה 'deep, deep'); Is 29<sup>15</sup> 'woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord' (מְעַמְּקִים); Dn 2<sup>22</sup> 'He revealeth the deep and secret things'; 1 Co 2<sup>10</sup> 'the deep things of God' (Wyclif's tr.; Tind. 'the bottome of Goddes secretes,' so Cranmer, Geneva (1557); but Gen. 1560 restored 'the deepe things of God,' and so Bishops'; Rhem. 'the profundities of God'). Cf. Bacon, Essays, 'the more deepe and sober sort of Politique persons.'

'Deep' is a common subst. in Shaks. and others of that day, and is often used figuratively, as Jul. Cæs. iv. iii. 226—

'The deep of night is crept upon our talk.'

But in AV where 'the deep' is not the sea, it refers to the waste of waters (the primitive têhôm), or to the bottomless pit. The Heb. words are תְּהוֹם têhôm, as Gn 1<sup>2</sup> 'darkness was upon the face of the deep' (see COSMOGONY); זִלְזָלָה zûlâh, Is 44<sup>27</sup>, and מְעִיִּלָּה mêzûlâh, Job 41<sup>31</sup>, Ps 69<sup>18</sup> 107<sup>24</sup>, or מְעִיִּלָּה mêzûlâh (in the plu. 'deeps'), Neh 9<sup>11</sup>, Ps 88<sup>6</sup>. The Gr. words are ἀβύσσος (see ABYSS), βῆθος, Lk 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>2</sup>; and βυθός, 2 Co 11<sup>25</sup>.

Deepness, now almost replaced by 'depth,' is retained from Wyc. in Mt 13<sup>8</sup> 'they had no deepness of earth' (RV retains, and restores 'deepness' to the par. passage Mk 4<sup>5</sup>, which Wyc. had also; Tind. has 'depth' in both places). J. HASTINGS.

DEER.—See FALLOWDEER.

DEFECTIVE.—Sir 49<sup>4</sup> only, and the meaning is 'guilty of wrongdoing,' 'All, except David and Ezechias and Josias, were defective: for they forsook the law of the Most High' (πλημμελεῖσαν êplhmmelhsan, lit. 'erred an error,' i.e. acc. to the Heb. idiom 'erred greatly,' RV 'committed trespass.' The same Gr. is found in LXX Lv 5<sup>19</sup>, Jos 7<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>20, 31</sup>). Bissell (in loc.) says 'were defective' is not strong enough. Nor is it now, but in older Eng. it was used for positive transgression or wrongdoing, as Act 10 Henry VIII. 1518, 'Persons . . . so founden defective or trespassing in any of the said statutes.' 'Defect' in the mod. sense of a shortcoming is given by RV in 1 Co 6<sup>7</sup> (ἡττημα, AV after Wyc. 'fault,' Gen. 'impatience,' RVm 'loss': see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 11<sup>13</sup>).

J. HASTINGS.

DEFENCED is used in AV (only of cities) where we should now say 'fortified,' the Heb. being either the vb. [צָבַר] bâzar (Is 25<sup>2</sup> 27<sup>10</sup> 36<sup>1</sup> 37<sup>26</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>20</sup>) 'to cut off, render inaccessible,' or the subst. מִבְּצָר mibhazâr (Jer 1<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>4</sup> 34<sup>7</sup>, always with צָר 'city,' 'a place cut off.' RV gives 'fenced' in Is 36<sup>1</sup> 37<sup>26</sup> and in Jer 4<sup>5</sup> 34<sup>7</sup>; Amer. RV has 'fortified' in all the passages. J. HASTINGS.

DEFER.—From dis apart, and ferre to carry, to defer is properly 'to put aside,' and this meaning is found in early English. The mod. meaning is 'to put off to another occasion,' 'to postpone'; but in older Eng. the word was loosely used in the general sense of 'put off,' 'delay,' as Dn 9<sup>19</sup> 'defer not, for thine own sake, O my God' (דָּלַיְנוּ 'delay not,' 'tarry not,' the vb. is never used in the sense of putting off to another occasion; so Gn 34<sup>19</sup>, Ec 5<sup>4</sup>); Pr 13<sup>12</sup> 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick' (מִקְצָה 'drawn out,' 'protracted,' cf. Is 18<sup>2</sup> 'where same part of vb. is tr. 'tall' in RV); Is 48<sup>8</sup> 'For my name's sake will I defer mine anger' (דָּלַיְנוּ, not postpone to another occasion, but delay so as not to vent it at all if possible, so Pr 19<sup>11</sup>). Delay is the meaning also in Apoc., Jth 2<sup>13</sup> (μακρύνω), Sir 4<sup>3</sup> (παρέλκω), 18<sup>22</sup> (μείνω). But in NT (Ac 24<sup>22</sup> only) the meaning is postpone to another occasion, viz. to a fuller hearing; the obsol. construction is, however, employed of having a person as the object, 'Felix . . . deferred them' (ἀνεβάλεν αὐτούς). Cf. Rogers (1642), Naaman, 137, 'If it seem goode to thy wisdom to deferre me.' RV gives 'deferred' for 'prolonged' Ezk 12<sup>25, 28</sup> (דָּלַיְנוּ). J. HASTINGS.

DEFILEMENT.—See UNCLEANNES.

DEFY.—When Goliath 'defied' the armies of Israel, it is probable that the translators of AV understood him to challenge them to combat, though the Heb. (תָּרַק) means to taunt or scorn (so 1 S 17<sup>10, 25, 26, 36, 45</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ch 20<sup>7</sup>). But when Balaam is summoned to Balak's camp with the words (Nu 23<sup>7, 8</sup>),

'Come, curse me Jacob,
And come, defy Israel,'

it is manifest that 'defy' is used in some other and now obsol. sense. The Heb. (נָקַם) means to be indignant, then express indignation against one, denounce, curse; and that is the meaning the parallelism would require (LXX ἐπικατάρασα, Vulg. detestare, Luth. schelten). Now 'defy' (from late Lat. dis-fidare, dis-trust) primarily means to renounce: 'I . . . refuse or affianced, to pronounce all bonds of . . . and fellowship dissolved (whence war would generally follow, and so the modern sense of the word). Thus Tindale's tr. of 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> 'no man speakynge in the sprete of God defieth Jesus.' This is probably the sense in which 'defy' should be taken in Nu, since it is Tindale's word; though there is a meaning of the word that is closer to the Greek, viz. 'despise,' 'set at nought,' as Olde (1649), Erasm. Par. Thess. 4, 'I defie all things in comparison of the gospel of Christ'; and a rare use nearer still, viz. 'curse,' as Hall (1548), Chron. 52b, 'The faire damoselles defied that da. . . the whiche thei had lost their . . . and Douay have 'detest' in its old sense of 'denounce.'

J. HASTINGS.

DEGREE.—Late Lat. . . . gradus (a step) gave Fr. degré, whence Eng. 'degree.' So a 'degree' is simply a step, whether up or down, and esp. one of a flight of steps, or the rung of a ladder. Thus Chaucer, Romaunt of Rose, 485—

'Into that gardyn, wel y-wrought,
Who-so that me coude have brought,
By laddre, or elles by degree,
It wolde wel have lyked me.'

And Shaks. Jul. Cæsar, II. i. 26—

'But when he once attains the upmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend.'

This is the meaning of 'degree' in AV wherever it occurs in the plur.: the ref. being either to the degrees of Ahaz's dial (2 K 20<sup>7</sup> bis 10<sup>10</sup> bis 11, Is 38<sup>8</sup> ter, see DIAL) or to the Songs of Degrees (Ps 120-134 titles, see PSALMS) and the Heb. מַדְגָּג ma'dag.

But from signifying a step literally, 'degree' soon passed to express also a step in rank, whence 1 Ch 15<sup>18</sup> 'their brethren of the second d.' (דְּבָרִים, lit. 'the seconds'); 17<sup>17</sup> 'a man of high degree' (רָם, lit. 'high'), Ps 62<sup>9</sup> 'men of high d.' (רָם, lit. 'high'), Sir 11<sup>1</sup> 'wisdom lifeth up the head of him that is of low d.' (ταπεινός: so Lk 1<sup>52</sup>, Ja 1<sup>9</sup>); 1 Ti 3<sup>13</sup> 'they that have used the office of a deacon will purchase to themselves a good d.' (βαθμός, lit. 'step,' RV 'standing').

In the last passage the meaning is quite exceptional in the Eng. as in the Greek. The LXX words is Wyclif's, who has been followed by all the versions except RV. It is simply a literal tr. of the Vulg. gradus, a translation of the Greek. The Gr. word βαθμός is used in the LXX it is used either as tr. of 'step' or of 'magnán' (1 S 55), the former being the 'steps' or 'degrees' of Aha's dial, the latter being 'magnán' it is also found once in the LXX, note in loc. (Camb. Bible), and Hort, J. HASTINGS.

DEGREES, SONGS OF.—See PSALMS.

DEHAITES (AV Dehavites, דְּהַיִּטִּים, Kēḥē dēḥayit, Ezr 4<sup>9</sup>).—The Dehaites were among the people settled in Samaria by Osnappar, i.e. probably the Assyrian king Acha-ban. They joined with their fellow-colonists in signing the letter written by Rehun and Shimshai to king Artaxerxes, to complain of the attempt made by the Jews to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (probably about 447 B.C.). The name has been connected with that of a nomadic Persian tribe, the Δάοι, mentioned in Herod. i. 125 (Rawlinson), or with the name of the city Du'-āa, mentioned on Assyrian contract-tablets (Fried. Delitzsch); but according to Schrader these identifications are very doubtful. The LXX reads Δαβαῖτοι (A), but in B the text runs Σουσανναῖοι of εἰνὶ Ἑλμαῖοι (for 'the Shushan-chites, the Dehaites, the Elamites'; cf. Meyer, Judenthum, 36). H. A. WHITE.

DEHORT.—Only 1 Mac 9<sup>9</sup> 'they dehorted him, saying, We shall never be able' (δὲν πείθοι); and in the headings of some of the Psalms (e.g. Lat. dehortari) is the verb 'dehort.' 'Exhort' continues, but 'dehort,' a word whose place 'disuade' has taken, has escaped us.—Trench, Lang. Past and Present, 179. Ussher (1656) in Ann. iv. 24 has 'Exhorting them to observe the law of God . . . and dehorting them the breach of that law.' J. HASTINGS.

DELAIAH (דְּלַיָּהּ, דְּלַיָּהּ).—1. One of the sons of Elioenai, a descendant of David (1 Ch 3<sup>24</sup>, AV Dalaiah). 2. A . . . of the 23d course of priests in the . . . (1 Ch 24<sup>18</sup>). 3. The son of Shemaiah, one of the 'princes' or officers of state at the court of Jehoiakim (Jer 36<sup>12, 26</sup>). 4. The son of Mehetabel, and father of Shemaiah, who was associated with Neh. in the rebuilding of Jerus. (Neh 6<sup>10</sup>). 5. The head of the children of D., who returned with Zerub. from Babylon (Ezr 2<sup>50</sup>=Neh 7<sup>62</sup>). The name in 1 Es 5<sup>37</sup> is Dalan. R. M. BOYD.

DELECTABLE.—Is 44<sup>9</sup> only, 'Their d. things shall not profit.' AV and RV retain the word from Geneva Bible, which explains, 'Whatsoever they bestow upon their idols to make them to seeme glorious.' But it is the idols themselves that are called 'the d. things' (דְּבָרִים hāmūdīm), which the Bishops expressed by the (too) free tr. 'the carved image that they love can do no good.' 'Delectable,' from Lat. delectabilis, came in through old Fr., whence came also the form

*Yet Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes from Cheyne, Isaiah (1882), p. xx, 'Isaiah had good reason . . . to dehort the Jews from an Egyptian alliance.'

'delitable,' which was afterwards spelt 'delightable' by a mistaken association with light; later forms are 'delit.' and 'delightful.' Only the last has held its ground; but 'delectable' is remembered by Bunyan's 'delectable Mountains' (Pil. Prog. p. 52); cf. Shaks. Rich. II. ii. iii. 7—

'And yet
Making t . . . . .

J. HASTINGS.

DELICACY.—Trench (Select Glossary, p. 52 f.) says, 'In the same way as self-indulgence creeps over us by unmarked steps, so there creeps over the words that . . . subtle change; they come to contain less and less of rebuke and blame; the thing itself being tolerated, nay allowed, it must needs be that the words which express it should be received into favour too. It has been thus with luxury; it has been thus also with this whole group of words.' The words are 'delicacy,' 'delicate' (adj. and subst.), 'delicately,' 'delicateness,' 'delicious,' 'delicacies,' all of which except 'delicious' are found in AV.

Delicacy.—Rev 18<sup>3</sup> 'the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies' (σφόδρα sing., RV 'wantonness,' RVm 'luxury'). 'Delicacies' is Rhemish tr., after Vulg. deliciae, so Wyclif; but Tind. and others 'pleasures.' Voluptuousness is the oldest meaning of 'delicacy'; see Delicate, and cf. Chaucer, Former Age, 58—

'J . . . . . lecherous]

That first . . . . .

Delicate.—The adj. has two meanings in AV. 1. Softly nurtured, as Sus 31 'Now Susanna was a very d. woman, and beauteous to behold' (τρυφερός); Bar 4<sup>28</sup> 'my d. ones' (οἱ τρυφεροὶ μου); and probably Dt 28<sup>54, 55</sup>, Is 47<sup>1</sup> (all LXX, LXX τρυφερός), Jer 6<sup>2</sup> 'a comely and d. woman' (ἡγῆται, LXX different reading), and Mic 1<sup>16</sup> (ἡγῆται, LXX τρυφερός). 2. Luxurious, as Wis 19<sup>11</sup> 'they asked d. meats' (ἐδέσματα τρυφῆς, RV 'luxurious dainties'); Sir 29<sup>22</sup> 'Better is the life of a poor man in a mean cottage, than d. fare in another man's house' (ἐδέσματα λαμπρά, RV 'sumptuous fare'); and Pr 19<sup>10</sup> RV 'delicate living' (ἡγῆται, AV 'delight'). As a subst. delicacies occurs Jer 51<sup>24</sup> 'he hath filled his belly with my d.' (RV 'delicacies'); Sir 30<sup>18</sup> (ἀγαθά, RV . . . , 31<sup>3</sup> τρυφήματα, RV 'good things; . . . Gen. 'let mee not eat of their delicacies' (AV 'dainties'); W. Brough (1650), 'Hunger cooks all meats to delicacies,' which Herrick seems to copy (Country Life), 'Hunger makes coarse meats delicacies.' Delicately means 'luxuriously' in the foll. passages in AV, La 4<sup>5</sup> (ἡγῆται), Pr 29<sup>21</sup> 'he that d. bringeth up his servant from a child, shall have him become his son at the length' (πᾶς='fondle,' 'indulge'; 'delicately' is Wyclif's tr., who, following Vulg., renders 'who delicatli fro childhed nurslith his servaunt, afterward shal feelen hym vnobeisaut,' V. contumacem); Lk 7<sup>25</sup> 'they which are gorgeously appparelled, and live delicately, are in kings' courts' (τρυφή, as LXX La 4<sup>5</sup>, and at 2 P 2<sup>13</sup> where AV 'riot,' RV 'revel'); 1 Ti 5<sup>6</sup> AVm 'she that liveth delicately (text in pleasure,' Gr. ἡ σπαταλώσα), is dead while she liveth'; and add 2 S 1<sup>24</sup> Ja 5<sup>5</sup> RV. But in Ad. Est 15<sup>3</sup> (AVm and RV 'carrying herself d.,' AV 'daintily,' Gr. τρυφεροῦμαι) the meaning is 'as one that was tender' (Cov.), that is, weak; and so perhaps 1 S 15<sup>32</sup> 'Agag came unto him delicately.'

The last is the only doubtful passage. AV took 'delicately' from the Bishops' Bible; Cov. 'tenderly,' Gen. 'pleasantly.' The Bishops' marg. is 'in bondes,' and RVm 'cheerfully.' The LXX gives τρέμων; Vulg. pinguissimus, et tremens, whence Douay 'very fatte, trembling,' Luther, getrost (confidently); Ostervald, gaiement. The possible ways of taking the Heb. (הִיטָלָה) are given by Driver (Notes on Sam. p. 99), who decides that it is safest, on the whole, to acquiesce in 'delicately,' 'voluptuously.' And, undoubtedly, voluptuously or luxuriously is the most natural meaning of the Heb. (for which see La 4<sup>5</sup>).

but its use in this place is not very apparent. The Eng. expression 'delightful' is probably used to express weakness and fear (as Ad. 15: 15) rather than pride or voluptuousness.

Delicateness.—Only Dt 28<sup>56</sup> 'the tender and delicate woman . . . which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for d. (δυσκολία) and tenderness,' i.e. not 'weakness,' but 'fineness.' Deliciously=luxuriously, Rev 18<sup>7,9</sup> 'lived deliciously' (σπηνδαίω, RV 'lived wantonly'). Cf. Latimer, ii. 412, 'I am more inclined to feed many pleasantly & necessarily, than a few deliciously and voluptuously'; and Lk 16<sup>19</sup> Tind. 'a certaine rich man, which . . . fared deliciously every daye.'

J. HASTINGS.

DELIGHTSOME, now only po. . . was once good prose, and occurs 'be a d. land' (ἡ δ. γῆ). Davies (Bible Eng. p. 236) 'dark chamber to put thee in—a dungeon is more light-some and delightsome—the grave.'

J. HASTINGS.

DELILAH (דלילה, Δαλιδά).—The woman who betrayed Samson into the hands of the Philistines. The account as given in Jr 16 does not say whether she was an Israelite or a Philistine; but she was doubtless the latter, and Sorek, her place of residence, was then within the Philistine territory. Samson often sought her society, and allowed her to gain a great influence over him. That she was his wife is very improbable. That is the opinion of the writers. W. J. BEECHER.

DELLOS (δῆλος, Delos).—The island of Delos. It was considered to have been anchored by Zeus to the bottom of the sea, and therefore not to be exposed to ordinary earthquakes.* It was the seat of a very ancient and widely-spread worship of Apollo, who, with his twin sister Artemis, was said to have been born there; and the Gr. peoples flocked from a great distance to the annual festival on the island, which is celebrated in the Homeric hymn to the Delian Apollo. The festival of the Virgin on the neighbouring island of Tenos is the modern representative of the ancient feast of Apollo. D., in B.C. 478, was selected as the great confederacy of Gr. stat. . . coasts and islands for defence against the Persians; but after a time Athens, the governing city of the confederacy, became also its centre. The Athenians treated D. as a rival to their own interests. As Athens became great, D. lost its importance; but when Athens grew weak, D. recovered. During the 2nd and 1st cent. B.C. it became one of the greatest harbours of the Aegean Sea, playing the same part in ancient trade that the island of Syra has played in modern commerce, and being favoured by the Romans after B.C. 190 as a rival to the maritime power of Rhodes. It was a nominally independent state under Rom. protection from B.C. 197 to 167. Then it was punished, for coquetting with Macedonia, with the loss of freedom; it was given to Athens, and its natives fled and settled in Achaia; and the Delian archons came to an end. The island was re-peopled by Athenian colonists (κληροδοχοί), along with many Roman settlers; and henceforth its inscriptions are dated by the Athenian archons; and it was always considered to be part of the Roman province Achaia (which see). The earliest trace of a Roman settler in D. is contained in an inscription of B.C. 250. During the 2nd cent. it became the largest settlement of Roman (or Italian) merchants and traders in the Mediter. lands; mainly through their efforts and wealth its rather poor harbour was greatly improved. In their interest it was declared a free port by the Roman state in B.C. 166 in order to strike a blow at their commercial rivals, the merchants of Rhodes; and to satisfy them their other commercial rival Corinth (which see) was destroyed utterly by the Romans in B.C. 146.

Owing to its great importance in the E. Mediterranean trade, D. is mentioned in the list of states to which the Roman gov. addressed letters in favour of the Jews (B.C. 135: 157, 1 Mac 15<sup>16-23</sup>; and the inscriptions of D. form the best commentary on that important historical document. D. was the great exchange where the products and the slaves of all the states of the E. were bought for the Italian market, and most of the names mentioned in the passage of 1 Mac occur in the Delian documents. The strange omission of the kingdoms of Pontus and Bithynia in 1 Mac becomes all the more remarkable by comparison with the frequent mention of them at Delos. As Homolle says, 'Among the Orientals who frequented D., the Jews doubtless held a considerable place' (Bulletin de Corresp. Hellén. viii. 1884, p. 98); but, as the inscriptions are to a large extent concerned with religious purposes, it is not easy to find the traces of their presence. A decree of the Delians confirming the immunity of the Jews from military service is quoted in full by Jos. (Ant. XIV. x. 14).

A friendly policy brought the prosperity of D., and the Roman settlers, to an end. In the Mithridatic war Athens took part with the king, while D., where the Roman settlers were so numerous, naturally remained true to the Roman interest. After maintaining itself for a short time, D. was captured in B.C. 87 by the enemy; 20,000 Italians were massacred there and in the neighbouring Cyclades; and, when the Romans recovered it in the course of the war, they found it, as Strabo says, deserted. It recovered to a certain extent in the following years; but direct trade between Italy and the E. harbours now became more common; Ostia and Puteoli took the place of D. as the great emporia for the purchase of E. products required in Italy, and under the Roman Empire D. became utterly insignificant.

LITERATURE.—The excavations conducted at Delos for many years by the French School of Athens have thrown a flood of light on the history of the island. An excellent summary and estimate of the results of the excavations is given in the works, is given in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, pp. 7-62. Since then numerous articles have appeared in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, pp. 329-373, viii. pp. 7. See also Homolle, de Delo Insulae rebus. W. M. RAMSAY.

DELUGE.—See FLOOD.

DEMAND.—Throughout AV 'demand' is simply to ask, as Fr. demande, without the sense of authority. This is manifest from the Heb. and Gr. words so trd., which have all this simple meaning. In Introd. to Gen. Bible we read, 'The Catechisme, or manner to teach children the Catechisme, wherein the minister demandeth of the child the maketh answer.' See Field, O.V. iii. on Mt 24. As a subst. d. occurs only Dn 4<sup>17</sup> with the same simple meaning. Cf. Chaucer, Troilus, v. 859—

'And of th' assege (siege) he gan hir eek byseche,
To telle him what was hir opounch
Fro that demande he so descandeth doun
To asken hir, if that hir straunge thoughte
The Grekes gyse, and werkes that they wroughte.'

Once RV introduces d. in mod. sense (Neh 5<sup>18</sup>) for AV 'require' (see Ryle's note). J. HASTINGS.

* An earthquake at D. was considered a specially grave expression of the will and power of the god; see Herod. vi. 93; Thucyd. ii. 8.

DEMAS (Δημάς, possibly an abbrev. of Demetrius) is described by the Apostle Paul as a fellow-labourer, and unites with him in sending salutations from Rome to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col 4<sup>14</sup>, Philem v.<sup>24</sup>). In the 2nd Ep. to Timothy (4<sup>10</sup>) he is described as having forsaken the apostle when he was awaiting his trial before Nero, because he 'loved this present world.' Whether he was discouraged by the hardships of the Christian life, or allured by the hope of some earthly advantage, and whether his apostasy was final, we have no means of knowing. He fell into the darker view of his character, and classes him among the apostates of the faith (Epiph. Hær. 51).

R. W. BOYD.

DEMETRIUS I., surnamed Σωτήρ, 'Saviour,' by the Babylonians in gratitude for the removal of their satrap Heraclides, was the son of Seleucus Philopator. In his boyhood he was sent (B.C. 175) to Rome as a hostage, and remained there during the reign of his uncle, Antiochus Epiphanes. When the Senate several times refused his request to be acknowledged as the king of Syria, he fled from Rome, with the assistance chiefly of the historian Polybius (Polyb. xxxi.; Justin, xxxiv. 3). Landing at Tripolis, he was joined by large bodies of the people, and even by the bodyguard of his cousin, Antiochus Eupator. Eupator was soon defeated and put to death, and in B.C. 162 D. was proclaimed king (1 Mac 7<sup>1-4</sup>, 2 Mac 14<sup>1-2</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. x. 1; Liv. Epit. xvi.). He conciliated Rome by valuable presents (Polyb. xxxi. 23), and, after interfering in the affairs of Babylon (App. Syr. 47; Polyb. xxxii. 4), turned his attention to Judæa. Alcimus (wh. see) was established in the high priesthood, and the Syrian lordship was for a time completely renewed. In the seven years that followed, D. again offended the Romans by putting a supporter of his own in the place of Ariarathes on the throne of Cappadocia (Polyb. xxxii. 20; Liv. Epit. xvii.), whilst his tyranny and excesses alienated his own people. Alexander Balas (wh. see) was set up as a claimant to the crown of Syria (B.C. 153); and he and D. competed for the support of Jonathan (1 Mac 10<sup>21</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 1-3). The former, offering princely rank and the high priesthood, won at the first bid; and when the latter made a further promise of exemption from taxation and investment with privilege (1 Mac 10<sup>28-29</sup>), the people 'gave no credence' to his words, which are very important for the light they cast upon the nature of the imposts exacted by the Syrian kings. The salt tax, the king's share of the crops and fruits, the poll-tax, the pressed service, with a variety of other burdens, were to be remitted, and the expenses of the temple to be met from the royal revenue (see Mahaffy, Emp. of Ptolemies, § 117). With the help of the Jews, Balas was able to recover from the reverses he suffered during the two years' war that followed; and in B.C. 150 a decisive engagement took place, in which D. displayed the utmost personal bravery, but was defeated and slain (1 Mac 10<sup>48-50</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. ii. 4; App. Syr. 67; Polyb. iii. 5; Justin, xxxv. 1; Euseb. Chron. ed. Schoene, i. 263 sq.).

R. W. MOSS.

DEMETRIUS II., surnamed Νικτωρ, 'Conqueror,' was sent by his father, D. Soter, for safety to Cnidus after the success of Balas seemed probable (Justin, xxxv. 2). For several years he remained in exile; but as soon as the unpopularity of Balas gave him an opportunity, he landed (B.C. 147) with an army of Cretan mercenaries on the Cilician coast. The entire country rallied to him except Judæa, where Jonathan still supported Balas. But Ptolemy Philometor declared in his favour, and their combined forces inflicted a fatal defeat upon Balas (B.C. 145) on the banks of the Cénoparas, from which event D. derived his surname (1 Mac 11<sup>14-19</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 8; App. Syr. 67; Liv. Epit. li.). Jonathan now set himself to separate Judæa from the Syrian Empire, and besieged the citadel in Jerus.; but D. persuaded him to raise the siege on the addition of three Samaritan provinces to Judæa, and the exemption of the country thus enlarged from tribute (1 Mac 11<sup>20-27</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. iv. 9). When the excesses of D. had estranged his subjects, Tryphon (Diodotus), a former general of Balas, set up the latter's son as a pretender to the throne; but D. obtained the help of Jonathan by promising the removal of the Syrian garrison from Judæa, and put down the revolt (1 Mac 11<sup>31-32</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. v. 2, 3). On Jonathan's return to Judæa the revolt broke out again, and Tryphon made himself master of Antioch. As D. failed to keep his promise to the Jews, they now took the side of Tryphon, and drove the royal forces out of Coele-Syria (1 Mac 11<sup>51-74</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. v. 5-11). D. withdrew from the S. part of his kingdom; but when Tryphon, who had secured the Syrian crown for himself, attempted to reduce Judæa, Jonathan's brother Simon attached himself to D., and extracted from him a formal recognition of independence (1 Mac 13<sup>44-42</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. vi. 7). Soon after D. invaded the dominions of the king of Parthia, by whom, in B.C. 138, he was taken prisoner (1 Mac 14<sup>1-3</sup>; though Jos. Ant. xiii. v. 11, Justin, xxxvi. 1, and App. Syr. 67, 68, arrange the events in a different order, and support B.C. 140 as the date of the disaster). The imprisonment lasted for ten years, at the close of which D. was liberated by the Parthian king, who was engaged in war with Antiochus Sidetes, brother of D. (Jos. Ant. xiii. viii. 4; Eus. Chron. ed. Schoene, i. 255). D. recovered the kingdom (B.C. 132), and at once undertook a war against Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt. Ptolemy thereupon claimed the Syrian crown for Alexander Zabinas, who was announced to be the son of Balas (Eus. Chron. i. 257), or of Sidetes (Justin, xxxix. 1). D. was conquered by Zabinas at Damascus, and fled to Ptolemais, and thence to Tyre, where in B.C. 125 he was murdered (Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 3), possibly at the instigation of his wife Cleopatra (App. Syr. 68; Liv. Epit. lx.).

R. W. MOSS.

DEMETRIUS III. (surnamed Εὐκαίρος, 'Prosperous,' and on coins Theos, Soter, Philometor, etc.) was a son of Alexander Balas, and the son of D. Nikator. A civil war ensued, in the course of which two of his elder brothers lost their lives, whilst Philip, the third, secured a part of Syria, and D. established himself in Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital, by the aid of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 4). In Judæa, too, civil war broke out between Alexander Jannæus and his Pharisee subjects. The latter invited the assistance of D. (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 5; Wars, i. iv. 4), who possibly regarded it as a good opportunity to extend his kingdom to its ancient limits on the West and the South. He entered the country with a large army, was joined by the insurgent Jews, and defeated Jannæus in a pitched battle near Shechem (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiv. 1; Wars, i. iv. 5). But the desertion of the Jews, who either pitied the plight of Jannæus (Jos. Wars, ib.) or more probably feared the re-establishment of Syrian supremacy, made it impossible for D. to follow up the victory, and he withdrew to Beroea (Aleppo). The town was occupied by Philip, who, when besieged by his brother, called the Parthians to his aid. D. was in turn shut up closely within his encampment and starved into surrender. He was sent as a prisoner to Arsaces IX., by whom he was detained in captivity until his death (Jos. Ant. XIII. xiv. 3). The dates of the reign of D. cannot be fixed with precision; but coins of his are known, dated from the Seleucid year 217 to 224, i.e. approximately from B.C. 95 to 88 (Eckhel, ii. 245; Gardner, Catalogue of Gr. Coins in the Brit. Mus. 101). R. W. MOSS.

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος).—Two persons of the name are mentioned in NT—the one who instigated the riot at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>24</sup>), the other who was commended by St. John (3 Jn v. 12). Both of these dwelt either in Ephesus or its vicinity,—the very name is redolent of Ephesian surroundings, and there is nothing impossible in the suggestion that the agitator had become the disciple of good report, and that, therefore, both references are to the same man. In its contracted form of Demas this is also the name of one who has an unhappy notoriety as a recreant, 'Demas hath forsaken me' (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>). He is also mentioned in Col 4<sup>14</sup> and Philm v. 24, and it is not certain that St. Paul meant to imply anything like utter apostasy. W. MUIR.

DEMON, DEVIL, Gr. δαίμων, or δαιμόνιον (more frequently), Heb. שָׁדַי, Syr. ܫܕܝܐ, Aram. ܫܕܝܐ (cf. Assy. šidu). The supposed Heb. root is [שד] 'to be mighty,' hence 'to rule,' Arab. ساد (cf. ٲٲ 'to treat violently, to destroy'). Demoniac, δαμονιζόμενος. For 'devil' (properly διάβολος, see SATAN) RV rightly substitutes 'demon' wherever the Greek text has δαιμόνιον.

Both physical and moral evil may be regarded from two points of view: (1) As existing in man physically in the form of bodily disease, or spiritually as moral evil; (2) as having a source outside man. It is with physical and moral evil in the latter aspect that we are now dealing. Among the Hebrews, both in pre-exilic and post-exilic times down to a comparatively late period of the Christian era, both moral and physical evil were attributed to personal agencies. This conception of personal evil agencies, that affected man's body and soul, exercised a profound and enduring influence over the minds of Christ and the apostles, and played a very considerable part in the writings of the Church Fathers.

In tracing this conception of evil spirits influencing man to its primitive sources, we shall find that it has its springs in early Semitic ideas which surrounded the Israelite people in the dawn of their history. Baudissin has clearly shown how the demonology of the Græco-Roman period of Judaism emerged out of the earlier polytheism. On this we shall have more to say later on. But it should be noted that that polytheism was itself the outcome of the principle called by Tylor, in his well-known work Primitive Culture, by the name 'animism.' Even early mankind instinctively sought for causes, and interpreted the forces of nature as emanating from beings analogous to himself (cf. Siebeck, Lehrb. d. Religionsphilosophie, p. 58 ff.). Thus primitive man dwelt in a cosmic society of superhuman agencies, some of which ministered to his well-being and others to his injury. At the dawn of human consciousness man found himself confronted by forces which he was unable to control, and which exercised a baleful or destructive influence. Hurricane, lightning, sunstroke, plague, flood, and earthquake were ascribed to wrathful personal agencies, whose malignity man would endeavour to avert or appease.

The nomadic Arabs of the time of Mohammed believed in the existence of hostile powers or Jinns, who were held to be the inhabitants of lonely spots, and Mohammed himself recognized their existence just as fully as his heathen contemporaries did. Various names were given to them, viz. Ghāl, Ifrit, Sīlā, Alāk; and we have likewise feminine names. The word Ifrit, which occurs so frequently in the 'One thousand and one nights,' is also found in the Korān (Sur. 27. 39), and according to Wellhausen means, like the Heb. ٲٲ, 'hairy.'* 'The desert is full of these spectral shapes. Whoever spends his time there as a traveller must steel his heart against them. A child of the desert must be on friendly terms with the wolf and on terms of intimacy with the ghāl.' On this subject consult W. R. Smith, RS, p. 119 f.

A. THE DEMONOLOGY OF THE OT.—The parallels which we find in OT to the Jinn of ancient as well as modern Arabia may now be noted. Isaiah, in an oracle describing the doom of Edom, portrays a scene among Edom's ruined fortresses, when 'one ٲٲ (hairy satyr) shall call out to another, and Lilith (the night hag) shall take up her abode' (Is 34<sup>14</sup>). This Lilith is a demon of feminine sex. The same mythical creature meets us in the cuneiform inscriptions (see Schrader, COT ii. p. 311). In one of the magical texts cited by Hommel (Semiten, p. 367) occurs the line (iv. Rawl. 29, No 1, Rev. 23)—

'The litu, the ilitu, the handmaid of Litu.'

The ٲٲ, litu or ilitu is placed in this connexion with the demon Namtar. There can be little doubt that this plague-demon was connected in the popular imagination with the Semitic-Babylonian word lilitu, which means 'night,' and so became a word of terror, denoting the night-demon, who sucked the blood of her sleeping victims. This grim feminine personality became a subject for later Jewish legends (see Sayce, Hibbert Lect. p. 146), which multiplied these night-demons (lilitu).

* Skizzen u. Vorarbeiten, ii. ('Reste des Arabischen Heidenthums'), p. 135 ad fin. But this view appears to me somewhat doubtful, and the connexion of ٲٲ with ٲٲ

'dust,' seems more probable. When we bear in mind the close connexion between the Jinn and the serpent according to Arabic belief (see Noldeke, Zeitschr. für Volkskunde, u. Arabic, 1860, p. 412 ff.; and Baudissin, Stud. 279 ff.), we are not surprised to find with this serpent in Gen. 4. 1. thou shalt son of dishonour or disgrace, a ٲٲ in one of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (No. 271). But a hint which we Desert (l. p. 136) places us on the right track both for the ٲٲ, or 'alignity of the ٲٲ, or earth-folk.' Malignant demons are believed to inhabit the seven stages of the under-world (l. p. 259). I should of Gn 3<sup>4</sup>. u madu bu ٲٲ. Mr. B. Gray of Mansfield College, Oxford, in a letter to me dated 1897, has written: 'I have looked up the article in the Lisan el Arab on ٲٲ, and can find nothing that necessitates giving to Ifreet the sense "hairy." I daresay you have noticed that some of the derivatives of the root ٲٲ, ٲٲ (in plu.) denote the feathers of the neck or the mane, or the front hairs of a horse. In the line cited by Wellh. from Hudh. 227<sup>10</sup> ٲٲ (plu. of ٲٲ) is used of the hair of women. The feminine of ٲٲ, ٲٲ, whence, according to Arabic lexicographers, ٲٲ (Ifreet), through quiescence of the ٲ, and subsequent change of the ٲ into ٲ. This is all the connexion with hair which I have yet been able to find, and thus there seems less in favour of connecting Ifreet with hairiness, than of your attractive alternative view of connecting it with dust.' In the new ed (1897) of Wellhausen's Heite, see pp. 151 ff., and footnote 1 p. 162.

See Weber, Syst. der bibl. u. q. g. P. 'in. Theol. p. 246; Eisenmenger, ibid. ii. p. 413 ff.

Even conservative critics like Dillmann and König assign Is 34 (together with 35) to a period not earlier than the end of the exile; Cheyne, indeed, would regard it as post-exilic (Introd. to Isaiah, p. 205 ff.). In the case of this chapter, as well as 13<sup>2-14</sup>, it is impossible to deny the existence of clear traces of direct Babylonian influence. But the date of these passages does not determine the belief in demonic personalities embodied in animal shapes first became prevalent in Israel. From the mention of jackals, ostriches, wild cats, and hyenas in connexion with the שָׂרִים 'satyrs,' both in 34<sup>13ff.</sup> and its parallel 13<sup>21ff.</sup>, we are led to infer that demons were held to reside more or less in all these animal denizens of the ruined solitude. From Lv 17<sup>7</sup> we also learn that in post-ex. times sacrifices were offered to שָׂרִים—practiced which is expressly forbidden. On the other hand, the curious rite respecting 'Azazel' (עֶזְזֵל), detailed in Lv 16<sup>8ff.</sup>, formed an integral part of the ceremonies on the great Day of Atonement, and clearly shows how firmly embedded the imagination was this belief in evil spirits, and stands opposed to J.* See AZAZEL.

The belief that certain animals were endowed with demonic powers, somewhat like the Arabic Jinn, must have existed in comparatively early pre-ex. times, since Gn 3<sup>1-19</sup>, containing the temptation of Eve by the serpent, belongs to the earlier stratum of J. We might compare with this Nu 22<sup>23-34</sup>, coming from the same documentary source. But in the narrative of the temptation of Eve by the serpent there is no hint that an evil spirit resided in the serpent. The serpent is identified with it, and we have no suggestion that a demon was able to detach itself from the animal and pass into something else. This was a later development. The animal was itself the demonic power, and the latter is not abstracted or treated as a separable personality.

The Jewish exile, covering the larger part of the 6th cent. B.C. and the close of the 7th, wrought a great change. It is probably to this period that we owe the Heb. word שָׂרִים. This word, occurring in the plural form שָׂרִים in Dt 32<sup>17</sup>, like the Aram. שָׂרִים, is probably a loan-word, taken from the Assyro-Babylonian (sidu). The word sidu in Assy. means good or evil genius, represented in the monuments in the form of a colossal bull. The word occurs only twice in OT (Dt 32<sup>17</sup> and Ps 106<sup>37</sup>). The Song of Moses (Dt 32) in its present form can hardly be earlier than the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Kuenen). Indeed, its retrospective and didactic character, as well as the references to Israel's past sins of idolatry, would point quite as well to the 6th cent. as to the 7th for the date of its composition. In other words, it may be held, with considerable probability, to reflect the feelings of pious Jews in the exile period.

Now, magic played a very considerable part in Babylonian religion. Magic rests on the basis of a belief in evil and destructive spirits, to whose baleful influences man is daily exposed, and which can be counteracted by certain incantations, whereby the countervailing name and power of the higher beneficent gods are invoked. As Sayce has clearly shown (Hibbert Lect. p. 317), magic was closely bound up with medicine, since 'all sickness was ascribed to demoniacal possession; the demon had been eaten with the food and drunk with the water, or breathed in with the air, and until he could be expelled there was no chance of recovery' (p. 310). Specimens of these magical texts may be seen in the translations given in Appendix 3 of Sayce's Hibbert Lectures. We subjoin the following specimen:—

'The plague (namtar), the fever which will carry the people away,
The sickness, the consumption which will trouble mankind,
Harmful to the flesh, injurious to the body,
The evil incubus, the evil alu, the evil maslum,
The evil man, the evil eye, the evil mouth, the evil tongue .
Against my body never may they come,
My eye never may they injure . . .
Into my house never may they enter,
O spirit of heaven conjure, O spirit of earth conjure.*'

A comparison of this vast system of belief in evil spirits and in incantations, which prevailed in Babylonia, with the later Jewish traditions of demonology, at once reveals the close connexion between the two. During the exile these Babylonian traditions effected an entrance into the Jewish world of ideas, and there became permanently domiciled.

But while שָׂרִים is obviously borrowed from the Bab. sidu, its signification was by no means the same. For שָׂרִים is used in the sense of deities of the heathen, אֱלֹהִים זָרִים. Now, the attitude of ancient Israel towards foreign deities varied considerably in different periods of the nation's history. The continued declension of the people towards idolatry in the pre-exilic times, as shown in the popular songs, Ps 135, Ps 136, Ps 137, Ps 138, Ps 139, Ps 140, Ps 141, Ps 142, Ps 143, Ps 144, Ps 145, Ps 146, Ps 147, Ps 148, Ps 149, Ps 150, Ps 151, Ps 152, Ps 153, Ps 154, Ps 155, Ps 156, Ps 157, Ps 158, Ps 159, Ps 160, Ps 161, Ps 162, Ps 163, Ps 164, Ps 165, Ps 166, Ps 167, Ps 168, Ps 169, Ps 170, Ps 171, Ps 172, Ps 173, Ps 174, Ps 175, Ps 176, Ps 177, Ps 178, Ps 179, Ps 180, Ps 181, Ps 182, Ps 183, Ps 184, Ps 185, Ps 186, Ps 187, Ps 188, Ps 189, Ps 190, Ps 191, Ps 192, Ps 193, Ps 194, Ps 195, Ps 196, Ps 197, Ps 198, Ps 199, Ps 200, Ps 201, Ps 202, Ps 203, Ps 204, Ps 205, Ps 206, Ps 207, Ps 208, Ps 209, Ps 210, Ps 211, Ps 212, Ps 213, Ps 214, Ps 215, Ps 216, Ps 217, Ps 218, Ps 219, Ps 220, Ps 221, Ps 222, Ps 223, Ps 224, Ps 225, Ps 226, Ps 227, Ps 228, Ps 229, Ps 230, Ps 231, Ps 232, Ps 233, Ps 234, Ps 235, Ps 236, Ps 237, Ps 238, Ps 239, Ps 240, Ps 241, Ps 242, Ps 243, Ps 244, Ps 245, Ps 246, Ps 247, Ps 248, Ps 249, Ps 250, Ps 251, Ps 252, Ps 253, Ps 254, Ps 255, Ps 256, Ps 257, Ps 258, Ps 259, Ps 260, Ps 261, Ps 262, Ps 263, Ps 264, Ps 265, Ps 266, Ps 267, Ps 268, Ps 269, Ps 270, Ps 271, Ps 272, Ps 273, Ps 274, Ps 275, Ps 276, Ps 277, Ps 278, Ps 279, Ps 280, Ps 281, Ps 282, Ps 283, Ps 284, Ps 285, Ps 286, Ps 287, Ps 288, Ps 289, Ps 290, Ps 291, Ps 292, Ps 293, Ps 294, Ps 295, Ps 296, Ps 297, Ps 298, Ps 299, Ps 300, Ps 301, Ps 302, Ps 303, Ps 304, Ps 305, Ps 306, Ps 307, Ps 308, Ps 309, Ps 310, Ps 311, Ps 312, Ps 313, Ps 314, Ps 315, Ps 316, Ps 317, Ps 318, Ps 319, Ps 320, Ps 321, Ps 322, Ps 323, Ps 324, Ps 325, Ps 326, Ps 327, Ps 328, Ps 329, Ps 330, Ps 331, Ps 332, Ps 333, Ps 334, Ps 335, Ps 336, Ps 337, Ps 338, Ps 339, Ps 340, Ps 341, Ps 342, Ps 343, Ps 344, Ps 345, Ps 346, Ps 347, Ps 348, Ps 349, Ps 350, Ps 351, Ps 352, Ps 353, Ps 354, Ps 355, Ps 356, Ps 357, Ps 358, Ps 359, Ps 360, Ps 361, Ps 362, Ps 363, Ps 364, Ps 365, Ps 366, Ps 367, Ps 368, Ps 369, Ps 370, Ps 371, Ps 372, Ps 373, Ps 374, Ps 375, Ps 376, Ps 377, Ps 378, Ps 379, Ps 380, Ps 381, Ps 382, Ps 383, Ps 384, Ps 385, Ps 386, Ps 387, Ps 388, Ps 389, Ps 390, Ps 391, Ps 392, Ps 393, Ps 394, Ps 395, Ps 396, Ps 397, Ps 398, Ps 399, Ps 400, Ps 401, Ps 402, Ps 403, Ps 404, Ps 405, Ps 406, Ps 407, Ps 408, Ps 409, Ps 410, Ps 411, Ps 412, Ps 413, Ps 414, Ps 415, Ps 416, Ps 417, Ps 418, Ps 419, Ps 420, Ps 421, Ps 422, Ps 423, Ps 424, Ps 425, Ps 426, Ps 427, Ps 428, Ps 429, Ps 430, Ps 431, Ps 432, Ps 433, Ps 434, Ps 435, Ps 436, Ps 437, Ps 438, Ps 439, Ps 440, Ps 441, Ps 442, Ps 443, Ps 444, Ps 445, Ps 446, Ps 447, Ps 448, Ps 449, Ps 450, Ps 451, Ps 452, Ps 453, Ps 454, Ps 455, Ps 456, Ps 457, Ps 458, Ps 459, Ps 460, Ps 461, Ps 462, Ps 463, Ps 464, Ps 465, Ps 466, Ps 467, Ps 468, Ps 469, Ps 470, Ps 471, Ps 472, Ps 473, Ps 474, Ps 475, Ps 476, Ps 477, Ps 478, Ps 479, Ps 480, Ps 481, Ps 482, Ps 483, Ps 484, Ps 485, Ps 486, Ps 487, Ps 488, Ps 489, Ps 490, Ps 491, Ps 492, Ps 493, Ps 494, Ps 495, Ps 496, Ps 497, Ps 498, Ps 499, Ps 500, Ps 501, Ps 502, Ps 503, Ps 504, Ps 505, Ps 506, Ps 507, Ps 508, Ps 509, Ps 510, Ps 511, Ps 512, Ps 513, Ps 514, Ps 515, Ps 516, Ps 517, Ps 518, Ps 519, Ps 520, Ps 521, Ps 522, Ps 523, Ps 524, Ps 525, Ps 526, Ps 527, Ps 528, Ps 529, Ps 530, Ps 531, Ps 532, Ps 533, Ps 534, Ps 535, Ps 536, Ps 537, Ps 538, Ps 539, Ps 540, Ps 541, Ps 542, Ps 543, Ps 544, Ps 545, Ps 546, Ps 547, Ps 548, Ps 549, Ps 550, Ps 551, Ps 552, Ps 553, Ps 554, Ps 555, Ps 556, Ps 557, Ps 558, Ps 559, Ps 560, Ps 561, Ps 562, Ps 563, Ps 564, Ps 565, Ps 566, Ps 567, Ps 568, Ps 569, Ps 570, Ps 571, Ps 572, Ps 573, Ps 574, Ps 575, Ps 576, Ps 577, Ps 578, Ps 579, Ps 580, Ps 581, Ps 582, Ps 583, Ps 584, Ps 585, Ps 586, Ps 587, Ps 588, Ps 589, Ps 590, Ps 591, Ps 592, Ps 593, Ps 594, Ps 595, Ps 596, Ps 597, Ps 598, Ps 599, Ps 600, Ps 601, Ps 602, Ps 603, Ps 604, Ps 605, Ps 606, Ps 607, Ps 608, Ps 609, Ps 610, Ps 611, Ps 612, Ps 613, Ps 614, Ps 615, Ps 616, Ps 617, Ps 618, Ps 619, Ps 620, Ps 621, Ps 622, Ps 623, Ps 624, Ps 625, Ps 626, Ps 627, Ps 628, Ps 629, Ps 630, Ps 631, Ps 632, Ps 633, Ps 634, Ps 635, Ps 636, Ps 637, Ps 638, Ps 639, Ps 640, Ps 641, Ps 642, Ps 643, Ps 644, Ps 645, Ps 646, Ps 647, Ps 648, Ps 649, Ps 650, Ps 651, Ps 652, Ps 653, Ps 654, Ps 655, Ps 656, Ps 657, Ps 658, Ps 659, Ps 660, Ps 661, Ps 662, Ps 663, Ps 664, Ps 665, Ps 666, Ps 667, Ps 668, Ps 669, Ps 670, Ps 671, Ps 672, Ps 673, Ps 674, Ps 675, Ps 676, Ps 677, Ps 678, Ps 679, Ps 680, Ps 681, Ps 682, Ps 683, Ps 684, Ps 685, Ps 686, Ps 687, Ps 688, Ps 689, Ps 690, Ps 691, Ps 692, Ps 693, Ps 694, Ps 695, Ps 696, Ps 697, Ps 698, Ps 699, Ps 700, Ps 701, Ps 702, Ps 703, Ps 704, Ps 705, Ps 706, Ps 707, Ps 708, Ps 709, Ps 710, Ps 711, Ps 712, Ps 713, Ps 714, Ps 715, Ps 716, Ps 717, Ps 718, Ps 719, Ps 720, Ps 721, Ps 722, Ps 723, Ps 724, Ps 725, Ps 726, Ps 727, Ps 728, Ps 729, Ps 730, Ps 731, Ps 732, Ps 733, Ps 734, Ps 735, Ps 736, Ps 737, Ps 738, Ps 739, Ps 740, Ps 741, Ps 742, Ps 743, Ps 744, Ps 745, Ps 746, Ps 747, Ps 748, Ps 749, Ps 750, Ps 751, Ps 752, Ps 753, Ps 754, Ps 755, Ps 756, Ps 757, Ps 758, Ps 759, Ps 760, Ps 761, Ps 762, Ps 763, Ps 764, Ps 765, Ps 766, Ps 767, Ps 768, Ps 769, Ps 770, Ps 771, Ps 772, Ps 773, Ps 774, Ps 775, Ps 776, Ps 777, Ps 778, Ps 779, Ps 780, Ps 781, Ps 782, Ps 783, Ps 784, Ps 785, Ps 786, Ps 787, Ps 788, Ps 789, Ps 790, Ps 791, Ps 792, Ps 793, Ps 794, Ps 795, Ps 796, Ps 797, Ps 798, Ps 799, Ps 800, Ps 801, Ps 802, Ps 803, Ps 804, Ps 805, Ps 806, Ps 807, Ps 808, Ps 809, Ps 810, Ps 811, Ps 812, Ps 813, Ps 814, Ps 815, Ps 816, Ps 817, Ps 818, Ps 819, Ps 820, Ps 821, Ps 822, Ps 823, Ps 824, Ps 825, Ps 826, Ps 827, Ps 828, Ps 829, Ps 830, Ps 831, Ps 832, Ps 833, Ps 834, Ps 835, Ps 836, Ps 837, Ps 838, Ps 839, Ps 840, Ps 841, Ps 842, Ps 843, Ps 844, Ps 845, Ps 846, Ps 847, Ps 848, Ps 849, Ps 850, Ps 851, Ps 852, Ps 853, Ps 854, Ps 855, Ps 856, Ps 857, Ps 858, Ps 859, Ps 860, Ps 861, Ps 862, Ps 863, Ps 864, Ps 865, Ps 866, Ps 867, Ps 868, Ps 869, Ps 870, Ps 871, Ps 872, Ps 873, Ps 874, Ps 875, Ps 876, Ps 877, Ps 878, Ps 879, Ps 880, Ps 881, Ps 882, Ps 883, Ps 884, Ps 885, Ps 886, Ps 887, Ps 888, Ps 889, Ps 890, Ps 891, Ps 892, Ps 893, Ps 894, Ps 895, Ps 896, Ps 897, Ps 898, Ps 899, Ps 900, Ps 901, Ps 902, Ps 903, Ps 904, Ps 905, Ps 906, Ps 907, Ps 908, Ps 909, Ps 910, Ps 911, Ps 912, Ps 913, Ps 914, Ps 915, Ps 916, Ps 917, Ps 918, Ps 919, Ps 920, Ps 921, Ps 922, Ps 923, Ps 924, Ps 925, Ps 926, Ps 927, Ps 928, Ps 929, Ps 930, Ps 931, Ps 932, Ps 933, Ps 934, Ps 935, Ps 936, Ps 937, Ps 938, Ps 939, Ps 940, Ps 941, Ps 942, Ps 943, Ps 944, Ps 945, Ps 946, Ps 947, Ps 948, Ps 949, Ps 950, Ps 951, Ps 952, Ps 953, Ps 954, Ps 955, Ps 956, Ps 957, Ps 958, Ps 959, Ps 960, Ps 961, Ps 962, Ps 963, Ps 964, Ps 965, Ps 966, Ps 967, Ps 968, Ps 969, Ps 970, Ps 971, Ps 972, Ps 973, Ps 974, Ps 975, Ps 976, Ps 977, Ps 978, Ps 979, Ps 980, Ps 981, Ps 982, Ps 983, Ps 984, Ps 985, Ps 986, Ps 987, Ps 988, Ps 989, Ps 990, Ps 991, Ps 992, Ps 993, Ps 994, Ps 995, Ps 996, Ps 997, Ps 998, Ps 999, Ps 1000, Ps 1001, Ps 1002, Ps 1003, Ps 1004, Ps 1005, Ps 1006, Ps 1007, Ps 1008, Ps 1009, Ps 1010, Ps 1011, Ps 1012, Ps 1013, Ps 1014, Ps 1015, Ps 1016, Ps 1017, Ps 1018, Ps 1019, Ps 1020, Ps 1021, Ps 1022, Ps 1023, Ps 1024, Ps 1025, Ps 1026, Ps 1027, Ps 1028, Ps 1029, Ps 1030, Ps 1031, Ps 1032, Ps 1033, Ps 1034, Ps 1035, Ps 1036, Ps 1037, Ps 1038, Ps 1039, Ps 1040, Ps 1041, Ps 1042, Ps 1043, Ps 1044, Ps 1045, Ps 1046, Ps 1047, Ps 1048, Ps 1049, Ps 1050, Ps 1051, Ps 1052, Ps 1053, Ps 1054, Ps 1055, Ps 1056, Ps 1057, Ps 1058, Ps 1059, Ps 1060, Ps 1061, Ps 1062, Ps 1063, Ps 1064, Ps 1065, Ps 1066, Ps 1067, Ps 1068, Ps 1069, Ps 1070, Ps 1071, Ps 1072, Ps 1073, Ps 1074, Ps 1075, Ps 1076, Ps 1077, Ps 1078, Ps 1079, Ps 1080, Ps 1081, Ps 1082, Ps 1083, Ps 1084, Ps 1085, Ps 1086, Ps 1087, Ps

Writ were considered specially potent against demons. Berach. 51a recommends the ḥa-ṣaḥ ḥor, Zec 34 'The Lord rebuke thee, Satan, as specially effective against the Angel of Death. Aboda Zara 12b, Pesachim 112b, warn the reader against drinking water in the night, for he runs the risk of death, or of the demon Shabriri, who can make men blind. The remedy is to strike the water-jug with the lid, and say to oneself, 'Thou N., son of N., thy mother hath warned thee, and said, Guard thyself from the Shabriri, deriri riri, riri, ri,' the pronunciation of the name with a syllable short each time being a potent spell to drive the . . .

We shall now cite an interesting passage from Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 5), which is significant because it shows how profoundly the belief in demonology affected even the most cultivated and cosmopolitan of Jews. In his account of Solomon's wisdom * we are informed that 'God enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons,' and that Solomon composed such incantations as alleviate distempers. 'And he left behind him the mode of using exorcism by which they drive away demons so that they never return. And this method is prevalent unto this day, for I have seen a certain man of my own country, whose name was Eleazar, releasing people that were demoniacal in the presence of Vespasian. . . . The manner of the cure was as follows:—He put a ring that had a root, of one of those sorts mentioned by Solomon, to the nostrils of the demoniac, after which he drew the demon out through his nostrils; and when the man fell down at once, he adjured him (the demon) to return unto him no more, making still mention of Solomon, and reciting the incantations which he composed.' Another passage shows that Josephus considered demons to be the spirits of departed wicked men (BJ VII. vi. 3).

Passing for a few moments to the Jewish apocryphal literature of the age, we find in the birth of Jesus, we observe that according to the Book of Enoch the demons are lost angels. They assail men's bodies, cause convulsions, and in other ways vex and oppress mankind (ch. 15); and this war of the demons on men will continue until the day of consummation—the great judgment (16), when they will receive dire chastisement.† In 19<sup>1</sup> we learn that evil spirits in various shapes shall corrupt men, and lead them astray to sacrifice to demons as if to gods until the great judgment day. In 53<sup>8</sup> we read of the iron chains prepared for the angelic hosts who are hurled down into the abyss of condemnation (cf. 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>, Rev 20<sup>2,3</sup>).

In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (test. Reuben) we are informed that there are seven evil spirits sent out from Beliar against mankind, viz. those of life, seeing, hearing, smell, talking, taste, and the procreative impulses. Another group of seven is mentioned, viz. of fornication, gluttony, competitiveness, flattery, pride, falsehood, injustice.

C. THE DEMONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

—This is in all its broad characteristics the demonology of the תורת המעשים Judaism stripped of its cruder and exaggerated elements. Evil demons or unclean demons, δαίμονια (דַּיְמוֹנִיּוֹת), πνεύματα ἀκάθαρα or רוּחִים (רוּחִים רְשָׁעִים), hover about the world, and these are under subjection to Satan (δὲσαν τῷ σατανᾷ).

* Respecting Solomon as a nucleus of later legend, see Stade, Gesch. p. 309 ff. and the Arabic story of Bilkis (given in the Chrestomathy of Socin's Arabic Grammar).

† Conybeare, in quoting this, apparently cites the cry of the demons to Jesus, 'Art thou come hither to torment us before our time?' I desire here to express my obligations to this writer, whose interesting articles on the 'Demomology of the New Testament' (JQR, July and October 1896) contain much valuable information. They are occasionally marked, however, by a certain tendency to accentuate unduly some of the details of the NT narrative. Note, for example, his rendering of ἰσχυροί as 'fell bodily' in Ac 10:4, whereas it has no more physical significance than in Eurip. Androm. 1042, σοὶ μὲν αὖθις ἰσχυροὶ λῦται.

Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>15</sup>. The demon was said to enter (εἰσέρχεται) into a man somewhat as though it were a physical entity, and similarly was said to be expelled or was forcibly expelled by some one who had authority to cast out (ἐκβάλλειν) demons. The demons may pass into other animals, e.g. into the Gadarene swine. A man possessed with a devil was said to have or hold a demon (ἔχει δαιμόνιον), or to be a demoniac (δαιμονιζόμενος, cf. the Arabic mejnūn, said of a man possessed by a Jinn, ibid. 259). Mt (4<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>15</sup>) also employs the verb εἰσέρχεται 'to be a lunatic,' as though it expressed something distinct from δαιμονιζέσθαι (4<sup>24</sup>). In Mk 1<sup>34</sup> the phrase used is (ἀνθρώποι) ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῃ, where the preposition ἐν means 'in' (under the influence of; cf. Winer, § xl. 1). Luke also uses ἐν οχλείσθαι of demon possession (6<sup>17</sup>).

The manifestations of demoniac very varied in NT. In the case of he is compelled to dwell among the tombs, which are associated with solitude and uncleanness. As water is connected with cleansing, the demons have a waterless spots. Demons are, however, chiefly associated with abnormal forms of human life, especially disease. Dumbness (Lk 9<sup>39</sup>, Mk 9<sup>17</sup>), deafness and dumbness (Mk 9<sup>25</sup>), blindness and deafness combined (Mt 12<sup>22</sup>), and epilepsy (Mk 1<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>39</sup>), are the manifestations of demoniac influence. Of all the synoptic evangelists, Luke is the most powerfully impressed with this conception. Even high fever is attributed to demoniac agency, as we can clearly infer from the fact that, in the case of Peter's mother-in-law, Jesus stood over her and rebuked the fever which possessed her (Lk 4<sup>38-39</sup>, cf. 13<sup>16</sup>). It is to be noted, however, that in this Gospel a saying of our Lord is reported which expressly distinguishes between ordinary cures and expulsion of demons, ἐκβάλλω δαμόνια καὶ ἰάσεις ἀποτελῶ (Lk 13<sup>26</sup>). The demons, moreover, were able to speak, and exercised mastery over the vocal organs of the human subject. Thus in one case, as the demon came forth, it cried with a loud voice (Mk 1<sup>26</sup>). It was possible for many demons to possess a human being at the same time. Seven demons were cast out from Mary Magdalene by Jesus (Lk 8<sup>2</sup>), while the Gadarene demoniac was possessed by a legion.

spirits Jesus bequeathed to His disciples (Mt 10<sup>1</sup>). They effected their cures simply by naming the name of Jesus (Mk 16<sup>17</sup>, Ac 3<sup>6</sup>). This belief in the powerful efficacy of the name comes from a hoary Semitic past (see Sayce's Hubbert Lect. pp. 302-307). It should be remembered that name meant to an ancient Semite personal power and existence, and hence involved to those who invoked the name of Jesus belief in the actual presence and might of the divine Saviour of mankind.

Before passing from the subject of the Gospel narratives in their relation to demonology, it should not be forgotten (1) that we have with the reports of chroniclers whose accounts are necessarily coloured by the popular beliefs of the age, psychic and cosmic; (2) that the properly demonic element is almost entirely absent from the Fourth Gospel. In 8th 10<sup>20</sup> employed by the Jews is quoted, while in 6th Judas is called διὰ βόλος and not δαίμων.

St. Paul, however, shared the conceptions of his contemporaries respecting devils. The following may be cited in illustration. In the much disputed passage 1 Co 10<sup>19, 20</sup> points, in our opinion, to the conclusion adopted by Baudissin, and more recently by Everling (Die Paulinische Angelologie u. s. v.), that St. Paul had borrowed the belief that the offerings to heathen deities were offerings to demons (cf. above the demonology of the Bk. of Enoch and the Sibylline books). In 1 Co 10<sup>20</sup> Paul argues, 'But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have communion with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils.' He is pleading that it is not permissible to partake of the heathen sacrificial offerings. He quotes the two examples of the Christian Lord's Supper and the Jewish sacrifice. In both cases there is a real communion between the participator and the object of worship. The statement in 8th 'We know that no idol is anything in the world,' does not involve any inconsistency. For St. Paul the gods as such are creatures of the imagination; yet he does not hold that nothing at all exists behind the image-worship of the heathen, but that demons lurk there and the kingdom of Satan, and that participators in heathen feasts are drawn into the circle of their evil influence (so Holsten).* Moreover, Everling (ib. p. 33 ff.) has shown with considerable probability that the reference in the obscure phrase 1 Co 11<sup>17</sup> 'for this cause ought the woman to have power over her head on account of the angels' is to be found in the legend of the intercourse of the fallen angels with the daughters of men. Book of Enoch (ch. 6) and other passages from the Book of Jubilees, Apocalypse of Baruch 56<sup>12</sup> in Charles' ed., and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (test. Reuben 5), show the important place held by this tradition in the literature that preceded the time of St. Paul.

It would lie beyond the scope of this article to trace the development of demonology in post-apostolic Christian writers. The elaborate demonology of Origen is portrayed in Conybeare's interesting article (JQR, Oct. 1896), to which the reader is referred. The enormous range of this belief in all its varieties, and the extent to which it penetrated into popular belief and practice from the hoary antiquity of Babylonian and Egyptian magic down to the time of the Reformation and beyond, is a fact of which this modern age of

* The opposite view is taken by Beyschlag in his Programme, 'Did the Apostle Paul regard the gods of the heathen as demons?' and he is followed by Marcus Dods (Expositor, March 1895, p. 237 ff.). But on the subject of Demonology in the NT, and the belief of Jesus in a personal devil, Beyschlag is an unsafe guide, as I shall attempt to show in my article SATAN.

is dimly conscious. Readers of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, however, soon become aware how fervently the modern Arab of the desert believes in the Jān (see especially vol. ii. p. 188 ff.). Monumental evidence presents a vast array of examples. A considerable mass of Aramaic inscriptions could be cited, if necessary, consisting of nothing else than incantations or spells. See, for example, the transcription and translation by Jos. Wohlstein, in Zeitschr. für Assyriologie, April 1894, of Aramaic inscriptions on clay vessels preserved in the Royal Museum at Berlin, No. 2416 (consisting of nearly 100 lines); also in Dec. 1893, No. 222 of 44 lines). See also the interesting Greek form in Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 261., and cf. art. EXORCISM. Respecting modern examples of demoniacal exorcism it is difficult to speak, though some examples appear well authenticated. One of the most striking is to be found in the account given by the missionary Waldmeier of his ten years' labour in Abyssinia. See Thomas Waldmeier, p. 61-62. The prevalence of such beliefs have not only passed into Western Europe, the gloom still invests a large portion of the world, and fills the hearts of many millions of our fellow-men with anguish and terror. Like our first parents, we behold

'all the eastern side
With dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms.'

OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

DEMOPHON (Δημόφων, 2 Mac 12<sup>2</sup>), a Syrian commandant in Palestine under Antiochus Eupator. According to the author of 2 Mac, after terms of peace had been agreed upon for the first time between Judas Maccabæus and Lysias (see ABSALOM IN APOCR.), some of the provincial commandants, among them, continued to act in a hostile manner towards the Jews.

H. A. WHITE.

DEN (דֵּן the lurking-place of wild beasts, Job 37<sup>8</sup>; דֵּן a cave where robbers hide, Jer 7<sup>11</sup>; דֵּן in Jg 6<sup>2</sup> is perhaps [but see Moore, ad loc.] a deep valley or water-course. In NT σπηλαιον).—The lions' den into which Daniel was cast (Dn 6<sup>7</sup> etc.) was doubtless that in which the king's lions were kept, in accordance with a custom known to prevail at Oriental courts. Layard (Nin. and Bab.) shows that these beasts were used for punishment or sport by the kings of Assyria. A bas-relief of Assurnasir-pal (B.C. 885-860) discovered at Nimroud, now in the British Museum. A seal of Darius has also been found, on which the king is represented in the act of shooting an arrow at a lion rampant.

G. WALKER.

DENARIUS.—See MONEY.

DENOUNCE.—In AV Dt 30<sup>18</sup> only, 'I d. unto you this day (that ye shall surely perish)' (דָּנִיתִי, tr<sup>d</sup> 'I profess' 26<sup>1</sup>). This is the orig. meaning of the word (fr. Lat. denuntiāre, 'to give official intimation'). So Peacock (1449), 'The Evangelie of God . . . which to alle men oughte be denouncid'; and 2 Th 3<sup>10</sup> Wyc. (1380) 'we denounced this thing to you, that if any man wole not worche: nether ete he' (after Vulg. hoc denunciabamus vobis).

J. HASTINGS.

DENY.—In the sense of 'refuse,' deny (Lat. de-negare, 'say no,' 'refuse') is not yet obsolete. Examples in AV are 1 K 2<sup>18</sup> 'I ask one petition of thee, deny me not' (דָּנִיתִי אֶתְּךָ 'turn not away my face'; in v. 20 the same phrase is twice tr<sup>d</sup> in AV 'say not nay,' RV 'deny not'; cf. Lk 12<sup>27</sup>; 1 K 20<sup>7</sup>, Pr 30<sup>7</sup> 'Two things have I required (RV 'asked') of thee; deny me them not before I die' (both דָּנִיתִי). But we cannot now say 'deny to do porated in the Pentateuch. The other main group of narratives in the Pent., denominated P from its generally 'priestly' characteristics, does not appear to have supplied the foundation for the treatment of the history in D. Thus in 1<sup>38</sup> the reader notices that Caleb alone is mentioned as the recipient of especial favour; there is no mention made of Joshua. In the Book of Nu the passage which records the favour granted to Caleb alone (Nu 14<sup>24</sup>) belongs to JE, the passage which associates Joshua with Caleb (Nu 14<sup>30</sup>) belongs to P. Similarly, in 11<sup>6</sup> we find mention of Dathan and Abiram, but not of Korah, who figures so conspicuously in Nu 16. But in Nu 16 the Korah passages are assigned by scholars to P; the JE portion of the narrative speaks only of Dathan and Abiram.

There are only three incidents in the historical references of Dt which are to be found in the P and not in the JE narrative of the Pentateuch. These are (1) the mention of the number 'twelve,' of the spies, Dt 1<sup>28</sup>, cf. Nu 13<sup>2-16</sup>; (2) the mention of the number 'seventy,' of the family of Jacob, Dt 10<sup>22</sup>, cf. Gn 46<sup>27</sup>, Ex 1<sup>5</sup>; (3) the mention of acacia-wood as the material of which the ark was made, Dt 10<sup>8</sup>, cf. Ex 25<sup>10</sup>. But it is to be remembered that these facts may have been recorded in JE, but have been preserved to us only in the excerpts from the P narrative.

Assuming the correctness of the general proposition, which is universally admitted by modern scholars, that the Pent. is of composite origin, we are brought, by a consideration of the literary likeness in D's treatment and style, to the opinion that D must take rank with JE and P as one of the component elements of the Pentateuch. Not, of course, that D should necessarily be ascribed any more than J, or E, or P, to any one writer or author, but only that in style and treatment it may be attributed to a literary source, representing the influence of a particular period, or of particular circumstances, upon a writer, or a school, or a succession of writers.

iii. THE UNITY OF THE BOOK.—Though we have hitherto spoken of Dt as if it were a unity in itself, it would be a mistake to suppose that it presents an unbroken homogeneous piece of literature written by a single person. There is good reason to suppose that the same kind of literary history is to be attributed to D as to JE and P. The original nucleus of writing has been revised, expanded, and modified. It is not difficult to indicate portions which could hardly have worn their present appearance if from the first they had been part of a consecutive piece of writing.

It appears the most probable view that Dt 5-26 (27<sup>8-10</sup>), 28 represent the original work, either in part or in its entirety. In this work chs. 5-11 formed the introduction; ch. 28 the peroration.

Wellhausen, indeed, limits the original work of Dt to chs. 12-26. But there seems no sufficient ground for separating 5-11 from 12-26. The style and diction are in marked agreement, and the differences which have been detected in the two sections are only those which might be expected to arise from the difference of subject-matter.

With regard to chs. 1-4 doubts have been more generally expressed. It has seemed to many improbable that the introduction, consisting of 5-11, should have been preceded by a long prefatory section. It is objected that the arrangement is too cumbersome to be the original one; that the awkwardness of the present arrangement is emphasized by the presence of two formal benedictions, 1<sup>1-5</sup> and 4<sup>44-49</sup>. Moreover, the absence in the hortatory passage 41-40 of any allusion to the preceding historical summary has suggested a doubt whether ch. 4 could be homogeneous with chs. 1-3. On the other hand, the style is admittedly Deuteronomic; and it is difficult to believe that 1-4 did not come in some form or another from the same writer or school as the contents of 5-26, 28.

Dillmann has made the suggestion that 1-3 formed originally the first introduction, which was written in the third person, and that this was altered in character from narrative into a speech by the redactor of the Pent., who incorporated Dt into the main work. Dillmann also considered that 41-40 originally belonged to the conclusion of the book, and that it was transferred from that position by the redactor: for confirmation of this see the use of the past tense in 4<sup>45</sup>, which seems to indicate that the legislative portion had already been recorded, and was present to the reader's mind.

It may be doubted whether there is not a danger of too much being made in the hypothetical rearrangement of the original materials. Taking into consideration (1) the very close resemblance of style, and (2) the absence of any serious contradiction in statement between the different portions, there is not room for any confident theory of different authorship for 1-4, though it may have been composed at a later time than the rest and placed afterwards.

When, however, we come to consider the question of chs. 29-34, it is impossible not to admit that we have there to deal with materials widely different in origin.

Chs. 29-34, in particular, 30<sup>1-10</sup>, obviously has no direct connexion with the section 30<sup>11-20</sup>, which immediately follows; 31<sup>16-22</sup> interrupts the thread of the narrative; while 32<sup>1-43</sup> and 33, two lyrical pieces, have evidently been derived from some independent collection of early Heb. songs. A few portions of 32 and 34 (32<sup>45-52</sup> and 31<sup>1-5, 7-9</sup>) are, on literary grounds, assigned with great probability to P as their original source.

It is probable that the structure of the book is as follows: (p. lxxvii). 'Some little time after the kernel [chs. 5-26, 28] of Dt was composed, it was enlarged by a second Deuteronomic writer (or writers), D<sup>2</sup>, who (1) supplemented the work of D by adding the extracts (2) incorporated, with additions of his (or theirs), from JE, and (taking it probably from a separate source) the Song 32<sup>1-43</sup>, with the historical notices belonging to it, 31<sup>16-22</sup> 32<sup>44</sup>. Finally, at a still later date, the whole thus constituted was brought formally into relation with the literary framework of the Hexateuch as a whole by the addition of the extracts from P.'

iv. THE RELIGIOUS TEACHING OF DEUTERONOMY.—The characteristics of the religious thought of this book are very marked. They exercised a profound influence upon the religious development of the people.

The great lessons of the spirituality of the Godhead (4<sup>12</sup>), and the uniqueness of J<sup>h</sup>, and His absolute unity (4<sup>35-39</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>10</sup>), are strongly and impressively taught. We pass from the older conception of 'monolatry' into the fuller and deeper thought of 'monotheism.' The relation in which the God of the people stands to the people is represented primarily as one of love rather than of law. The thought of the love of Israel towards her God, which is indeed laid down in the words of the Decalogue (Ex 20<sup>8</sup>, Dt 5<sup>10</sup>), is not required elsewhere in the Pent., but in Dt it is earnestly insisted on as the basis of faithful service on the part of the creature to the Creator and of the redeemed to the Deliverer (cf. 10<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 30<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>20</sup>). Appeals made to Israel to keep the commandments are, it is true, often based on the recollection of God's love, of His terrible visitation, on motives of fear; but the highest appeal is made to the consciousness of J<sup>h</sup>'s love, in that He had chosen Israel, not for Israel's greatness or power, but out of His own free love (Dt 7<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>). The love and affection of God towards the nation, as distinguished from His love towards individuals, constitutes an especial feature in Dt (4<sup>37</sup> 7<sup>10</sup> 23<sup>8</sup> 33<sup>9</sup>); and Dt shares with Hosea (3<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>) the distinction of J<sup>h</sup>'s love for Israel with the thought and teaching of so much of NT theology (cf. 1 K 10<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ch 21<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>, Mal 1<sup>2</sup>). Again, love as indicating the people's affection and devotion to J<sup>h</sup> is again and again insisted on as the true spring of all human action (cf. 5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 30<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>20</sup>). This teaching of the relation of love between J<sup>h</sup> and Israel is the mark of Dt deeply impressed upon OT theology. It is this which leads more directly than any other line of OT teaching to the revelation ultimately contained in the words, 'God so loved the world,' etc. (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>).

As the outcrop of the thought of the divine love which is the Father, it also comes into view the Son, who is called as 'the son' and of 'J' as the people's Father. The loving God had given Israel life by redemption from Egypt; He had brought Israel up and educated him in the wilderness (see Dt 14<sup>2</sup> and 8<sup>2</sup>. 8. 16).

The intimacy of the relation between J<sup>n</sup> and Isr. emphasizes the demand that Israel should also 'cleave' to J<sup>n</sup> (11<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>), and not follow 'other gods' (814. 15 74 818. 20 11<sup>16</sup>. 17. 20 30<sup>17</sup>. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833.

The inducements to yield to superstitious practices are pictured as strong and numerous; but to yield is fatal. J<sup>n</sup>'s wrath and His just punishment are the nation's penalty, and will be its extermination (6<sup>10-15</sup> 8<sup>11-20</sup> 11<sup>16, 17</sup> 31<sup>29</sup>). The alternative between obedience and disobedience, between the service of J<sup>n</sup> and the service of 'other gods,' constitutes the theme of the great passage of warning and denunciation which is presented in ch. 28.

The holiness of the people is another chief thought, the prominence of which is a marked feature in this book, resulting from the conception of the close relationship between Israel and J' the Holy One. The people are holy to J', and cannot therefore join themselves to 'other gods' (7<sup>6</sup>). It is this 'holiness' which should prevent them from bodily mutilation as a sign of mourning; for such behaviour was the mark of a nation serving 'other gods' (14<sup>2</sup>). This 'holiness' is the reason for which the people must refrain from food that would render unclean those who were J''s possession (14<sup>21</sup>). God has chosen His people, not only to make them 'high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour'; but also that they may be 'an holy people unto J'' (26<sup>13</sup>). The 'holiness' of the people depends upon its obedience (28<sup>9</sup>). The spirit of 'holiness' to J' is ethically to be expressed by the observance of love towards the רֵעִי, and by kindness and charity towards the poor, the widow, the orphan, the Levite, and the stranger (10<sup>18, 19</sup> 24<sup>17-21</sup>). The millstone was never to be taken in pledge; the garment taken in pledge was to be returned before nightfall (24<sup>6, 10-13</sup>). Feelings of humanity were to be extended towards the animals; the ox treading out the corn was not to be muzzled (25<sup>4</sup>); and thought was even given to the bird and its young ones (22<sup>6, 7</sup>).

In outward worship the 'holiness' of the people can be adequately safeguarded only by worship at the central sanctuary chosen by J<sup>n</sup>. This regulation, which is laid down in ch. 12, is repeated in connexion with the laws of tithes (14<sup>23</sup> etc.), the firstborn (15<sup>20</sup>), the festivals (16<sup>2</sup>, 6, 11), the firstlings (26<sup>2</sup>), the judges (17<sup>8, 10</sup>). So long as worship was carried on at local shrines, on the high-places, and under trees (12<sup>2</sup>), it was inevitably tainted with heathenism; the hearts of the people would be alienated from the service of J<sup>n</sup>; and the moral purity of the nation would be corrupted by the assimilation of idolatrous practices.

Thus the relationship of Israel to J<sup>n</sup> is asserted as the spiritual principle which must animate the individual's whole existence. The laws which are pronounced show the high mission of Israel is to be interpreted in daily life. These laws are no formal code. The blessing for obedience is promised as a reward for particular acts, and for the whole regulation of life; and the blessing promised is expressed in terms which Israel could understand and appreciate,—outward prosperity and length of life (12<sup>28, 28</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> 14<sup>29</sup> 15<sup>10, 18</sup> 16<sup>20</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>).

v. LANGUAGE AND STYLE OF DEUTERONOMY.

—The style in which the book is written has very clearly marked characteristics of its own. It is quite distinct, and easily recognizable. It bears no resemblance to the style of P, nor does it show any likeness to the narrative style of JE. In certain hortatory passages of JE there may be noticed 'an approach to the style of Dt; and these sections [Dt 26, Ex 13<sup>20-15</sup> 19<sup>20-6</sup>, parts of 20<sup>2-17</sup> 23<sup>24-33</sup> 34<sup>10-28</sup>] appear to have been the source from which the author of Dt adopted some of the expressions currently used by him' (Driver).

The style of Dt is remarkable for its command of rich and effective periods, in which the sentences are framed with great oratorical skill. They are rhythmical without being tedious; and copious without being shallow and rhetorical. Some of the writing of Jeremiah approaches most closely in style to Dt; and the influence of Dt upon subsequent Heb. literature was very marked. The Deut. style was imitated and adopted by a group or succession of writers in and after the days of the exile. The Deut. passages in Jos, Jg, and K are easily distinguishable; they are generally of a hortatory character, and represent a particular attitude of fervent patriotism and religious thought, expressed with considerable redundancy of language, and with the use of certain characteristic phrases.

Very full and complete lists of the characteristic Deut. words and phrases have been drawn up by Driver (Deut. Introd. p. lxxviii.) and Holzinger (Einleit. in h. Hex.). The following are instances of words peculiar to Deut. which, however, are used with great frequency elsewhere in the Bible. In Dt, though elsewhere not found, or only used with great rareness, in the Hexateuch:—

W<sup>h</sup>at <sup>is</sup> your heart and with all your soul.
 the priests the Levites, observe to do,
 that it may be well for thee.
 to do that which is right (good or evil) in the eyes of J<sup>h</sup> to hearken to the voice.

Under this head should be noticed the use of אָהַב to love (a) with God as obj. : (b) of God's love to His people.

אֱלֹהִים אֲחֵרִים other gods.
הַאֲרִיךְ to prolong (of days).
הוֹרֵשׁ to dispossess.
יִבְחַר to choose.
יִכָּרֵם to cleave to.
יִחַבֵּץ thoroughly.
יָבִן לְפָנָי to deliver up before.
יִקָּח to ransom.
יִשְׁלַח יָדָהּ that to which thou puttest thine hand.
יִשְׁמַד to destroy.
יִשְׁמַד יְהוָה the abomination of J<sup>h</sup> (of idolatry).
יִשְׁרָץ to root out the evil.
כִּיּוֹם הַזֶּה as at this day.
כִּלְיֵימָם continually.
עַם קֹדֶשׁ a holy people

Other characteristics of his style are—

- (1) The preference for אָבִי (56 times) above אָבִי (1290 295); the use of אָבִי in the Song 32<sup>21.39</sup> and 324<sup>9.32</sup> is not from the same hand as D.
- (2) The preference for אָבִי (47 times) above אָבִי (411 2835 293 18).
- (3) The use of the emphatic אָבִי in the 2nd and 3rd per. plur of the imperf.

[illegible]

| JE.                                     | DEUTERONOMY.   | P (INCLUDING H).            |
|---|--|-----------------------------|
|   | 241 <sup>af</sup> (wages of hired servant not to be detained). | Lv 1913.                    |
|   | 241 <sup>b</sup> (the family of a criminal)                    |                             |
| Ex 2220-23(21-24) 23 <sup>a</sup> . | iger,  | " 1933 <sup>r</sup> .       |
|   | " of   | " 196 <sup>r</sup> 2322.    |
|   | 25 <sup>a</sup> (threshing ox not to be                        |                             |
|   | omen).   | " 1935 <sup>r</sup> .       |
| 1714.                                   |  |                             |
| cf. 222 <sup>a</sup> 23 <sup>a</sup>    | at the offer-  | of Nu 1812 <sup>r</sup> .   |
| 2319 <sup>a</sup> 342 <sup>a</sup> .    | ing of first-fruits).  |                             |
|   | 2012 <sup>10</sup> (thanksgiving at the pay-                   |                             |
|   | ment of the triennial tithe)                                   |                             |
| 2320-33.                                | ch. 28 (peroration, presenting                                 | Lv 26 <sup>a</sup> 45.      |
|   | motives for the observance                                     |                             |
|   | of the Code).  |                             |
| 204 23 3417.                            | 416-18 23 725 (against images).                                | Lv 194 <sup>b</sup> 261.    |
| 2312 <sup>b</sup> .                     | 514 <sup>b</sup> (philanthropic object of                      |                             |
| cf. 13 <sup>a</sup> 16.                 |  |                             |
| 20 <sup>a</sup> 1318 14.                |  | " 194 <sup>a</sup> .        |
| 1314.                                   |  |                             |
| 2324 <sup>a</sup> 32 <sup>r</sup> .     |  | " 3355.                     |
| 3412 16 <sup>r</sup> .                  | ites).   |                             |
| 2324 <sup>b</sup> 3413.                 | 75 123 (Canaanite altars, 'pil-                                | " 3352.                     |
|   | lars,' etc to be destroyed)                                    |                             |
| 196 2229 (30).                          | 76 142 21 2619 25 <sup>r</sup> (Israeli a 'noly                | Lv 1144 <sup>r</sup> 192    |
|   | people').  | 207 26; Nu                  |
|   | (in different connexions).                                     | 1540.                       |
| 2220 (21) 23 <sup>a</sup> .             | 1019 (to love the 'stranger').                                 | " 1934.                     |
|   | 1216 23 1523 (blood not to be                                  | " 1710-14 1926 <sup>a</sup> |
|   | eaten).  | (cf. 317 726 <sup>r</sup> ; |
|   |  | Gn 94).                     |
| 2318 <sup>a</sup> 3425 <sup>a</sup> .   | 163 <sup>a</sup> (leavened bread not to be                     | Ex 128.                     |
|   | eaten with Passover).  |                             |
| 136 <sup>r</sup> 2315                   | 163 <sup>b</sup> 44 <sup>8</sup> (unleavened cakes for         | " 1215 18-20, Lv            |
| 3413.                                   | seven days afterwards).  | 236.                        |
| 2315 <sup>b</sup> 3425 <sup>b</sup> .   | 164 <sup>b</sup> (flesh of Passover not to                     | " 1210, Nu 912.             |
|   |  |                             |
|   | " 'seven   | Lv 2334 39 41-48.           |
|   | days').  |                             |
|   | 176 1915 ('two or three wit-                                   | Nu 3530.                    |
|   | nesses').  |                             |
| 2133-29.                                | 16 <sup>r</sup> " " applica-                                   | Lv 2419 <sup>r</sup> .      |
|   | tion in each case).  |                             |
| 2025.                                   | 275 6 (altars of unhewn stones).                               |                             |

[The instances in which the divergence is most marked are indicated by an asterisk *.]

vii. DATE AND AUTHORSHIP.—The date to which the composition of Dt should be assigned cannot be determined with any degree of certainty. But it is clear, from what has been already said, that it cannot reasonably be attributed to any very early period in the history of Heb. literature.

a. The testimony of the style and language connects it with the period preceding the age in which the imitators of the Deut. style wrote and flourished. Certainly, the rich and fluent oratorical periods of Dt belong to a period of ripe literary development, and not to the rough beginnings of a national literature.

It has been asserted that this is contradicted by the presence of certain archaisms. But, even if there were a few archaisms, their presence would not affect the general impression produced by the character of the Deut. style. The alleged 'archaisms,' however, are not of a kind to furnish any proof of the antiquity of the book.

(a) an. The 'epicene' use of the pronoun throws more light upon the history of the text than upon the antiquity of the book.

The vowels in an and an were in all probability absent from the original autographs.

The fem. form hi seems to have existed in the earliest periods of the language.

(b) לָאֵל. This form occurs 8 times in the Pent., 4 times in Dt 442 722 911, once in 1 Ch 20<sup>a</sup> 28. As the usual 'disyllabic' form occurs in the Pent. some 260 times, and in the cognate dialects the disyllabic form was usual, the monosyllabic is almost certainly an orthographical anomaly, and should have a second vowel, לָאֵל, לָאֵל; cf. לָאֵל.

(c) וְיָדָה (1616 2013), as in Ex 2317 34<sup>33</sup>, instead of וְיָדָה, which is used over 50 times in the Pent. The use of וְיָדָה for וְיָדָה goes back to the old law of Ex 2317.

(d) וְיָדָה (3240 341<sup>3</sup>), as elsewhere in Pent. In Jos it is spelt וְיָדָה 23 times, and we have וְיָדָה in 2 S 10<sup>5</sup>, Jer 39<sup>5</sup> 52<sup>8</sup>. The suggestion has been offered that 'Israel picked up a new pronunciation after they came to the land of Canaan, and it was not until the death of the Israelites called the place 'Yēiēchō' incorrectly, and that this was embodied in the Pent., but that the local pronunciation was given by Joshua. It might have been supposed that the writer of the account of the death of Moses (Dt 341<sup>3</sup>) would have had as a model for 'picking up a new pronunciation' the writer of Jos 21. But the pronunciation followed in the Pent. is found also in K, Ezr-Neh, and Ch; so that no argument can be based upon the variety of the spelling.

Other supposed archaisms seem to arise from the mannerism of the author rather than from any real antiquity in their form.

The use of וְיָדָה, equally for masc. or fem., appears indeed to be a genuine archaism; but the fact that וְיָדָה appears as the fem. of וְיָדָה elsewhere in the Heb. Scripture—except in the Pent., is merely an indication that the text of the Pent. had become regarded as too sacred to modify, at an earlier date than the other books subsequently admitted into the Heb. Canon.

Finally, the presence of an archaism is no more proof of a very early date than the presence of an Aramaism would be proof of a very late date. We have to account for the one as well as for the other.

b. The evidence derived from the language is corroborated by that which the religious teaching supplies.

(1) It has already been noticed that the love of God is a unique (except for Ex 20); and it is generally believed that the prophet Hosea is the first exponent of this teaching. Dt 'builds upon the foundation of the prophets' (Driver).

(2) The 'monotheism' of Dt is an expansion of the 'monolatry' of early Israel; and the command to worship at a single sanctuary expresses in a concrete form the conception of a monotheistic religion. We are confronted with a stage of religious thought which has been reached only after a long preparatory period of discipline and teaching.

c. A comparison of the laws with those in Ex 20-23 shows that whereas the Deut. legislation is founded upon the laws of 'the Covenant,' and often repeats them almost verbatim, e.g. 14<sup>21</sup> = Ex 2319 34<sup>26</sup>, 7<sup>2</sup> = Ex 3413, and, as a rule, merely expands them with hortatory phrase, in other cases Dt presents us with a modification of the earlier law, showing a more advanced and humane civilization. Thus comparing the law of release for bondservants in Dt 1512-17 with the parallel law in Ex 212<sup>r</sup>, we notice (1) that female slaves are included in the law of release, (2) that provision is granted to the released slave so that he should not starve, (3) that the old custom of boring the ear is not required to be done publicly. Similarly, in Dt 5 the institution of the sabbatic year is put in force to restrain the exactions of the usurer, whereas in Ex 2310 it had only an agricultural significance.

d. The laws in Dt regulating national worship represent a later stage of Isr. history than those in Ex 20-23. This is conspicuously shown in regard to the place of sacrifice. In Ex 20<sup>24</sup> an Israelite may erect local altars: 'in every place where I record my name, I will come unto thee and bless thee.' The practice of sacrificing at local altars and shrines was a very universal from the time of Joshua (Jos. 24<sup>26</sup>; 1 S 7<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>12-14</sup> 10<sup>3-8</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 14<sup>35</sup> 20<sup>6</sup>, 2 S 15<sup>12, 32</sup>) until the days of Hezekiah, who endeavoured to centralize all worship at Jerus. as the one national sanctuary (2 K 18<sup>4-22</sup>). The law of Dt insists (12<sup>1-18</sup> etc.) upon the necessity of sacrificing at one place which J<sup>n</sup> shall have chosen 'to set his name there.' It expresses in the terms of direct injunction the change for which Hezekiah contended and which Josiah finally carried into execution.

e. It may be granted that the laws of worship in Dt are quite too exacting to be regarded as containing any ceremonial law. Thus the precise dates for the Festivals of Passover and Tabernacles are not given. In the former case the month is given, but not the day; in the latter case, neither month nor day. In the description of the Passover no direction is given that everyone should partake of it; while the command to observe the 7th day of Passover as 'a solemn assembly' and a day of rest is not applied to the other two feasts.

But, making all allowance for the general and fragmentary character of the religious law in Dt, we cannot pretend to be able to overlook the discrepancies between the law of Dt and that of the (so-called) Priestly Code. The most notable discrepancy is in reference to the status of the Levites, and the provision for his maintenance. In Dt the regular expression 'the priests, the Levites' (17<sup>9, 18</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>8</sup> 27<sup>9</sup>), does not seem to recognize the distinction between 'the sons of Aaron' and 'the Levites,' which is found in the priestly laws. The Levites are pictured as wanderers and objects of Israelite charity, for which special regulations are laid down (12<sup>12-19</sup> 14<sup>27, 29</sup> 16<sup>11, 14</sup> 18<sup>8</sup> 26<sup>11, 12</sup>); there is no reference to the provision in Nu 18 for the maintenance of priests and Levites, and in Nu 35 for the reservation of 48 cities for their place of residence.

A complete difference is also expressed in the laws relating to firstlings and to tithes. In Dt 12<sup>17-19</sup> 15<sup>1-4</sup> the firstlings are to be presented at the central sanctuary, and there eaten by the owner. In Nu 18<sup>18</sup> the firstlings are pronounced to belong to Aaron, 'And the flesh of them shall be thine; as the wave-breast and as the right thigh it shall be thine.' In Dt (12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>22</sup>) it is enjoined that a tithe of the produce of the land is to be set aside, and to be eaten by the offerer at the central sanctuary; while, in every third year, the tithe is to be devoted to the poor or the destitute and the Levite. In this there is no resemblance to the tithe law of Nu 18<sup>21-28</sup> and Lv 27<sup>30, 32</sup>, according to which the tithe was to be paid of animal as well as of vegetable produce; it was to be paid to the Levites, who, in their turn, were enjoined to render a tenth to the priests.

Another instance of ritual discrepancy is found in the description of the priestly dues. In Dt 18<sup>3-5</sup> the sacrificing priest received as his share 'the shoulder, two cheeks, and maw'; in Lv 7<sup>31-34</sup> 'the wave-breast' and 'heave-thigh' or shoulder are assigned to the priest.

Added to this, there is the argument from silence, in that Dt makes no mention of the year of jubilee, the great Day of Atonement, the Levitical cities, the meal-offering, or the sin-offering, nor even of the tent of meeting (31<sup>14</sup> is from JE).

And it is incredible to suppose that the Levitical system, if formulated as we have it in P, should have been so wholly overlooked in an address to the people.

It is impossible to resist the impression that the law of Dt represents an expansion and development of the ancient code contained in Ex 20-23, and precedes the final formulation of the priestly ritual, which only received its ultimate form in the last period of revising the structure of the Pentateuch.

In order to approach more nearly the limits of time within which it is reasonable to suppose that Dt was written, we may take into consideration the indications of time, and judge of them not as individually convincing items of evidence, but as collectively carrying considerable weight.

(a) It was written on the W. side of the Jordan; cf. the use of 'beyond Jordan' in Dt 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>41, 48, 47, 49</sup>, as in Jos 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>7</sup> etc. See BEYOND.

(b) The law of the kingdom, 17<sup>14-20</sup>, is expressed in language indicating acquaintance with the evils of Solomon's reign.

(c) The law of the judicial tribunal in 17<sup>8-13</sup> does not ordain a new institution, but describes a court already existing, and having a close resemblance to the one described in 2 Ch 19<sup>8, 11</sup> as appointed by Jehoshaphat.

(d) Isaiah, who speaks of the erection of an 'obelisk' (mazzēbāh) for a sacred purpose in connexion with the worship of J<sup>n</sup> in Egypt, could hardly have been acquainted with the law of Dt 16<sup>22</sup> 'Thou shalt not set thee up an obelisk, which J<sup>n</sup> thy God hateth.'

(e) Dt refers to the worship of 'the host of heaven' as a dangerous form of idolatry (4<sup>19</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>). We do not find in the historical books any mention of this superstition being a source of religious temptation until the days of Ahaz; see 2 K 23<sup>12</sup>.

(f) The style of Jeremiah's address is abundant traces of the influence of Dt.

If we may take these hints together, we arrive at the probability of Dt having been composed during the period which intervenes between the accession of Ahaz and the literary activity of Jeremiah.

A terminus a quo for the composition of Dt is supplied by the date of the book of the law' in the 18th year of the reign of Josiah (B.C. 621). There can be no manner of doubt that this book corresponded to a work practically identical with the main portion of Dt (5-26. 28). This work contained denunciations and curses, such as are found in Dt 28 (cf. 2 K 22<sup>11, 13, 19</sup>); it contained mention of the covenant with J<sup>n</sup>, with clear reference to Dt 28<sup>69</sup> (cf. 2 K 23<sup>2, 3</sup> 21). The reforms instituted by Josiah are such as would be required by conformity with the law of Dt, especially in regard to the centralization of worship, 2 K 23<sup>8, 9</sup>; the prohibition of the worship of the heavenly bodies, 2 K 23<sup>4, 5, 11</sup>; the prohibition of the high-places, obelisks, Ashérim, etc., 2 K 23<sup>4, 5, 14, 15</sup>; the prohibition of religious prostitutes, 2 K 23<sup>7</sup>; the maintenance of the priests ejected from the local shrines, 2 K 23<sup>8, 9</sup>; the prohibition of Molech worship, 2 K 23<sup>10</sup>; the celebration of the Passover in Jerusalem 'as it is written in this book of the covenant,' 2 K 23<sup>21-23</sup>; the ejection of diviners and consultants with familiar spirits, 2 K 23<sup>24</sup>.

The finding of this 'book of the law' in the temple is described as a fortuitous occurrence. There is no foundation for the suggestion that Hilkiah himself had written the book, and that the story of its finding was a fabrication. The account is straightforward and natural. It is generally agreed that the book may have been written in the reign of Manasseh, or in the early part of the reign of Josiah. Hezekiah, who had commanded all Isr. worship to be offered at the sanctuary in Jerus. (2 K 18<sup>4-22</sup> 21<sup>3</sup>), commenced the policy of removing the high-places. Manasseh's reign reversed all that Hezekiah had done. It is thought probable that the . . . of Dt was intended, in the days of Manasseh, to protest against the religious evils of that time, against the forms of superstition that had begun to find their way into Judah from Babylonia, as well as against the corruptions and disorders at the high-places which presented a form of J<sup>n</sup> worship wholly alien to the teaching and spirit of the prophets of Israel.

Such a work, written in the troublous reign of Manasseh, may well have been deposited for safety within the precincts of the temple. The description of its discovery leads the reader to suppose that the book was one that had been written some considerable time before the 18th year of Josiah's reign. The character of Dt agrees exactly with the spirit of Huldah's warning in 2 K 22<sup>16-20</sup>, where she speaks of the people of Judah having forsaken J<sup>n</sup>, and burned incense to other gods, etc.

The traditional view, that the work in its present form was written by Moses, is now generally recognized by critical scholarship as impossible. The fact that Moses is described in Dt 31<sup>1-24</sup> as having committed the Deut. legislation to writing, was, in former times, regarded as sufficient proof that the whole work came from his hand. The writer (Dt 31<sup>1</sup>) narrates the fact that Moses 'wrote this law'; he also narrates the fact that Moses delivered farewell discourses to the people. There is no appearance of autobiography in Dt. There is no claim to Mosaic authorship for the whole work. A copy of the Deut. law is stated (Dt 31<sup>26</sup>) to have been committed by Moses to the keeping of the priests 'by the side of the ark.'

Heb. laws went back to the founding of the nation under Moses. The name of Moses embraced the whole legislation, both in its earlier forms and in their later expansion and modification. The writer of Dt employed the nucleus of ancient law as the means of conveying the teaching needed by his time. The authority of Moses is invoked as imparting the spirit of Isr. law in its later application, no less than in its original framing. Moses is made to plead with his people, and to show the abiding . . . the worship of J<sup>n</sup>.

The work is . . . a religious teacher, not of a jurist or a statesman. In language, in thought, and in character, it is most easily understood as the composition of one who lived in the 7th cent., and who sought, by a 'dramatic' use of the last words of Moses, to recall his countrymen to a holier life, and a purer service of J<sup>n</sup>. It has been objected that the allusions to the dwellers in Canaan, and to the Amalekites (7<sup>1-5</sup> 20<sup>16-18</sup>), would be unintelligible and unnecessary at so late a period as the 7th cent. B.C. But the writer's purpose is to transfer himself to the age of Moses, and from that historic standpoint to appeal to the nation's conscience. If Moses were represented as speaking in the plains of Moab, it would be natural for the writer to make him refer to the Canaanites, and to introduce suitable local allusions. And the writer's argument was perfectly intelligible. If severity of the sternest kind was traditionally said to have been inculcated by Moses against the idolatrous inhabitants of the land, how much more was it required in dealing with those who, in Israel itself, had proved so faithless to J<sup>n</sup>, in spite of the warnings of the prophets!

It has been objected that the substance of Deut. laws is alluded to in writings earlier than the 7th cent. B.C. Thus 1 S 28<sup>3</sup> has been compared with Dt 18<sup>11</sup>, Hos 4<sup>14</sup> with Dt 23<sup>18</sup>, Hos 5<sup>10</sup> with Dt 19<sup>14</sup>, Am 8<sup>8</sup> with Dt 25<sup>1</sup>, Neh 2<sup>1</sup> with Dt 1<sup>15</sup>, while 2 K 14<sup>6</sup> refers to the law contained in Dt 24<sup>18</sup>. But this line of objection assumes that the existence of the laws is . . . with the composition of Dt, and . . . act, which criticism has clearly revealed and strenuously reiterated, that Dt contains and expands laws of very much greater antiquity than its own composition.

In . . . passages, in which the words of the . . . writers have been regarded as referring to Dt, it is obvious that Dt, as well as the prophets, refers back to the older law of Ex 20-23:—

|    |     |                 |     |      |                  |    |                  |
|----|-----|-----------------|-----|------|------------------|----|------------------|
| Is | 117 | 23              | 102 | = Ex | 22 <sup>21</sup> | Dt | 24 <sup>17</sup> |
|    | 123 | 5 <sup>23</sup> |     | = "  | 23 <sup>8</sup>  |    | 16 <sup>18</sup> |
| Am | 23  |                 |     | = "  | 22 <sup>25</sup> |    | 24 <sup>12</sup> |
|    | 512 |                 |     | = "  | 23 <sup>6</sup>  |    | 16 <sup>10</sup> |

There are, of course, in Dt abundant allusions to offerings (e.g. ch. 12), tithes (12<sup>22-29</sup>), distinctions of 'clean' and 'unclean' (12<sup>15, 22</sup> 14<sup>3-20</sup>), the 'solemn assembly' (16<sup>8</sup>), law of leprosy (24<sup>3</sup>), and kindred topics, which show the familiarity of Dt with the national religious observances; they do not exhibit acquaintance with the distinctive ordinances of P; . . . reference to them is necessarily made . . . terms.

Certain words and phrases have also been adduced from the . . . writers, which it is alleged must have . . . from Dt, e.g. Hos 5<sup>11</sup> oppressed from Dt 28<sup>32</sup>; 8<sup>13</sup> they shall return to Egypt from Dt 28<sup>38</sup>; 11<sup>8</sup> Admah and Zeboim from Dt 29<sup>22</sup>; Am 4<sup>9</sup> blasting and mildew from Dt 28<sup>22</sup>; 4<sup>11</sup> overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah from Dt 29<sup>23</sup>; 5<sup>7</sup> wormwood from Dt 29<sup>17</sup> etc. But the occurrence of such words and phrases is not sufficient to justify the claim for direct citation. They are expressions, most of them, which would quite . . . occur independently to the writers. . . any . . . that there is more probability of these writers having borrowed a phrase from Dt than of Dt having borrowed a phrase from them. Considering the resemblance of Dt's style to the writing in Jer and Kings, it would be more natural to expect Dt to have borrowed from Hosea or Amos than for Hosea or Amos to have borrowed from Dt. The Deuteronomist style in Jer, Jos, Jg, Kings, shows at once the influence of Dt; but there is no clear proof of the earlier prophets having been acquainted with Dt.

LITERATURE.—For a fuller discussion of the subject the reader is referred to the . . . Driver, in his commentary on . . . Critical Commentary, T. & T. Clark, 1895, and in his art. 'Deuteronomy' in Smith's DBZ, to all of which the writer of the present article is largely indebted. Other works dealing with the same subject, to which reference may be made are the commentaries of Orelli and Harper, and Enchiridion of Richey, Cornell, Kong, Sander, Kuenen, Hitzig, Cheyne, Jeremiah (Men of the Bible Series); W. R. Smith, OTIC; Ryle, Canon of the OT; Montague, Revelation of the Ancient Hebrews; Wedderburn, Lit. d. l. T.; P. Lehmann, 'La Réforme de la Codée Josias,' in Revue d. l'Histoire des Religions, t. xxix, 1894.

H. E. RYLE.

DEVIL.—See DEMON, SATAN. DEVOTED THINGS.—See ACCURSED, CURSE.

DEVOTION.—RV gives 'devotion' for AV 'prayer' in Job 15<sup>4</sup> (אֲדָוָה). In AV the word is found only Ac 17<sup>22</sup> 'as I passed by, and beheld your devotions,' Gr. τὰ σεβασμὰ ὑμῶν, RV 'the objects of your worship.'

That RV gives the meaning of the Greek there is no doubt. The same Gr. word occurs Wis 14<sup>20</sup> (ὁ θεὸς AV 'a god,' RV 'object of devotion'), 15<sup>17</sup> (Vulg. quæ sunt, AV 'the things which he worshipped' RV 'object of his worship'), Bel 2<sup>1</sup> (RV 'the gods AV 'worshipped'); and 2 Th 2<sup>10</sup> (RV 'that is worshipped, RVm 'an object of worship'). Did the AV translators understand 'devotions' in the sense of 'objects of worship,' then? Aldis Wright (Bible Word-Book, p. 198 f.), after a full discussion, concludes that they did not. . . . ever, from Sidney, Arctia (ed. 1593, p. 282) as follows: 'Dametas began to shake his head voyce, to looke big, to march up and downe, . . . higher than he was wont, swearing by no the walls should not keepe the coward from him.' The Eng. Dict. gives 'an object of religious worship' as one of the . . .

together into one rude chaos'; but says, 'this sense is not very certain, the meaning of the quotations being in every case doubtful.' A. W. . . . he word from Gen. Bible of 1560; . . . Tind. 'the maner how ye worsh . . . of 1557 (Whittingham), Bishop: 'Cov. youre gods seruyce' (from Zurich Bible, euore Gottesdienst); Rhem. 'your Idols.' But it has not been observed that Tomson's NT of 1576, which from 1587 onwards supplanted the NT of 1560 in most copies of the Gen. Bible, has the marg. note: 'Whatsoever men worship for religion's sake, that we call devotion.' That note, which removes all doubt of this meaning from the word, was before the translators of AV, and they would have no hesitation in using an abstract word in this concrete sense: cf. Ac 14<sup>15</sup> Gr. τὰ ματαία, AV 'vanities', RV 'vain things.' Coverdale has 'devotion' in Ja 1<sup>28</sup> for AV and RV 'religion' J. HASTINGS.

DEW (לַי, tal).—i. The atmosphere is capable of holding in suspension a certain amount of aqueous vapour proportionate to its temperature under a given pressure. The greatest amount is taken up during the daytime: but on the approach of sunset, when the temperature is lowered, part of the vapour is . . . the form of dew, till the dew-point is reached.

This process is enhanced in Eastern countries like Palestine, where the surface of the ground and the air in contact therewith are highly heated during the daytime, but where at night, and particularly under a cloudless sky, the heat of the ground is radiated into space and the air becomes rapidly cooled down. The excess of moisture in the air then gently 'falls as dew on the tender herb,' and sometimes so copiously as to sustain the life of many plants which would otherwise perish during the rainless season; or even, as in the case of Gideon, to saturate a fleece of wool (Jg 6<sup>38</sup>). When the sky is clouded, radiation is retarded, and rain may fall. Thus rain and dew alternately benefit the vegetation; and to the latter agent may possibly be ascribed the presence of a beauteous, though dwarfed, flora amongst the waterless valleys of the Sinaitic Peninsula, which in the early morn sparkles in the sunshine, owing to the multitude of dewdrops which have settled on the leaves and stems of the plants during the cool hours of the night.

ii. Thus deprivation of dew, as well as of rain, becomes a terrible calamity in the East. On this account 'dew and rain' are associated in the imprecation called down by David on the mountains of Gilboa in his distress at the tidings of the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1<sup>21</sup>); and in the curse pronounced on Ahab and his kingdom by Elijah (1 K 17<sup>1</sup>); as also by the prophet Haggai on the Jews after the Restoration (Hag 1<sup>10</sup>) owing to their unwillingness to rebuild the temple.

iii. In the Book of Job the formation of dew is pointed to as one of the mysteries of nature insoluble by man (Job 38<sup>28</sup>); but in Pr it is ascribed to the omniscience and power of the Lord (Pr 3<sup>20</sup>).

iv. Dew is a favourite emblem in Scripture; the following are examples: (a) Richness and Fertility, 'God give thee of the dew of heaven (Gn 27<sup>28</sup>, Dt 33<sup>13</sup>). (b) Refreshing and Vivifying effects, 'My speech shall disil as the dew' (Dt 32<sup>2</sup>); 'Like a cloud of dew in the heat of summer' (Is 18<sup>4</sup>). (c) Stealth, 'We will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground' (2 S 17<sup>12</sup>). (d) Inconstancy; the goodness of Judah is 'as the early dew, it goeth away' (Hos 6<sup>4</sup>); Ephraim . . . shall be 'as the early dew that passeth away' (ch. 13<sup>3</sup>). (e) The young warriors of the Messianic king, with flashing weapons like dewdrops, 'Thou hast the dew of thy youth' (Ps 110<sup>3</sup>).

E. HULL.

DIADEM.—This term (διάδημα) was applied by the Greeks to the emblem of royalty worn on the head by Pers. monarchs (Xen. Cyr. viii. 3. 13). It consisted of a silken fillet, 2 inches broad, of blue or purple, mixed with white, tied at the back of the head. Originally intended to confine the hair, and worn by all Persians, it became an ornamental head-dress, the king's being distinguished by its colour, and perhaps by jewels studding it. It was tied round the lower part of the khshatram (Heb. כִּתְרֵי, Gr. kithaps or kitaps; see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iii. 204 note), a tall, stiff cap, probably of felt, and of bright colours, which formed the tiara or turban of the king (Q. Curt. iii. 3. 18, 19; see head from Persepolis in Rawlinson, iii. 166). The head-dress of soldiers other than the king was soft, and fell back on the head (Suidas, Λεξιων, τιάρα). See also the Pompeian mosaic of the battle of Issus, given in Ainslie, Herculaneum and Pompeii. Later, the fillet was . . . broad pendants falling on the shoulder . . . diadem was adopted by Alexander and his successors (1 Mac 1<sup>9</sup>; Herodian, i. 3. 7). To the Greeks and Romans it was the distinctive badge of royalty, unlike the wreath, and is commonly described as white (Tac. Annales, vi. 37). Its presentation to Julius Cæsar was therefore specially offensive (Cic. Phil. ii. 34; Sueton. Jul. 79). Pliny (NH vii. 57) attributes its invention to Father Liber (the supposed Latin Dionysus), and it was long confined in art to him; but later artists placed it on the head of other deities. Diocletian was the first Rom. emperor to wear it permanently and publicly. Out of it, in combination with the 'corona,' the later royal crowns were developed.

In LXX διάδημα is used loosely to translate not only 'crown royal' (כִּתְרֵי מַלְכִּי Est 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>17</sup>) but 'crown' (כִּתְרֵי Est 8<sup>15</sup> διάδημα βύσσινον πορφυροῦ); . . . 'crown' (כִּתְרֵי Is 62<sup>3</sup>). But not so in Job 29<sup>14</sup>, Is 3<sup>23</sup>; in Zec 3<sup>5</sup> כִּתְרֵי is tr. kithaps, a round turban also given to the high priest's turban in 1 K 21<sup>1</sup> - 28<sup>4</sup>, Lv 16<sup>4</sup>). In 1 Mac 1<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> it describes the strictly royal insignia for the head adopted by the Greeks from the Persians (διάδημα τῆς Ἀσίας). In AV of OT, diadem is again used loosely for the high priest's turban (Ezk 21<sup>26</sup> כִּתְרֵי), a royal tiara (Job 29<sup>14</sup>, Is 62<sup>3</sup> כִּתְרֵי) and a crown (Is 28<sup>5</sup> כִּתְרֵי). RV more properly confines diadem to the last three passages, using 'mitre' in Ezk 21<sup>26</sup>, and also 'turban' in the marg. of Job 29<sup>14</sup>. But though thus the royal head-dress of the kings of Israel is not described as a diadem, there can be but little doubt that it was such (see CROWN). In NT the distinction between crown and diadem is accurately observed in the Gr. and in RV, but not in AV. Diadem should be read in Rev 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>, where it symbolizes respectively the empire of 'the dragon,' 'the beast,' and of the royal Christ. The phrase 'on his head were many diadems,' describes Christ's universal dominion (see CROWN; also for bibliomancy).

G. T. PURVES.

DIAL (מִלָּחָה, ἀναβαθνός, horologium), RVm 'Heb. steps,' 2 K 20<sup>1</sup>, Is 38<sup>8</sup>.—The Heb. word commonly denotes 'steps' (see Ex 20<sup>26</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>19</sup>), and is so rendered elsewhere in this narrative (2 K 20<sup>9-11</sup>, Is 38<sup>8</sup>; AV degrees). The 'steps' referred to are doubtless not simply the steps of the palace (so LXX, Jos. Ant. x. ii. 1), but formed part of some kind of sun-clock (so Targ., Vulg., Jerome on Is 38<sup>8</sup>, and most commentators). According to Herod. ii. 109, the Babylonians were the inventors of the πρόδος or concave dial, the γνώμων, and the division of the day into 12 hours. The introduction by Ahaz of a device for measuring the time may be regarded as a result of his intercourse with the Assyrians (2 K 16<sup>10ff.</sup>), but it is uncertain what kind of clock is intended. Some have supposed that it was in the form of a dial with concentric circles, and a central gnomon (Ges., Hitz., Keil, etc.); but it is doubtful whether nyg can denote 'degrees.' Hence it seems simpler to think of actual 'steps' . . . and a pillar or obelisk, the time of day . . . indicated by the position of the shadow on the steps. Since in 2 K 16 c. it is regarded as possible for the shadow to go down or to return 10 steps, it is clear that these steps did not each mark an hour of the day, but some smaller period of time. In biblical Heb., indeed, no word denoting an hour is found; nyg first appears in the Aram. of Dn 4<sup>36</sup> (Eng. 19) 5<sup>5</sup>. Our ignorance of the real form of the 'dial' of Ahaz renders precarious all attempts at explaining the phenomenon of the recession of the sun's shadow. Moreover, a discussion of the problem requires a critical comparison of the parallel accounts in Is and 2 K; and it must be recognized as probable on independent grounds, that our narrative is considerably later than the time of Hezekiah. Cf. esp. Dillmann and Cheyne on Is 38<sup>3-8</sup>.

H. A. WHITE.

DIAMOND.—See STONES (PRECIOUS).

DIANA OF THE EPHESIANS is the Latinized rendering of the name Artemis (Ἀρτεμις τῶν Ἐφεσίων), by which the Greeks designated a goddess whose sanctuary was situated close to Ephesus. The situation and splendour of the temple, and the part that the sanctuary and its priests played in the history of the city, through the influence of the conservative anti-Greek party, which favoured the interests of the temple and the power of the goddess, are described under EPHEBUS. The goddess, who had her seat in the rich valley near the mouth of the Cayster long before Gr. colonists had set foot on the Asian coast, had little in common with the chaste virgin goddess Artemis of Greek poetry and mythology. She was the impersonation of the vitality and power of nature, of the reproductive power which keeps up the race of man and animals in an unbroken series of offspring, and of the nourishing power by which the earth tenders to the use of man and animals all that they require to keep them in life. She was worshipped, with almost complete identity of character and image, over the whole of Lydia; and the Lydian Artemis presents such close analogies with the Phrygian Cybele, and with other feminine envisagements of the divine power in Asiatic countries, like the Canaanite Ma, the Phoenician Astarte or Asherah, the Syrian Atargatis and Mylitta, as to suggest that they are all mere varieties of one ultimate religious conception, presenting in different countries certain differences, due to varying development according to local circumstances and national character. The old hypothesis that this widespread similarity was due to Phoenician colonists, who carried their own goddess with them to new lands, is now discredited: there is no evidence that Phoenicians ever settled in the Cayster Valley, still less in other parts of Lydia.

The Ephesian goddess was represented by a rude idol, which was said to have fallen from heaven (Ac 19<sup>35*</sup>)—a tradition which attached to many sacred and rude old statues, such as that of Cybele at Pessinus (said to be merely a shapeless stone), Athena Polias on the Athenian Acropolis, etc. In the representation which is familiar to us from coins, statues, and statuettes, the goddess appears as a standing idol, in shape partly human; the upper part of the body in front is covered with rows of breasts, symbolizing her function as the nourishing mother; the lower part is merely an upright block, without indication of legs or feet, covered with symbols and figures of animals; the arms from below the elbows are extended on each side, and the hands . . . by props; the head is surmounted by a . . . ornament, polos, or by a mural crown, and something like a heavy veil hangs on each side of the face down to the shoulders; the figure stands on a peculiarly shaped pedestal, generally low on coins, but sometimes high; frequently stags . . . the goddess, one on each side. A similar representation of the native goddess is found very widely both in Lydia and in Phrygia. The Gr. colonists in Ephesus identified this Oriental deity with their own Artemis, on account of certain analogies between them; they represented her on their coins in the Gr. character, and introduced some of the Gr. mythology of the twins Artemis and Apollo; but they never succeeded in really affecting the cultus, which remained always partly Asian and non-Greek. The chief priest bore the Phrygian title Megabyzos, and in earlier time he had to be a eunuch; but Strabo seems perhaps to imply that this condition was no longer required, when he was writing (about A.D. 19). Some authorities think that there was a body of Megabyzoi in the ritual; but Canon Hicks seems rightly to argue that the title was . . . to a single chief priest, who . . . the divine associate of the goddess, Attis or Atys, whom she herself mutilated. A large body of priestesses were under his authority, divided into three classes (Plutarch, An seni sit per. resp. p. 795, § 24), called Mellierai, Hierai, and Parierai; and according to Strabo they originally had to be virgins. Some authorities seem to apply the name Melissai, 'Bees,' to them; and the bee is the most characteristic type on earlier Gr. coins of Ephesus. A single priestess (léteia) is mentioned in inscriptions, who was . . . the head of the cultus and . . . a body of priestesses.

There was also a . . . of priests (some wrongly say a single high priest), to whom was given the title Essenes. The Essenes were appointed for a year only (Paus. viii. 13. 1); and they seem to have been officials at once of the city and of the sanctuary, for they allotted new citizens to their proper tribe and division, sacrificed to the goddess on behalf of the city, and seem in general to have guarded the relations between the State and the goddess. Various other bodies of ministers attended the sanctuary, such as the Kouretes, the Akrobatai, the Hieroi, whose nature and duties are obscure (the first two, perhaps, colleges similar to the modern dervishes, the last a Greek form of hierodouloi). There can be no doubt that the ritual was of an orgiastic type, and accompanied with ceremonial prostitution and other abominations: traces of the ritual and its accompaniments are collected in the works on Ephesus (which see); the Lydian ritual of the Mysteries, which are mentioned at Ephesus in inscriptions (Hicks, p. 147, CIG 3002; Strabo, p. 640), as well as in many other cities, is described in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia (Ramsay), i. p. 91 ff., and the general character of the religion in Lyd. et le Monde Grec. (Radet), p. 261 ff.

The epithets 'Queen of Ephesus' and 'great' or 'greatest' seem to have been specially appropriated to Artemis in Asia: so CIG 2963 c. τῆς μεγάλης θεᾶς 'A., 6797, 'Ἐστὶν ἡ βασίλισσα'; Xen. Eph. i. 11. p. 15, τῇ μεγάλῃ 'Ἐφεσίων' 'A.; Achilles, Tat. viii. 9. p. 501, τῇ 'A. τῇ μεγάλῃ θεᾷ; Hicks, No. 481, l. 278. τῆς μεγίστης θεᾶς 'A. Further, the expression μεγάλῃ Ἀρτεμίδι seems to have been a formula of an invocatory character: see that river, is not wholly improbable; we know, however, of no such river so called, and the home of such of the Joktanidae as can be identified with certainty is in Arabia. The word dakal (in Syr. deḡla, 'palm') is well known in Arabic, and signifies dry dates of bad quality; as they possess no cohesive power, to 'scatter like dakal' is a proverbial phrase. The geographer Yāqūt knows of a place in Yemamah called Dakalah, 'where there were palm trees,' of too little importance to be connected with the son of Joktan; moreover, the corresponding form in Hebrew should be Dekalah rather than Diklah. The names immediately preceding and following Diklah give no clue to its identification. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

* In this place the rendering 'which fell down from Jupiter' (AV and RV) gives a wrong impression: the word δοκίτευς merely indicates that the image was believed to have fallen from the clear sky. In Eurip. Iph. T. 977, 1384, οὐρανόθεν πίσημα is given as the equivalent and explanation of δοκίτης ἀγάλμα.

DILAN (דִּלָּן), Jos 15<sup>38</sup>.—A town of Judah in the same group with Lachish and Eglon. The site is unknown. C. R. CONDER.

DILIGENCE.—'Derived from diligo, to love, "diligence" reminds us that the secret of true industry in our work is love of that work' (Trench, Study of Words, p. 314). But as diligence has been forgotten the rock whence it was hewn, it has lost some of its proper meaning. It is a synonym now for 'industry'; but formerly it was also a syn. for 'carefulness,' since our love of a work may express itself as readily in care or caution as in perseverance. Hence Wyclif's tr. of 1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup> 'If ony man kan not gouverne his hous, how schal he haue diligence of the chirche of God'; and Coverdale's tr. of Pr 4<sup>23</sup> 'Kepe thine hert with all diligence, that thou lose it not; for it is retained in AV and RV. Cf. Job 40<sup>15</sup>, 'He declared what diligence the ancients took to try true miracles from false.' Diligent and diligence had the same range of meaning. Thus Job 42<sup>5</sup> Cov. 'I have geuen diligent care unto the' (Gen., AV 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear,' RV 'I had heard,' etc.—thus reversing Coverdale's meaning); AV 1611 Title, 'with the former Translations diligently compared and revised'; Shaks. Tempest, III. i. 42—

'The harmony
Brought my ... bondage

J. HASTINGS.

DILL.—See ANISE.

DIMINISH.—To diminish is to make less, and that primary meaning is alone in use now. We do not even use the word 'diminish' to lessen the influence of,' 'belittle,' 'lessen,' 'will I also d. thee'; 29<sup>15</sup> 'I will d. them, that they shall no more rule over the nations'; Is 21<sup>17</sup> 'the mighty men ... shall be diminished' (RV 'shall be few'); Ro 11<sup>12</sup> 'if ... the diminishing of them [be] the riches of the Gentiles' (RV 'their loss,' Sanday-Headlam 'their defeat'). Cf. Argument of Ep. to Heb. in Gen. NT: 'For seeing the Spirit of God is the autor thereof, it diminisheth nothing the autoritie, although we knowe not with what penne he wrote it.' Still less can we speak of diminishing one thing from another, i.e. withdrawing or withholding, so as to cause diminution, as Dt 4<sup>2</sup> 'Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye d. ought from it'; Jer 23<sup>2</sup> 'd. not a word' (RV 'keep not back'). So in Atkinson's tr. (1504) of De Imitatione, IV. ix.: 'Take from our hertis ... all that may ... dimynyshe vs from thy eternall loue.'

J. HASTINGS.

DIMNAH (דִּמְנָה).—A Levitical city in Zebulun, Jos 21<sup>35</sup>. Dillmann, followed by Bennett in Haupt's OT, emends to דִּמְנָה, Rimmon (cf. 1 Ch 6<sup>22</sup>, Jos 19<sup>13</sup>). J. A. SELBIE.

DIMON, DIMONAH.—See DIBON.

DINAH (דִּינָה).—The daughter of Jacob by Leah (Gn 30<sup>21</sup>). The narrative of Gn 34 relates how, when Jacob was encamped at Shechem, after his return from Mesopotamia, she was seduced by Shechem the son of Hamor, a Hivite prince. Shechem was bitterly resented by her full brothers, Simeon and Levi. Shechem was ready to prove his attachment by marrying the maiden, and offered to pay any marriage price or dowry that might be fixed by her family. To this her brothers consented, but only on condition that all the men of Shechem should be circumcised. This, in consequence, her brothers made it the means of, for their sister's dishonour, by the place on the third day, the circumcision made them incapable of self-defence. Both at the time and on his death-bed, their father Jacob (according to J) spoke of this act with indignation and abhorrence (Gn 34<sup>30</sup> 49<sup>5-7</sup>). It was, however, approved by later Jewish fanatics (Jth 9<sup>2</sup>). (For the tribal significance of Dinah and the historical incidents which may underlie the above narrative, see SIMEON). R. M. BOYD.

DINAITES (דִּינָיִים, LXX Δεινῖται, Ezr 4<sup>9</sup>), a people settled in Samaria by Osnappar (i.e. probably Assurbanipal). They joined with the other Samaritans to revolt against the Jews to Artaxerxes. The Dinaites have been variously identified with the Da-ja-ēni, a tribe of western Armenia, mentioned in inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I. (Schrader); and with the inhabitants of Deinaver, a Median city (Ewald), or of Din-Sharru near Susa (Fried. Delitzsch). On account of the other peoples named in the same verse, the last view seems the most probable. See further Meyer, Judenthum, 39 f. H. A. WHITE.

DINHABAH (דִּינְהָבָה).—The capital city of king Bela in Edom (Gn 36<sup>32</sup> = 1 Ch 1<sup>43</sup>). There is some doubt as to its identification. The name, which is accented so as to mean 'Give judgment' (Ball, Genesis, ad loc.), occurs in Palmyrene as Danaba or Dahbāna (דִּינְהָבָה); cf. Δαυβή in Babylonian, and see Dillm. and Del. on Gn 36<sup>32</sup>. It has been proposed by Neubauer (Academy, 1891, p. 260) to identify Dinhabah with Tennib. This is accepted by Tomkins (ib. p. 284), who further identifies Tennib with Thenib, E.N.E. from Heshbon, described in Tristram's Moab, p. 222. See further Hommel, Anc. Heb. Tradition, 223 n. J. A. SELBIE.

DINNER.—See FOOD.

DIONYSIA (Διονυσία, Bacchanalia, EV 'Feast of Bacchus'), 2 Mac 6<sup>7</sup>.—A festival in honour of Dionysus. Dionysus is usually regarded as the god of the vine, but, as Frazer shows in the Golden Bough, he was a god of trees in general. As he comes before us in Greek worship, he is quite clearly a god of wine; but Jevons may be right in thinking that two cults have been combined,—that of the god of wine and that of the wine-god, which at first was naturally nameless. The character of the god is to be determined, not from the myths told about him, which are tales invented to explain the ritual, but from the ritual itself, interpreted through comparison with parallel rites among other peoples. The festival was intended to celebrate the revival of vegetation in spring after the long sleep of winter. Not only to celebrate it, however, but by sympathetic magic to secure the fertility of the fields. This imitation of the processes of nature was associated with the wildest orgies and excesses, stimulated no doubt, in this instance, by the connexion of Dionysus with the vine. Jevons gives a reconstruction of the festival as it was held at Thebes and other places. A branch, or something else representing the vegetation spirit, was carried round the cultivated fields, to secure a plentiful crop. A human figure, also representing the spirit, was fastened to the top of a tree trunk, which had been felled and prepared for the purpose. This was hoisted up and then pelted till it fell. The women then tore it in pieces, and the woman who got the head raced with it to the temple or chief house and nailed it to the door. But in many cases the rites were much more savage, and bulls or goats, which represented the god himself, were torn to pieces by the worshippers in a mad scramble to possess themselves of portions of the flesh, and even human beings suffered at times in this way. The flesh was taken home and some of it buried in the fields. (For parallels to this custom of killing the god the Golden Bough should be consulted. It secured a certain communion with the deity, the preservation of his vigour through the death of his temporary representative and his re-incarnation in a fresh life, and the fertility of the land in which the flesh was buried). The most famous festivals of Dionysus were held in Attica. Besides the Anthesteria and Lenaea there were two, known as the Lesser and the Greater Dionysia. The former was held in country districts in December, and was a vintage festival, celebrated by dancing, songs, improvisations, and processions, in which the phallus was borne. The utmost licence of speech and conduct characterized it. The Greater Dionysia were held in the city, and were chiefly important from the fact that at them the great dramas of the tragic and comic poets were produced. Before the dramatic performances there was a great public procession of worshippers, wearing masks and singing the dithyramb, in which an image of Dionysus was carried from one temple to another. This was followed by a chorus of boys. According to 2 Mac 6<sup>7</sup> Antiochus compelled the Jews, when the feast of Dionysia (RVm) came, to go in procession in honour of Dionysus, wearing wreaths of ivy. The ivy was specially sacred to the god. See further under DIONYSUS. A. S. PEAKE.

DIONYSIUS.—Dionysius, designated the Areopagite (ὁ Ἀρειοπαγίτης), is mentioned as one of the few converts made by St. Paul at Athens (Ac 17<sup>34</sup>). He is probably thus specially named as having been a member of the Council of Areopagus (see AREOPAGUS). Nothing further is known of him. It has been suggested that St. Luke, who apparently was not at Athens, may have owed to Dionysius his report of the speech on Mars' hill. According to Dionysius of Corinth (in Euseb. HE iii. 4) he became the first bishop of the church at Athens; according to one account (Niceph. HE iii. 11) he suffered martyrdom at Athens under Domitian; according to another (Martyr. Rom.), having come to Rome, he was sent by Clemens I. (about 95) to Paris, and there beheaded on the Martyrs' Mount (Montmartre); and no small controversy has arisen in France over his title to be regarded as St. Denys, the patron saint of France. Various mystical writings, circulated in the Middle Ages under his name, are still extant; but they have long been regarded as non-genuine, and are now generally supposed to have been put into circulation about the 5th century. WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

DIONYSUS (Bacchus).—A Greek god, in whose worship there are three distinct strata. The first consists of those rites with which spirits of vegetation (originally probably plant-totems) are worshipped by all primitive peoples, in the new world as well as the old, who possess any cultivated plants. This stratum is probably not older than the separation of the European from the other members of the Aryan family, for it was only after that separation that the Aryans began to domesticate plants. The next consists in the worship associated with the cultivation of the vine: this originated where, according to the most recent researches, the vine was first cultivated by the European branch of the Aryans, viz. in Thrace. The rites by which these rites were associated with the vegetation spirit was not completed, if indeed it had begun, in the time of Homer; for in the Homeric poems D. occurs as a god, but is not associated with the vine, except in passages generally admitted to be comparatively late additions. The third stratum belongs to the 7th cent. B.C., the period in which, among the E. nations conquered by the Assyrians and Babylonians, national calamity led men to look for assistance to a ritual more potent than that in daily use. This more potent ritual was found in the older and more awful forms of sacrifice which lingered on in connexion with out-of-the-way altars. To the form of worship thus revived, only those were admitted who were formally initiated into these 'mysteries.' From the East the institution of 'mysteries' came to Greece; and the reason why it came, particularly to the worship of such deities as Demeter and Dionysus was that that worship was an evolved form of the rites (common to many Aryan and Semitic and other peoples) with which vegetation-spirits were originally worshipped. The resemblances which thus made possible the spread of the worship from the East to the West also facilitated the dissemination of the worship of Dionysus over the E., for which mythology (e.g. Nonnus) accounted by the myth of his campaign on the part of the god in the readiness with which the worship of D. was received in many parts of Syria and Pal. that we find the explanation of the attempts or threats to establish the worship of D. amongst the Jews: it was presumed, e.g. by Nicanor (2 Mac 14<sup>38</sup>) and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 6<sup>7</sup>), that it would be acceptable to them as to other peoples, while Ptolemy Philopator, who branded the Jews with the ivy-leaf of Dionysus (3 Mac 2<sup>29</sup>), had an additional motive, in the fact that D. was the family God of the Ptolemies, for forcing his worship on them by a means analogous to that which many Hindoo sects adopt to symbolize their devotion to their particular god, and which has a further parallel in the common barbaric custom of tattooing the worshipper's body with the symbol of the god under whose protection and power he is. See further under DIONYSIA. F. B. JEVONS.

DIOSCORINTHIUS (Δῖος Κορινθίου [τετραδὶ καὶ ἐκάδῃ], Dioscorus, 2 Mac 11<sup>21</sup>). See TIME.

DIOSCURI (Δῖοι κάριοι, RVm at Ac 28<sup>11</sup>; text, The Twin Brothers; AV, Castor and Pollux) are mentioned as giving their name to the ship in which St. Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli, on his way to Rome. The D. in mythology were the sons of Zeus and Leda, and brothers of Helen. Castor was the horse-tamer, and Pollux the prince of boxers. For their brotherly affection they were placed in the sky as the constellation of the Twins (Gemini). They were worshipped from early times in Greece, ('Græcia Castoris memor' Hor. Od. iv. 5. 35), in Cyrene in Africa (Pind. Pyth. v.), not far from Alexandria, in Southern Italy, and enjoyed especial honour at Rome on account of their supernatural appearance at the battle of Lake Regillus. Their image was printed on the reverse of the earliest silver coins of the Romans (denarii) as that of two youths on horseback. They were, however, best known as the tutelary gods of sailors, who identified their presence with the pale blue flame or light seen in thundery weather at the mast-head. They are thus mentioned Hor. Od. i. 3. 2: 'Sic fratres Helene lucida sidera'; also Od. iii. 29. 64: 'tutum feret geminus Pollux'; also Catull. iv. 27 and lxxviii. 65; and Eurip. Helen. 1663-65. It was a common practice to put, as a παράσημον (Ac 28<sup>11</sup>) or insigne, some device for a figure-head to a ship, in imitation of the person or object (not always complimentary, Virg. Æn. x. 188) after which the vessel was named. See Virg. Æn. v. 116, 'Mnestheus agit Pristin'; Æn. x. 166, 195, 209, 'Hunc vehit immanis Triton,' etc. This figure-head was to be distinguished from the tutela (Cic. De Nat. D. i. 10. 1), 'tutela Minervæ,' or image of the protecting genius, under which the ship sailed, placed generally in the stern of the vessel. In later times the distinction appears to have been effaced, and, in the vessel which carried St. Paul, the Dioscuri were probably intended for the 'tutela' as well as the 'insigne,' and their heads were probably fastened, one on each side, in front.

LITERATURE.—Seyffart, Dict. of Class. Antiq. by Nettleship and Sandys; Rich, Dict. of Antiq.; Page, Acts of the Apostles, in loc.

C. H. PRICHARD.

DIOTREPHES (Διοτρεφής, WH-έφης).—A person, otherwise unknown, who is introduced in 3 John (vv. 7, 10) as ambitious, resisting the writer's authority, and standing in the way of the hospitable reception of brethren who visited the Church—probably travelling evangelists, such as are mentioned in the Didaché. It has been inferred by some that he was a presbyter or a deacon in the Church. It has also been supposed that he was in conflict with the Jewish-Christians; or, on the other hand, that he was a teacher of false doctrine, Judaistic or Gnostic. But all is matter of conjecture. Others think that his action indicates an illegitimate assumption of authority over the Church, connected with the tendency to the establishment of a monarchical episcopate, which may have begun during the lifetime of St. John.

S. D. F. SALMOND.

DIPHATH (דפּת) occurs in RV and AVm of 1 Ch 1<sup>4</sup>, but it is practically certain that AV Riphath is the correct reading. By an easily explicable scribal error דפּת has arisen from דפּת, the reading of MT in the parallel passage Gn 10<sup>2</sup>. See RIPHATH.

J. A. SELBIE.

DISALLOW.—'Allow' is in AV either to 'accept' or 'reject' (see ALLOW); 'disallow' is unambiguously to 'reject.' So Nu 30<sup>8</sup> b<sup>12</sup> 8. 11 (אין refuse, reject; see Ps 141<sup>5</sup> RV); and 1 P 2<sup>4,7</sup> (ἀποδοκιμάζω, RV 'reject'). So Latimer (Serm. and Rem., 11), 'I must not suffer the devil to have the victory over me. I must disallow his instructions and suggestions.'

J. HASTINGS.

DISANNUL, which scarcely differs in meaning from 'annul,' the prefix being only intensive, is now going out of use. RV removes it only from Gal 3<sup>15</sup>, giving 'make void' instead (Gr. ἀθετέω, of which the subst. ἀθέτης is tr<sup>a</sup> 'disannulling' He 7<sup>18</sup> and retained by RV). Amer. RV prefers 'annul' in Job 40<sup>8</sup>, Is 14<sup>27</sup> 28<sup>18</sup>. The use of the word in biblical English may be illustrated by Coverdale's tr<sup>a</sup> of Is 14<sup>27</sup> 'For yf the LORDE of hostes determe a thing, who wyl dysanulle it?'; and Tindale's tr<sup>a</sup> of He 8<sup>13</sup> 'In that he sayth a new testament he hath abrogat (πεπαλαίωκεν) the olde. Now that which is disannulled (παλαιούμενον) and wexed olde, is redy to vannysche awaye.'

J. HASTINGS.

DISAPPOINT has a stronger meaning in AV VOL. I.—39 than in mod. English, Job 5<sup>12</sup> 'He . . . the devices of the crafty' (רמס, RV as Is 44<sup>25</sup> AV, RV; so Pr 15<sup>22</sup>); Ps 17<sup>13</sup> 'Arise, O Lord, d. him' (קום וקרב, RV 'confront him,' RVm 'forestall him,' Cheyne 'intercept him'); Jth 16<sup>8</sup> 'the Almighty Lord hath disappointed them by the . . . work' (ἀθέρησεν αὐτοὺς, RV 'brought them to nought'; see under DISANNUL). Cf. Hall, Hard Tests (1833), 311: 'All those curious and . . . shall be utterly undone and . . .'

J. HASTINGS.

DISCERN.—To discern (Lat. dis apart, cernere separate) is to separate things so as to distinguish them, as Coverdale, Erasm. Par. 1 Jn, p. 48: 'It is not the sacramentes that discern the children of God from the children of the devyll; but the puritie of lyfe and charitie.' So Ezr 3<sup>13</sup> 'the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping.'

To discern a person or thing is therefore, in biblical lang., to separate out from others, so as to recognize, as Gn 27<sup>23</sup> 'he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother . . . word of God . . . is a discernor of the heart' (κρίνεις, RV 'quick to discern' 1 Jn 4<sup>19</sup> 'discerning the Lord's body' (μὴ διακρίνεις τὸ σῶμα τοῦ κυρίου); Vulg. non discernens corpus Domini; Latin, non discernit; discernit, 'not wisely demynges'; Luther, discernit; discernit; Tind. 'because he maketh no difference of'; so Cov., Cran., Gen. 1557; but Gen. 1560, 'because he discerneth not,' with marg. note, 'But as though these holie mysteries of the Lordes bodie and blood were commune meats, so without reverence he commeth unto them'; so Tomson; Bish. 'making no difference of'; Rhem. 'discernit' body of our Lord'; whence AV; but RV 'discernit' body—omitting τὸν κυρίου with edd.

J. HASTINGS.

DISCIPLE.—This word—in Greek μαθητής; fem. μαθήτρια (occurring only Ac 9<sup>36</sup>); verb, μαθητεύω (times)—is in sacred literature connected with the Gospels and the Acts, though it often appears in Attic Greek (esp. Plato) as denoting the pupil of a philosopher or rhetorician, in contradistinction to the master, διδάσκαλος (just as in NT, Mt 10<sup>24</sup>), or to the discoverer, εὑρετής. We have a similar contrast in OT, e.g. 1 Ch 25<sup>8</sup> τελείων καὶ μαθητῶν, the perfect and the scholar; AV and RV, the teacher and the scholar, in contrast to the senior and junior members of the trained musical guilds. Likewise, in the case of the prophetic guilds superintended by Samuel and more fully organized by Elijah and Elisha, in order that by spiritual force they might cherish the theocratic spirit among the people, and check the tendency to apostasy, the general 'company' is contrasted with him who 'stood as head over them' (1 S 19<sup>20</sup>), and the 'sons,' 2 K 2<sup>7</sup> (i.e. pupils; cf. Pr 4<sup>1,10</sup>, and passim) with him 'before' whom they 'sat,' 2 K 4<sup>38</sup>, their master (κύριος), 2 K 6<sup>5</sup>. [Teacher, διδάσκαλος, however, occurs in LXX only in connexion with heathen monarchs, and then but twice: Est 6<sup>1</sup> (the teacher of Ahasuerus) and 2 Mac 1<sup>10</sup> (the teacher of Ptolemy); and the phrase 'schools of the prophets' (however truly it may represent facts) is 'a pure invention of the commentators' (Smith, Prophets of Israel, 85).] In Talmudic literature talmid ἡδὲ hakkānīm, pupils of the learned (i.e. the scribes), is a frequently recurring phrase, and of these St. Paul was one when he was 'brought up at the feet of Gamaliel,' sitting, i.e. with the rest of the pupils, on the lower benches in front of him (Ac 22<sup>3</sup> cf. Mt 5<sup>1</sup>).

The usage of the word in NT is very simple. We read of the disciples of John the Baptist (Mk 2<sup>18</sup>), of the Pharisees (same place), of Moses, Jn 9<sup>28</sup> (only by way of contrast to Jesus), but most of all of Jesus, to whose disciples, in fact, the subst. is almost entirely, and the verb entirely, limited. The word maintains its classical connotation of compliance with the instruction given: the μαθητής is not only a pupil, but an adherent (see Cremer, Bib. Theol. Lex.; cf. Xen. Mem. i. 6. 3, where μαθηταί are called the μιμηταί, imitators, of their διδάσκαλος; so Jn 8<sup>31</sup>, 'If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples,' cf. 15<sup>5</sup>). Hence it is applied most esp. to the Twelve in all four Gospels, sometimes with δώδεκα and sometimes without; they are 'the disciples,' Mt 10<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27</sup>, Lk 8<sup>9</sup>, Jn 3<sup>22</sup>. Mt seems, indeed, to confine the plural to them (Weiss), unless 8<sup>21</sup> and 5<sup>1</sup> be exceptions. When it denotes the wider circle, as in Lk (particularly 6<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>1</sup>), it has the same sense of adherence. Hence it stands, occasionally in Gospels (Mt 10<sup>42</sup>, taken with 18<sup>6</sup>) and in Ac, as a synonym for πιστεύων, a 'believer.' Aristot. Περὶ σοφ. ἐλέγχ. 161<sup>b</sup> 3—δεῖ πιστεῖν τὸν μαθητὴν, the learner is bound to have faith, even where, as in Ac 19<sup>1</sup>, the word is applied to half-instructed believers, who, while believing apparently in Jesus as greater than John the Baptist, were still (as it seems) not sure that Jesus was absolutely the Messiah, and that they had not to 'look for another' (Mt 11<sup>2</sup>). So also, quite distinctly, with the verb μαθητεύω (three times in Mt, once in Ac), which is once intrans. (Mt 27<sup>57</sup>), twice trans. (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Ac 14<sup>21</sup>), and once deponent (?) (Mt 13<sup>52</sup>, where, in accordance with the usual dative construction, the phrase signifies a disciple of the kingdom of heaven personified). (See Meyer and Meyer-Weiss).

J. MASSIE.

DISCIPLINE.—'Discipline' is properly instruction, that which is imparted by the discipulus or scholar, and is 'from 'doctrine,' which pertains to the doctor or teacher. In this sense Wyclif (1382) gives Pr 3<sup>1</sup> 'Thou shalt finde grace and good discipline (1388 'teching') befor God and men'; and Chaucer (Skeat's Student's ed. p. 716), 'Thanne shaltow understonde, that bodily peyne stant in disciplyne or techinge, by word or by wrytinge, or in ensample.' But under the influence of the Vulg. and the Church, 'discipline' came early to be used for 'chastisement.' In Pr 3<sup>1</sup> Wyc. has 'the discipline of the Lord, my sone, ne caste thou away.' See CHASTISEMENT.

In AV whether 'discipline' means instruction or chastisement it is not easy always to decide. It occurs Job 36<sup>10</sup> 'He openeth also their ear to d.' (māḡār, RV 'instruction,' which the sense seems to demand; but the Heb. has nowhere else this meaning, and the whole passage is of chastity or moral discipline; Wis 15<sup>6</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>, Sir 41<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>7</sup> 32<sup>14</sup> 34<sup>14</sup>, Bar 4<sup>13</sup> (1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>1</sup> 25<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>1</sup> 29<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>1</sup> 33<sup>1</sup> 34<sup>1</sup> 35<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>1</sup> 37<sup>1</sup> 38<sup>1</sup> 39<sup>1</sup> 40<sup>1</sup> 41<sup>1</sup> 42<sup>1</sup> 43<sup>1</sup> 44<sup>1</sup> 45<sup>1</sup> 46<sup>1</sup> 47<sup>1</sup> 48<sup>1</sup> 49<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>1</sup> 52<sup>1</sup> 53<sup>1</sup> 54<sup>1</sup> 55<sup>1</sup> 56<sup>1</sup> 57<sup>1</sup> 58<sup>1</sup> 59<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup> 62<sup>1</sup> 63<sup>1</sup> 64<sup>1</sup> 65<sup>1</sup> 66<sup>1</sup> 67<sup>1</sup> 68<sup>1</sup> 69<sup>1</sup> 70<sup>1</sup> 71<sup>1</sup> 72<sup>1</sup> 73<sup>1</sup> 74<sup>1</sup> 75<sup>1</sup> 76<sup>1</sup> 77<sup>1</sup> 78<sup>1</sup> 79<sup>1</sup> 80<sup>1</sup> 81<sup>1</sup> 82<sup>1</sup> 83<sup>1</sup> 84<sup>1</sup> 85<sup>1</sup> 86<sup>1</sup> 87<sup>1</sup> 88<sup>1</sup> 89<sup>1</sup> 90<sup>1</sup> 91<sup>1</sup> 92<sup>1</sup> 93<sup>1</sup> 94<sup>1</sup> 95<sup>1</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> 97<sup>1</sup> 98<sup>1</sup> 99<sup>1</sup> 100<sup>1</sup>), which is, however, 'chastisement,' but is used in LXX as a translation of discipline, hence 'chastisement' there, and so in NT the same, 1 Th 5<sup>6</sup> 2; see Kennedy, Sources of N.T. Greek, p. 191).

J. HASTINGS.

DISCOMFIT, DISCOMFITURE.—From dis apart, and conficere to put together, to 'discomfit' is to undo, destroy. Both words, now archaic if not obsolete, are always used in AV of defeat in battle, Is 31<sup>8</sup> being a mistrans. for 'become liable to forced service.' Cf. More, Utopia (Rob. tr.), p. 140: 'if al their whole armie be discomfited and overcum'; and Chaucer, Knight's Tale, 150—

'After the bataille and discomfiture.'

RV introduces 'discomfit' for 'destroy,' Ex 23<sup>27</sup> Ps 144<sup>6</sup> (צָרָה), Dt 7<sup>22</sup> (צָרָה); for 'trouble,' Ex 14<sup>24</sup> (צָרָה); and 'discomfiture,' Dt 7<sup>22</sup>, 1 S 5<sup>9</sup> (AV 'destruction'), Dt 28<sup>20</sup> (AV ' vexation'), Is 22<sup>5</sup> (AV 'trouble'), the Heb. being always מַחֲרָב mehdāmah.

J. HASTINGS.

DISCOVER.—In mod. Eng. 'to discover' is 'to detect,' 'find out,' which is a late use of the word. The meanings in AV are: 1. Uncover, lay bare (the primary sense, lit. 'to take off the cover,' Fr. découvrir), Ps 29<sup>9</sup> 'The voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests' (צָרָה, RV 'strippeth bare': 'I do not understand this of stripping the foliage merely, but rather of the breaches and openings made by the lightning and the wind in the heart of the wood'—Earle, Psalter of 1539, p. 271); Ezk 16<sup>57</sup> 'Before thy wickedness was discovered'; Hos 2<sup>10</sup> 'now will I d. her lewdness in the sight of her lovers'; 7<sup>1</sup> 'the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered'; Sir 13<sup>30</sup> 'Exalt not thyself, lest thou fall . . . and so God d. thy secrets' (RV 'reveal'); 11<sup>27</sup> 'his deeds shall be discovered' (RV 'the revelation of his deeds'). Cf. Knox, Hist. p. 182, 'Which God of his infinite goodness hath now discovered to the eyes of all that list to behold'; and p. 250, 'who rashly discovering himself in the Trenches, was shot in the head.' 2. Withdraw (spoken of the cover itself, so as to uncover), Job 41<sup>18</sup> 'who can d. the face of his garment?'; (RV 'strip off his outer garment'—see Davidson in loc.); Is 22<sup>5</sup> 'he discovered the covering of Judah' (RV 'took away'); Jer 13<sup>23</sup> (= Nah 3<sup>5</sup>) 'I will d. thy skirts upon thy face.' So Bacon, New Atlantis, 129: 'At the beginning he discovered the face of the deep, and brought forth dry land'; Chapman, Hesiod, l. 161—

'When the woman the unwieldy lid
Had once discover'd, all the miseries hid . . . dispersed and flew
About the world.'

3. Disclose or reveal, 1 S 14<sup>8</sup> 'we will d. ourselves unto them'; 22<sup>6</sup> 'when Saul heard that David was discovered' (נִגַּח 'made known,' 'revealed'); Job 12<sup>22</sup> 'He discovereth deep things out of darkness'; Pr 25<sup>9</sup> 'd. not a secret to another' (RV 'disclose not the secret of another'); Sir 6<sup>9</sup> 27<sup>16</sup>, 1 Mac 7<sup>21</sup> 'when he saw that his counsel was discovered' (ἀπεκαλύφθη, 'made known,' 'revealed,' not 'found out'); 2 Mac 6<sup>11</sup> 'others, that had run together into caves near by, to keep the Sabbath secretly, being discovered to Philip, were all burnt together' (RV 'betrayed'). Cf. Bacon, Essays, p. 17: 'For Prosperity doth best discover Vice; But Adversity doth best discover Vertue'; and Shaks. Merry Wives, II. ii. 190—

'I shall discover a thing to you.'

4. Exhibit, display, a Blount (1600): 'The more he mounted, the more he discovered his incapacity.' In AV Pr 18<sup>2</sup> 'A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may d. itself' (RV 'reveal'). 5. Desery, sight, Ac 21<sup>1</sup> 'When we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand' (ἀναφάνω, RV 'come in sight of'). 6. Notice, Ac 27<sup>28</sup> 'they discovered a certain creek' (κατενόουν, RV 'perceived').

J. HASTINGS.

DISCUS.—See GAMES. DISEASE.—See MEDICINE. DISH.—See FOOD.

DISHAN (דִּישָׁן).—A son of Seir, Gn 36<sup>21</sup>. 28. 30 = 1 Ch 138. 42. In Gn 36<sup>28</sup> the reading דִּישָׁן of MT should be emended to דִּישָׁן, after 1 Ch 14<sup>1</sup>. See following article.

DISHON.—1. A son of Seir, דִּישָׁן Gn 36<sup>21</sup> = דִּישָׁן 1 Ch 138. 2. A son of Anah and grandson of Seir, דִּישָׁן Gn 36<sup>28</sup>, cf. v. 30 = דִּישָׁן 1 Ch 14<sup>1</sup>, which should also be read for MT דִּישָׁן in Gn 36<sup>28</sup>. Dishan (see art. above) and Dishon are, of course, not individual names, but the eponyms of Horite clans. Their exact location is a matter of uncertainty. דִּישָׁן occurs in Dt 14<sup>8</sup> (only) as the name of a clean animal (LXX πύργος, AV and RV 'pygarg'), which is generally taken to be some species of gazelle or antelope. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, 127) identifies it with the Antelope addax; but Hommel (Namen der Säugethiere, 391), deriving the word from a root שָׁרַח = spring, leap (cf. Assy. dassu), thinks of the mountain-goat. So also Delitzsch (Assyr. Stud. i. 54). The existence of such animal names amongst the Horites has been used by W. R. Smith as an argument in favour of totemism. See Journal of Philology, ix. 75 ff., Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, and RS (passim); and for the contrary, Aldeke in ZDMG (1886), 148-187. Cf. Studies in Bib. Archaeol. (1894), and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names (1896), p. 86 ff. J. A. SELBIE.

DISHONESTY in 2 Co 4<sup>2</sup> is used in the obsolete sense of 'disgrace' (αἰσχύνη, RV 'shame,' after Wyc., Gen.; AV followed Rhemish NT; Tindale has 'unhonesty'). Cf. Coverdale's tr. of Ru 2<sup>15</sup> 'Let her gather betwene the sheues also, and do her no dishonestye'; and of Sir 3<sup>11</sup> 'Where the father is without honoure, it is the dishonesty of the sonne.' 'Dishonest' Sir 20<sup>24</sup>, and 'dishonestly' 22<sup>4</sup>, are used in the same sense. J. HASTINGS.

DISPATCH.—To 'dispatch business' is still in use, as in To 7<sup>8</sup> 'let this business be dispatched,' 2 Mac 12<sup>18</sup> 'before he had d. anything he departed.' But to 'd. a journey,' i.e. 'expedite,' is out of use; nor is any example given in Oxf. Eng. Dict., 2 Mac 9<sup>4</sup> being missed: 'Therefore commanded he his chariotman to drive without ceasing, and to dispatch the journey.'

To 'get rid of quickly' by death, is found in RV, where RV gives 'despatch,' a spelling which is incorrect, and which was unknown till the beg. of the 19th cent. It seems to have arisen from Johnson having accidentally entered the word so in his Dict., though he himself always spells it 'dispatch.' See Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v. J. HASTINGS.

DISPERSION.—See ISRAEL.

DISPOSITION.—Ac 7<sup>53</sup> 'Who have received the law by the d. of angels' (Gr. els διαταγὰς ἀγγέλων; RV 'as it was ordained by angels'; RVM 'unto ordinances of angels,' cf. Ro 13<sup>2</sup> τοῦ θεοῦ διαταγῆ, AV and RV 'the ordinance of God'). 'Disposition' is the Rhemish word here (Wyc., Tind., Gen. have 'ordinance'; Cov., Cran. 'ministration'), and it is used in the archaic sense of administration. In the same sense 'disposer' is used by Tind. in 1 Co 4<sup>1</sup> 'Let men this wise esteeme us, even as the ministers of Christ, and disposers of the secretes of God' (EV 'stewards,' Gr. οἰκονόμοι); and by Gen. (1560) in 1 P 4<sup>10</sup> 'Let euerie man as he hathe received the gifte, minister the same one to another, as good disposers of the manifolde grace of God' (EV 'stewards'). 'Disposing' in Pr 16<sup>33</sup> 'The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord,' is used in the earlier sense of control, disposal; while the vb. 'dispose' in Job 34<sup>13</sup> 37<sup>15</sup>, 2 Es 5<sup>49</sup> 8<sup>11</sup>, Sir 16<sup>26</sup> has the still earlier and primary meaning of 'arrange in proper order.' This primary meaning (as Lat. disponere) seems to be intended by 'disposition' in 2 Es 8<sup>30</sup> (plasma) 5<sup>30</sup> (form utero), the Lat. words so tr. having ref. to the creation of man; but in Jth 8<sup>20</sup>, Ad. Est 16<sup>6</sup>, Sir 20<sup>26</sup>, the word is used in the familiar sense of 'bent of mind,' 'character,' a sense which is found as early as 1387: Trevisa, Higden, iii. 113: 'Nought by chaungynge of body, but by chaungynge of disposicion of wit and of menyng.' J. HASTINGS.

DISPUTE, DISPUTATION.—As 'debate' has lost the meaning of wrangling, so 'dispute' has acquired it. In older Eng. to 'dispute' was to discuss or argue, without strife. Thus Bp. Carleton (1610), Jurisd. Pref., 'I have disputed the Kings right with a good conscience, from the rules of Gods word,' i.e. I have discussed it, argued for it: cf. Sir T. More, Utopia, p. 53, 'that they maye in everye matter dispute and reason for the kynges right'; Knox, Hist. p. 25, 'after that Sir James Hamilton was beheaded (justly or unjustly we dispute not),' and p. 215 'He [Knox] did gravely dispute upon the nature of the blinde world.' So in AV, Job 23<sup>7</sup> 'There the righteous might dispute with him' (ἤνυσ, RV 'reason'); Mk 9<sup>33</sup> 'What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?' (διαλογίζομαι, RV 'were ye reasoning,' as 2<sup>8</sup> AV); 9<sup>34</sup> 'for by the way they had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest' (ἡγοῦμαι): RV keeps 'dispute' here, but 'shame was not that they had wrangled, but that they had discussed such a question at all. The same Greek is similarly tr. in AV of Ac 17<sup>17</sup> (RV 'reasoned'), 19<sup>8</sup> (RV 'reasoning'), 24<sup>12</sup>, Jude<sup>9</sup> (so RV). The subst. διαλογισμός is once tr. 'disputing'; Ph 2<sup>14</sup> AV, RV, 'Do all things without murmurings and disputings'; but even here Thayer prefers 'hesitation,' 'doubting,' Lightfoot 'inward questionings.' In Ac 6<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>29</sup>, λογίζομαι meaning is plainly 'discuss,' 'argue'; so 15<sup>7</sup> (συζητήσας) and 1 Co 1<sup>20</sup> (συζητήτης). The only passage in which 'dispute' seems to have the meaning of 'wrangle' is 1 Ti 6<sup>5</sup> 'Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds' (TR παραδιατριβαί, edd. διαπαράτριβαί, RV 'wranglings'). Here Wyc. has 'ἡ διατριβή' and Rhem. 'conflictus' after Vulg. 'conflictus,' but Tind. and the rest 'disputations,' a word which never seems to signify 'altercation,' 'wrangling.' The Gr. word is found nowhere else.

'Disputation' occurs in AV, Ac 15<sup>2</sup> (TR συζητήσας, edd. συζητήσας, RV '...'), and Ro 14<sup>1</sup> 'Hin: that is weak in faith... receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations' (eis διακρίσεις διαλογισμῶν; lit. 'unto discussions of doubts'; RVM 'for decisions of doubts'; see Sanday-Headlam in loc.). Bp. Bonner's injunction for the reading of the Bible (1541) ends thus: 'he is not to expound, nor to reade with a lowde voyce, and without disputacion,' where, as elsewhere, d. means 'discussion': the reader is neither to expound the meaning himself, nor to discuss it with others.

J. HASTINGS.

DISTAFF (ῥῆμα).—This term occurs in AV only in Pr 31<sup>13</sup>. The Hebrew word is found repeatedly in Neh 3, where it means 'part' or 'district' of the city, something 'cut off' or 'divided' from the rest. It is found also in 2 S 3<sup>20</sup>, where it is rendered 'staff,' but prob. = distaff (see Driver's note). RV renders the word in Pr 31<sup>13</sup> 'spindle,' for which it may no doubt be used; but if we may judge from the cognate Arab. word (falkat), it means the whorl of the spindle, a piece of wood or other material, of hemispherical form, through which the spindle-pin passes, and above which is the hook holding the thread. The design of this piece is to give steadiness to the circular motion of the spindle. This form of spindle is in common use among the women of Syria to-day.

H. PORTER.

DIVERS, DIVERSE.—'Divers' has now dropped out of use, or, if used archaically, is restricted to the sense of 'several.' But formerly 'divers' and 'diverse' were indifferent spellings of the same adj., which expressed either 'varied,' 'different' (Lat. diversus); or 'various,' 'several.' Thus Ridley, A Breve Declaration (Moule's ed. p. 106): 'in the matter of thys Sacrament ther be diverse [=several] poyntes, where menne (counted to be learned) can not agree'; Grindal, Letter to Q. Eliz. (1577): 'divers [=different] men make divers senses of one sentence of Scripture.' In AV 1611 'diverse' occurs Lv 19<sup>15</sup>, Est 3<sup>5</sup>, Dn 7<sup>19</sup> 23<sup>24</sup>, Mt 4<sup>24</sup>; elsewhere 'divers.' The conjunction of 'divers' with 'sundry,' as in He 1<sup>1</sup>, is common in old Eng., as in the Act authorizing Matthew's Bible (Hen. VIII. 1543): 'divers and sundrye his subjects of this his realme.' J. HASTINGS.

DYES.—See LAZARUS.

DIVINATION has many different modes amongst the different peoples of the earth, but all are in their origin either natural or supernatural. Methods which originally were supernatural may come to lose their supernatural character; methods which were at first natural may come to be regarded as supernatural; and, from lack of evidence, it may be difficult or impossible to say with regard to any given method whether in its origin it was a natural or a supernatural method.

We shall begin with the supernatural methods as being those first suggested by the word 'divination,' and we shall define them as those by which man gains foreknowledge of the future from a supernatural source, e.g. by inspiration, possession, or direct interrogation of the divine will. These methods, the supernatural, again fall into two classes, the licit and the illicit, according as the supernatural source is or is not a god of the community. We may think what we will of the honesty of the priests of Apollo, and entertain what idea we like as to the way in which the oracle of Delphi or of Baal-zebub (2 K 12<sup>6</sup>) was worked, but the worshipper of Apollo who consulted the oracle was doing what was approved of by the religious consciousness of his age and race (however low we rank it in the scale); his action was licit. On the other hand, we may pity both the witch and the witch-finder of the time of James I. of England, but we cannot deny that witchcraft was considered, both by those who practised and those who persecuted it, to be irreligious: it was illicit. And the same distinction has prevailed over the world: savages, however low, distinguish in their way between the worship of their tribal gods and commerce with supernatural spirits who are no gods of theirs.

But before proceeding to inquire more closely into the licit modes of divination, i.e. those which are religious, we must notice that these, again, fall into two classes, viz. those which are objectively religious and those which are only subjectively religious. That is objectively right, true, or religious which is so, whether a man thinks it so or not; that is subjectively right, true, or religious which is honestly believed to be so, whether it really is so or not. All peoples of the earth have honestly believed that their gods communicated supernatural foresight to certain favoured men, and so divine inspiration or possession is a subjectively religious method of divination. When and where the belief is not merely subjectively but also objectively true, the divine inspiration takes the form, not of 'divination,' but of PROPHECY (which see). In this article the only side of inspiration we have to deal with is the subjectively religious — without prejudice to the question whether any given example is or is not, as it is honestly believed to be, really divine.

Amongst this class of diviners we must place the sacred scribes of Gn 41<sup>8</sup> and the 'magicians' of Ex 7<sup>11</sup>, as also the Sibyl of Virgil or the Pythia of Delphi, and the inspired priests or 'divine kings' of savages all over the world. All are believed by themselves and their fellow-worshippers to be inspired by one of their respective national or tribal gods; and in all cases possession or inspiration is conditioned by some kind of sacrament or communion. That communion may take the form either of a sacramental meal or of a sacramental investiture. The worshipper may partake of the substance of the animal or plant in the shape of which his deity habitually manifests himself, and which is sacrificed to the deity: thus the priestess of Apollo Diradiotes at Argos and the priestess of Earth at Aegira became inspired by drinking the blood of the animals offered to those deities respectively; the Bacchæ of Dionysus obtained inspiration by tasting the blood of the grape, sacred to that god; the Pythia, by eating the leaves of Apollo's sacred plant, the laurel. Or the worshipper may be (like the idol of the god) clad in the skin or smeared with the blood or fat of the animal, or the juice or oil of the plant, which is the corporate manifestation of the deity, or be robed in the insignia of the god, and so be 'invested' by the power of the divinity. Possession, then (whether by means of the sacred meal or of sacramental investiture), is one of the licit and subjectively religious ways in which foreknowledge of the future may be derived from a supernatural source. It is the way peculiarly appropriate to gods which manifest themselves in animal or vegetable form. But it is not the only way: there are deities of earth, air, fire, and water, who may or must be interrogated in another way. In one cult a draught of a sacred stream may have the same effect as a draught of sacred blood in producing inspiration; but in another cult the deity of the stream may be consulted by casting offerings into the sacred waters, and inferring that the answer at the time will or will not be granted, whether the offering is or is not accepted by the sacred waters. And the ordeal by fire is based on the same principle as this ordeal by water. Divination by a bowl or cup of sacred water (Gn 44<sup>5</sup>), again, has the same origin. The leaves of a sacred tree may be eaten to produce inspiration, but their voice in the wind may speak directly to the worshipper, as did the rustling of the leaves of the sacred oaks of Dodona. Or the branches and twigs themselves, being of the substance of the divinity, may be made to give indications of the divine will: our word 'lot,' like the Gr. κλῆπος, originally meant simply 'a twig.' See LOT. RIT. MAGICANCY or xylomancy (Hos 4<sup>2</sup>) and helomancy (1 K 21<sup>4</sup>) are but forms of divining by the aid of a tree-god. Still more, when a deity habitually manifests himself in animal form, may the inward disposition of the deity be augured by the sacrificing priest, according as the entrails of the victim have or have not anything extraordinary in their appearance (Ezk 21<sup>21</sup>). In the same way and for the same reason the flight of a sacred bird may be 'auspicious' or 'inauspicious' (Ps 58<sup>8</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>).

The illicit or irreligious forms of divination need not detain us long. They are those in which the supernatural Being consulted is one who is not a god of the community, has no bond of loving-kindness with the community, and is accordingly regarded by it, not merely as a strange god, but as a malevolent and evil spirit. No man consults such a spirit except for purposes which the national gods, as being 'the nation's interests and the nation's not sanction. Commerce with such a spirit is anti-social as well as anti-religious; and the man who is guilty of it is a wizard (Lv 19<sup>20</sup>), and has always been punished as a criminal all over the world by the peoples who believe in the possibility of such commerce.

Necromancy, consulting the spirits of the dead (Lv 19<sup>21</sup>, Is 8<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>), is a way of obtaining foreknowledge from a supernatural source which was illicit among the Jews (to whom ancestor-worship was forbidden), but licit amongst all other peoples. Consultation of the teraphim (Ezk 21<sup>21</sup>, Zec 10<sup>2</sup>) seems to have persisted amongst the Jews in spite of the fact that it was, strictly speaking, idolatrous: the teraphim were images (1 S 19<sup>13</sup>), like the altar-stones of the Scandinavians and the clay or wooden idols of the Balonda and Barotse, which could be made to prophesy by smearing them with the blood of sacrifice. For onciromancy see DREAMS. All we need here remark is that it is a form of divination which may be licit (Jg 7<sup>13</sup>) or illicit (Dt 13<sup>2,3</sup>), according as the source of the dream is a divine or an evil spirit. We have now

DO.—Most of the forms and uses are familiar. But as to form, notice 'doeth' in the plu. Sir 35<sup>15</sup> (AV 1611) 'Doeth not the teares run downe the widowes cheeks?' (mod. edd. 'do'). Cf. Pr. Bk. (1549) Com. Ser.: 'And whosoever willingly upon no just cause, doth absent themselves: or doth ungodly in the Parish church occupy themselves: . . . to be excommunicate'; and in the imperat. Piers Plowman, v. 44—

'That ye prechen to this . . . prene it or to the seluen,
And doth it in dede . . . do it to the seluen.'

As to usage, notice that 'do' is steadily losing its active and independent power. 1. We now prefer a stronger word like 'perform' in such phrases as 'do sacrifice', Is 19<sup>21</sup> 'the Egyptians . . . shall do sacrifice' and 'oblation' (RV 'shall worship with sac. and obl.'). or 'do a trespass' Nu 5<sup>6</sup>; or 'do goodness' Nu 10<sup>22</sup> (RV 'do good'); or 'do service' (Heb. עָבַד, lit. 'to serve the service'), a freq. phrase in Nu; cf. also Jn 16<sup>2</sup> 'whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service' (λατρεῖαν προσφέρειν, RV 'offereth service unto God'). 2. 'Do' meaning to act is still in use, but scarcely as Ac 17<sup>7</sup> 'the-e all do contrary to the decrees of Caesar' (TR πράττουσι, edd. πράσσουσιν); Ph 2<sup>13</sup> 'it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure' (τὸ ἐνεργεῖν, RV 'to work'). 3. But 'do well' is good Eng. still, as Jn 11<sup>12</sup> 'if he sleep, he shall do well' (σωθήσεται, Tindale 'he shall do well enough', and so Cov., Cran., Gen. 1557; but Wyc. 'he schal be saaf', and so Gen. 1560, Tomson, Rheims; RV 'he will recover', RVm 'be saved'). 4. To 'do', meaning to 'fare', is in use in the phrase 'how d'ye do?' but not as 2 S 11<sup>7</sup> 'David demanded of him how Joab did and how the people did' (עָבַד לְיָהוָה, lit. 'for the health of Joab and for the health of the people', RV 'how Joab did and how the people fared'), so Est 2<sup>11</sup>; Ac 15<sup>26</sup> 'Let us go again and visit our brethren . . . and see how they do' (ὡς ἔχουσιν, RV 'how they fare'); Eph 6<sup>21</sup> 'that ye also may know my affairs and how I do' (τὶ πράσσω). 5. The phrase 'to have to do with' is still good idiomatic Eng., but notice the Greek Mt 8<sup>29</sup> 'what have we to do with thee?' (τί ἡμῖν καὶ σοί; lit. 'what to us and to thee?') as Wyc. has it, after Vulg. quid nobis et tibi? the idiom of AV being Tindale's; He 4<sup>18</sup> 'all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do' (πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος, lit. as Wyc. 'to whom a word to us', Vulg. ad quem nobis sermo, Tind. 'of whom we speake', Gen. 1557 'with whome we have to do'). 6. As an auxiliary, 'do' is noted by the grammarians as (1) the vicegerent for any antecedent verb, Ac 7<sup>28</sup> 'Wilt thou kill me, as thou diddest the Egyptian yesterday?' (in Gr. the vb. is repeated, ἀνέλεῖν . . . ὃν πρότερον ἀνέλες, hence RV 'as thou killedst'); (2) to express the tense, now used in negative sentences, as 'I do not know' and interrog. 'do you know?' but formerly in affirm. also, as Gn 22<sup>1</sup> 'God did tempt Abraham.' This is a peculiarly Eng. idiom; but closely akin to it is another, which is older, and is common to French, but now quite obsolete. As Fr. has faire savoir 'cause to know,' so Eng. had 'I do you to know' with the same meaning. Thus North, Plutarch, p. 561: 'I do thee to understand that I had rather excell others in excellency of knowledge than in greatness of power'; Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1022—

'And we shal speke of thee somewhat, I trowe,
When thou art goon, to do thine eres glowe!'

In Malory's King Arthur we read: 'And so they looked upon him and felt his pulse, to wit (i.e. to know) whether there were any life in him. In the name of God, said an old man. For I do you verily to wit he is not dead.' That is, 'I cause you to know,' mod. Eng. 'I would have you know.' This phrase is found in AV, 2 Co 8<sup>1</sup> 'we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia' (γνωρίζομεν ὑμῖν, RV 'we make known to you,' which was Wyclif's tr.; 'do you to wit' came from Tindale; Rheims has 'we doe you to understand'). The Eng. auxiliary and this form are sometimes found in an interesting example being in . . . of the Chesse (1474), Pref.: 'I delybered in myself to translate it in to our maternal tonge. And whan I se had achyueud [achieved] the sayd translation, I dyde doo set in enprynte [I caused to be printed] a certyn nombre of theym, Which anone were depressed and solde.' 7. Lastly, notice the phrase 'do away,' Nu 27<sup>4</sup> 'Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family, because he hath no son?' (נָסַח, RV 'be taken away'); 1 Ch 21<sup>8</sup> 'I beseech thee, do away the iniquity of thy servant' (מִן־פָּנָי, RV 'put away'); 1 Co 13<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>11</sup>, 14 (all καταργέω='render inoperative,' a peculiarly Pauline word; St. Paul uses it 25 times, elsewhere in NT Lk 13<sup>7</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup> only; RV in 2 Co 3<sup>11</sup> 'pass away'). Cf. Wyclif's tr. of He 10<sup>9</sup> 'he doith awei thi first, that he make stidfast the secunde,' and of 12<sup>1</sup> 'do we aweie al charge and synne.'

* Cf. Shaks. Jul. Cæs. ii. ii. 5: 'Go bid the priests do present sacrifice.'

J. HASTINGS.

DOCTOR, DOCTRINE.—Doctor is used in the old Eng. sense of 'teacher' in Lk 2<sup>46</sup> (διδάσκαλος); and 'doctor of the law' for 'teacher of the law' in Lk 5<sup>17</sup>, Ac 5<sup>34</sup> (νομοδιδάσκαλος). Cf. Melville's Diary (Wodrow, p. 95), 'to the Doctor is given the word of knowlage, to open upe, be simple doctrine, the mysteries of fathe.' So Bacon (Essays, p. 9) calls St. Paul 'the Doctor of the Gentiles,' and Latimer (Works, i. 430) calls the devil 'that old Doctor,' and this is the use in Pope's lines—

'Who shall decide, when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt, have said me?'
Ep. to Ld. Bathurst, l. l.

See under SCRIBE. Doctrine (see next art.) is similarly used for 'teaching' in Dt 32<sup>2</sup>, Job 11<sup>4</sup>, Pr 4<sup>2</sup>, Is 29<sup>24</sup> (all נָתַן, lit. 'gave', received, elsewhere only Pr 1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>); Is 28<sup>9</sup> (נִתְּנָה, lit. 'something heard,' RV 'message,' RVm 'report'); Jer 10<sup>8</sup> (נִתְּנָה, really 'discipline,' RV 'instruction'); 1 Es 5<sup>40</sup> (διδασκαλία), Sir 16<sup>25</sup> 24<sup>27</sup>, 32 (παιδεία), 24<sup>33</sup> (διδασκαλία); and freq. in NT for Gr. διδασκαλία. Still more freq. for 'the process of teaching,' 'instruction' (διδασκίη), as Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 'they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship.' Cf. Chaucer, Non. Prest. Tale, 622—

* For seint Paul seith, that al that writen is,
To our doctryne it is y-write, y-wis.

J. HASTINGS.

DOCTRINE, etymologically regarded, signifies the work of a doctor or teacher, from doceo, to teach; hence it denotes sometimes the act of teaching, sometimes the substance or matter of that which is taught. It may also be theoretical or practical, refer, that is, to either truth or duty—that which is to be believed, or that which is to be done.

On the theoretical side, doctrine may be compared with, and distinguished from, dogma or tenet. Dogma and doctrine, especially in the plural, are often identified, but the latter is really a wider conception than the former. It differs from it in two respects—a doctrine is less formal, less of a scientific construction than a dogma, and there is implied in the latter a reference to some religious community on whose authority it is maintained. By some the distinction is thus stated: 'Doctrine summarizes the statements of Scripture on a particular point, adding and diminishing nothing; dogma formulates the principles and relations involved in the doctrine, and the inferences following from it. Every dogma, therefore, is of the nature of a theory, giving the rationale of the facts.' The word dogma does not occur in EV nor : except in the sense of a 'decree' or ' <sup>c2</sup>, Ac 16<sup>4</sup> 17, Eph 2<sup>5</sup>, Col 2<sup>1</sup> ). He 11<sup>28</sup> [Lachm. dogma, but TR and WH diagramma ]. The modern meaning of the word is foreign to the sacred book. On its practical side, doctrine is almost synonymous with precept or principle.

In OT, doctrine occurs chiefly as tr. of  $\text{דָּבָר}$  ('message' in Wisdom literature) 'that which is heard' (e.g. Job 32<sup>2</sup>, Job 11<sup>4</sup>, Pr 4<sup>2</sup>, Is 29<sup>34</sup>); it occurs once only in each case as tr. of  $\text{מִצְוָה}$  ('discipline', 'command'), and  $\text{מִשְׁמָע}$  'that which is heard' (Is 28<sup>9</sup>, RV 'message'). In Apoc. there are several occurrences of the word. It appears in Sir as tr. of  $\text{τράπεζα}$ , as when 16<sup>55</sup> the writer says: 'I will show forth doctrine in weight' (RV 'instruction by weight' by the parallel clause).

'doctrine and truth' appear for the Gr. δῶσις καὶ ἀλήθεια, which in their turn represent the אֱמֻנָה וְחִמּוּם, Urim and Thummim—'Lights and Perfections (?)' of the parallel passage Neh 7<sup>65</sup>. In NT, with one exception (He 6<sup>1</sup>, where for AV 'the principles of the doctrine of Christ' RV reads 'the first principles of Christ'), doctrine is employed to represent either διδασχῆ or διδασκαλία, both of which words are used in active and passive sense, the active being predominant in the case of διδασκαλία, the passive in that of διδασχῆ. The latter emphasizes the authority, the former the act' (Cremer; but see Hort, Chr. Ecclesia, 191). Both words are employed in an absolute way for 'the teaching' (διδασχῆ in Tit 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>9</sup> RV; διδασκαλία in 1 Ti 4<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>, Tit 2<sup>7</sup>). It is worth noting that out of 21 occurrences of διδασκαλία in NT, no fewer than 15 are in the Pastoral Epistles. RV has almost uniformly substituted 'teaching' for doctrine as tr. of διδασχῆ, but has only occasionally made the same substitution in the case of διδασκαλία. In only one instance has it introduced the word doctrine when it does not appear in AV, viz. in 1 Ti 6<sup>2</sup> where it reads 'If any man teacheth a different doctrine,' for AV 'If any man teach otherwise.'

A. STEWART.

DODAI.—See D .

DODANIM (דודנים, LXX Ῥόδιοι, Gn 10<sup>4</sup>).—Fourth son of Javan (Ionian Greeks), and therefore undoubtedly intended to designate a Gr. tribe or colony. There can be no connexion, beyond an accidental similarity in sound, with the inland town of Dodona in Epirus. Nor can it mean Dardanians, as Delitzsch still maintains, for the Trojan province of Dardania was never of such consequence as to give its name to a leading family in the genealogy of mankind. Dr. Madden and others are inclined to accept the reading of the LXX (which is also that of the Samaritan translation of the Pent. and of Jerome, as well as the MT of 1 Ch 1<sup>7</sup>), and identify the Dodanim with the Rhodians or the inhabitants of the islands of the Ægean Sea. If Elishah be Southern Italy and Sicily, the two pairs of sons of Javan will be named from east to west: Elishah and Tarshish; Kittim (Cyprus) and Dodanin (Rhodes). The inhabitants of Rhodes from B.C. 800 onward were Ionian Greeks, sons of Javan, who took the place of the earlier Phœnician population. The Rhodians are certainly in their proper place alongside of the Kittim. They were known even to Homer, and were visited from a very early date by all the trading peoples of the eastern Mediterranean coasts. Bochart's idea that they might be identified with the Gr. colonists on the banks of the Rhone (Rhodanus) has not commended itself to anyone.

LITERATURE.—Dr. L. N. H. 2, 1, 331, under 'Dodanim,' treats ably of the four sons of Javan. See also Winer, Schenkel, Riehm; and Bertheau on 1 Ch 17 in his Commentary.

J. MACPHERSON.

DODAYAHU (דודאיהו 'beloved of J,' AV Doda-yah).—Father of Eliezer of Mareshah, the prophet who censured Ahab for entering into alliance with Ahab's son (1 K. 22<sup>37</sup>). Gray (Heb.
Prop. Names, 62, 232) contends that the correct Heb. text is דודיה. So also Kittel in SBOT (cf.
Nestle, Eigennamen, 70). J. A. SELBIE.

DODO (so the Kerê כֶּרֶה, Kethibh Dodai (דֹּדַי), or possibly Dodi (דֹּדִי); LXX combines the two, translating, υἱὸς πατράδελφου αὐτοῦ υἱὸς Σουεῖ).—1. The father of Eleazar, the second of the three captains who were over 'the thirty' (2 S 23<sup>9</sup>). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11<sup>13</sup>) the name is given as Dodo (דֹּדוֹ, LXX Δωδαι), and also 'the Ahohite' for the erroneous 'son of Ahohi.' In the third list (1 Ch 27<sup>4</sup>) Dodai (דֹּדַי, LXX Δωδεῖα) is described as general of the second division of the army, but the words 'Eleazar the son of' appear to have been accidentally omitted. Bertheau considers that Dodai is the more correct form, and appeals to the LXX and Jos. (Δωδελου), he accordingly restores this form in 2 S 23<sup>9</sup> and 1 Ch 11<sup>12</sup>.

The traditional spelling (Dodo), however, is most probably right: the name Dudu has been found on the Tel el-Amarna tablets, apparently as that of an Amorite official at the Egypt. court. In the Inscription of Mesha (l. 12) we also find דודו (probably דודו=Dodo); it appears to be the name of some deity. 2. A Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, one of 'the thirty' (2 S 23<sup>34</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>26</sup> דודו). 3. A man of Issachar, the forefather of Tola the judge (Jg 10<sup>1</sup>). LXX and Vulg. tr. πατραδελφου αὐτοῦ; patruī Abimelech. J. F. STENNING.

DOE.—RV (Pr 5<sup>19</sup>), AV 'roe,' is in Heb. <sup>רֶאָה</sup> ya'alah, the female ibex. See GOAT, under <sup>אֵיִלִּים</sup> ayilim.

DOEG (דוג, דוגא, דוג *).—An Edomite, and chief of the herdsmen for her. (1.) 'Manners,' reading with Grätz דוגא for דוגא, of Saul. When David fled to Nob, to Ahimelech (or Ahiah) the priest, D. was there 'detained before the Lord.' Having witnessed the aid given to the fugitive, he reported what he had seen to the king, who summoned Ahimelech before him, and accused him of treason. Regardless of his protestations of innocence, Saul ordered him to be slain. The king's guard shrunk from laying hands upon the sacred person of a priest, and the order was then given to D., who not only slew all the priests, but perpetrated a general massacre of all the inhabitants of Nob, destroying even the cattle (1 S 21<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>9-19</sup>). D. is mentioned in the title of Ps 52.

R. M. BOYD.

DOG (כֶּלֶב keleḇ, κύων, κύναιον, canis).—The dog is mentioned in many places in the Bible, and (with the somewhat uncertain exception of the greyhound, Pr 30<sup>31</sup>, where the Heb. signifies slender in the loins, and is rendered in the marg. horse, RVm war-horse) always with contempt. The dog referred to is doubtless the pariah animal so common in the streets of all villages and cities in Bible lands. The original of this degenerate race of dogs is probably the shepherd dog (Job 30<sup>1</sup>), which differs from the town animal chiefly in his long fur and bushy tail, and his far greater strength, courage, and ferocity. All of these qualities are the natural result of the hardships of his life. Compelled to go long distances, to guard the flocks from the wolves and other savage beasts, to face the cold winds of winter, and its pelting rains or sleet or snow, he needs all the endowments which he possesses over those of his idle, cowardly relative, who spends most of the time, when not in search of his carrion food, in sleeping under the shelter of walls or vaulted passages, or sprawling in the soft mud or dust of the streets.

* On this form see Driver on 1 S 2218.

The street dog is 2 to 3 ft. long, exclusive of his tail, and from 18 inches usually tawny in colour, but often white, or black, with short, stiff fur, small eyes, and usually with little or no bushiness to the tail. These dogs usually occupy defined quarters of the towns, and any dog intruding into a quarter not his own is certain to be set upon and very severely bitten. They act as public scavengers (1 K 14<sup>11</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>10</sup> 36<sup>1</sup>, Jer 15<sup>2</sup>). They wander from place to place, especially in the neighbourhood of the city walls, and make the night hideous with their barking (Ps 59<sup>6-14</sup>). They not infrequently attack passers in lonely places, especially in the neighbourhood of Arab camps. Violent men are compared to them (Is 56<sup>10</sup>). They are used to watch houses and tents (Is 56<sup>10</sup>). The name dog is a term of reproach (1 S 24<sup>14</sup>, 2 S 3<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 8<sup>13</sup>, Is 66<sup>3</sup>, Ph 3<sup>2</sup>, Rev 22<sup>15</sup>). 'The price of a dog' (Dt 23<sup>18</sup>) probably refers to the practices of the male kēdeshim (see Driver ad loc. and Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. 114). In a word, the Eastern street dog is a type of all that is cowardly, lazy, filthy, treacherous, and contemptible. They seem to have been omnipresent in the time of Christ (Mt 15<sup>26</sup>, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>, Lk 16<sup>1-11</sup>), as the former citations prove them to have been in more ancient times.

With the doubtful exception before given (Pr 30<sup>31</sup>), there is no allusion to hunting dogs in Scripture. As the friend of man, endowed with noble intelligence, the dog had no place in Heb. life.

G. E. POST.

DOGMA, properly an opinion (cf. dokein), then, as a decision of one in authority (cf. dokein), of rulers (Lk 2<sup>1</sup>, Ac 17<sup>7</sup>, He 1<sup>1</sup>), of doctores (Eph 2<sup>15</sup>, Col 2<sup>14</sup>), of apostles (Ac 16<sup>4</sup>). The same word in its verbal form is used of the decisions of the elders (Ac 15<sup>22-25, 28</sup>). Hatch (Hib. Lect. 1888, pp. 119-120) has very well shown how, from this original meaning of 'personal opinion,' the word came to signify 'decrees' in the case of rulers, and 'doctrines' in the case of teachers. By far the most important NT use of the term is in Eph and Col. All the early Gr. commentators understand by 'dogmas' in both passages the doctrines or precepts of the gospel. Lightfoot correctly insists upon rendering the word, as in all other NT passages, decree, ordinance; in Eph it is restricted to Mosaic ordinances, but in Col it is applied more generally to all decrees in which moral principles and religious precepts are set forth. The restriction in the one case, however, is not in the word, but only in the context. In Eph the dogmata as 'authoritative decrees' are distinguished from ἐντολαί as separate precepts, by both of which terms the Mosaic law is characterized from different points of view. By styling these precepts 'dogmas' the apostle emphasizes the point that they were imposed by external authority. This is in keeping with the ecclesiastical use of the word to indicate doctrines which are enunciated authoritatively by the Church. See DOCTRINE.

J. MACPHERSON.

DOK (Δῶκ).—A fortress near Jericho, where Simon the Maccabee, along with two of his sons, was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, 1 Mac 16<sup>15</sup>. The name survives in the modern 'An Dik, 4 miles N.W. of Jericho (Robinson, BRP ii. 309; Ritter, Erdkunde, xv. i. 460; SWP iii. 173, 191, 209). In Jos. (Ant. XIII. viii. 1; Wars, i. ii. 3) it appears as Dagon (cf. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 250).

J. A. SELBIE.

DOLEFUL.—Is 13<sup>21</sup> 'their houses shall be full of doleful creatures' (Heb. חַיִּים 'ôhîm); and Mic 2<sup>4</sup> 'and lament with a doleful lamentation' (חַיִּים 'ôhîm, AVm 'lament with a lamentation of lamentations,' RVm 'lament with the lamentation, It is done,' after Ewald, Cheyne, and others, taking the last word as Niph. of חָנָן, instead of a subst. from חָנָן to wail). There is a general agreement that the 'ôhîm of Is 13<sup>21</sup> are jackals, as there is the Assy. ahû used in the bilingual texts for Bab. lik-barra, lit. 'evil-dog.' The older Eng. VSS mostly give 'great owls,' the Geneva keeping the Heb. ôhim, with a note suggesting the possibility that they and the Zim (AV 'wild beasts') are 'wicked spirits whereby Satan deluded man, as by the fairies, goblins, and such like fantasies,' which probably suggested the 'doleful creatures' of AV (cf. Wyc., Douay, 'dragons'). The Heb. is probably onomatopoeitic, from [חנן] to howl; but 'doleful' is mournful (fr. Lat. dolere), as in Shaks. Pass. Pul. xxi.—

'She, poor bird, as all forlorn, Lean'd her breast up till a thorn,
And there sang the dolefull'st ditty.'

Shaks. uses 'dole' in the same sense, as Hamlet, I. ii. 13—

'In equal scale weighing delight and dole.'

J. HASTINGS.

DOLPHIN.—See BADGER.

DOMINION, used in the ordinary sense, is the tr. of various words in OT and NT, and only noteworthy as the rendering of κυριότης in Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup> (pl.), and, perhaps, 2 P 2<sup>10</sup> and Jude<sup>8</sup> (sing.). Associated as it is in Col 1<sup>16</sup> with ἀρχαί and ἐξουσίαι, and in Eph 1<sup>21</sup> with these and δυναμεις (all sing.),—words used elsewhere (e.g. Eph 6<sup>12</sup>, Col 2<sup>15</sup>, Ro 8<sup>38</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>) primarily, at any rate, of the angelic powers, good or bad or both,—it stands, without doubt, in Eph (1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>) and Col (descensively) for a grade in the angelic hierarchy; probably, along with ἀρχαί (Col 1<sup>16</sup>), the highest grade (as Lightfoot concludes from the earliest lists; see his note on Col 1<sup>16</sup>), being at the same time second in that grade, while ἀρχαί and ἐξουσίαι belong to the next grade below; just as kingship, suggested in θρόνος, is naturally superior to lordship (κυριότης), (compare the θεοί and κύριοι of 1 Co 8<sup>9</sup>), and both are superior to the ordinary rule and authority. Θεός, κυριότης, ἀρχή, ἐξουσία, and δύναμις, or their linguistic equivalents, are found among the orders of angels in Jewish or Jewish-Chr. books ranging over the NT period or its immediate neighbourhood. Thus in Jubilees, § 15: 'Over all [the Gentile nations] hath [God] set spirits as lords' (cf. Sir 17<sup>27</sup>); in Test. XII. Patr. Levi 3, 'In the heaven next to God are thrones (θρόνοι), powers (ἐξουσίαι), angels being, in the same passage, assigned to each of the first six out of the seven heavens, in descending order; in Enoch 6<sup>10</sup>, 'The host of the heavens and all the holy ones above, and the host of God . . . all the angels of power, and all the angels of principalities,' etc. Christian Fathers, such as Origen, Ephrem Syrus, Pseudo-Dionysius, accept similar though varying gradations (see Lightfoot, Col 1<sup>16</sup>). The more creditable in one who was able to give alms, and might have contented herself with doing this. The garments which the widows showed to St. Peter may most naturally be supposed to be those which she had previously given to them. The widows are thus seen here, as in 64, to form a recognized class, dependent upon bounty. The account of the actual raising of Dorcas (vv. 40, 41) bears a close resemblance to that of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9<sup>25</sup>, Mk 5<sup>40, 41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>51</sup>).

V. H. STANTON

DORYMENES (Δορυμένης), the father of Ptolemy Macron, who was a trusted friend of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 4<sup>45</sup>), and was chosen by Lysias to command the Syrian army in Pal. in conjunction with Nicanor and Gorgias (1 Mac 3<sup>38</sup>). Ptolemy had formerly been in the service of the Egypt. king Ptolemy VI Philometor (2 Mac 10<sup>13</sup>); and his father, Dorymenes, may perhaps be identified with the Ætolian Dorymenes who fought for Ptolemy IV. against Antiochus the Great (Polybius, v. 61).

H. A. WHITE.

DOSITHEUS (Δοσίθεος).—1. The priest who, according to a note in one of the Greek recensions of Esther, brought the book to Alexandria in the 4th year of Ptolemy Philometor (?) and Cleopatra, c. B.C. 178 (Ad. Est 11<sup>1</sup>). 2. A soldier of Judas Maccabæus, who (2 Mac 12<sup>25</sup>) laid hold, in the heat of battle, of Gorgias the general of the enemy, and sought to take him alive. The attempt was frustrated by a Thracian horseman, who cut off the arm of Dositheus. 3. A renegade Jew who frustrated the plot of Theodotus to assassinate king Ptolemy Philopator (3 Mac 18). 4. An officer of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12<sup>26, 24</sup>).

J. A. SELBIE.

DOTEA (Δωτα).—Another form of DOTHAN (which see). AV has incorrectly Judæa.

NOTE.—The orig. meaning of to 'dote' is to be foolish (cf. 'dotage,' and Scotch 'doited'), as in Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 261—

'Wel wot I ther-by ȝifou begynnest dote
As olde foles, wel an hur-ȝynut faynlet', and Piers Plowman, i. 138—

'Thow doted daffe, quod she, dull arne thi wittes'

In this sense occurs 'dote' in Jer 50<sup>35</sup> 'A sword is upon the liars, and they shall dote' (Cov. 'they shall become foolies,' Heb. יִלְכְּדוּ, the vb. [לָכַד] is only found in Niph., and always = be foolish, or act foolishly, whether innocently as Jer 5<sup>4</sup>, or not as Is 19<sup>13</sup>); Sir 25<sup>2</sup> 'an old adulterer that doteth' (ἐλαττοῦμενον συνέσει, RV 'lacking understanding'); and 1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup> 'ἡλικιωὶν τῶν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ' (AVm 'a fool,' Rvm 'sick,' Gr. νοσῶν, only here in NT, and νόσημα only Jn 5<sup>4</sup> TR; but the sense is clearly 'unsound,' 'mad,' a common meaning of the word; Tind. tr. freely 'wasteth his braynes'; 'doteth' is the Geneva word of 1560). Elsewhere 'dote' occurs only in the sense of 'be (foolishly) fond,' Ezk 23<sup>5, 7, 9, 12, 16, 20</sup> (21<sup>2</sup>). J. HASTINGS.

DOTHAN (דּוֹתָן and דּוֹתָן, Δωθάν), Gn 37<sup>17</sup> (Dothaim, in Jth 4<sup>8</sup> etc.), now Tell Dothân, was an ancient town situated 10 miles N. of Samaria. Thither Joseph followed his brethren from Shechem (Gn 37<sup>16</sup>). The pasturage about it is still the best and freshest in a time of drought (Thomson, Land and Book, p. 466). The site of Dothan, known in earlier times by Eusebius, who placed it 12 miles N. of Samaria, had for some centuries been lost till recovered by Van de Velde (vol. i. p. 364 ff). It lay on an ancient (Jewish?) road, of which Van de Velde found the remains, crossing from the plain of Esdraelon into the plain of Sharon, and must have always been an important military post. It stood on the top of a mound, as the language of 2 K 6<sup>14-17</sup> would suggest. There are still two large ancient cisterns, into one of which possibly Joseph was cast. There are two wells, as the name implies, but only one of them seems ancient. It bursts from the foot of the hill (Sur Mem. ii. 169, 215). Most probably, Joseph's brethren were gathered watering their flocks when he Dothan was the residence of Elisha incident of 2 K 6<sup>12</sup> occurred. It is several times mentioned in the account of the siege of Bethulia (Jth 4<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>8</sup>).

A. HENDERSON

DOUBT.—See next article. The middle Eng. douten most freq. meant to fear, after dubitare in late Lat. And this meaning is still very common for 'doubt' in Shaks., as Macbeth, IV ii. 66—

'I doubt some danger does approach you nearly'

In AV this meaning is evident in Sir 9<sup>13</sup> 'Keep thee far from the man that hath power to kill; so shalt thou not doubt the fear of death' (οὐ μὴ ὑποτρέψῃς φόβον θανάτου, RV 'thou shalt have no suspicion of the fear of death'). But in NT also it is often more than 'hesitate' or 'mistrust,' esp. where the Gr. is ἀπορέομαι, 'to be at a loss' (Jn 13<sup>22</sup>, Ac 25<sup>20</sup>, Gal 4<sup>20</sup>), or the stronger διαπόρρω, 'to be utterly at a loss' (Ac 2<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>). In like manner doubtful means 'perplexing' or 'perplexed,' Sir 18<sup>7</sup> (ἀπορέομαι, RV 'in perplexity'); Lk 12<sup>23</sup> 'neither be ye of doubtful mind' (μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε, a word of disputed meaning here, see Plummer, ad loc.); Ro 14<sup>1</sup> 'd. disputations' (see under DISPUTE).

J. HASTINGS

**DOUBT.—The Heb. of OT seems to lack an exact equivalent to our term 'doubt,' when used in a religious reference. Some have, indeed, understood 'doubters,' 'sceptics' to be meant when the Psalmist, who loves God's law and hopes in His word and delights in keeping His commandments, declares that he 'hates them that are of a double mind' (Ps 119<sup>113</sup> בְּלִבִּי שְׁנֵי דָבָר). Apparently, however, it is rather hypocrites, what we should call 'double-faced men,' who are meant; and it seems to be hypocrisy, rather than doubt, which is in mind also in 1 K 18<sup>21</sup>, where the kindred term שְׁנֵי דָבָר occurs, and in 1 Ch 12<sup>33</sup>, Ps 12<sup>3</sup>, where the similar phrase 'double heart' (לֵב יָדָי) appears, as well as in Hos 10<sup>2</sup>, where the comm. differ as to whether the words דָּבָר, לֵב are to be tr'd 'their heart is divided,' or, perhaps better, 'their heart is smooth,' i.e. deceitful.

In NT, on the other hand, we meet with a series of terms which run through the shades of meaning expressed by our words, perplexity, suspense, distraction, hesitation, questioning, scepticism, shading down into unbelief.

Perplexity is expressed by the verb ἀπορέω (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>, Lk 24<sup>4</sup>, Jn 13<sup>22</sup>, Ac 25<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>8</sup>, Gal 4<sup>20</sup>), with its strengthened compound, διαπόρρω (Lk 9<sup>7</sup>, Ac 2<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>), expressing thorough perplexity, when one is utterly at a loss, and the still stronger compound ἐξαπορέω (2 Co 1<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>), in which perplexity has passed into despair. This perplexity is never assigned in NT to the sphere of religion. Even in such instances as Lk 24<sup>4</sup>, where we are told that the women, finding the Lord's tomb empty, 'were perplexed thereabout'; Mk 6<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>8</sup>, where Herod's perplexity over John's preaching and the subsequent preaching of Jesus and His followers is spoken of; and Ac 2<sup>12</sup>, where the extreme perplexity of those who witnessed the wonders of the Day of Pentecost is adverted to, it is not a state of religious doubt but of pure mental bewilderment which is described. The women merely had no explanation of the empty tomb ready, they were at a loss how to account for it; Herod simply found John's preaching and the reports concerning the preaching and work of Jesus and His disciples inexplicable, he had no theory ready for their explanation; the marvels of Pentecost, before Peter's explanation of them, were wholly without meaning to their witnesses; and, similarly, in Ac 10<sup>17</sup>, Peter was just at a complete loss to understand what the vision he had received could mean, and required a revelation to make it significant to him. It was this state of mind, a state of what we may call objective suspense due to lack of light, which the Jews claimed for themselves when in Jn 10<sup>24</sup> they demanded of Jesus: 'How long dost thou lift up our soul (τὴν ψυχὴν ἡμῶν αἰεὶς)? If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly.' They would suggest that they were in a state of strained expectation regarding His claims, and that the lagging of their decision was due, not to subjective causes rooted in an evil heart of unbelief, but to a lack of bold frankness on His part. Jesus, in His reply, repels this insinuation and ascribes the fault to their own unbelief. They were not eager seekers after truth, held in suspense by His ambiguous speech: they were men in possession of full evidence, who would not follow it to a conclusion opposing their wishes; they were therefore not perplexed, but

For the doubtful mind the NT appears to have two expressions, μετωρῖσθαι (Lk 12<sup>28</sup>) and διστάζειν (Mt 14<sup>31</sup> 28<sup>17</sup>). This state of mind is superinduced on faith, and is a witness to the faith which lies behind it; only those who have faith can waver or be distracted from it. But the faith to which it witnesses is equally necessarily an incomplete and imperfect faith; only an imperfect faith can waver or be distracted from its firm assurance. The exhortation, 'Be ye not of a wavering mind,' is appropriately given, therefore, in Lk 12<sup>28</sup>, to those who are addressed as 'of little faith' (ὀλιγόπιστοι), of whom it is the specific characteristic. It is to trust in God's providential care without carking anxiety as to our food and drink and clothing that the Saviour is exhorting His hearers in this context—to fulness of faith, which, according to its definition in He 11<sup>1</sup>, is absorbed in the unseen and future in contrast with the seen and present. Those who have full faith will have their whole life hid with God; and in proportion as care for earthly things enters, in that proportion do we fall away from the heights of faith and exhibit a wavering mind. It was a similar weakness which attacked Peter, when, walking, by virtue of faith, upon the water to come to Jesus, he saw the wind and was afraid (Mt 14<sup>31</sup>); and, accordingly, our Saviour addressed him similarly, 'O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt (ἐδίστασας)?' Here, again, is real faith though weak, but a faith that is distracted by the entrance of fear. The same term, and surely with similar implications, is used again and on an even more interesting occasion. When the disciples of Jesus came to the mountain where He had appointed them and there saw their risen Lord, we are told (Mt 28<sup>17</sup>), 'They worshipped: but some doubted (ἐδίστασαν).' It is this same doubt of imperfect and distracted faith, and not the sceptical doubt of unbelief, that is intended. All worshipped Him, though some not without that doubt of the distracted mind which is no more 'absurd' here than in Lk 12<sup>28</sup> and Mt 14<sup>31</sup>. Whence the distraction arose, whether possibly from joy itself, as in Lk 24<sup>41</sup>, or from a less noble emotion, as possibly in Jn 20<sup>25</sup>, we do not know. But the quality of doubt resulting from it, although manifesting the incompleteness of the disciples' faith, was not inconsistent with its reality; and the record of it is valuable to us as showing, along with such passages as Lk 24<sup>37-41</sup>, Jn 20<sup>25</sup>, that the apostles' testimony to the resurrection was that of convinced rather than of credulous witnesses.

A kindred product of weak faith, the doubt of questioning hesitation, is expressed in NT by the term διαλογισμός (Lk 24<sup>38</sup>, Ro 14<sup>1</sup>, Ph 2<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). It is the Nemesis of weakness of faith that it is pursued by anxious questionings and mental doubts. Thus, when Christ appeared to His disciples in Jerus., 'they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had beheld a spirit' (Lk 24<sup>38</sup>). 'Their Master's rebuke, "Wherefore arise in your heart?" And in St. . . , the timid outlook of the weak in faith is recognized as their chief characteristic. This seems to be the meaning of Ro 14<sup>1</sup>, where 'he that is weak in faith' is to be received into full Christian brotherhood, but not 'for the adjudication of questionings' (cf. the κρινέτω of v.<sup>3</sup> and the κρίνων of v.<sup>4</sup>) here is a man whose mind is crowded with scruples and doubts,—he is to be received, of course, but not as if his agitated conscience were to be law to the community; he is to be borne with, not to be obeyed. The same implication underlies Ph 2<sup>14</sup>, where the contrast between 'murmurings and disputings' seems to be not so much between moral and intellectual rebellion, as between violent and timid obstacles in the Christian pathway,—a contrast which appears also in 1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>. It would seem that those who are troubled with questionings are everywhere recognized as men who possess faith, but who are deterred from a proper entrance into their privileges and a proper performance of their Christian duties by a settled habit of hesitant casuistry, which argues lack of robustness in their faith.

The NT term which expresses that deeper doubt which argues not merely the weakness but the lack of faith is the verb διακρίνεσθαι (Mt 21<sup>21</sup>, Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Ro 4<sup>21</sup>, 14<sup>23</sup>, Ja 1<sup>6</sup><sup>10</sup>, Jude 22). Wherever this critical attitude towards divine things is found, there faith is absent. The term may be used in contrast to that faith by which miracles are wrought, or in which God is approached in prayer (Mt 21<sup>21</sup>, Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Ja 1<sup>6</sup><sup>10</sup>); in either case it implies the absence of the faith in question and the consequent failure of the result,—he that 'doubteth' in this sense cannot expect to receive anything of the Lord. It may be used of a frame of mind in which one lives his life out in the Christian profession (Ro 14<sup>23</sup>); in this case, the intrusion of this critical spirit vitiates the whole course of his activities,—because they are no longer of faith, and 'whatsoever is not of faith is sin.' Or it may be used as the extreme contrast to that fulness of faith which Abraham exhibited in his typical act of faith; and then it is represented as the outgrowth of unbelief (Ro 4<sup>21</sup>). From the full description of its opposite here, and the equally full description of it itself in Ja 1<sup>6</sup><sup>10</sup> (see Mayor's note), we may attain a tolerably complete conception of its nature as the critical, self-debating habit of the typical sceptic, which casts him upon life like a derelict ship upon the sea, and makes him in all things 'double-minded' and 'unstable.' Such a habit of mind is the extreme contradiction of faith, and cannot coexist with it; and it is therefore treated everywhere with condemnation—unless Jude 22 be an exception, and there the reading is too uncertain to justify its citation as such. See further, FAITH.

B. B. WARFIELD.

DOVE (ῥῆ) γὼνῆ, περιστέρα, columba).—There are several species of wild doves in Bible lands, which all go by the name of hamām in Arabic. (1) The ring dove or wood pigeon (Columba Palumbus, L.), which appears twice a year, at the spring and autumn migration, in all the wooded districts of Palestine. It is taken by means of a decoy bird, tied to a perch, with its eyelids sewn up. A considerable number remain through the winter. (2) The stock dove (Columba oenas, L.), which is common in Gilead and Bashan, and in the Jordan Valley. (3) The rock dove (Columba livia, Bonnat), which is found along the coast, and in the highlands W. of the Jordan and in Lebanon. (4) The ash-rumped rock dove (Columba Schimperi, Bp.), which is found in the interior of Pal., and makes its nests in the caves and fissures of the chalk precipices. The name hamām is associated with a number of wadis and other natural features of the country.

Tame doves are found in every city and village, often in immense numbers. They have been kept from most ancient times. The writer discovered in Wady Sir, in Gilead, a rock-hewn dove-cot of large size. It is described and figured in PEFSt, Oct. 1886. It is a favourite amusement of boys and young men, especially in the interior cities, as Damascus, Hems, Hamath, etc., to spend the later afternoon hours in the flight of pigeons. They train about over the houses, making their own home a centre, and to come back and alight on their owner's hand, and, with a shrill whistle, to be tossed off into the air for a short whirl. It is one of the earliest of birds in the Bible (Gn 8<sup>12</sup>). It is a bird capable of distant flight (Ps 55<sup>6</sup>). A domesticated variety has yellow plumage (Ps 68<sup>13</sup>). The wild doves make their nests in the cliffs overhanging the wadis (Ca 2<sup>14</sup>, Jer 48<sup>28</sup>, Ezk 7<sup>16</sup>). The mournful cooing of the dove is well known, and often alluded to in Scripture (Is 38<sup>14</sup> 59<sup>11</sup>, Nah 2<sup>7</sup>). Its harmlessness is proverbial (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>). Its foolishness is used to illustrate the stupidity of Ephraim (Hos 7<sup>11</sup>). Its lovable qualities are also proverbial (Ca 1<sup>5</sup> etc.). Young pigeons were used in sacrifice (Gn 15<sup>9</sup>).

Dove's Dung accumulates in immense quantities around the dove-cots, and is an invaluable manure, especially for cantelopes. It is owing to the use of this fertilizer that the melons of Persia are so renowned for their excellence. The talus in front of the cliffs where wild doves nest in large numbers is covered with thick deposits of their excrement, which is almost as powerful a fertilizer as guano.*

G. E. POST.

* There seems to be no doubt of the etymological significance of the word חֲרִי hārī yōnim (2 K 6<sup>25</sup>). Hārī means literally dung. The Arab. ḥārī is also a word of the same signification. It is used in the same sense in Arabic and constantly so used by the Arabs. It was the substance which was sold at the rate of five pieces of silver the quarter cab, that is, 6s. 4d. the pint? Many efforts have been made to find some plant which might have been called by this name. Avicenna says (A. 111) that the best quality of ushūdān, a name for several species of Salsola, is called heri el-azāfer, that is, sparrow's dung. There are numerous instances of a similar nomenclature. Nevertheless, no one has as yet found a plant that bears the name of dove's dung, or which can be identified with the material which was sold so dear; and nothing is gained for science by mere conjecture. It is better to accept the literal interpretation, and conclude that, in the last resort, the dove-cots were drawn upon to satisfy the cravings of starving men. The ordure and urine of almost all kinds of animals and birds, which were administered by the ancients as a medicine, were administered by the ancients as a medicine. There are long unsavory references in ancient medical treatises of Avicenna and others on their virtues. They were and are still used as collyria in the treatment of ophthalmia. Houghton cites a statement from a Spanish author, who says that in the year 1316 so great a famine distressed the English that 'men ate their own children, dogs, cats, and pigeons' dung.' With this statement compare the famine threat (2 K 18<sup>27</sup>, Is 36<sup>12</sup>). It is well known that pigeons and other birds often pass seeds unchanged through their alimentary canal. When the Dutch tried to enhance the price of nutmegs in their E. Indian possessions by limiting the growth of the trees, the large wild pigeons of those regions thwarted their purpose by carrying the nutmegs in their crops, and depositing them in their excrement at points far removed from the Dutch possessions. The seeds took root, and produced nutmeg trees. Birds are a great factor in the propagation of plants in this manner. Some of the coral islands is largely indebted to them for species thus introduced. The existence of such un-

DOYE'S DUNG.—See DOVE and FOOD.

DOWRY.—See MARRIAGE.

DOXOLOGY, which is not a biblical word, is the name which has been given to the formal ascription of praise or glory (glorificatio). Such are the closing sentences of several apostolic prayers, e.g. Ro 16<sup>27</sup>, Jude 25, Eph 3<sup>20</sup>. In particular, the name is given to the last sentence of the Lord's Prayer as it stands in TR and our AV of Matthew (cf. 1 Ch 29<sup>11</sup>). This verse, however, is omitted in the parallel passage of St. Luke, neither is it found in the earlier Uncials or the Vulg., but first in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles and hence it has been omitted from the text of WH and RV (text, not margin). See Chase, Lord's Prayer, 168 ff.

The 'angels' hymn' (Lk 2<sup>14</sup>), Gloria in Excelsis, etc., has been made the foundation of another doxology by the addition of several non-biblical sentences. This, which is known liturgically as the 'greater doxology,' occurs in one of its forms in the Psalter of Codex A (LXX), while the 'lesser' (Gloria Patri, etc.) is wholly extra-biblical.

C. A. SCOTT.

DRACHMA.—See MONEY. DRAG.—See NET.

DRAGON.—Four Heb. words are rendered in AV by this fabulous name. 1. תַּנִּינ tannīn, dragons, the plural of tan, which latter is not used in Scripture. This word signifies a howler, and refers to a beast inhabiting the desert. RV tr. it in every instance. But in Is 13<sup>22</sup> 34<sup>13, 14</sup> it is found associated with יָחַיִּים (yayyim) which would seem to be the same as ibn-awa in Arab., vulgo wahwi. This animal is undoubtedly the jackal. It is clear that the same animal would not be mentioned twice in a short list of animals, and by two totally different names. We must therefore seek for another desert howler, than which none could fulfil the conditions better than the wolf. The Arab. word tinān is one of the names of the wolf. The LXX renders tannīm variously. Thus Job 30<sup>29</sup>, Is 34<sup>13</sup> 43<sup>20</sup> serpentes, Ps 44<sup>19</sup> kakawis, Is 13<sup>22</sup> exūoi, Jer 10<sup>22</sup> 49<sup>33</sup> στρουβοι, Jer 9<sup>11</sup> 14<sup>5</sup> 51<sup>57</sup>, Mic 1<sup>8</sup> δράκοντες. 2. תַּנִּינ tannīm, a singular form, which is probably a clerical slip for tan tannīm (Ezk 29<sup>3</sup> 32<sup>2</sup>), as the latter is the reading in several MSS. This is properly rendered dragon in both AV and RV of the first passage, and in RV of the second, where AV has whale in text and dragon in marg., the reference being to the crocodile, and applied to Pharaoh. 3. נָחַשׁ תַּנְּוֹת (Mal 1<sup>3</sup>), a fem. plural of tan, rendered by RV jackals, but preferably, for the reason given above (1), female wolves. 4. נָחַשׁ תַּנְּנִינִם, pl. tannīnīm. This word is the exact equivalent of the Arab. tannīn, pl. tannīn, which signifies 'a great serpent,' or 'a dragon,' or some mythical monster, of which it is said that it was two leagues in length of a colour like that of a leopard, with scales like those of a fish, two great fins, a head of the size of a hill, but in shape like a man's, two great ears, and two round eyes, and from its neck branched six other necks, every one nearly 20 cubits long, and every one with a head like a serpent. The LXX translates this δράκων, dragon, in every case except Gn 1<sup>2</sup>, where it is κῆτος, AV whales, RV sea digested seeds would account for the alimentary value (slight though it might be) of dove's dung. Furthermore, doves convey nourishment to their squabs by disgorging some of the undigested food from their crops. Some of the grains would certainly be spilled. In addition, the dung contains feathers, scales, and other debris. When it is remembered that such a quantity of glue, ground wood, and all manner of tainted garbage are greedily devoured by starving men, it is not strange, or beyond belief, that dove's dung was eaten in Samaria in the last agony of despair.

monsters. In AV (Job 7<sup>12</sup>) it is rendered whale, and in RV sea monster. It is applied to sea monsters under the name dragons, in AV and RV (Ps 74<sup>13</sup> 148<sup>7</sup>, Is 27<sup>1</sup>); and to land serpents, even of the smaller sort (Ex 7<sup>9, 10, 12</sup>, where it is tr. serpents [RVm 'Heb. tannin, any large reptile,'] Dt 32<sup>33</sup>, Ps 91<sup>13</sup>, where it is tr. in AV dragon, and in RV serpent). In every case it might have been translated 'dragon' as in LXX (see SERPENT, 2). It is applied metaphorically to Pharaoh (Ps 74<sup>13</sup>, Is 51<sup>9</sup>; cf. חַיָּים (2) above). In the comparison of Nebuchadnezzar with a dragon (Jer 51<sup>34</sup>), we may still imagine the reference to be to a crocodile, which may well have existed in the Euphrates at that time.

The word תַּנִּינִים (tannin (La 4<sup>3</sup>) is either the Aram. form of תַּנִּינִים tannim or a textual error for it (Siegfr. Stade), or a defective script for תַּנִּינִים (Löhr). It is rendered in AV sea monsters, and in RV jackals. The reference is prob. to some fierce desert mammalian. The same objection obtains to the jackal as that stated in the case of תַּנִּינִים (1). The word is preferably rendered wolves. It might, as in AV, refer to some cetacean sea monster were it not for the comparison with the ostrich, which would seem to imply that it was a land animal.

In NT the word dragon (Rev 12<sup>3a</sup>) clearly refers to a symbolical, serpent-like monster. Modifications of this ideal have obtained credence in the legends of almost all civilized nations. Dragons of all shapes and sizes have been described and figured, and their lairs are still pointed out in every land. Representations of them are found on coins, in pictures, sculptures, and even on the banners of nations, as on that of China to-day. Dragon worship has prevailed in many lands. The serpent of Gn 3 was transformed ultimately into the 'old serpent called the Devil and Satan' (Rev 20<sup>2</sup>). Apollo slew the Python. The story of Bel and the Dragon shows how the idea of this monster was lodged in the Hebrew mind. G. E. POST.

DRAGON'S WELL.—See JERUSALEM and WELL.

DRAM.—See MONEY.

DRAUGHT, DRAUGHT HOUSE.—The 'draught' (ἀφειδρῶν) of Mt 15<sup>17</sup>, Mk 7<sup>19</sup> is a privy, as in Burton, Anat. of Mel. 165: 'Muck hills, draughts, sinks, where any carcasses or carrion lies.' And the 'd. house' (מִתְחַבֵּה) of 2 K 10<sup>27</sup> is the same (lit. 'place of hārī,' see p. 620 n.); Cov. 'prevy house.' In earlier writers this and other words in ugh are generally spelt with f (see Earle, Philology, § 153); Wyclif's tr. of Ps 40<sup>3</sup> 'he ledde out me fro the lake of wretchidnesse, and fro the filthe of drafft.'

J. HASTINGS.

DRAW.—In mod. usage 'draw' is too mild a word for the action expressed by שָׁחַב shāḥab, in Jer 49<sup>20</sup> 50<sup>45</sup> (RV 'draw out'); or by שָׁחַב in Ac 14<sup>19</sup> 'having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city' (RV 'dragged'), 17<sup>8</sup> 'they drew Jason and certain men unto the rulers of the city' (RV 'dragged'); Rev 12<sup>4</sup> 'his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth' (RV 'draweth'); or by שָׁחַב in Ac 16<sup>19</sup> 'they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the marketplace' (RV 'dragged'); 21<sup>30</sup> 'they took Paul and drew him out of the temple' (RV 'dragged'). In older Engr. 'draw' had a stronger sense than now; the verb to 'drag,' which sprang from the same Anglo-Saxon dragan, having in course of time carried off some of its strength. Cf. Spenser, F.Q. II. v. 23—and fowly battered his comely corse.

He ca-
Drew

J. HASTINGS.

DRAWER OF WATER (מִנְיָן מַעֲבֵד).—According to Jos 9<sup>21, 23, 27</sup> the 'drawing' drudgery of bringing water for the service of the sanctuary, coupled with the 'drawing' of the 'rod,' was the price paid by the 'Gibeonites' allowed to live (cf. Dt 29<sup>11</sup> and Driver's note there). The business of carrying water to the different houses in a town or village is one of the humblest and most poorly paid in Oriental life. It requires little skill or capital. The water is carried in a goat-skin, slung on the back; or two skins are loaded, one on each side of a small donkey, usually driven along by an infirm old man. His clothes are splashed and soiled; the fountain is often some distance away, and on account of the number of women impatiently waiting to fill each one her jar in turn, he has often to bring some of the water at night or very early in the morning. He is engaged continually in what the Samaritan woman found irksome even as an occasional duty (Jn 4<sup>15</sup>).

CARRIER AND WINE-SKIN.

G. M. MACKIE.

DREAD, DREADFUL.—1. These words have gained in intensity during their history. Bp. Fisher says: 'I well perceived it in myself, but all too late, I dread me'; and it once was possible to say 'without dread' for 'without doubt,' as in Chaucer (?) Rom. of Rose, B. 2199—

'For certainly, withouten drede,
A cherle is deemed by his dede.'

By 1611 the word had gained somewhat of its present strength, so that 'fear' is used in AV where 'dread' was used by Wyclif, as Mt 2<sup>2</sup> 'he hirde that Archilaus regnede in Judee for Eroude, his fadir, and dredde to go thidir'; 14<sup>5</sup> 21<sup>46</sup> 'thei dredden the puple'; Lk 2<sup>9</sup> 'thei dredden with great drede' (AV 'they were sore afraid'). But even in AV dread is used with scarce more intensity than modern 'fear,' as 1 Ch 22<sup>13</sup> 'dread not, nor be dismayed' (אִלִּיץ, RV 'fear not'). 2. But the change is not in intensity only; there is also a change in quality. We may still say that we fear God, but we must not say that we dread Him, or that He is our dread, as in Is 8<sup>13</sup> 'let him be your fear, and let him be your dread' (אִתְּכֶם מִתְּרָאָה וּמִתְּפֹאֶה), for 'dread' has lost the sense of 'awe,' or 'reverential fear' it once possessed, and signifies that which shocks or terrifies. Jacob's exclamation, Gn 28<sup>17</sup> 'how dreadful is this place,' conveys a wrong impression to our ears; 'awful' would be a nearer word now. So in Dn 9<sup>4</sup> 'the great and dreadful God.' Dreadful in AV is simply that which may be feared, as Wis 10<sup>18</sup> 'd. kings' (φοβερός, RV 'terrible'); 17<sup>8</sup> 'a fire kindled by itself, very d.' (ἀβρομαρή πυρὶς ἑαυτῇ ἐκείνη, RV 'full of fear'). Cf. Act. Henry VIII. (1513), 'by lawes dredful and penall, to take awaye, purg, and clesne this his highnes realme.'

J. HASTINGS.

DREAMS are regarded by men in the lowest stage of culture as objective realities, and all dreams are to them equally true: in the case of every dream the savage believes that he really visits the places he dreams of, or is visited by the persons of whom he dreams. Hence those savages whose gods are, for instance, animal-totems, believe that when they dream of the animal they have been visited by the god: thus the young Red Indian adopts as his manitou the animal of which he dreams during his puberty-fast. A person who is visited by frequent dreams is called a medium between men and gods: the Zulus term a person thus chosen 'a house of dreams.' For the purpose of obtaining communications of this kind, dreams are induced by artificial means, e.g. by fasting or the use of drugs. Then dreams come to be considered less as objective experiences than as visions, warnings, revelations of the future sent by the gods. Such revelations may be sought, e.g. as by those who visited and slept in the cave of Trophonius for the express purpose of obtaining supernatural communications, or by the Pythia at Delphi, or, e.g., the dream sent by Zeus to Agamemnon in the Iliad (ii. 1-34), or that of Xerxes described by Herodotus (vii. 12). To Homer and Herodotus it seems quite natural that the gods should, to accomplish their larger ends, send dreams to the individual which are intended to deceive him, and the dreams of Agamemnon and Xerxes are deceptive dreams of this kind. But to the deeper spiritual insight of Plato it appears a manifest impossibility, a violation, so to speak, of the laws of religious thought, that a god should deceive men in any way (Rep. 382 E), whether by waking visions or by dreams in the night; while at the same time he does not deny that dreams may come from the gods, and elsewhere (Tim. cc. 46 and 47) he assigns a prophetic character to some dreams. But side by side with this, the religious view of dreams, there existed and exists the superstitious view: the religious view discriminates between dreams (which are sub-conscious states) just as it discriminates between our waking states of full consciousness, and marks off some of them as moments in which the spirit of man is in direct communication with his god; the superstitious view, however, makes no such discrimination, it regards all dreams as omens, none as having a religious import. Its object is not to know the will of God, but to forecast the future; and its method of doing so is neither religious nor scientific;—not religious, for it makes no attempt humbly to approach the throne of heavenly grace; and not scientific, because for the patient study of the laws by which God rules the universe it substitutes a system of jumping at conclusions. It applies to dreams the same mode of interpretation as to other omens: it blindly assumes that things casually connected in thought are causally connected in fact, and draws its erroneous conclusions accordingly. These illogical processes frequently become developed into regular codes of interpretation (as, for instance, among the Arabs, the Persians, and in the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus) by means of which anyone can interpret his own dreams, and thus the uneducated classes in a civilized people relapse into a stage of thought as low as that of the savage.

Assuming it, for the moment, to be true that the state of partial consciousness which we call dreaming may, in exceptional cases, be chosen as the moment for divine communications to man, we see from the above sketch that the human race generally has reached the truth only after, and in consequence of, making many mistakes, just as Kepler invented and rejected fourteen theories to account for the apparent position of Mars before he hit upon the right one, and just as the path of every science is strewn with the ruins of abandoned hypotheses. In the first place, it arises whether the Jews also error into truth. In the first place, dreams are recorded both in NT (Mt 1<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>13-20</sup>) and in OT (Dn 2<sup>28</sup>) which are expressly said to be communications from God; though it is only in OT, and there only in Gn (28<sup>12</sup>, Jacob's ladder), that God is said to appear Himself. In the next place there are dreams recorded (e.g. those of the chief butler and baker and of Pharaoh, Gn 40 and 41) which, though prophetic, are not expressly said to come from God; indeed, from Gn 40<sup>8</sup> it is clear that in the case of such dreams it is 'interpretations' that belong to God. Third, all the dreams actually recorded in the Bible are dreams which came unsought, but the words of Saul (1 S 28<sup>15</sup> 'God is departed from me and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams') seem to indicate the existence of the practice (whether approved or disapproved of by the higher religious consciousness of the community) of deliberately seeking supernatural dreams, as they were sought in the cave of Trophonius. Fourth, it would appear from Jer 27<sup>9</sup> that there was amongst the Israelites a tendency, which the prophets opposed, to regard the mere dreaming of dreams as itself an indication that the dreamer was a chosen medium of divine communications, as the Zulus regard the use of dreams 'as a chosen medium also. (1.) On the other hand, we do not find in the Bible any traces of the superstitious interpretation of dreams such as was known to the Arabs; on the contrary, Joseph declares (Gn 40<sup>8</sup>) with emphasis that 'interpretations belong to God'; and we do not find that dreams, when sought, were induced by artificial means. Thus, to sum up, on the one hand the Scriptures start from a spiritual height to which the religious consciousness of the heathen would attain only after a long course of evolution, and then only in the case of an isolated genius like Plato; on the other hand, there are indications that the Israelites passed through several of the same stages of error as the rest of mankind.

Thus far we have said nothing of the psychological and physiological laws of dreams. The connexion between our states and dreams is recognized in practice if not in theory by the savage who induces dreams by fasting or the use of drugs. Civilized man, even in the prescientific period, further recognizes that the experiences of the day furnish most of the material for our fancies of the night: dreams, says Lily, 'come either by things we see in the day or meates that we eat'; Herodotus makes Artabanus explain Xerxes' dream as due to his anxiety about his projected invasion of Greece; and the dream of Pharaoh may similarly have been due to the anxiety which a 'low Nile' must cause in any one responsible for the government of Egypt. Hippocrates discovered that certain diseases announce their approach by disturbing dreams, and modern medical science confirms the discovery. Without going further into the physiological theory of dreams, we may note that the ordinary concomitant of dreaming is probably an excessive or a deficient supply of blood to the brain. Now, the recognition of this fact that dreaming has its laws, combined with the belief that some dreams are supernatural communications, sometimes leads to the statement that some dreams are sent by God, some (most) not; and this statement conveys a truth in a form open to serious misapprehension. It may be taken to imply two things, both false, viz. (1) that dreams which happen according to natural laws are not part of God's will and design; (2) that dreams which are divine are irreconcilable with the laws by which He governs the universe. A less misleading way of stating the facts would seem to be to say that His laws act in such a way that we find ourselves at some times in closer communion with Him than at others. All our states of consciousness (whether of complete or of partial consciousness) have their psychological laws and also their physical counterparts in the chemical processes of the brain and nervous tissue; the mental processes which issued in the Iliad or Hamlet were all in accordance with psychological laws, and all had their physiological counterparts. So, too, every process of reasoning has its psychological and physiological laws, but we do not consider that this fact impedes us in any way from distinguishing good reasoning from bad, or that it prevents us from recognizing the truth when it is presented to us, or that any study of either of those sciences will enable us to dispense with logic or supply us with a better means of distinguishing, say, between a correct syllogistic inference and an illicit process of the minor. Logic already affords us. So, too, the fact that our states of partial consciousness are all under law—physiological and psychological—does not constitute any impediment to our distinguishing those states which do from those states which do not possess the characteristics of divine revelations; nor can it impeach the validity of the distinction thus drawn by the religious consciousness of mankind, Christian, Jew, and Gentile, any more than it can impeach the validity drawn by logic between correct and incorrect inferences. The question is one of fact. Do sub-conscious states, possessing the characteristics of divine revelations, occur? And to recognize those states is the prerogative of the religious consciousness. If it be said that in the waking state such recognition is possible, but not in a state of partial consciousness, we must inquire on what grounds the statement is made. If on the ground that our sub-conscious states are under physiological laws, then our reply is that so also are states of complete consciousness. If on the ground that in a state of partial consciousness the very faculty whose function is recognition of the kind in question may be dormant, to this our reply is that in the vast number of cases it undoubtedly is dormant; but just as Condorcet, in an exceptional abnormal condition, could, in sub-conscious sleep, work out a mathematical problem which awake he could not solve, and just as Coleridge could compose in sleep the poem of Kubla Khan, so in abnormal cases the power of spiritual perception, relieved from the hindrance of external sensations, may conceivably be exalted to a pitch of exaltation as far above its ordinary degree of activity and receptivity as the inspiration of Coleridge or the mathematical reasoning of Condorcet was in the cases alluded to. 'The fact that all or most men suppose some significance in dreams constitutes a ground for believing that the supposition is based on experience' (Aristotle, Div. per Somn. i.).

LITERATURE.—CUNNINGHAM, Mental Physiology; Clodd, Myths and Legends; F. B. JEVONS, Natural History of Imagination (1883).

DRESS.—To 'dress' (fr. Lat. directus, through old Fr. dresser) is in meaning as in deriv. the same as 'direct.' Thus Wyclif translates Ps 58 'dresse thou my weie in thi sight,' 40<sup>2</sup> 'he dresside my goyngis'; Lk 17<sup>2</sup> 'to dresse oure feet in to the weie of pees.' (Cf. the use still of 'dress' as a military technical term.) In AV the word is used in the general sense of 'put right,' much as we now use 'do.' Indeed the Heb. most freq. translated 'dress' is the ordinary verb 'to do' (עָשָׂה asâh), Gn 18<sup>7-8</sup> a calf for food; Lv 7<sup>9</sup> meat-offering, 'dressed in the frying-pan,' 1 S 25<sup>18</sup> sheep for food, 2 S 12<sup>4</sup> a lamb for food, 13<sup>7</sup> meat, 19<sup>24</sup> the feet = wash, 1 K 17<sup>12</sup> a cake, 18<sup>23, 25, 26</sup> a bullock for sacrifice. The other words are עָשָׂה asâh, to 'work,' Gn 2<sup>15</sup> the garden of Eden (in 2<sup>5</sup> tr. 'till'), Dt 28<sup>30</sup> vineyards; cf. Lk 13<sup>7</sup> ἀμπελουργός, AV 'dresser of his vineyard,' RV 'vinedresser'; γεωργίου ἐσθλου, Sir 27<sup>8</sup>, AV 'if the tree have been dressed,' RV 'the husbandry,' as in 1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>; γεωργέω He 6<sup>7</sup>, AV 'dress,' RV 'till'; עָשָׂה asâh, 'prepare' (lit. 'do good to'), Ex 30<sup>7</sup> lamps. Cf. Tindale, Works, p. 453: 'The lampe must be dressed and snuffed dayly.' RV gives 'dresser' for AV 'gatherer' Am 7<sup>14</sup> (עָשָׂה, see Driver's note).

J. HASTINGS.

DRESS.—The study of Oriental dress serves to explain particular allusions to clothing in the Bible; it is a fresh interest to the narrative by presenting to the eye a picture of those written about; and a knowledge of the various articles of costume and of Oriental usage and sentiment connected with them, it enables us to follow the sacred writers into the figurative meanings they sought to convey when common facts about the outward garments were applied to the clothing of the inner man. Special attention is rendered necessary by the fact that while the general character of Oriental dress is recognized by all, it is often difficult to pronounce upon particular articles as to origin, material, and usage. In this respect the subject resembles that of Pal. architecture, inasmuch as an ancient wall may have stones of Phœnician, Jewish, Greek, Roman, Saracenic, and Crusading styles, and yet the experienced archaeologist may have much difficulty in naming the builder and assigning the date of actual construction. So with regard to dress, amid certain features that were characteristic of Israel, the separated people copied largely from the customs of Canaan, Egypt, Babylon, Greece, and Rome. The chief points of inquiry are those that deal with 1. Materials of Dress; 2. Articles of Dress; 3. Oriental Custom and thought about Dress.

1. MATERIALS OF DRESS.—The ewe (1) wool and hair; (2) linen and cotton; (3) silk. 1. Wool (צֶמֶר, Hair (שֵׁער). One of the earliest forms of clothing in the East would be that of a sheepskin worn as a vest or jacket, or in the larger form of a cloak made of several sewn together, with the wool left on. These are still in use with the wool either inside or outside. The next stage was the removal of the wool and the art of weaving (which see). Sheep-shearing is mentioned in Gn 31<sup>19</sup> 38<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>24</sup>, 2 S 13<sup>18</sup> etc. The hair of the goat has also been used from time immemorial, especially for material that had to bear much exposure and strain. The shepherds' tents are made of it, also bags for holding grain and flour. Hence it is called sackcloth (שֵׂעִיר). The hair of the camel was also manufactured into cloth, rougher than that made from wool, but softer than sackcloth. At present it is largely employed for cloaks and rugs, and naturally for camel-harness. The term צֶמֶר (1 K 19<sup>13, 19</sup>, 2 K 2<sup>13</sup>, Jos 7<sup>21, 24</sup>, Jon 3<sup>6</sup>) may either indicate that the cloak was originally taken from a skin, or may be simply descriptive of its size. The combination שֵׂעִיר צֶמֶר occurs Gn 25<sup>25</sup>, Zec 13<sup>4</sup>.

2. Cotton, Linen, שֵׁט (Arab. shat), צִמְצִימָה, בָּזָז (Arab. bazz), בִּלְלוֹס (Arab. billos), אֲלֵנוֹס. The warmth of the Oriental climate and the advance of civilization bringing more of indoor-life and social gratification tended to create a widespread demand for this manufacture. Egypt and Syria sent their merchandise of linen and brodered goods to Tyre, Ezk 27<sup>16</sup>. The Indian source of supply is preserved in the Arab. name Shesh-Hindi (Indian cambric). The word karpas (of Persian origin) should also be translated 'cotton' in Est 1<sup>6</sup>. See COTTON. Cotton and linen were not carefully distinguished. At the present day the Indian cotton cloth with stamped bright patterns, used for hangings and dados, is very like the linen of the Egyptian mummy-cloths. For the Israelites it was enough to know that those stuffs were both of vegetable fibre, and not of wool. The mixture of wool and linen was called linen (Dt 22<sup>11</sup>, Lv 19<sup>19</sup> only), a word of uncertain (perhaps Egyptian) origin (see Driver, ad loc.). Garments made of it were forbidden to the Israelites.

3. Silk. שֵׁשׁ * Ezk 16<sup>10, 13</sup>, σηρικόν, Rev 18<sup>12</sup> (from Σήρες, the name of an Indian people from whom, acc. to Strabo [516, 701], the ancients got the first silk). A common name for silk in Arabic is harir, a word whose derivation is most uncertain (see Fränkel, Aram. Fremdwörter, 39. In Pr 31<sup>22</sup> AV incorrectly gives 'silk' as tr of שֵׁשׁ (RV correctly 'fine linen').

II. ARTICLES OF DRESS.—1. Shirt, Sheet, Linen Garment (שָׂרָת sārāt, σινδών, Jg 14<sup>12, 13</sup>, Pr 31<sup>24</sup>, Is 3<sup>23</sup>, 1 Mac 10<sup>14</sup>, Mk 14<sup>51</sup>). This was worn next to the body, and was nearest in purpose to the first coverings mentioned in Gn 3<sup>7-21</sup>. When it appears as the only garment, it is a cotton or linen wrapper of various sizes. Once representing all, it continued to give something of its character to all the other articles of Oriental dress. It would be the waist-cloth of the Israelites in the brick-fields of Egypt as shown in the monuments, a towel, white or coloured, wrapped tightly round the loins or reaching down towards the knees. Of similar material and shape, though somewhat larger, it was worn in Palestine by boatmen, fishermen, wood-sawyers, and drawers of water. It was also found as a simple large sheet thrown round the body (Mk 14<sup>51</sup>), with an end flung over the shoulder, with or without a girdle.

When worn with other garments it took the form of a night shirt, of white cotton or linen, or coarse silk, reaching below the knees. It was made by town under conditions of trade and agriculture. The alterations consisted in having the entire front cut open, long sleeves attached, and the shape more adapted to the figure. The two fronts were drawn tightly round the body overlapping each other, and the waist was firmly bound with a belt or sash. It thus resembled a camsock or dressing-gown. From the fact of its covering and supplementing the shirt, and being like it in form, it was obviously meant to be superior to it in material and appearance. It was most frequently taking a long piece of the material and folding it into two equal lengths, with the sides sewn up, and holes at the top corners for the arms, or with sleeves inserted. At the present day it is usually sold without any opening for the head. This is the proof that it is new, and allows the purchaser to please himself as to whether the opening is to be small or large, plain or ornamental. It is the same for men and women, the latter requiring a larger opening for convenience in nursing. Anyone wearing only the shirt is called naked (Jn 21<sup>7</sup>). It is undress.

COAT (Kethoneth).

EGYPTIAN LOIN-CLOTH AND SYRIAN SHIRT.

2. Coat (שָׂרָת kethoneth, χιτών, tunica). The shirt passed by easy transition to the tunic-coat or second garment. It completed the indoor costume for family life, the shop, and familiar outdoor surroundings. It was not needed in the simple privacy of pastoral or Bedawi life, and its presence marked the change to the life of the village and made of striped and bright-coloured cotton or linen, and sometimes of woollen cloth. The overlapping front confined by the girdle formed a recess for carrying any small parcel, such as bread for the journey. A slit was made on each side of the skirt, about a foot long, so as to allow greater freedom in walking. See COAT.

* 'Silk' is accepted by Siegfried-Stade as the meaning of שֵׁשׁ, but A. B. Davidson (Comm. ad loc.) doubts if silk was worn as early as the time of Ezekiel. 'The LXX (σηρικόν) and ancients thought of some very thin and delicate material. The kind of garment was probably some large wrapper or veil covering the whole person.'

3. Cloak (מִעָלָה mē-ālāh, ἵμας himas, ῥάβδος rabdos; Arab. jubbah, meshlah, abdal). — The outermost garment was distinguished by its greater size, and the absence of the girdle. There was much variety in shape, quality, and material caused by the social position of the wearer and the style of Babylonia, Egypt, or Syria, which it most resembled. It was called ῥάβδος, ῥάβδος, from its length; ῥάβδος, ῥάβδος, from its enveloping fulness. Hence it represents clothing generally, and is translated 'apparel', 'raiment', 'vesture', 'attire', etc. To it especially refer the expressions 'changes of raiment', 'suits of apparel.' Two varieties may be distinguished. (a) מִעָלָה, מִעָלָה. This was a long loose robe with very wide sleeves worn over the belted coat and shirt. It was a dress that expressed authority, culture, and distinction, and was considered the mark of the priestly, educated, and rich classes. It resembled (2) in length, and was as much superior to it as it was to the shirt. While a public dress, it was of lighter and more ornamental material than the square simlâh, which was peculiar to the outdoor cloak. It was the dress of the professions (1 Ch 15<sup>27</sup>, 1 S 21<sup>15</sup>), the mark of high rank and station (1 S 18<sup>4</sup> 24<sup>15</sup>), the מַחְלָאזָאֵה mahḥalāzāh, suit of ḥalāz of the Hebrews (Is 3<sup>22</sup>, Zec 3<sup>4</sup>), the ṭhaub of the Arabs. In Egypt it is sometimes worn as a long black surplice, but usually it is open and unconfined. Such was the robe of the Ephod with its fringes and bells swaying with the motion of the figure. The Jewish tallith and the Arabic burnous resemble it in ornamental lightness, but the stripes of the one and the form of the other point rather to the simlâh. It was worn by Saul (1 S 24<sup>4</sup>), was given by Jonathan to David (1 S 18<sup>4</sup>), was the long robe of the Pharisees (Lk 20<sup>46</sup>), and of those 'arrayed in white robes' (Rev 7<sup>13</sup>). It was always emblematic of social intercourse and high rank. It was the full dress of ancient times. At present in Syria it is almost confined to the Oriental clergy, and to Moslems of the official and merchant classes, the latter often having it faced and partly lined with soft fur. Joseph's coat (כֶּתֶם ketēm) was most likely an open long mē'ûl. It was an unusual article of pastoral or Bedawidress, which generally comprises the shirt with belt, and the square cloak or simlâh of wool or haircloth, with frequently a sheepskin vest between. Such a special garment worn by Joseph would be a mark of favour and an occasion of jealous comparison. The coat (RV 'robe'), 1 S 21<sup>10</sup>, annually brought to Samuel would also be of this sort.

CLOAK OR ROBE (Mē'ûl, στελή).

(5) שִׁמְלָה simlâh, ἱμάτιον. This was the largest and heaviest article of Oriental dress, being the dress of travel, of the shepherd, worn for protection against cold and rain, and used as a covering during sleep (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>). It consisted of a piece of cloth about 7 ft. from right to left, and 4½ from top to bottom. A width of 1½ ft. was folded in at each side, and sewn along the top, with a slit at each top corner through which the hand and wrist could pass. The garment thus losing about 1½ ft. on each side. Usually, two pieces, each 7 ft. long, were sewn together to make the block material, and the over-sewing joining is seen running across the back. The finest kind, however, is made of one entire piece. Such, as was Christ's 'garment without seam' (ἵματιον ἄρτον), Gn 25<sup>23</sup>, may have been a simlâh. The Arabs call their black tents houses of hair, and the term usually signifies cloth of camel or goat hair from the sheep's wool. Cloaks of camel hair are common at the present day, those made in the neighbourhood of ancient Cilicia having a rough surface like that of Scotch shooting tweed, but much firmer and heavier in the make. They are often of a coppery-brown colour, and the comparison in Gn 25<sup>23</sup> would be easily suggested. They are also made of wether's hair. Ornamentation of coloured silk or red wool is frequently sewn upon the neck, front, and back. The general surface is often further relieved by its being woven in stripes of darker and lighter, or black and white.

CLOAK (Simlâh, ἱμάτιον).

SIMLÂH AS WORN.

In the ordinary simlâh of the Syrian shepherd and farmer this is the most characteristic feature. Elijah's mantle and John the Baptist's raiment were of the square cloak pattern. The Bab. garment in Jericho was an ornamental one, possibly of crimson colour, like those described in Ezk 23<sup>15</sup>. The large outer garments of shepherds on the hills and inward plains is often made of sheep skins with the fleece left on; but as frequently this is a vest, and the ordinary cloak is worn over it. See CLOKE.

SHEEPSKIN COAT.

4. Breeches of linen (כִּתְמֵי מִכְנֵשֶׁל בָּד, Ex 28<sup>42</sup>; סַרְבָּלִין sarbdlin, Dn 3<sup>21</sup>; RV hosen; Ges. Thes. 'vel feminalia vel pallia'). The first word indicates that which is drawn together, that is, by the waist-cord passing inside the hem of the gathiers. The second means most likely the Persian divided skirt or loose trousers, Arab. sirwâl, as the principal article of the common dress when such trousers are worn. In modern Arab. it is called libās = 'clothing,' for the same reason. It was evidently a modification of the long shirt or tunic-coat, dividing it into two parts at the belt, the upper part being a short Zouave jacket, often highly ornamented, and the lower part being the ṣarbālīn, 'hosen.' A long piece of cloth was made into a wide open bag by sewing up the bottom, except a hole at each corner for the feet to pass through. The upper edge was hemmed, and drawn together by a cord or sash within the hem. A mass of plaited cloth thus hung down between the knees, and even trailed between the feet, as a sign of leisure and luxury. During active exercise, such as hoeing, walking, running, these folds were tucked up under the belt in front or behind or at the sides. This was to have the loins girt.

TRANSITION FROM 'KETHŌNETH' TO 'SARBĀLĪN.'

5. Girdle. 1. ḥiṭ 1 S 18<sup>4</sup>. 2. abnēt, only of high priest or a high official, Ex 28<sup>4</sup>, Is 22<sup>21</sup>, prob. a sash wound round the waist several times and falling to the feet; cf. Stade, ThL (1894), p. 236; Jos. Ant. III. vii. 2. 3. ḥiṭ 'waistband,' see W. R. Smith as quoted in Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., also Expos. Times, iii. (1893), 243, 256. The girdle was worn over (1) and (2), and was sometimes a cord, often a leather belt as now worn by Eastern monks. For the purse arrangement in it, see BAG. The girdle braced the hip-joints for prolonged exertion, and under it the hanging skirts were drawn up. It served to hold the ink-horn of the scribe, with its box of atramentum or black fluid, soaked up into sponge or pith, and its case for holding reed pens. The sash was the order of the garter in Oriental costume, the ends being richly ornamented with needlework in silk and gold (see poses of activity, although the Bedawin occasionally apply it to this purpose. The simlāh, cloak, was then rather folded over the arm, or thrown over the shoulder, or laid aside, as at the stoning of Stephen. But when a large bundle had to be carried a considerable distance, the cloak was drawn up somewhat, and the belt fastened tightly around it over the waist, thus forming a large pouch or sack behind. This was prob. the way in which the Israelites carried their kneading-troughs (Ex 12<sup>34</sup>).

1. LOINS GIRT.

2. GIRDLE WITH INKHORN.

6. Head-dress; AV Bonnet, RV Head-tire (קִנְיָה migbālāh (see BONNET); פָּאָר pā'ēr, Is 3<sup>20</sup>; צִנִּיף ṣānīph, Is 3<sup>23</sup>). The head-dress of the Israelites in early pastoral times would be the same as that which is worn by their successors the Bedawin. It is a piece of cotton or linen, white, blue, or black, or of brightly coloured silk, about a yard square, folded diagonally, and laid on the head so as to screen the eyes, protect the cheek-bones and the back of the neck. It is held in its place by a cord (חֵטִי Gn 38<sup>18</sup>) of soft elastic wool, usually dark brown or black, or of twisted cotton whipped with threads of silk and gold, coiled in several rings tightly round the head, making a covering at once picturesque, comfortable, and protective. The rich colours of the Bab. head-dress are described as 'dyed attire,' מְבֻיָּלִים (Ezk 23<sup>15</sup>). The article is now called kufiyeh (from the town of Kufah). Afterwards a skull-cap came to be worn, with a napkin usually white, or white with gold thread, folded into a long band and wound round it. In 1 K 30<sup>38, 41</sup> the head-band is drawn over the face to conceal the features, after the manner of Bedawin robbers. The מְבֻיָּלִים of Dn 3<sup>21</sup> (RV tunics, RVm turbans, MALE HEAD-DRESS (1. PASTORAL. 2. PERSIAN. 3. SYRIAN PEASANT).

EMBROIDERY. The military girdle (2 S 20<sup>8</sup>) was a baldrick, often set with gems. The girdle was not used to bind up the loose outer garment for pur-see Bevan, ad loc.) may have been the Persian fez, named from the mould in which the felt was pressed. In the case of the royal crown the cord of the original head-dress was represented by the gold circlet, and the scarf by the cap of cloth and the coronation veil. For military head-dress see HELMET.

7. Border, Hem, Skirt (תָּבִיחַ kānāph, 1 S 24<sup>4</sup>; שָׁוֶה shāl, Ex 39<sup>4</sup>; κρᾶσμενον, Mt 9<sup>20</sup>). The outer garment had four cords with tassels (תָּבִיחַ qizith, Nu 15<sup>38</sup>, תָּבִיחַ Dt 22<sup>12</sup>, see Driver's note) at the corners. To make the border and fringes large and conspicuous was part of the Pharisaic form (Mt 23<sup>5</sup>). The corner fringes are seen on the large tallith of synagogue worship, and on the small one of white cotton worn like an unseen ephod next to the shirt. In the large tallith, about 2 yds. sq., of white cotton or wool with black border or stripes, a sq. inch of coloured silk is sown on each corner inside, and through a hole made precisely in the middle of the patch, so as to make the opening a mathematical corner, there is passed a cord composed of eight threads and five knots. This, with the numerical value of תָּבִיחַ, 600, makes up 613, the rabbinical number of commandments in the Law. During worship the tassel is taken in the hand and raised to the lips. The history and significance of the Fringes will be found fully discussed under the art. FRINGES, vol. ii. p. 68<sup>b</sup>; see also the literature cited there.

FRINGES.

8. Napkin (συνδελιον, Lk 19<sup>20</sup>, Jn 20<sup>7</sup>, Ac 19<sup>12</sup>). In a climate like that of Palestine the need of a napkin was occasioned not by cold so much as by dust and heat, as its name implies. At the present day it is used to wipe the face and the back of the hands, and is often partly folded in around the neck to protect the collar of the coat from perspiration and to give coolness. The same name is given by the Arabs to the small cotton cap which they wear under the woollen fez, and call an arklyeh (sweat-cloth).

9. Sandals (סַנְדָּלִים, סַנְדָּל, סַנְדָּל, σανδάλια, Mk 6<sup>9</sup>, Ac 12<sup>9</sup>). The primitive shoe or sandal was a flat sole of leather, wood, or matted grass with loops attached, through which the shoe-latchet, a leather thong, passed and strapped in the foot. The Arab. na'al means the sole of the shoe, as being the principal part, thus pointing to the sandal origin. Even with the shoes or slippers of red, black, and yellow leather in common usage, the ancient habits survive, as the natives like to bend down the leather behind the heel, and make it more like a sandal. The wooden sandal in very common use has a strap nailed on to hold the foot across the toes, showing the beginning of the upper. Those worn by brides at the marriage feast are made 7 or 8 inches high to give the dignity of the cothurnus. Sandals are removed when entering a house or church, or any place where prayer is offered. The shoe being associated with outside defilement, and being the lowest article of dress, is used as an epithet of contempt and vituperation, and as an implement of beating. Socks are seldom worn, and in walking the shoe is often removed, or the foot with the shoe on is held up to shake out the dust.

10. Female Dress. This so far resembled male attire as to make interchange possible and prohibited, Dt 22<sup>5</sup>. There was the šaddin or shirt-dress, Is 3<sup>23</sup>; over it a kēthōneth or tunic-robe, Ca 5<sup>8</sup>, bound with a girdle, Is 3<sup>24</sup>. Over this, ladies of nobility wore an ungrided mē'il or robe after the pattern of יֹאֲכָבֶד's 'coat,' 2 S 13<sup>18</sup>. Social life made it possible also for women to have festival robes (AV 'changeable suits of apparel,' Is 3<sup>22</sup>). There is mention of turbans, ornamental bands of silk, or embroidered linen, Is 3<sup>23</sup>, probably rather deeper than those commonly worn by men. Another ornamental head-dress is described by the term used for the priestly head-dress, כִּטְיָה. These must have been very elaborate, judging from those of the Egyptian monument, and the tardiness with which the metal head-bowl and horn (Arab. tantur) were given up by the women of Syria in modern times. The horn was worn erect, day and night, the veil of a widow being black, others white.

ELEVATED HORN.

The chief articles of specially fem. attire were the veils and mantles. There were muflers (מַפְלֵר, Is 3<sup>29</sup>, thin face-veils like gauze mesh and nun's-veiling, the former brightly coloured with floral designs, used for the face and breast (Arab. barla'a, mandil)).

It is impossible to say precisely what sort of mantle-robe the מַנְטֵל mantle, Is 3<sup>22</sup>, may have been. The שַׁוְיָה shawls (AV wimples), Is 3<sup>22</sup>, were large veils of white lace, or tough muslin (white or indigo at present), worn over the head and falling down the back. Those worn by Bedawi and peasant women are often used for carrying grass, vegetables, or various parcels, Ru 3<sup>14</sup>.

The veils (וֵילִים Is 3<sup>22</sup>) were the largest enveloping veils, now called by the Arabs izars, made of white cotton, black twilled silk, or rich silk stuffs of the brightest colours and of highly ornamental for women, and the love of respectful attention and dignity makes the third equally so for men.

FACE VEILS (1. SYRIAN MOSLEM. 2. EGYPTIAN. 3. LEBANON DRUZE).

patterns. This veil is one of the most familiar objects in the streets of Eastern towns. About the caul (RVm 'networks,' מְרִירִים Is 3<sup>8</sup>) there is no certainty; possibly it was a light netted veil covering the hair and falling over the shoulders, set with tiny discs of silver and gold and other pendants, something like what is still worn. So with regard to stomacher (מְרִירִים), Is 3<sup>24</sup>; as the antithesis suggests some sort of girdle, highly or even fantastically ornamental in contrast with sackcloth, it may have been the loose apron-sash with dangling ribbons and attachments worn by dancing girls.

HEAD AND BACK VEIL (Mitpahath).

LARGE VEIL (Raddid).

III. ORIENTAL CUSTOM AND THOUGHT CONCERNING DRESS.—Food and clothing are the two great requisites of the natural life, 1 Ti 6<sup>8</sup>. Clothing is the second necessity. Of its three services, protection, decency, and ornament, the warmth of the climate of Palestine causes the first to be less important than it is in colder countries, while the domestic customs make the second very important Clothing distinguishes man from the beast. 'To be unclothed' is not merely to suffer cold, but 'to be found naked' (2 Co 5<sup>3</sup>). The phrase 'naked, and ye clothed me' (Mt 25<sup>36</sup>), over and above personal comfort to the individual, means restoration to human society and human dignity. 'Clothed and in his right mind' (Mk 5<sup>15</sup>) were two equal indications that Legion was no longer an outcast. So to have fine apparel was apt to carry the assumption of all inward graces (Ja 2<sup>8</sup>).

Eastern clothing is throughout an adaptation not only to climate but to character. Clothes are flung off and on with the same rapidity as that with which heat changes to cold and sunshine to starlight; so it is with the quickly-varying moods of the people. Oriental clothes appear to the European to be cumbersome and prohibitive of exercise. This to the ordinary Oriental mind carries a subtle recommendation, implying that the wearer does not need to work. A common Arab proverb says, 'There is a blessing in being busy,' but it is usually the spectator that quotes it. The loose and ornamental style of Oriental dress emphasizes the thought that the chief good of life is not in active achievement, but in rest and the privilege of rest. Among the trades a work loses in public respect in proportion as the worker has to take off clothing when engaged in it. All clothing above the undermost easily takes on meanings of office, investiture, and precedence. Brightness and colour are synonymous with happiness and prosperity, and grief of soul is expressed by the darkest object seen in nature, the intense black of goat hair (Rev 6<sup>12</sup>). Orientals always travel in their best clothes; it was scarcely necessary for the Gibeonites to assure Joshua that their raiment had been new when they started, except as indicating the length of their journey. In public worship Orientals are impressed and apparently satisfied by changed vestments and spectacular ritual to a degree that always puzzles the more ethical and introspective mind of the West.

In the Bible there are numberless instances of the employment of facts concerning dress for the expression of spiritual truth. The metaphorical application is carried out in much detail, showing that the subject was at once familiar and of extreme interest. We have such phrases as 'clothed with humility' (1 P 5<sup>5</sup>), 'the garment of salvation, the robe of righteousness' (Is 61<sup>10</sup>), into which is meant to be borne all that Oriental dress means with regard to completeness of covering and dignified grace. The girdle, head-dress, and sandals are especially rich in similitudes of strength, honour, and defilement. Thus with ref. to the girdle, there is the significance of its cleaving to the loins (Jer 13<sup>1</sup>); of its being loosened (Is 5<sup>27</sup>); its strengthening value (Is 22<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>18</sup>, Eph 6<sup>14</sup>); there is the pathos of being girded (Jn 21<sup>18</sup>); and the mystery of support (Is 45<sup>9</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Keil, Benzinger, and Nowack, Heb. Arch.; Schurer, HJP (see 'Clothing' in Index); Conder, Handbook to the Bible; Ederhem, Jesus the Messiah (1887), i. 621-626; Thomson, Land and Book, 3 vols. 1831-1886 (see 'Garments' in each vol.); Tristram, Land of the Bible (1882), p. 155-176; Maspero, Les Origines de la Civilisation (1896), p. 718f.; Die Abhandlungen (1866), p. 208 ff.

DRINK.—See FOOD. DRINK-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

DROMEDARY.—Besides the word (דָּרָמָה) rendered dromedary, but which ought to have been tr<sup>d</sup>. young camel (see CAMEL), there are two words, רֶכֶשׁ rekesh (rendered in 1 K 4<sup>23</sup> dromedaries, and in Est 8<sup>10, 14</sup> mules, and in Mic 1<sup>13</sup> swift beasts), and רָמָמָה rammah (Est 8<sup>10</sup> AV young dromedaries). Rekesh (a rare synonym of רָמָה) probably denoted a species of horse noted for some choice quality. That this quality was swiftness is quite uncertain. Rammah is Pers. ramah, 'flock' or 'herd' (see Ges. Thes.). In Est 8<sup>10</sup> רָמָה, lit. 'sons of the herd,' is tr<sup>d</sup> in RV 'bred of the stud.' To all appearance, then, we must drop the dromedary from the list of Bible animals. G. E. POST.

DROPSY.—See MEDICINE.

DROSS (רֵץ, Kethibh רֵץ, sing. only in Ezk 22<sup>18</sup>, elsewhere always plur. רֵצִים, קֵצִים, קֵצִים).—For the process whereby dross was separated from the pure metal, see FURNACE, REFINER. The word is several times used in the OT to denote what is base and worthless, e.g. Ps 119 'O wicked,' Is 1<sup>22, 25</sup>, Ezk 22<sup>18, 19</sup> (of degenerate Israel). J. A. SELBIE.

DROUGHT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, also FAMINE.

DROVE.—This word is the equivalent in AV of two Heb. words. 1. עֶדֶר eder (Gn 32<sup>16, 17</sup>). Eder is elsewhere rendered flock (see FLOCK), except in one place (Jl 1<sup>18</sup>), where it occurs twice in the construct state, עֶדְרֵי צֶמֶר, which is tr<sup>d</sup> 'herds of cattle,' and עֶדְרֵי כֶּשֶׂם 'flocks of sheep.' 2. מַדְנֶה madneh. This word, although rendered in Gn 33<sup>8</sup> AV drove, is rendered once in the same connexion (32<sup>7</sup>) bands, and twice (32<sup>9</sup>) company. This last, which is the correct tr., is adopted by RV (cf. Gn 50<sup>9</sup>). See HERD. G. E. POST.

DROWNING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

DRUNKENNESS.—The spectacle of men beside themselves through alcoholic drink has been familiar from the beginning of history, and all languages have terms in which to describe it. It is a subject that appears in the Bible, as in other ancient writings.

1. Some of the terms used in the Scriptures in connexion with drunkenness.—The Heb. has no word that describes this vice, like the Eng. words 'drunken,' 'drunkard,' 'drunkenness,' 'inebriate,' in terms derived from the physical act of drinking. It has two stems in common use (שָׁחַח and שָׁחַח), referring to the act of drinking; and each denotes indifferently the drinking of water or wine or other liquids, drinking by men or by animals or by the ground. From one of these stems comes the word mashkeh, not often used, denoting a butler or cupbearer, one who serves wine at table (Neh 1<sup>1</sup>, Gn 40<sup>1</sup> etc.). From the other comes the word mishteh, much used, denoting a formal feast, a banquet. This is often tr<sup>d</sup> by the Gr. πότης, and once (Est 7<sup>1</sup>) by συμπόσιον.

Like the Gr. word, it has in it the idea of a social feast as a gathering where men drink together. This shows that the idea of social drinking is older than the differentiation of the Heb. language. Hence it is the more remarkable that the words of these Heb. stems never, of themselves, denote either vicious carousal or intoxication. They are sometimes used in connexion with carousal or intoxication, but in such cases the author always adds other words to indicate the vicious meaning. Even Ec 10<sup>17</sup> is not an exception to this. See BANQUET.

A different stem is ranakh (רָנַח), occurring 14 times as a verb, and 6 times in all in the form of three different nouns. The idea is that of being brimful, or saturated, or soaked (Ps 23<sup>5</sup>, Job 37<sup>11</sup>, Is 58<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>9</sup> 34<sup>5, 7</sup> etc.). It is possible to tr. the Heb., in every passage where these words occur, without recognizing an allusion to drunkenness. But LXX commonly tr. them by derivatives of μεθύω or πίνω, and they are no doubt to be regarded as denoting drunkenness. It is as when we speak of a habitually drunken man as a soaker, or as sodden with drink (Jer 46<sup>10</sup>, La 3<sup>15</sup>).

Another stem, sabbah (שָׁבַח), is used in all 8 or 9 times. Its meaning is nearly that of our Eng. 'to guzzle,' that is, to drink intoxicating liquor, stupefying effect. The active : the guzzler as in the act, the passive participle describes him as affected by the liquor, the noun denotes either the liquor or the act of guzzling (Is 56<sup>12</sup>, Dt 21<sup>20</sup>, Pr 23<sup>30, 31</sup>, Nah 1<sup>10</sup>, Is 1<sup>22</sup>, Hos 4<sup>18</sup>).

More important than all these is the stem shakkhar (שָׁכַח). The verb means to become intoxicated, and in common use are the nouns shakkhar, 'intoxicating liquor' (see STRONG DRINK); shikkār, 'drunkard,' and shikkārōn, 'drunkenness.' Many hold that the word is the same with our sugar, and that group of words in the Western languages. If so, the Heb. word and the Western word start together with the fact that sugar is present at the formation of alcohol, but follow entirely different lines of meaning. The usage of the Heb. stem is abundant and clear, leaving no doubt as to its meaning. Hebrew-speaking people were familiar with the spectacle of men overcome by alcohol, and they used the words of this stem to express this familiar fact.

In NT, and in Gr. VSS of OT, quite a variety of terms are used, but we need mention only one group: μέθη, 'habitual intoxication'; μεθύω, 'to be intoxicated'; μεθύσκειν, 'to make intoxicated'; μεθύσμα, 'an intoxicant'; μέθυρος, 'intoxicated.' In their meaning and use (both literal and metaphorical) the words of this group are similar to those of the Heb. group last mentioned.

2. Particulars given in the Bible concerning drunkenness.—The OT and NT passages that give these particulars, though numerous, are too familiar to need direct citation. If one needs to refer to them, they are easily found by the help of a concordance. Of ancient passages one will easily recall the contest concerning wine, kings, women, and truth, in 1 Lk 11:37; the drunkenness of Holofernes, as described in Jth 12<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>; the many references to drinking usages in Sir; and other like passages.

These various canon. or apocr. passages mention abundantly many of the familiar physical effects of drunkenness: staggering, reeling, dizziness, incoherent speech, redness of eyes, vomiting, stupid sleep, insensibility to blows, insatiable appetite for more stimulant. They speak of its mental effects: exhilaration, jollity, loss of good judgment, inconsequence of thought and purpose, inability to keep secret, quarrelsomeness, shamelessness, failure to remember afterwards what occurred while one was drunk, the purposed forgetting of one's riches, as the nakedness of Noah, the folly of Amnon, the sodden condition of Nabal. They speak of festal drinking, of usages compelling one to drink, or exempting him from compulsion (Est 1<sup>8</sup>), of carousals, dissipations, excess, riot, of the Syrian king drinking himself drunk in his tent in the face of the enemy, many times of the high-born people of both Israel and Judah as wasting their property and energies in costly drinking feasts, of the connexion of drunkenness with licentiousness, of orgies in which the three waters were drunk. They speak of the pernicious effects of these things on one's constitution or life, of the guzzler and the glutton who bring themselves to poverty, to loss of energy, to rags. They speak of sociological effects, of men who by reason of private dissipations neglect public duty, of men who ought to be ambitious to serve God and their country, but whose actual ambitions run in the line of carousing or drinking intoxicating beverages, of consequent incapacitation for leadership, and resulting oppression and injustice at home, and boundless defeat and slaughter by foreign invaders.

In these and other passages no one can fail to recognize the vices and evils of drunkenness and its evils in the biblical times, and their identity with the same evils as now existing. Especial importance attaches, therefore, to anything the Bible has to say in regard to the remedy.

The author of Sir says: 'Wine drunk in season and to satisfy is joy of heart and gladness of soul; wine drunk largely is bitterness of soul, with provocation and conflict' (31<sup>28,29</sup>). Similar passages abound in ancient literature. They commend the moderate use of intoxicants, and condemn the excessive use; generally drawing the line, however, not between exhilaration and drunkenness, but between drunkenness that is regarded as occasional and seasonable and drunkenness that is habitual and unseasonable. In view of this, it is worth noting that our canonical books contain no such passage. On the other hand, they unqualifiedly condemn drunkenness. They lay down the proposition, 'Look not on the wine when it is red' (Pr 23<sup>31</sup>). In such cases as those of the king of Tyre (10<sup>9</sup>), of Daniel, of the Rechabites, of the Ninevites, they teach that even total abstinence is sometimes a duty.

An account of the intoxicating liquors mentioned in the Bible will be found under the titles STRONG DRINK and WINE. See also FOOD.

3. The difference between the ancient and the modern problem.—With all their many points of identity, there is a large and important group of differences. Any one who will carefully study all the passages in the Bible which speak of this matter will note that, in a large majority of them, drunkenness is explicitly spoken of as the vice of the wealthy. Perhaps there is not an instance in which habitual drunkenness is attributed to any who are not wealthy. In modern times, on the contrary, drunkenness is supposed to be much more prevalent among the poor than among the well-to-do. This difference is not an accident. It is mainly the result of the cheapening of intoxicants, through improved processes of distilling and brewing, into alcohol, within the past two or three centuries. When the price of enough wine or beer to make a man drunk was equal to half a month's wages, and no other intoxicants were to be had, it was impossible for most men to become sodden drunkards. The case is different when an hour's labour will pay for an intoxicating quantity of cheap liquor. In the older time, habitual drunkenness was possible for thousands where it is now possible for hundreds of thousands. This vast modern extension of the domain of intemperance should not be forgotten when we study the Bible for practical purposes on this subject. To this might be added a large number of important differences of detail between ancient life and modern life that have bearings on the question in hand. The outcome of such a comparison is that drunkenness and its attendant evils, inexcusable, widespread, harmful, and dangerous as they were in the civilizations in which the Scriptures were written, are immeasurably more so in our existing civilization, and we ought to deal with the problem accordingly. W. J. BEECHER.

DRUSILLA (Δρουσίλλα).—See HEROD.

DUKE.—This word being a title in AV with two exceptions* to the chief of the family of Esau this was a hereditary title, as it is in Britain now. It is, however, never a title in AV, but a general expression for 'chief,' being formed from Lat. dux (the word in the Vulg.), and the tr. of a word (דָּוָד or דָּוִד 'allāph) which is also applied to the princes of Judah (Zec 9<sup>12</sup>). See CHIEF, ii. 3).

The Heb. word is probably more specific than its Eng. equivalent, being held by Dillmann (on Gn 36<sup>15</sup>) to be derived from דָּוָד, so properly 'a chiliarch,' and understood by the LXX. to denote properly the leader of a clan, and as 'probably the indigenous name borne in Edom by the ruling class,' while in Eng. 'duke' was introduced by Sir J. G. Wilkinson (1827) and J. Hastings (1828). The Heb. word is also used in the Talmud (i. 31) calls Gideon 'a duke' (דָּוִד), the Messiah, Mt 26 'And thou, Bethlehem, the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda; for of thee a dukk shall go out, that shall govern my people of Israel'; and Select Works, iii. 137, 'Jesus Christ, duke of our betel, taught us laws of prudence, and not to fight bodily.' Between 1512 and 1679 (that is, when AV was made) the title was extinct in England. J. HASTINGS.

DULCIMER.—See MUSIC.

DUMAH (דִּמָּה).—1. Son of Ishmael (Gn 25<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>30</sup>), representing some Arabian tribe or locality. There are many places of this name mentioned by the Arabian geographers, Daumun, nom. unit. daum, wild nut, common in Arabia Deserta (Doughty, Travels in A. D., Index). The most important of the places called after it, Dumat al-Jandal (also written Daumat and Dumat) was identified by the earlier Mohammedan geographers with a place mentioned in Gn (Yakut, s.v.) and it is probable that the same place is referred to by Pliny (HN vi. 32), who is acquainted with a Domatha in the neighbourhood of the Thamudeni (as well as a Thumati), and Ptolemy, who mentions a city Δουμῆδα or Δουμῆδα in Arabia Deserta (v. 19, 7), as well as a city of importance of the same name in Arabia Felix (viii. 22, 3). Stephanus Byz. s.v. quotes Glaucus in the second book of his Arabian Antiquities as mentioning a city of the name, and Porphyry, De Abstin. ii. 56, asserts that an Arabian tribe named Dumathii sacrificed a boy every year, and buried him under the altar which they used as an idol, probably with reference to the same place. Its site is fixed by the geographer Al-Bekri (i. 353) as 'ten days' journey from Medina, ten from Cufa, eight from Damascus, and twelve from Misr'; but by Mas'udi (Bibl. Geog. Arab. vii. 248) as 'five from Medina, and fifteen or thirteen from Damascus,' the latter numbers being probably more correct. The 'suk Dūma,' discovered by Burckhardt in the Jauf (Travels in Syria, 662), has been identified with it partly on the ground of the correspondence of the names of the surrounding villages with those mentioned by the geographers (cf. Ritter, Erkunde von Arabien, ii. 360-388). The only further reference to it in the Bible is perhaps to be found in the heading of Is 21<sup>14</sup>, where an obscure oracle in a strange dialect is introduced with the words 'the massa' of Dumah'; for this the LXX substitutes Idumæa, and many modern critics are inclined to interpret the name Dumah (in Heb. 'silence') allegorically. It is probable that more accurate knowledge of the purport of the oracle would show the geographical interpretation to be right. 2. Name of one of the mountain cities of Judah (Jos 15<sup>62</sup>) according to the reading of most of the editions; but in that of Ginsburg, Rumah (רומה) is substituted, and this reading is adopted by the LXX (Ρωμα or Ρουμα) and the Vulgate. It is probable, however, that the ordinary reading Dumah is correct. In the Onomast. Δουμα is given as the name of a large city in the Daroma, seventeen miles from Beit Jibrin; and it was identified by Robinson with Khirbet Daumah, in the neighbourhood of Beit Jibrin, where are to be seen the ruins of a village situated on two hills separated by a valley, with remains of many cisterns and caves excavated in the rock, belonging to the Canaanite or Jewish epoch, as well as vestiges of Christian buildings. The 'seventeen miles' of the Onomast. is an overstatement, due to the tortuous routes followed in the mountain country (Guérin, Judée, iii. 359-361).

* The one exception is Jos 13<sup>24</sup> 'dukes of Sihon' (דָּוִדִּים, RV 'princes'), and the other 1 Mac 10<sup>10</sup>, where Jonathan Maccabæus is said to have been made a 'duke' by king Alexander (στρατηγός, RV 'captain').

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

DUMB.—See MEDICINE.

DUNG.—1. Used in the East as manure (Lk 13<sup>8</sup>) and for fuel; especially that of cattle, where wood and charcoal are scarce or unattainable. In Eastern cities there is usually a receptacle for the offal of cattle, whence it is carried out and either burnt or used as manure. Directions for the use of dung are given in Dt 23<sup>10-14</sup>; and in the camp (Ex 29<sup>14</sup>, Lv 4<sup>11-12</sup> 8<sup>37</sup>, Nu 19<sup>5</sup>).

2. The word is used (a) to express contempt and abhorrence, as in the case of the carcass of Jezebel (2 K 9<sup>37</sup>); and in that of the Jews (Jer 9<sup>22</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>17</sup>). (b) To express contempt upon the face was a sign of dishonour (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>). (c) As representing worthlessness, St. Paul counted all things but dung that he might win Christ (Ph 3<sup>8</sup>).

E. HULL.

DUNG GATE.—See JERUSALEM.

DURA (דורה Dn 3<sup>1</sup>, a plain 'in the province of Babylon'). Etym. uncertain. The word may be connected with the Bab. duru, a strong wall or fortification, possibly also with Dor (Jg 1<sup>27</sup>) and with דור. Ammianus Marcellinus (xxv. 6) mentions it as situated E. of the Tigris. The distance of such a locality from Babylon seems to preclude the possibility of its being the same as that alluded to in Daniel. The validity of this objection depends upon the extent of territory which may be regarded as included in the expression דוריתא. The same objection of distance applies to the place of this name which occurs in Polybius (v. 48), which was on the Euphrates near the mouth of the Chaboras, more than 200 miles N.W. of Babylon.

A third (and the most probable) locality suggested is to the E. of Babylon, where Oppert found what appears to be the base of a great statue, near a mound known as Dúair.

G. WALKER.

DURE.—The simple vb. 'dure' (fr. Lat. durare, be hard, 'last') is now obsol., its place being filled by 'endure.' It occurs in AV Mt 13<sup>21</sup> only: 'Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while' (RV 'endureth for a while', Gr. πρόκαιρος ἐστί, lit. 'is temporary'; Wyc. 'is temporal', Rhem. 'is for a time'; 'dureth' is Tindale's word, who translates the same expression in Mk 4<sup>17</sup> by 'endure,' and is followed by AV). 'During,' still in use, is the pres. ptc. of this verb; cf. Tindale, Works, p. 476: 'when the disciples were come together vnto the breaking of the bread, Paule made a sermon duryng to mynighit.' Not in AV, 'during' is introduced by RV into Mt 26<sup>3</sup>, Jn 2<sup>23</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>, Rev 11<sup>6</sup>. Durable is still in use, and applicable to clothing, as Is 23<sup>18</sup>, but scarcely now to riches, as in Pr 8<sup>18</sup>. Cf. Purchas, Pil. p. 28: 'They might take up their Crosse, and follow the second Adam unto a durable happinesse.'

J. HASTINGS.

DUTY is that which is due. In mod. Eng. it is only that which is due by one, but formerly expressed also that which is due to one. This is the meaning of Ex 21<sup>10</sup>, AV 'If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage shall he not diminish' (so RV). Cf. Tindale's tr. of Mt 20<sup>14</sup> 'Take that which is thy duty, and go thy way,' and of Lk 12<sup>42</sup> 'to geve them their dentie of meate at due season'; and Knox, Hist. p. 117: 'I will serve my Prince with body, heart, goods, strength, and all that is in my power, except that which is God's duty, which I will reserve to him alone.' Shaks. uses the word in both senses, Tam. of Shrew, iv. i. 40: 'Do thy duty, and have thy duty.' For the biblical conception of Duty, see ETHICS.

J. HASTINGS.

DWARF is the rendering in AV and RV of qā, a word (Lv 21<sup>20</sup>) denoting one of the physical disqualifications by which a priest was unfitted for service. The word means thin, lean, small. It is applied to Pharaoh's lean kine (Gn 41<sup>3</sup> etc.), to the minute grains of manna (Ex 16<sup>14</sup>), to the still, small voice (1 K 19<sup>12</sup>), and in other like instances. The conjecture that it here means a dwarf is plausible. But others regard it as meaning an unnaturally thin man—a con-sumptive, perhaps. The Sept. (ἐφελος) and Vulg. connect this specification with the one that follows, as indicating defective eyes. So the meaning must be regarded as uncertain.

W. J. BEECHER.

DYEING.—The art of dyeing is not mentioned in Scripture, but dyled stuffs are referred to in various passages, and hence it is altogether probable that dyeing was known to the Israelites. The coloured stuffs mentioned are blue, purple, and scarlet; these all occurring together in the description of the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex 26<sup>1-6</sup>). It would seem that the yarn was dyed before weaving (cf. Ex 35<sup>23</sup>), as we know was the custom of the Egyptians (cf. Wilk. Anc. Eg. ii. p. 166, ed. 1878), from whom the Israelitish women may have acquired the art. The Egyptians were certainly acquainted with the art of dyeing by the use of chemicals, though they may not have understood the chemical properties of the materials employed (cf. Pliny, xxxv. 11, and Wilk. ii. 168, 169), and the Hebrews no doubt knew something of it at the time of the Exodus. At a later period they may have learned from the Phœnicians the process of making the Tyrian purple, so renowned among the ancients; but it is not probable that they produced it, as they could not readily procure the shell-fish used in its manufacture. The purple of the tabernacle, if made by the Hebrews, must have been obtained from other sources and by other methods. Purple occurs in Pr 31<sup>22</sup> as the clothing of the virtuous woman; and as it stands in a long list of items of her handiwork, it may indicate that she knew how to make it. Scarlet was obtained by a process similar to that of purple, as we learn from Kenrick, Phæn. ch. viii., and Rawlinson, Phæn. ch. viii. Blue was doubtless obtained from indigo, which was known to the Egyptians from their commerce with India (Wilk. ii. 164). See COLOURS.

Rams' skins 'dyed' red (עֵרָא אֵילִם אֶרְבֵּיתִים) are mentioned in Ex 25<sup>2</sup>. This process the Hebrews could have learned also from the Egyptians (cf. Wilk. ii. 185). The art is still carried on in Syria, and large quantities of skins are tanned red for the native shoes and saddles.

H. PORTER.

DYSENTERY.—See MEDICINE.

E

E.—The symbol ordinarily used in criticism of Hex. to signify the work of the [second] Elohist. See HEXATEUCH.

EAGLE (עָשׂוֹר neshar, derb, aquila).—The Arab. retains the same name, in a modified form, nishr, substituting sin for shin. This term is used by the Arabs for the vultures, of which there are four species in the Holy Land. (1) Gypæus barbatus, Cuv., the lammergeier, the עֶשְׂרֵי peres of the Hebrews, AV ossifrage, Arab. anûk. (2) Gyps fulvus, Sav., the griffon. (3) Neophron percnopterus, L., the Egyptian vulture, called in Arab. raham or dejah-Firawn, Pharaoh's hen. It is the gier eagle of AV, not of RV. (4) Vultur monachus, L.

It is also used for the true eagles, of which there are eight species in the Holy Land. (1) Aquila chrysaetos, L., the osprey of AV, which is the golden eagle, עֶשְׂרֵי ozniyyâh. (2) A. heliaca, Sar., the imperial eagle. (3) A. clanga, Pall., the greater spotted eagle, and perhaps A. pomarina, Brehm, the lesser spotted eagle, of which, however, only one specimen has been noted. (4) A. rapax, Temm., the tawny eagle. (5) A. pennata, Gmel. (6) A. nipalensis, Hodges, the steppe eagle. (7) A. bonelli, Temm. (8) Circæus Gallicus, Gmel., the short-toed eagle. The last is easily recognized by its large flat head, its huge golden eyes, and brightly spotted breast. Its short toes and tarsi are covered with tessellated scales to protect it from the serpents on which it preys. It is the most abundant of the eagle tribe in Palestine. All the above birds are included by the Arabs under the generic term nishr=neshar, even those which have also specific names, as the ossifrage, the osprey, and the Egyptian vulture. They agree in swiftness of flight (Dt 28<sup>40</sup> etc.), in soaring high into the air (Pr 23<sup>8</sup> 30<sup>18</sup>, Is 40<sup>31</sup>), in making their nests in high trees or inaccessible rocks (Job 39<sup>27-30</sup>, Jer 49<sup>18</sup>), and in keenness of vision (Job 39<sup>28</sup>).

The expression 'enlarge thy baldness as the eagle' (Mic 1<sup>16</sup>), refers to the griffon, which has its head and neck free from feathers. The references to feeding on the slain (Job 39<sup>30</sup>, Mt 24<sup>28</sup>) are not to be understood of vultures alone, as eagles also will feed on dead animals if they find them. But it is especially applicable to the griffon and Pharaoh's hen. Therefore in such passages (cf. Pr 30<sup>17</sup>, Mt 24<sup>28</sup>) the allusion is generic. The 'ravenous bird from the East' (Is 46<sup>11</sup>) describes Cyrus, probably in allusion to the fact that the griffon was the emblem of Persia, and embroidered on its standard. This emblem in various forms has been copied by the Romans, Russians, Austrians, Germans, and by the United States.

The renewal of the youth of the eagle (Ps 103<sup>5</sup>) is an allusion to its longevity, which sometimes reaches a hundred years. The eagle is one of the 'living creatures' of Ezk 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 4<sup>7</sup>. It has been adopted as an emblem of St. John (in Irenæus of St. Mark), owing to his insight into the divine character, and his power of looking at the divine glory.

The 'bearing on eagles' wings' (Ex 19<sup>4</sup>) is clearly metaphorical, and does not refer to any habit of the eagle. The passage in Dt 32<sup>11</sup> 'As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings,' is explained by the preceding verse, which reads, 'He found him in a desert land, and in the waste, howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye'; and in the following verse, 'So the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him.' The allusion is to the fostering care of the eagles for their young, and the pains they take to lure them from the nest and teach them to fly. These are well-known facts. It would be no wise difficult for an observer to fancy, in their evolutions, that the old birds actually bore up the younger ones in the air, as well as fluttered over them.

G. E. POST.

EAR (אָזן, ôzen, ôds).—Hearing is associated with obedience as seeing is with conviction. In the East when an order is given, the responsive gesture is to lift the hand to the head and breast, implying that the order is understood and will be carried out. Thus also in the Arabian Nights, after a command by a superior, the invariable reply is, 'Hearing and obeying!'

Eye, ear, and heart are concrete terms for understanding, will, and affection, and the gospel is declared to be something beyond human thoughts, desires, and passions. Men had at all times offered sacrifices to influence the will of the gods appealed to, but here God made the sacrifice to lead captive the will of man. 'Ear hath not heard' (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>). Its limit is in man's willingness to listen (Mt 13<sup>9</sup>, Rev 2<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>17</sup>, etc.). Assurance concerning God's ability to hear is drawn from the fact that He planted the ear (Ps 94<sup>9</sup>). The alienated heart is called an uncircumcised ear (Jer 6<sup>10</sup>).

The boring of a slave's ear by his consent was the token of life-long surrender and ownership (Ex 21<sup>6</sup>; but not Ps 40<sup>5</sup>, see Kirkpatrick, ad loc.); the tip of the ear was touched with blood in the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lv 8<sup>28</sup>), and in the cleansing of a leper (14<sup>14</sup>, 17, 25, 28); the cutting off of the ears is mentioned as one of the atrocities perpetrated by an enemy (Ezk 23<sup>25</sup>); to incline the ear is a frequent expression for to give attention (Ps 45<sup>10</sup>, Pr 22<sup>17</sup> etc.); the ears tingle (לָזַק) at dreadful news (1 S 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 K 21<sup>12</sup>, Jer 19<sup>3</sup>); to open one's ear (אָזְנִי) is a common expression for to reveal a secret to one (1 S 9<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>27</sup>, 1 Ch 17<sup>28</sup> etc.).

G. M. MACKIE.

EAR.—To 'ear' is to plough (Old Eng. erian, connected with aperev and arare), as 'After that he tempereth it with dong, then eareth it, soweth it, and haroweth it' (Pulgr. Perf. 1528, p. 23); 'A silver saucer . . . was eared up by a plough' (Harrison, England, i. 361). In AV, Dt 21<sup>4</sup> 'A rough valley, which is neither eared nor sown

(RV 'plowed'; so at Gn 45<sup>5</sup>, Ex 34<sup>21</sup>, 1 S 8<sup>12</sup>); Is 30<sup>24</sup> 'the young asses that ear the ground' (RV 'till,' Heb. עָרָה 'work,' as in Dt 21<sup>4</sup>).

J. HASTINGS.

EARNEST.—There are three well-known NT passages in which this word occurs: Eph 1<sup>14</sup> 'The earnest of our inheritance'; 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> and 2 Co 5<sup>5</sup> 'The earnest of the Spirit.' In all three instances the Greek word (introduced perhaps by Phœnician traders) is the same, ἀρραβών. Its Lat. equivalent is arra or arrabo (not pignus), and its Eng. arles, now obsolete except in Scotland. The corresponding word in Heb. עֲרָבָה (Gn 38<sup>17, 18, 20</sup>) means a pledge or token, something to be returned when the terms of the contract have been observed; but by ἀρραβών, arrabo, arles, we are to understand a first instalment, given as a sure and binding engagement that the rest shall follow in due time. The earnest is a pledge, but it is a pledge consisting of part of the possession, or benefit, or blessing with which the contracting parties are concerned. The arles given to a servant signifies that a contract has been entered into, and it is a binding promise that the wages agreed upon will be forthcoming when the term of engagement has expired. It is really a part of the wages, and it is the same in kind as the money payment to be afterwards made. In very olden times a similar formality used to obtain in connexion with the conveyance of land, or houses, or mills. In buying a field, the purchaser had given him a clod of earth as an earnest that, at the appointed time, he should enter upon complete possession. When houses were transferred from one owner to another, the purchaser or receiver had handed him some of the thatch as arles or earnest that by and by the whole property should pass over into his possession. In the case of a mill, some small piece of the machinery was passed from hand to hand. These simple ceremonies were as binding as an agreement written upon a tablet and made valid by the impression of a Government stamp. The idea underlying them all appears in various forms in Scripture history. Abraham's sojourn in Canaan was a kind of earnest to a wanderer like him that his seed should by and by possess the land. When Abraham's servant, having gone to Mesopotamia to fetch a wife for Isaac, gave Rebekah a nose-ring and bracelets and jewels of gold and silver, these were to her an earnest of Isaac's wealth, and the evidence of a comfortable home in Canaan. Using the word in the sense above explained and illustrated, the apostle tells us that the work of the Holy Spirit in our hearts is an earnest of our heavenly inheritance. Christian knowledge, holiness, and happiness are not only a foretaste of heaven's bliss. See I. C. L. p. 68f.

G. M. PHILIPS.

EAR-RING.—נֶזֶם, nezem, orig. nose-ring (נֶזֶם אֶפְרוֹחַי Gn 24<sup>47</sup>, נֶזֶם אֶפְרוֹחַי Is 32<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ezk 16<sup>12</sup>, where first clause should read as in RV 'I put a ring upon thy nose'), perhaps equiv. to נָקָה in Ex 35<sup>22</sup> (AV bracelet, RV brooch); also applied to ear-ring, נֶזֶם אָזְנוֹת, Gn 35<sup>4</sup>. In RV it is tr. ring, where the text makes no special reference to nose or ear. For the nose the nezem was a plain ring of gold worn either in the wing or central cartilage of the nose. For the ear the circular form (נֶזֶם עֹרֶבֶת Ezk 16<sup>12</sup>) was the most common, but usually ornamented with some sacred or having one or more balls attached, hence called נֶזֶם אֶפְרוֹחַי Is 3<sup>19</sup> (AV chains, RV pendants). In Is 3<sup>20</sup> for נֶזֶם AV 'ear-rings,' RV gives 'amulets' (see AMULET). Such rings formed an important part of the bride's ornaments (Gn 24<sup>22</sup>). At the present day in Syria, when a young peasant woman comes into town with her friends to buy the marriage outfit, the first purchase is usually that of the earrings. Ear-rings are now confined to women, being regarded as barbaric and effeminate when worn by men. Among the Bedawin, in the case of an only son, the ear-ring is sometimes worn as an amulet in the form of a large silver ring suspended round the outer ear, with discs or balls attached to the lower half of the ring, hanging visible below the lobe of the ear. Rings for nose and ear formed the material of the golden calf (Ex 32<sup>2</sup>), of Gideon's image (Jg 8<sup>24</sup>), and were offered for the furnishing of the tabernacle (Ex 35<sup>22</sup>).

SYRIAN EAR-RINGS.

LITERATURE.—Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 107; Lane, Modern Egypt (London A. 'Female Ornaments'); Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt (London); Hartmann, Hebraica, iii. 205; Wellsted, Travels, i. 321; Harmer, Obs. iv. 311, 314; Moore, ibid. 571.

G. M. MACKIE.

EARTH is the tr. of various Heb. and Gr. terms, the most notable of which are—

1. אֶרֶץ (deriv. uncertain, perhaps from a root containing notion of being tilled, or of covering and closely fitting. See Oxf. Dict. L.E. s.v.), which with its LXX and NT equivalent γῆ is used (1) of the earth as tilled, Gn 2<sup>3, 5</sup> etc. Hence אֶרֶץ אִישׁ = a husbandman, Gn 9<sup>20</sup>. (2) Of earth as a material substance, from which were fashioned man Gn 2<sup>7</sup>, animals v. 19, vessels Is 45<sup>9</sup> (see POTTERY), of which at times altars were made Ex 20<sup>24</sup>, cf. 2 K 5<sup>17</sup>, and which was put upon the head as a token of woe or of contrition 1 S 4<sup>12</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>2</sup>, Neh 9<sup>1</sup>. In this last reference the term more frequently employed is עָפָר = dust, which is rendered earth in such passages as Gn 26<sup>18</sup>, Job 8<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 28<sup>30</sup> 41<sup>33</sup>, Is 2<sup>19</sup>, Dn 12<sup>2</sup>. (3) Of earth as the visible surface of the globe, in such phrases as 'everything that creepeth upon the face of the earth' (RV 'ground') Gn 1<sup>25</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> etc. (4) Of earth as = land or country Gn 47<sup>19</sup>, Is 19<sup>7</sup>, esp. of the Holy Land Zec 2<sup>12</sup>. (5) Of earth as = whole earth Gn 1<sup>25</sup> 23<sup>14</sup>. This last usage is rare, and, like the preceding, belongs rather to—

2. אֶרֶץ (in Aram. portions of Ezr and Dn אֶרֶץ, Syr. ar d'), which is used (1) of earth as opposed to heaven Gn 1<sup>1</sup>, cf. Mt 23<sup>18</sup>; (2) of earth as opposed to sea Gn 1<sup>20</sup>, cf. Mk 4<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>7</sup>; (3) of the whole earth Gn 1<sup>18</sup>, or its inhabitants Gn 1<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 18<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>35</sup>; (4) = land, country, district Gn 10<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>, cf. Mt 2<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>34</sup>; (5) as synonymous with אֶרֶץ = soil Gn 1<sup>11, 12</sup>, cf. Mt 13<sup>5</sup>. See GROUND.

3. A poetic synonym of אֶרֶץ is אֶרֶץ (perhaps fr. a root = productive; according to Hommel, Expos. Times, 1897, viii. 472, it had originally a mythological sense), 1 S 2<sup>8</sup>, Is 14<sup>21</sup> etc. Both אֶרֶץ and אֶרֶץ are reproduced in the LXX by γῆ and οἰκουμένη, the latter of which occurs a good many times also in NT, e.g. Lk 4<sup>5</sup>, Ro 10<sup>18</sup>, Rev 16<sup>14</sup>.

See further COSMOGONY, WORLD.

J. A. SELBIE.

EARTHQUAKE.—Palestine has from time immemorial been a country subject to earthquakes, and it is therefore not surprising that several references to these phenomena should be found in Holy Writ. Nor is it improbable that during prehistoric times, especially during the Miocene and Pliocene epochs, it was even more liable to seismic shocks than in the former period, when we consider that the regions beyond the Jordan witnessed volcanic eruptions on a vast scale from craters and foci which are now altogether dormant.*

The references in this article will be restricted to the region of Pal. and the adjoining territories of Syria, Asia Minor, and Arabia Petraea, and the subject will be treated under the foll. heads:—

1. Historical. 2. Prophetic. 3. Phenomena of the Christian Era. 4. Origin of Earthquake Phenomena. 5. Literature.

1. HISTORICAL.—(a) The earthquake at Sinai on the giving of the law: 'The mount quaked greatly' (Ex 19<sup>18</sup>).

(b) Earthquake accompanied by fissures and sinking of the ground, by which Korah and his companions were destroyed (Nu 16<sup>31</sup>; also Jos. Ant. IV. iii. 3).

(c) Earthquake in the days of Saul (1 S 14<sup>15</sup>).

(d) Elijah, fleeing from the wrath of Jezebel, finds a refuge on the solitary heights of Horeb (Mount Sinai) in Arabia Petraea (1 K 19<sup>11</sup>). Assuming Jebel Musā to be actually the mount in question, tradition has handed down to us the name of the cave from which the prophet witnessed the effects of the earthquake. At about 200 feet below the summit of this mountain there lies in a recess a circular pool surrounded by rocks of granite and porphyry penetrated at one spot by a cave, probably of artificial origin, known amongst the Arabs and the monks of St Catherine as 'Elijah's cave.' The position and surroundings fit in so well with the narrative that it would be useless to call in question the truth of this identification.† The solitude of the place would have afforded the prophet protection; the cave, shelter; and the pool, water to quench his thirst.

(e) Earthquake in the reign of Uzziah. This earthquake must have been one of extraordinary severity, as it is twice referred to, Am 1<sup>1</sup> and Zec 14<sup>5</sup>; and from the latter passage we may infer that it caused a precipitate flight of the inhabitants of Jerus., and may have been accompanied by fissuring of the earth at the Mount of Olives. The exact date cannot be determined, as Uzziah's reign was long, extending from c. B.C. 790–740.

(f) B.C. 31, Sept. 2. In the reign of Herod an earthquake occurred in Judaea, 'such as had not happened at any other time,' destructive to men and animals (Jos. Ant. XV. v. 2).

(g) Earthquake at the Crucifixion. In this case the earthquake described in Mt 27<sup>51</sup> was one of the miraculous manifestations of divine power which accompanied the death of our Lord on the cross, and was followed by rending of the rocks and of the veil of the temple, and opening of the tombs, A.D. 29.

(h) Earthquake at Philippi. This has often been considered a miraculous manifestation of divine power, called forth for the release from prison of St. Paul and Silas, A.D. 51.

* In Keith Johnston's Physical Atlas, as also in Prestwich's Map of Active and Extinct Volcanoes (Geology, vol. 1), the region of Pal. and Syria is shown as one greatly subject to earthquake shocks.

† The only other rival is that of Serbāl, but the claims of J. Musā to be Horeb far outweigh those of Serbāl. See Stanley, Sinai and Pal., ed. 1880, p. 49; Pictureque Pal., p. 113.

2. PROPHEPIC.—Earthquakes being amongst the most terrible and impressive of natural phenomena, are made use of in the Bible for prophetic imagery connected with future calamitous events; thus—(a) 'she (Ariel or Mount Zion) shall be visited of the Lord of hosts with thunder and with earthquake' (Is 29<sup>6</sup>, RV). (b) 'And there shall be famines and earthquakes in divers places' (Mt 24<sup>7</sup>). (c) 'And I saw when he [the sixth seal, and there was a great earthquake] (Rev 6<sup>12</sup>). (d) 'And he (the angel) taketh the censer, and he filled it with the fire of the altar, and cast it upon the earth; and there followed thunders, and voices, and earthquakes, and an earthquake' (Rev 8<sup>5</sup>). (e) 'And there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand persons' (Rev 11<sup>13</sup>). (f) 'And there was a great earthquake, such as was not since there were men upon the earth' (Rev 16<sup>18</sup>).

3. EARTHQUAKES OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA.—Out of the large number of recorded earthquakes, of greater or less intensity, from which Pal. and the neighbouring countries have suffered, only a few of special importance can be noticed here.

(1) A.D. 62. Earthquake in Asia Minor, the cities of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Agathicum were overthrown (Mar. Comes, p. 46, quot. by Mallet).

(2) A.D. 551. Felt over Pal., Arabia, and Syria (Theophanes, p. 192).

(3) A.D. 658. Month of June; very destructive in Pal. and Syria (Theoph. p. 232).

(4) A.D. 746. Jerus. and surrounding regions suffered greatly (Theoph. p. 363).

(5) A.D. 755. A severe shock of earthquake occurred at Jerus., whereby the Haram es-Sherif ('Mosque of Omar') was much injured (Besant and Palmer, Hist. Jerusalem, ed. 1888, p. 97).

(6) A.D. 859. Earthquake throughout Syria; in Antioch 1500 houses were thrown down (Abulfaraj, p. 166, quot. by Mallet).

(7) A.D. 1038. Earthquake by which Jerus. was much injured (Cervoni, p. 757).

(8) A.D. 1170. Succession of earthquakes passed through Pal., which, by their violence and frequency, filled all men's hearts with fear; hundreds perished in the ruins of their houses; grief and consternation spread around (Hist. Jerusalem, p. 352).

(9) A.D. 1202 (or 1204). An earthquake shook Pal. from end to end; Damascus, Tyre, and Nablus were reduced to heaps of ruins; the walls of Acre and Tripoli fell; Jerus. alone seemed spared, and there Christian and Mohammedan met together to thank God for their safety (Hist. Jerusalem, p. 492; Abulfeda, Ann. iv. p. 211).

(10) A.D. 1402. Coast of Syria affected; sea retired and then invaded the land; several towns ruined (Muratori, t. xvii. p. 974).

(11) A.D. 1759. An earthquake protracted through a period of three months, in which Acoo, Saphat, Baalbek, and other places were severely injured (Volcanoes, p. 210).

(12) A.D. 1813. An earthquake occurred at Aleppo, lasting only ten or twelve seconds, by which the town together with several others in Syria, were converted into a heap of ruins; many of the houses were destroyed (Chesn. Sur les Lignes de la Tigris).

(13) A.D. 1837, 1st Jan. Great earthquake in Pal. by which the town of Safed was destroyed, with many of the inhabitants (Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 581).

4. ORIGIN OF EARTHQUAKE PHENOMENA.—From the observations made by Hopkins, Lyell, and others regarding the cause and nature of earthquakes, it seems clearly established that they have their origin in some sudden impact of gas, steam, or molten matter, impelled by gas or steam under high pressure, beneath the solid crust. The effect of such impact is to originate a wave of translation through the crust, travelling outwards from a focus, and causing a movement of the surface to greater or less distances. These waves of translation can in some cases be represented on a map by curved lines; each line representing approximately an equal degree of seismic intensity. That there is an intimate connexion between earthquake shocks and volcanic action is proved by the fact that eruptions from volcanic craters are generally preceded by earthquake shocks, and these latter are more frequent in those regions where volcanoes, either active or extinct, abound. At the same time, the most destructive earthquakes are not necessarily in the neighbourhood of volcanoes; many of the most disastrous having occurred in places far removed from centres of eruption; as, for example, those of Lisbon in 1755, and of Charleston in N. America in 1886. Such cases as these have led to the view that active volcanoes act as a safety-valve for the escape of the elastic gases and vapour underlying the crust.*

LITERATURE.—Hopkins, Trans. Roy. Soc. Edin., 1847, p. 33; Mallet, Assoc. 1847, p. 33; Mallet, Lyell, Principles of Geology, vol. ii; Prestwich, Geology, vol. i, ch. 13, with map of earthquake areas; Judd, Volcanoes, ed. 1888, p. 343; Hull, Volcanoes, Past and Present, Cont. Sci. Ser. p. 217 (1892); for the earthquakes of the Bible, Plumptre, Biblical Studies, 136; Andrews, ibid. 137; Lord, 561, 576; Schurer, HJP, i. i. 408, 426; Pusey on Am 44. E. HULL.

EASE.—The subst. is found chiefly in the phrase 'at ease,' which has both a good and a bad meaning: Ps 25<sup>13</sup> 'His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth' (עָנָה 'in good'); but Am 6<sup>1</sup> 'Woe to them that are at ease in Zion' (עָנָה), so Job 12<sup>6</sup>, Ps 123<sup>4</sup>, Is 32<sup>11</sup>, Zec 1<sup>5</sup> with same Hebrew. Once 'ease' means 'relief,' Sir 38<sup>14</sup> 'that which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life' (ἀνταναστής, RV 'relief'). Elsewhere 'rest' or 'enjoyment,' as Dt 28<sup>65</sup> 'among these nations shalt thou find no ease' (עָנָה); Jth 1<sup>16</sup> 'there he took his ease, and banqueted' (ἐκεῖ ἐβήρυκεν); Lk 12<sup>19</sup> 'take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry' (ἀναπαύου). But in Apocr. the word occurs as the opposite of difficulty, as 2 Mac 2<sup>25</sup> 'that they that are desirous to commit to memory might have ease' (εύκορτία), 2<sup>27</sup> 'it is no ease' (οὐκ εύχερες). In these places we should now use the adverb 'easily.' But we still have 'with ease,' as in Jg 21<sup>13</sup> 'they . . . chased them, and trod them down with ease' (עָנָה), RV 'at their resting place'.

But the meaning of this passage is uncertain; Moore thinks the Heb is corrupt. The word מְנוּחָה means 'rest,' as Nu 10<sup>34</sup>, and is often translated 'rest' (Gen 22<sup>3</sup>), but it may be a place-name here, as AvM 'from Menuchah,' RVm 'at Menuchah'; there is, however, no prep. in the Heb. The older versions are at a loss. The AV rendering is from the Geneva Bible 'chased them at ease,' with marg. 'drove them from their rests.' Taverner gives 'chased them to Menoah'; Cov. 'followed upon'; neither was there any rest of Menuchah. Th. Osterwald 'depuis Menuha.' On the whole it seems best, if we are to accept the text, to take the word as a place-name; and then Osterwald is probably nearest the mark 'depuis Menuha jusqu'à l'opposite de Gu bha.'

The verb has always the meaning of 'give relief'; but that may be either by lightening a burden, as 2 Ch 10<sup>4</sup> 'ease thou somewhat the grievous servitude of thy father'; or by removing it altogether, as Is 1<sup>2</sup> 'I will ease me of mine adversaries' (עָנָה), 2 Es 7<sup>28</sup> 'if he did not so of his goodness, that they which have committed iniquities might be eased of them, the ten thousand part of men should not remain living' (עָנָה). (1. Jer. Taylor (1630), Works, iii. 90, 'I am no sooner eased of him, but Gregory Gandergoose . . . catches me by the goll'; and Pope, Odys. xxi. 342, 'Ease your bosoms of a fear so vain.' Tindale meant to express the removal of the burden when he trd Mt 11<sup>28</sup> 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are laden, and I will ease you'; and so Hos 11<sup>7</sup> Cov. 'their pro-

*The theory of Mr. B. Mallet differs somewhat from the above; briefly stated, he considers that earthquakes originate in shocks caused by the strain overcoming the resistance along lines of fracture traversing the earth's crust; this strain being due to the secular cooling of the crust and consequent contraction (Trans. Roy. Irish Acad. vol. xxi.).

phetes laye the yocke vpon them, but they ease them not of their burthen.' J. HASTINGS.

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE (צִדְוֹן, vía ávaroláw).—A general name for the inhabitants of the country east of Palestine, especially the Syrian desert, but also including what was known of Arabia; in Jg 6<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> and 8<sup>10</sup>, the Children of the East are coupled with Midian and Amalek; in Jer 49<sup>28</sup> with Kedar. The mention of their עִמְרָה, or Bedawin encampments (Ezk 25<sup>4, 10</sup>), which they are to erect on the lands of Moab and Ammon, identifies them with the Ishmaelites, of whom the same technical term is used. To their proverbial wisdom reference is made in 1 K 5<sup>10</sup> and Is 19<sup>11</sup>, and it is probably the reason why the author of the Book of Job made his hero one of them (Job 1<sup>3</sup>). In Gn 29<sup>1</sup> 'the land of the children of the E.' might seem to be Mesopotamia; but it is more probable that different views of the habitation of Laban are conflated in that chapter.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

EAST SEA, EASTERN SEA.—See DEAD SEA.

EASTER, used in AV as the tr. of τὸ πάσχα in Ac 12<sup>4</sup> 'intending after E. to bring him forth to the people.' RV has substituted correctly 'the Passover.' The anachronism of AV was inherited from older Vss which avoided, as far as possible, expressions which could not be understood by the people. A. C. HEADLAM.

EBAL or OBAL.—1. Name of a son of Joktan (עֵבֶל Gn 10<sup>28</sup> MT, עֵבֶל ib. Sam., Γαβάλ Luc., 1 Ch 1<sup>22</sup>), probably representing a place or tribe in Arabia. There are several places in S. Arabia with names approximating to the Hebrew forms, e.g. 'Ābān, a mountain near San'a (recently mentioned by Hamdani); 'Obāl, a place in the district of Hujailah visited by Glaser (1887); 'Ābīl, mentioned by Halévy; but till more is known of the source of the ethnological tables in Gn, it is impossible to assign any probability to such identifications. Identifications from the root 'abl occur as tribal names at the commencement of Islam (Tāj al-arūs, viii. 4), and it is likely that the author had in mind some tribe, otherwise unknown, bearing such an appellation. 2. Name of a son of Shobal son of Seir (עֵבֶל Gn 36<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>40</sup>). D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

EBAL (עֵבֶל, Arab. el-Islamtyeh).—Ebal and Gerizim, the mounts of Cursing and Blessing, form the most conspicuous and important summits of the hills of Samaria. This distinction is due partly to their superior height and to their central position in the whole land, but chiefly to the deep cleft between them which breaks the outline of the long mountain ridge running N. and S. This natural pass between E. and W., led up to by wheat-growing plains on each side, became inevitably a place of importance both for purposes of commerce and in times of war. The existence of a branch of the main road from N. to S. leading through the narrow opening between Ebal and Gerizim, would still further tend to make the locality familiar and important. It needed only the additional circumstance of numerous fountains in the fertile hollow where the bases met, to create an Oriental town where the traveller might rest in safety and the inhabitants would possess all that was necessary for man and beast. Such a town was the ancient Shechem (Gr. Neapolis, Arab. Nablās), occupying the defile where it is only 150 yds. wide.

This attractiveness and convenience of the place is exemplified in the lives of Abraham and Jacob; the former arriving here on his first entry into the land of Canaan (Gn 12<sup>6, 7</sup>), and Jacob resting at the same spot on his return from Paddan-aram (Gn 33<sup>18-20</sup>).

Ebal and Gerizim face N. and S., the latter being the more celebrated in religious history, but the N. summit (3077 ft.) being 200 ft. higher, and commanding a more free and extensive prospect.

1. View of the Land from Ebal.—The beginning of the ascent from Nablûs is over grass of intensest green and enamelled lustre, through irrigated vegetable gardens of rank luxuriance, and under foliage of juicy trans-jordanic sparkling in the sunlight—one of the most fertile and picturesque spots in Palestine.

Above this, one enters immediately upon the silvery grey of the olive trees, which rapidly become scanty and irregular as the path opens in earnest upon the mountain climb. Then stony terraces and rocky face, with thistles and thorny shrubs, until the traveller reaches the broad, bare summit, and stands upon the central peak of the whole land. Looking N., one sees the Jordan, towering aloft in the distance, glistening with snow-streaked crests beyond the boundary plain in which lay Abel (Ibl), Baal-gad (Cæsarea Philippi, Banias), and Dan (Tell el-Kadi). On the E., rising steeply from the Jordan bed, is seen the long, slumbrous, uniform ridge of Gilead and Moab. To the S., conspicuous summits can be identified in the neighbourhood of Jerus.; and to the W., beyond the lower hills and patchwork of broad plain, the yellow coast-line sweeps from Jaffa to Carmel.

Such a commanding view from such a central point emphasizes at once the limitations of the land and the grandeur of the events that have given it immortality.

2. Religious Connection.—One of the most important of these events was the arrival at this spot of Abraham in his journey of faith to the land of Canaan, and his receiving by the terebinth of Moreh a promise from the Lord, 'unto thy seed will I give this land' (Gn 12<sup>7</sup>). It was fitting that the fulfilment of the promise, after more than 400 years of waiting and preparation, should receive its great public announcement at the very place where it had been given. It was also deeply appropriate that in a land where customs and occupations, scenery and social life, were to be a storehouse of parable and moral teaching to the world, its central heights of Ebal and Gerizim should be baptized into this service and be known as the mountains of Cursing and Blessing. It was accordingly here that Joshua (Jos 8<sup>30-35</sup>) assembled the congregation, and erected the memorial altar according to the command and detailed instructions of Moses (Dt 11<sup>29, 30</sup> and 27. 28). In addition to the duty of formal compliance with such a command, there was an inner urgency of the hour that called for such an act of declaration and decision. For the past 40 years the Isr. had received the fruits of adversity: they were now to face the greater temptation of success. The emergency was a suitable one for setting forth the moral regalia of the kingdom, and the responsibilities of its service. The recent experience at Jericho and Ai had emphasized the plain conditions of triumph and failure. Still further the incident of the Gibeonites, and the rumour of confederated opposition, set before them the dangers and difficulties of the work. And so on that memorable day, in the defile between Ebal and Gerizim, the Isr. entered upon the inheritance of the promises in the only way that it can be entered—through the door of complete and conscious surrender to the will of God. They were to possess the land, but not for themselves. The assemblage was on a scale of vastness suitable to the moral elevation of the thought. In the central hollow of the hills rested the sacred ark that had so unerringly guided them in the journey, and was now pointing to the final resting-place of secure possession. Up the opposing sides of Ebal and Gerizim, six tribes to each, rising with the mountain slopes and terraces in solid masses where the ground was level, with fluttering groups and sprinklings on points of advantage, all bright colours mingling with the predominant white, the whole congregation of Israel was drawn up—an army in array for the battle of life. It was the Coronation Day of the Moral Law. God could not do more for His people, and, to invert the familiar phrase, His extremity became min's. If righteousness could come by it, it have come then and continued. As the solemn entail of forfeiture was proclaimed from Ebal, and the bright succession of blessings from Gerizim, the announcement was received with an acclamation of amens. It was a mingling of the two voices of Destiny and Disposition, of Divine purpose and human choice.

—Robinson, BRP; Stanley, Sinai and Pal.; and Book; Smith, Illustrations; Murray's and Baedeker's Guide Books.
G. M. MACKIE.

EBED (עֶבֶד).—1. The father of Gaal, who headed the rebellion against Abimelech (Jg 9<sup>25-35</sup>). 2. One of those who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8<sup>9</sup>), called in 1 Es 8<sup>32</sup> Obeth.

EBED-MELECH (עֶבֶד-מֶלֶךְ).—An Ethiop. eunuch, at whose intercession and by whose personal exertions Jeremiah was released from the pit-prison of Malchiah. For this kindly service E. was rewarded from the fate of his companions (Jer 38<sup>7-13</sup>). It is possible that the name E., which means 'servant of [the] king,' may have been an official title. A very ancient seal (see fig. on p. 258 of Benzinger's Heb. Arch.) is inscribed 'Obadiah servant of the king' (Obadiah 'ebhed hammelek). More probable, however, is the view of Gray (Heb. Philology, 117, 147), who takes Melech as a divine name.

J. A. SELBIE.

EBENEZER (עֵבֶן עֶזֶר or עֶזֶר 'Stone of help').—Mentioned three times in 1 S. According to 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> it is the scene of a great defeat of the Isr. at the hands of the Phil. in the time of Eli, while in 7<sup>12</sup> it is the name of a stone set up by Samuel to commemorate a great victory over the Philistines; it is further noticeable that in 7<sup>12</sup> the name is apparently given for the first time, though the victory there described happened some twenty years after the events of ch. 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>. In 7<sup>12</sup>, which belongs to a somewhat later document, E. is placed under Beth-car, and between Mizpah and Hasshan ('the tooth'); but we must here follow the LXX (ἡ πέτρα παλαιά), and read 'between Mizpah and Jashan (or Jeshanah)'; the latter (cf. 2 Ch 13<sup>7</sup>) is probably the modern 'Ain Sinia, to the N. of Beirût. On this view, E. would lie somewhere at the head of the valley of Aijalon; this site is further favoured by the notice in 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>. The more generally accepted theory, however, places E. more to the north, at the head of the vale of Sorek, and either identifies the stone set up by Samuel with the great stone at Bethshemesh (6<sup>18</sup>) or places it in the immediate neighbourhood. But this identification does not suit 7<sup>12</sup>, and is hardly compatible with the narrative of 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>. See G. A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. p. 223 f.
J. F. STENNING.

EBER (עֶבֶר).—1. The eponymous ancestor of the HEBREWS (which see), great-grandson of Shem, son of Shelah, and father of Peleg and Joktan (Gn 10<sup>24</sup>, 11<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>18, 19, 25</sup>), perhaps used poetically for Israel in Nu 24<sup>24</sup> (but see Dillm. ad loc.).

2. The representative family of Amok in the days of 12<sup>20</sup>. 3. A Gadite family name, 1 Ch 5<sup>12</sup>. 4. 5. The name of two Benjaminite families, 1 Ch 8<sup>12, 22</sup>. See GENEALOGY.
J. A. SELBIE.

EBEZ (עִבְזַי), 'white.'—A city of Issachar (Jos 19<sup>20</sup>). The site is uncertain. Probably the ruin El-Beidhah, 'the white,' east of Carmel. SWP vol. i. sheet v.
C. R. CONDER.

EBIASAPH.—See ABIASAPH.

EBONY (עֵבֶן הַחַיִּים hobnim).—The Arab. name for this wood is very near the Heb., being ebnits. There can be no reasonable doubt of the identity of the wood intended in the single passage in which it is mentioned (Ezk 27<sup>15</sup>). It was brought to Tyre by merchants from Dedan, on the Pers. Gulf. It is the black heart-wood of Ebenum, L., and several other species of Ebenum genus, trees of a large size in Ceylon and S. India. Ebenum, however, furnishes the best wood. It resembles the common and the Japanese persimmon in its mode of growth and inflorescence, and in bearing an edible fruit, between a pome and a berry. The sap-wood is white and valueless, but the heart often yields a log 2 ft. in diameter, and 10 to 15 ft. long.
G. E. POST.

EBRON (עֵבְרוֹן).—A town in the territory assigned to Asher (Jos 19<sup>28</sup> RV; wrongly written Hebron in A.V., as if from עֵבְרוֹן, the name of the famous Judæan city). It is just possible that we should read 'Ebdon, for 'Ebron, the latter form having arisen from the substitution, not uncommon, of ע for ב. It is noteworthy that this name, 'Ebron, occurs but once, while in the other name-lists for Asher (Jos 21<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>74</sup>) we have an 'Ebdon or 'Abdon, which is absent here. This supposition has the support of twenty MSS (Gesenius). It is, however, in conflict with the ancient versions, all of which give 'Ebron, with the single exception of B, which unaccountably has 'EABON. From the order in which the towns are mentioned, we should seek for E. somewhere north of Cabûl, and south of Rehob, Hammôn, and Kanah. No certain identification has yet been made: in 10<sup>10</sup> on the ruin of 'Abdeh answers well enough the condition indicated. Twelve miles north of Cabûl, about 10 miles N.N.E. of Acre, and 3 miles east of Achzib,—the modern Ez-Zib,—it occupies a slight eminence on the northern edge of the Plain of Acre, the mountains rising like grim guardians behind. If we accept the identification of 'Ebron with 'Abdon, this seems to be the most probable site.
W. EWING.

ECBATANA.—See ACHMETHA.

ECCLESIASTES (קֹהֶלֶת Kohēleth, LXX Ἐκκλησιαστής, Aq. Κωλέθ).—1. The TITLE.—This presents some difficulties, which have scarcely as yet been satisfactorily explained. The word is a fem. part. of the Qal conj. The verb is not found elsewhere in this conj. In the Hiph. the word means 'to call an assembly together.' It is commonly held that here the Qal is used with the force of the Niph., and that Kohēleth means 'one who convenes an assembly.' There have been other interpretations, such as 'a collector of sayings,' or 'one who gathers wisdom from various quarters.' But since the verb is always used with ref. to persons and never with ref. to things, these are untenable. Tyler urges that the causative force cannot be put into the word, and he explains it to mean 'one who is an assembly.' Kohēleth would thus be a personification of 'an ideal assembly of those Jewish philosophers, Stoic, Epicurean, and others, whose opinions were influential at the time when the book was composed' (Tyler, Ec. 59). But this is too artificial to be probable, and it seems best to fall back on the common view, that K. means 'the convener of an assembly.' A greater difficulty is caused by the fem. form. This has been explained on the hypothesis that the speaker is Wisdom, impersonated in Solomon, and K. is fem. as agreeing with the fem. word for Wisdom. This view has been taken by Ewald, Hitzig, Ginsburg, and others. Against this, however, serious objections may be urged. It is strange that Wisdom should be nowhere mentioned as the speaker. Further, it is barely conceivable that Wisdom should have used some of the language put into the mouth of K. (1<sup>17, 18</sup> 7<sup>23</sup> etc.), or that Solomon should be regarded as her impersonation, considering the experiences through which the speaker says that he has passed. Again, the tone of the discourses is so different from what we find in those passages where Wisdom is actually represented as speaking, that if the writer had intended to make Solomon the spokesman of Wisdom he would have felt it necessary, in view of this striking difference, to say so explicitly. It is also to be observed that the verb used with K. is masc., and on the view we are discussing it is explained by the theory that the fem. Wisdom speaks through the masc. Solomon. The objections already urged against the identification of K. with Wisdom have led to the view that we are to find in the fem. form, not a distinction of sex, but a variation in meaning. In other words, the Preacher is a male, but the fem. termination conveys a special shade of meaning. This gives a better account of the use of the masc. verb. The word may then mean 'one who holds the office of a teacher or preacher' (Delitzsch, Nowack, Cheyne), or, if the fem. has an intensive force, 'the great orator' (W. Wright, RVm). Kuenen feels himself unable to decide between the view that K. is Wisdom and that the fem. does not express distinction of sex. The arguments for the latter view seem to be stronger, and we should probably interpret K. to mean 'one who holds the office of teacher.' The title Ecclesiastes comes from the LXX.

That by K. the author means Solomon has been subject to dispute, but should admit of none. He is identified with 'the son of David, king in Jerus.' (1<sup>1</sup>), and says of himself, 'I, K., was king over Israel in Jerusalem.' The son of David who was king is best explained strictly and not loosely to mean descendant. After the division of the kingdom a king could not have spoken of himself as reigning over Israel in Jerusalem. It is also clear that Solomon is the king whose varied experiences of wisdom and luxury are referred to in chs. 1 and 2.

2. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—The book was, till the period of critical investigation, almost universally ascribed to Solomon. Some writers still support this view, though it is abandoned by all critics of eminence. The main reason is that Kohēleth speaks in the first person, and therefore if the author was not Solomon he would be deceiving his readers. This does not follow. The author of Job uses the literary vehicle of a debate to reach the solution of his problem. Here the writer has chosen an autobiographical sketch of Solomon as his literary vehicle. And he has done so for reasons which are quite obvious. Solomon was the typical representative of Wisdom, and the author wished to set forth his conclusions as those of a man who had brought the deepest and sanest reflection to bear upon life. But it was also important that his experience should be wide, and his opportunities of testing the value of life in its various forms of the fullest. Here Solomon admirably served his purpose. Not only was he the wise man, but he was a king whose magnificence has passed into a proverb, and who was able to gratify every wish. He was thus able to wring the most out of life, and from him the sentence 'All is vanity' would come with greater force than from any other. This is no proof that he is not the author, but it removes any antecedent prejudice against the denial of the Solomonic authorship, based on the statements of the book.

The objections to the Solomonic authorship are overwhelming. The very language quoted to prove it is seen on examination to be unfavourable to it. Solomon can hardly have said 'I was king,' as if he had ceased to be so, for he reigned till his death. The words 'over Israel in Jerus.' are most naturally explained by the writer's knowledge of kings of Israel who did not reign in Jerusalem. And since it was his own father who had made Jerus. the royal city, and Solomon had not been preceded by a long line of kings, he could scarcely have spoken of 'all that were before me in Jerus.' (1<sup>16</sup> 27<sup>8</sup>). There are also many passages which do not suit the Solomon of history. The writer speaks with bitterness of the oppression of the weak and the perversion of judgment. Solomon would not have tolerated such abuses if he had felt them so keenly as the author. Certainly, so far from feeling any keen distress at oppression, his Commentary systematically oppressive. The Commentary do not impress us as those of a king who stands above his subjects, but as those of a subject sympathizing with the misery of his fellow-subjects. Instead of judgment and righteousness he sees wickedness, and bids his readers not to wonder at oppression and violence. The State is not well-ordered and prosperous as in the time of Solomon. 'Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low places.' This is an error which proceeds from the ruler. Servants ride on horses, and princes walk on the earth. Nor can the reference to the king's system of spies, and the writer's bitter advice based upon it, be seriously regarded as from a king (10<sup>20</sup>). Other references to kings (4<sup>13-15</sup> 10<sup>16,17</sup>) are Commentary conceivable in Solomon's mouth. Nor he Commentary view, that Solomon wrote the book in his old age after renouncing of his idolatry, any support in the book itself. From beginning to end there is no confession of wrong-doing, no ref. to idolatry, no hint of repentance. It dwells on the unsatisfying nature of life, but penitent confession is quite alien to its whole spirit and purpose. The author is certainly not a satisfactory or edifying penitent.

But the same conclusion that Solomon cannot be the author is shown by the language. The linguistic evidence is so decisive that Delitzsch has said, in words that have been quoted with approval by many critics since: 'If the Book of K. be of old-Solomonic origin, then there is no history of the Heb. language.' And Driver, whose opinion on such a matter is of exceptional value, says: 'Linguistically, K. stands by itself in OT. The Heb. in which it is written has numerous features in common with the latest parts of OT, Ezr, Neh, Ch, Est, but it has in addition many not met with in these books, but found first in the fragments of Ben-Sira (c. B.C. 200) or in the Mishnah (c. A.D. 200). The characteristic of the Hebrew in which these latest parts of OT are written is, that while many of the old classical words and expressions still continue in use, and, in fact, still preponderate, the syntax is deteriorated, the structure of sentences is cumbersome and melegant, and there is a very decided admixture of words and idioms not found before, having usually affinities with the Aramaic, or being such as are in constant and regular use in the Heb. of post-Christian times (the Mishnah, etc.).

And this latter element is decidedly larger and more prominent in Ec than in either Est or Ezr-Neh-Ch' (LOT, 444). The phenomena, in fact, are consistent only with the post-exilic date, and the Solomonic authorship is therefore out of the question. The detailed evidence may be found in Delitzsch's Com. (Germ. ed.), or in Wright's Ecclesiastes, Excursus iv. (see also Driver, LOT as above).

Critics who deny the Solomonic authorship, i.e. all critics who need be taken into account, are unanimous in assigning the book to the post-ex. period. There are two main theories—one that it belongs to the later years of the Pers. period, which came to a close B.C. 332; the other, that it comes from the Gr. period, and should be dated about B.C. 200. The former is the view of Ewald, Delitzsch, Ginsburg, and Cheyne in his Job and Solomon. In favour of the latter are Noldeke, Kuenen, Hitzig, Tyler, Plumptre, Cornill, and Toy; while Cheyne in his Founders thinks it is probably correct. Nowack and Driver think the language points to the later date, but is not decisive; and so much is undoubtedly correct, if we Commentary accept the later date on the ground of Commentary evidence alone. There are other criteria of importance. The political conditions implied yield valuable data. Cornill says: 'The general picture of the circumstances makes us fix on a Commentary anarchy, in which well-ordered Commentary be spoken of, worthless revolutionaries seize the government and exhaust the country, and political wisdom is recognized to consist in a dull, listless submission to Commentary and tyranny' (Einleit. 251). The justice of this description is clear from these passages, 4<sup>13-15</sup> 10<sup>5-7,20</sup>. This compels us to place it at the earliest in the later years of the Pers. period, and precludes a date in the earlier part of that period. But it will suit equally well the date in the Gr. period, about B.C. 200. Hitzig thinks on account of 10<sup>16</sup> that its date is B.C. 204, when Ptolemy Epiphanes ascended the throne at the age of five. He takes 9<sup>13-16</sup> to be an allusion to the siege of Dora in B.C. 218. But this did not succeed owing to the Commentary of the place, not because a poor wise man Commentary it. He explains 4<sup>13-16</sup> of the high priest Onias ('the old and foolish king') and his nephew Joseph ('the poor and wise youth'), but the statements of the passage are not true of them. The political circumstances admit of either date. Kuenen thinks that the cosmopolitan tone of the book speaks for its origin in the Gr. period; but, as Nowack points out, this is characteristic of Heb. Wisdom generally. In its attitude to the doctrine of a future life Kuenen regards it as a forerunner of Sadduceism. The writer's views, it is true, are those of the older Heb. theology, but they are put forth in opposition to the newer doctrine. Nowack thinks that these arguments would tell rather in favour of a Maccabean date, when the two tendencies of Pharisaism and Sadduceism became explicit. This does not follow, since, as Kuenen points out, while he is a forerunner of the Sadducees, he is so little a Sadducee that Graetz could regard him as a disciple of Hillel. This is most naturally explained by the view that he wrote before the rise of these distinct parties.

The most plausible argument in favour of the later date is derived from the supposed influence of Gr. philosophy. Tyler was the first to work out in detail the supposed influences of post-Aristotelian philosophy, and he was followed by Plumptre in his Commentary. A full and apparently conclusive refutation may be found in Cheyne's Job and Sol. (see also Nowack). Tyler's view is that the signs of acquaintance with Stoicism and Epicureanism are unmistakable. The author, however, he takes to be neither Stoic nor Epicurean, but one who leaves the doctrines of the two schools side by side in order to warn his readers against studies which could conduct to no certain goal, but led to opinions so opposed. The following points of contact with Stoicism are adduced. The doctrine that man should live according to nature is set forth in the catalogue of Times and Seasons (31-8). The doctrine of history presents no progress, but is found in the description of the endless round in which the affairs of men move, so that all effort secures no progress but only return to a former condition (12-10). Fatalism is present in both; both regard the weaknesses of men as a kind of insanity, and both dwell on the futility of life. But no weight can be attached to these. The doctrine of repetition which characterizes life is not put forward as a philosophical doctrine, but as a fact to be accepted by observation and experience. The sense of the futility of life is due to disillusion, and was not learnt in a school of philosophy. Fatalism is only a coincidence. The view that the weaknesses of men are a kind of insanity is a genuine idea of Hellenistic wisdom which treats wisdom and folly as equally unsatisfactory. Men are as beasts, and returning to it; pleasure is the form of undisturbed tranquillity. The sea does not fill, the body is dissolved into its elements. The parallels are commonplace, and no distinctively Epicurean doctrine is to be found. It needed no philosophy to learn that man returned to dust, and that the life of the body was not to be followed by the rivers that fed it, or that pleasure was good if enjoyed in moderation. The new view of the future life. For traces of Stoicism the appeal is often to late coincidences are either unreal or explained from Heb. as well as Gr. We can therefore hardly rely on this alleged influence of Greek philosophy. Kuenen thinks that the philosophical element in the stricter sense is absent. But a general influence, he thinks, may be detected. And if the date in the Gr. period is accepted, we may believe that the writer is influenced by the atmosphere of Gr. thought.

So far, then, as the arguments for the two dates go, they cannot be said to be decisive. The linguistic argument pleads strongly for the later date, and there is no argument to set against it on the other side. The balance of probability, therefore, dips towards a date c. B.C. 200, though the book may possibly belong to the Persian period. Renan has put forward the view that the date is B.C. 125. But it was probably quoted as scripture shortly afterwards, which implies a longer previous history than Renan assigns to it. And after the Maccabean struggle we should expect greater religious fervour. Graetz' view, that it belongs to the reign of Herod the Great (whom he identifies with K.), is probably excluded by the fact that it seems to have been quoted as scripture before that time; and apart from this it is questionable if the history of the Canon will permit of its composition so late.

3. THE INTEGRITY OF THE BOOK.—Certain passages have been suspected by several critics as later interpolations. The Epilogue (12<sup>13-14</sup>) was the first to be suspected, but later the authenticity of the following has also been denied. The whole of 12<sup>13-14</sup>, however, does not stand or fall together, since vv. 9-12 are denied on other grounds than vv. 13, 14. It will be most convenient to take 12<sup>13-14</sup> first. The substance of the book evidently ends at 12<sup>8</sup>. K. ends on the same note as that on which he began, 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' In itself, however, this does not mark these verses as due to another hand. To the end of 12<sup>8</sup> Solomon is represented as speaking, and in 12<sup>9-12</sup> the real author may be regarded as speaking in his own person, and commending the book as the work of one of 'the wise.' Nor is it any serious argument against this that the author is represented in the body of the book as a king, but here as a wise man, for Solomon was the chief representative of 'the wise.' It is true that there are difficulties in the passage, and some uncommon expressions, but in themselves they do not warrant the view that the verses are the work of another writer. Those who think so regard them as a recommendation affixed to the work by a later hand. But the writer speaks of the author as if he were another than himself, in order to keep up the assumption of Solomonic authorship.

The other alleged interpolations raise a much more difficult question. 12<sup>13-14</sup> are suspected partly on account of their general tenor, partly from their reference to the judgment. It seems strange to announce as the conclusion of the matter, that the teaching of the book may be summed up in the injunctions to 'fear God and keep his commandments.' Its teaching is rather that 'all is vanity and striving after wind,' and that man's wisest course is to recognize this and extract as much pleasure from life as he can. It is not denied that the fear of God is advised in the book, but that it is its main theme, or the chief lesson to be drawn from it. Kuenen, who gives a very long and elaborate defence of the authenticity of the entire Epilogue, admits that if this were interpreted in the highest sense as the one thing about which man had to concern himself, we should be compelled to deny 12<sup>13-14</sup> to the author of the rest of the book. He argues, however, that the writer simply means that the fear of God and keeping of His commandments is the indispensable condition of enjoying life. But it is questionable whether the explicit words, 'for this is the whole duty of man,' do not compel us to interpret the command in the larger sense which Kuenen denies. The Epilogue is also suspected because of its style. And the same objection lies against it. 'But know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' If the reference is to a judgment after death, it seems improbable that they can be harmonized with other passages in the book (cf. 3<sup>19-21</sup> 9<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>). But it is possible that a judgment in this life is referred to. This requires a change of reading in 3<sup>17</sup>, when instead of 'there' (עַל שָׁמַיִם), 'he hath appointed' (עַל שָׁמַיִם) would be read. It is not clear, however, that this yields so good a sense, and it is not improbable that in all the passages a judgment after death is spoken of. In 12<sup>13</sup> the difficulty arises partly from the idea, which is thought to be alien to the general tenor of the book, partly from its incongruity with the context. The counsel, 'Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth,' is not what we expect from the author of such a book. Nor do the preceding counsels lead up to this. The young man is bidden to rejoice in all the days of his life, esp. in the days of his youth, remembering the dark days that await him in Sheol. But remembering not only these, but all the failure of manly vigour and his physical powers, and of the zest for pleasure that will come upon him with old age, he would do well to make the most of his prime of life. This gives a connected sense, and one in harmony with the rest of the book, and we obtain it by deleting 12<sup>13</sup> and connecting 12<sup>14</sup> with 11<sup>10</sup>. The meaning in that case will be—make the best of your youth in the enjoyment of pleasures before the evil days of old age come, when you will say, I have no delight in them. It is true that the connexion of 12<sup>14</sup> with 11<sup>10</sup> is a little awkward if 12<sup>13</sup> is omitted, but the connexion in the text is even more awkward. Graetz proposes to retain the words with a slight alteration of the Hebrew, and to read, 'Remember also thy fountain (i.e. thy wife) in the days of thy youth.' This is not grotesque, though it has been criticized as such; nor even unworthy, for it is an exhortation to a life of conjugal purity (in opposition to illicit amours), such as we have also in 9<sup>8</sup>. But it is scarcely a happy suggestion. Bickell not only adopts the correction of the text, but attempts to improve the connexion by transposition. 12<sup>14</sup> ('and the spirit return unto God who gave it') may be retained on the ground that it simply implies the dissolution of the personality into its original sources, the body will return to dust, the spirit to God. The 'spirit' is more than the breath of life. A very serious objection need be felt to 7<sup>s</sup> or 8<sup>12, 13</sup>.

While Kuenen retains these views, which he supports by denying anything of a higher point of view than we generally find in the book, several critics defer to the whole, with the obvious exception of his Bampton Lectures which have been included, for otherwise a scribe would have passed it by, and it would have been simply left out of the Canon. This, however, is questionable.

A book which really teaches true religion, and a few interpolations would bring this out more clearly. He also urges that it is more probable that an Isr. would have this reserve in the bottom of his soul, than that he should give way to blank and unrelieved pessimism. It is more remarkable to find so much as Cornill defending their authenticity. He maintains that the same thoughts run through the whole book; the fear of God and God the Judge are cardinal conceptions. In his very striking passage on the contents of the book he says: 'OT piety has never achieved a greater triumph than in the Bk of K.' (Einleit. 251). While the author sees the misery of the world as clearly as our modern pessimists, he is so penetrated by the piety of OT that he does not hit on the simplest and most obvious solution, that the world is the plaything of blind chance. He returns to the faith of his childhood in a personal God and a moral order of the world.

These views, and they are shared by other critics, are of weight. Yet it is doubtful if they do justice to the phenomena on the other side. It is very true that the author's meditations end as they begin: 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' Would he have been so if he had really fought his way back to the faith of his childhood? Cornill seems to overstate the case when he says that similar thoughts run through the book, and that the fear of God and God the Judge are cardinal conceptions. The theism of the book is not very pronounced. Cheyne says with justice: 'To me, K. is not a theist in any vital sense in his philosophic meditations. . . . He certainly never lost his theism, though pale and cheerless it was indeed, and utterly unable to stand against the assaults of doubt and despondency.' Looking at his speculations from a somewhat different viewpoint, it might even be alleged that K.'s theism is the source of all his perplexities. To every Hebrew, God and Providence were convertible notions, and this God, which to Job was an immorality, might be to K. a puzzle. Upon this theory it may, of course, be urged that rigid consistency is not to be expected in a man of the writer's temperament, who would speak according to his mood. Yet we may surely think that a man of his intellectual power and close observation of life would have some fixed principles; and we find them running through most of his meditations. When we find a few sayings that seem to run contrary to these, we may either try to explain them with the general view of the author, or we may see them as interpolations due to a different set of interests of orthodoxy. The former course seems preferable to that of leaving them as unreconciled contradictions. It seems on the whole most probable that at least 12<sup>12, 13, 14</sup> are later interpolations (assuming that 'thy Creator' is correctly read in 12<sup>14</sup>), and possibly also 3<sup>17</sup> and 11<sup>10</sup>. On the other hand, 12<sup>7</sup> can be explained so as to avoid any conflict with the author's views.

The view of Krochmal with reference to the Epilogue must not be passed over in silence. He regarded 12<sup>11, 12</sup> or 12<sup>11, 14</sup> (it is not clear which) as appended to the whole of the third part of the Canon (the Kethubim or Writings). He adopted the view as the conclusion of the Kethubim, but the Canon added nothing for Ec. as by the author. It is unnecessary to discuss this view, which rests on pure hypothesis, and has been almost universally rejected.

This part of the subject, it remains only to mention the original theory of Bickell. Eng. readers may find it presented in Dillon's Sceptics of OT, with a tr. of the book as given in Cheyne's Job and Solomon (p. 273 ff.). It is that the Heb. MS from which our text is descended met with an accident. The sheets were dislocated, and passages were brought into order which had originally no connexion with each other. Two sets of interpolations were then made. One series was designed to connect the verses which had been thus brought together. The other interpolations were intended to give the book an orthodox tone. The detailed working-out, which is very brilliant and ingenious, cannot be exhibited here. We may, however, give his results as to the original book and its order. He makes the orig. K. to consist of 1-12, 13-14, 15-16, 17-18, 19-20, 21-22, 23-24, 25-26, 27-28, 29-30, 31-32, 33-34, 35-36, 37-38, 39-40, 41-42, 43-44, 45-46, 47-48, 49-50, 51-52, 53-54, 55-56, 57-58, 59-60, 61-62, 63-64, 65-66, 67-68, 69-70, 71-72, 73-74, 75-76, 77-78, 79-80, 81-82, 83-84, 85-86, 87-88, 89-90, 91-92, 93-94, 95-96, 97-98, 99-100. The theory is open to very serious objections. It is questionable whether it will stand the test of exegesis; and to quote Cheyne's words: 'Apart from other difficulties in the way of the theory, the number and arbitrariness of the interpolations are reason enough to reject it.' Bickell also says that the original book should have been taken piece together, and combined to produce our Bk of Ec. Bickell has argued an objection, which if valid is fatal to the supposition that the original book could have occurred. It is that, at so early a period, the codex form would not be used, but the roll form, and therefore there would be no sheets to be dislocated by such accidents as are postulated by the theory.

4. CONTENTS AND THOUGHT.—It is very difficult to give an account of the contents of Ec which shall be at once clear, brief, and adequate. There is very little strict development of the thought, and the endless repetition which the writer sees in nature and life has its partial counterpart in his book. The difficulty is increased by the uncertainty as to interpolations and the exegesis of particular passages. The following outline may be given. Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. No profit comes to man from all his toil. Nature and man go ceaselessly round and round in the same course with utterly wearisome monotony, and there is no new thing under the sun (1<sup>2</sup>). K. being king over Jerus. uses his wisdom to understand the life of men, and finds that all is vanity (1<sup>2-15</sup>). He finds, too, that the search to know wisdom and folly is vanity, and that wisdom brings sorrow (1<sup>16-18</sup>). He tries to find happiness in pleasure, and exhausts every source of enjoyment, but finds it is all vanity (2<sup>1-11</sup>). Wisdom far exceeds folly, yet wise and fool perish and are forgotten alike (3<sup>1-17</sup>). The accumulation of wealth is vanity, for the man who has gathered it by toil and wisdom must die and leave it to another, it may be to a fool (2<sup>18-23</sup>). The best thing in life is to eat and drink, as God permits. Yet even this is vanity (2<sup>24-26</sup>). A time is allotted for everything. This is the doing of God, who has set the world [or eternity] in man's heart, yet so that His plan cannot be understood. Since man cannot understand the plan by which the season for everything is appointed, he will do well to enjoy life as much as he can. All is fixed unalterably by God, that men should fear Him (3<sup>1-15</sup>). The sight of oppression makes him think that God will judge the righteous and the wicked. But man dies like the beasts, and should enjoy life while he may, for he cannot return to it after he is dead (3<sup>16-22</sup>). The oppression of the helpless convinces him that the dead are in better case than the living, and best of all is not to have been born at all (4<sup>1-3</sup>). Successful labour is vanity, for it only causes a man to be envied (4<sup>4-6</sup>). The efforts of the lonely man to attain wealth are vanity; and there is safety and comfort in the possession of a friend (4<sup>7-12</sup>). A poor wise youth succeeded an old and foolish king, yet the king himself depends like all his subjects on the products of the earth] (5<sup>8-9</sup>). Accumulation of wealth is vanity, for it brings little pleasure and much anxiety (5<sup>10-12</sup>). Sometimes wealth is accumulated by labour and lost by misfortune, so that the possessor has no enjoyment out of it (5<sup>13-17</sup>). It is best to eat and drink and enjoy life, so far as God gives one the power, and thus make life pass without too much reflexion (5<sup>18-20</sup>). God sometimes gives the means of enjoying life, but withholds the power of enjoyment (6<sup>1-6</sup>). Toil is for the appetite which is insatiable, the wise is no better off than the fool; possession is better than inordinate desire, but this too is vanity (6<sup>7-9</sup>). The destiny of man has been determined for him, he cannot struggle against it, nor does he know what is good for him (6<sup>10-12</sup>). A good name is better than ointment, death than birth, sorrow than mirth (7<sup>1-9</sup>). The end is better than the beginning, patience than vexation, wisdom than property. Whether in prosperity or adversity be your lot, consider that God, and cannot be altered (7<sup>13-14</sup>). Do not go to extremes in virtue or vice, in wisdom or folly (7<sup>15-18</sup>). Yet wisdom is strength, since all sin and may need it. Gossip should not be listened to, for a man is sure to hear something unpleasant about himself (7<sup>19-22</sup>). K. sought wisdom, but could not fully attain it. But he found this, that woman was more bitter than death, and only the man who pleased God would escape her snares. A good man was as one in a thousand, but a good woman he had not found at all. This was not the fault of God, but of man, who had sought out many inventions (7<sup>23-29</sup>). Wisdom is the best. Be obedient to the king, and in time of oppression do not be tempted to rebel, for judgment will come on the tyrant (8<sup>1-9</sup>). The wicked sometimes fare as the righteous, and the righteous as the wicked, yet it is better with the righteous than with the wicked; but since all is vanity, it is best to eat, drink, and be merry, for that, at any rate, will last as long as life (8<sup>10-15</sup>). However wise a man may be, he cannot understand the work of God. All men are in His hand, and cannot escape the universal lot. Life is bad, but it has hope; death comes to all, and with it the loss of consciousness, feeling, and activity (8<sup>16-9<sup>6</sup></sup>). Enjoy life to the full, unvexed by scruple as to the approval of God (?); get the most out of this life, for there is nothing to be looked for beyond it (9<sup>7-10</sup>). In the conflict of life merit does not ensure success, but it is matter of chance and circumstance. Men are snared by misfortune as fish are caught in a net. Wisdom is better than strength, yet, as in the case of the poor man who dwelt in the city, it meets with ingratitude and forgetfulness (9<sup>11-16</sup>). Wisdom is far better than folly, it will guide man aright in his relations with princes, save him from danger, and guide him on his guard, and guide him in. Yet a foolish ruler may exalt folly (9<sup>17-10<sup>11</sup></sup>). A fool's talk is worthless, and his labour wearisome (10<sup>12-15</sup>). Unhappy is the land whose king is a child and whose princes are slothful and gluttonous; while that country is blessed whose king is of noble character and whose princes are temperate. But if the king be bad, it is prudent not to curse him even in secrecy, for his spies are everywhere, and will tell him of it (10<sup>16-20</sup>). Be benevolent [or prudent], so that you may be safe in time of calamity. Do the work you have to do without waiting for the exact circumstances you would like. The laws of nature are above you, and the attempt to attain too close conformity with them is likely to paralyze industry (11<sup>1-4</sup>). Life is sweet, but let man remember also the days of darkness that await him after death. And, remembering these, let him enjoy life to the full in his youth, before the evil days of old age come on him, when all his physical powers will fail, and all appetite for pleasure be gone; before his life be shattered, and he pass away. Vanity of vanities, all is vanity (11<sup>7-12<sup>9</sup></sup>).

So end the meditations of K.; for the Epilogue, whether in whole or part authentic or not, lies outside the work itself. There can be little question as to the fundamental thought of the book. All is vanity, life yields no real satisfaction. If we had unlimited means at our disposal to secure happiness, it is quite unattainable. The best thing is to seek for enjoyment, to eat, drink, and be merry. Yet we should do the author an injustice if we regarded him as a mere sensualist. From gross indulgence he would have turned with disgust. It was madness, and no man who valued his peace of mind would be enticed by it (cf. his words on 'the woman whose heart is snares and nets,' 7<sup>26</sup>). He urges rather a moderate enjoyment of the good things of life: 'Eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; . . . Let thy garments always be white; and let not thy head lack ointment. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity.' Life is a bad business at the best, but it lies within our power to palliate its misery by prudence and the due enjoyment of what little pleasure we can get. And we should be all the more eager to make the most of our opportunities for pleasure that in the dreary darkness of Sheol no possibility of enjoyment will be found. His motto is Carpe diem; and if in the abstract it be not a high motto, we must remember the misery of his time, and the absence of any hope of improvement in this world or immortality in the next. If we ask the cause of this misery, and the vanity of life and uselessness of all that lies in the conditions of human life. God has a plan of the world, everything has its time and season. But man cannot find out what this plan is, and hence rarely orders his life in accordance with it. He may think that a certain line of conduct will produce a certain result; but it may be quite different, so that life may seem ruled by chance, not by law. And he is not master of his own fate. God has ordained this, and he helplessly struggles against it. He is caught in an evil snare and cannot escape. But when K. speaks of God, we may easily read more into his language than he meant. J., the national name of the God of Israel, nowhere occurs. K. is certainly a theist, and the name of God frequently occurs. But God is withdrawn from the life of men ('God is in heaven, thou upon earth,' 5<sup>2</sup>). God is not to be feared, and man must be very circumspect in his approaches to Him (5<sup>1-2</sup>). Man should be very careful in his utterances, and should avoid a hasty vow. If he vows he will defer to pay, for God 'hath no pleasure in fools,' and if provoked to anger may destroy the work of his hands (5<sup>7-9</sup>). K.'s conception of God has nothing attractive or winning. He is rather set before us as the omnipotent Ruler who has ordained all the course of history, which man vainly seeks to comprehend, and as the austere Deity on whose favour or forbearance none may venture to presume. Such enjoyment as may be gained from life in harmony with His laws is legitimate, hence the gratification of appetite in a legitimate manner has His approval, it is His gift (2<sup>2-3</sup> 3<sup>18, 19</sup> 9<sup>7</sup> etc.).

conjecture of Margoliouth (see ARABIA, p. 131<sup>b</sup>), that it may be the modern Aden in S. Arabia, is not without plausibility.

KAT<sup>2</sup>, 827; Delitzsch on Is 37<sup>12</sup>; D. Delitzsch, Paradies, 4, 93, 184.

2. 'The house of Eden' (AVm and RVm Beth-eden) is mentioned in Am 1<sup>5</sup>. The context has led to the inference that it was in the neighbourhood of Damascus, 'some royal paradise in that region which is still the Paradise of the Arab world' (G. A. Smith, Twelve Proph. 125). Ewald (Prophets, i. 159, Eng. tr.) identifies it with the Paradise of Strabo, xvi. 2-19; and Farrar (Minor Prophets, 53) thinks it may be Beit el-janne 'House of Paradise' (see, however, Driver's note on Am 1<sup>5</sup>), about eight miles from Damascus, referring in support of this view to Porter (Five Years in Damascus, i. 313). Driver considers the most probable identifications to be (1) the modern Ehden, 20 miles N.W. of Baalbek; or (2) Bit-Adini, described above. Wellhausen (Kl. Proph. 68) considers it improbable that Beth-eden is to be identified with Damascus, and is sceptical also about the identification of the same passage with Baalbek. (See, further, G. Hoffmann in ZAW, 1883, p. 97; Schrader, KAT<sup>2</sup> p. 442; and esp. Driver, Joel and Amos, 132f., 228f.) J. A. SELBIE.

EDEN (עֵדֶן, Edem).—We read that 'the LORD God planted a garden in Eden, eastward, and there put the man whom he had formed' (Gn 2<sup>8</sup>). 'And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became four heads' (v. 10). Two of these were the Tigris and Euphrates; a third was the Pison, which compassed the land of Havilah; the fourth being the Gihon, which compassed Cush. After Adam had been expelled from the Paradise, his firstborn, Cain, 'dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden,' and there built the city of Enoch (Gn 4<sup>16a</sup>).

Eden means 'delight' in Hebrew, and the position of its garden has been assigned to various parts of the world. Even the North Pole and Australia have found advocates. In i. i. 3), the Book of Enoch (xxxii. 1-3) places it in the extreme north-east, 'in the place of the mountains of Uta'. Sanson, Reland, Calmet, Bunsen, Keil, and von Raumer locate it in Armenia, between the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, the Araxes and the Phasis. Calvin, Bochart, Huet, Rask, and the modern Assyriologists assign it to Chaldaea. Le Clercq places it in the neighbourhood of Damascus, between the Chrysorrhoeas and the Orontes; while Heidegger seeks for it in Palestine near the sources of the Jordan; and Hildebrand and Hildebrand in southern Arabia. Remondin locates Eden with Udyana, 'the garden,' near Kashmir; Bertheau, Lassen, Obry, Spiegel, and Lenormant, with the Meru of the Hindu Puranas, and the Airyana-Vaêja and Harâ-Berezaiti of the Zoroastrian Vendidad and Avesta. Meru seems primarily to have denoted the mountains above the Pison, Airyana-Vaêja being the country between the sources of the Oxus and Jaxartes, and Harâ-Berezaiti the Belur-dagh. Ezk 28<sup>14</sup> is appealed to in behalf of the theory that the garden of Eden was on a mountain, though the text may be differently explained.

The rivers Pison and Gihon have been the subject of a similar variety of identifications. Josephus, Eusebius, Augustine, Ambrose, and Jerome make the Pison the Ganges, Cosmas Indicopleustes identifies it with the Indus, while the Jewish commentators, Sa'adya and Rashi, as well as the Samaritans, declare it to be the Nile. The Nile, on the other hand, is identified with the Gihon by Josephus (Ant. i. i. 3), most of the Fathers, Kalisch, Gesenius, and Bertheau, as well as in Sir 24<sup>25</sup>. It is also, in Jer 2<sup>18</sup>, substitutes Gihon (גִּיחֹן) for Sihor, the Nile. Cosmas makes Gihon the Ganges; the Samaritan version calls it the Askôph, which seems to be the Cho-aspes. Mohammedan writers identified the Gihon and Pison with the Oxus and Jaxartes, whence their modern names of Jihûn and Sihûn, which were transferred by the Seljuk Turks to the Pyramus and Sarus in Cilicia. St. Martin identifies the Pison with the waterless Wady er-Ruma in Arabia.

The cuneiform inscriptions have, however, cleared up the position of the garden of Eden. The 'plain' of Babylonia was Edin, which was adopted by the Semites under the form of Edinu. Its Assyrian equivalent was Zeru, corresponding to the Arab. Zor, the name still applied to the 'confluence' between the Tigris and Euphrates. These rivers formerly flowed immediately into the Persian Gulf, though, owing to the silting up of their mouths, their ancient mouths are now fifty miles distant from the sea. The seaport of primitive Chaldaea was Eridu, 'the good city,' now Abu-Shahrain, which stood near the mouth of the Euphrates. In its neighbourhood was a garden, 'a holy place,' wherein grew the sacred palm-tree—the tree of life—whose roots of bright lapis lazuli were the cosmic abyss, whose position was the centre of the world, and whose couch was the couch of the goddess Bahu, where the god Tammuz dwelt in the shrine under the shadow of its branches, within which no mortal had ever entered. An oracle was attached to 'the holy tree of Eridu,' and Eri-Aku (Arioch) calls himself its 'executor.' This tree of life is frequently represented in the Assyrian sculptures, where it is depicted with two guardian spirits or cherubs, kneeling or standing on either side of it. They are winged, with the heads sometimes of eagles, sometimes of men. Lenormant states that on an Assyrian talisman in the collection of M. de Clercq he found the word Kirubu in place of the ordinary sedu or 'protective genius' (Les Origines de l'Histoire, i. p. 115). The word Kirubu of the cherubim has its counterpart in the word of Merodach 'with fifty heads,' 'whose light gleams forth like the day'; and Sumerian texts speak of 'the wicked serpent,' 'the serpent of darkness.' See further, art. CHERUBIM.

The statement of Genesis, that the river which went out of Eden was parted into four heads, is explained by the fact that the Persian Gulf was held to be a river by the Babylonians, and was accordingly called by them nar marratum, 'the salt-water river.' In the second millennium B.C., not only the Tigris and Euphrates, but other rivers besides flowed into it; but the tide, which carried the salt water a long way, made it possible to speak of it as a river. The Tigris was called Idigla and Idigla, 'the encircling,' in Sumerian, and id-ghul 'a river.' The Pison and Gihon were identified by Sir Henry Rawlinson with the Uku and S. which Tiglath-pileser III. couples with the Tigris in southern Babylonia (Report of Fortieth Meeting of British Assoc. p. 173). Subsequently he held the Pison to be the Arakhtu or canal on which Babylon was built; and the Gihon the modern Jûkhâ, which flows westward from the Euphrates towards Abu-Shahrain. Friedrich Delitzsch also identifies the Gihon with the Arakhtu, which he believes to be the Shatt-en-Nil of to-day; but the Pison with the Pallukat, the Pallacopas of classical geography.

The names of the two rivers are, however, still unidentified in the inscriptions. But the land of Havilah encompassed by the Pison was the 'sandy' region of northern Arabia, which extended westward towards the frontier of Egypt (Gn 25<sup>18</sup>, the Horites had not yet been dispossessed (Gn 14<sup>6</sup>). The Horites were governed by 'allūphim or 'dukes,' and both the office and name were handed on to their Edomite successors (Gn 36<sup>29, 40-43</sup>). As the 'allūphim of Edom' are alone referred to in the song of Moses (Ex 15) after the overthrow of the Egyptians, we may perhaps infer that at the time of the Exodus a king had not been established in Edom; at any rate the reference is an indication of the antiquity of the name in which it occurs. Before the Israelites entered the desert, however, there was a king in Edom. Moses sent messengers from Kadesh-barnea to the king of Edom, asking him to allow his 'brother Israel' to pass through his country, promising that they would march along the highway and do no injury to the country. But the Edomites refused, and came out with an army, so that the Israelites were obliged to 'compass the land of Edom' (Nu 20<sup>14-21</sup> 21<sup>14</sup>).

The kings of Edom who reigned 'before there reigned any king over the children of Israel' are enumerated in Gn 36<sup>31-39</sup>. The first, Bela the son of Beor, seems to be identical with Balaam the son of Beor, the seer of Pethor. If so, this would account for his having been slain in the war with the Midianites (Nu 31<sup>8</sup>). 'Rehoboth by the river,' from which Shaul came (Gn 36<sup>37</sup>), must have stood on the Euphrates, as that is 'the river' of the OT; consequently it cannot be the Rehoboth or 'Suburbs' of Nineveh (Assyr. Ribû), which were on the Tigris. The list of Edomite kings must have been extracted from the royal annals, and, as it breaks off in the reign of Hadar (Gn 36<sup>39</sup>) (or Hadad, 1 Ch 1<sup>50</sup>), may have been composed at that time. It will be noticed that the monarchy was elective, not hereditary.

The children of Israel were ordered not to 'contend' with their 'brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir,' for God had 'given Mount Seir unto Esau for a possession'; and accordingly they turned eastward after passing the Edomite ports of Elath and Eziongeber (now Akabah and Kala'at el-Akahab), at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, and made their way to Moab along the eastern edge of Mount Seir (Dt 2<sup>4-8</sup>). Similarly, the Edomite, like the Egyptian, was allowed to 'enter into the land' of the Lord in the third generation, in contrast to the Ammonite and Moabite, who could not do so till the tenth generation.

Ramses III. of the Twentieth Egyptian Dynasty, after defeating the northern hordes who had attacked Egypt, and overrunning the south of Palestine, 'smote the people of Seir who belong to the Shasu (Bedawin), and plundered their tents.' Among the pictures of his prisoners at Medinet Habu is that of the Edomite 'chief,' who, it must be observed, is not called 'king.' So far as we know, it was the only campaign ever undertaken by a Pharaoh against Mount Seir. Its date was about B.C. 1230-1200, some thirty years after the Exodus, so that the Israelite migration had been in the neighbourhood of Edom at the time (cf. Nu 21<sup>14</sup>).

Edomite tribes settled in the south of Judah, and even Othniel the brother of Caleb, and the first judge, was a Kenizzite (Nu 32<sup>12</sup>, Jos 15<sup>17</sup>, Gn 36<sup>11, 15</sup>). Saul warred with Edom (1 S 14<sup>47</sup>); and David conquered the country, putting garrisons throughout it, and occupying its ports in the Gulf of Akabah (2 S 8<sup>13, 14</sup>, where we must read 'Edom' for 'Aram,' AV 'Syrians'). It was in these ports that Solomon with the help of the Tyrians constructed the merchant vessels which traded to Ophir for gold (1 K 9<sup>26-28</sup>). Throughout his reign, however, Edom was in a state of revolt under Hadad, 'of the king's seed,' who had escaped to Midian when Joab was for six months cutting 'off every male in Edom' after David's conquest of the country. From Midian he and his companions went to Paran, and from thence to the court of Egypt, where the Pharaoh gave him his sister-in-law as a wife, and his son Genubath was brought up as an Egyptian prince. But on the death of David and Joab, Hadad obtained leave to return to Edom, and became 'an adversary unto Solomon' (1 K 11<sup>14-22</sup>). He does not seem to have succeeded in making himself independent, however, as we find Edom still subject to Judah after the revolt of the Ten Tribes. Jehoshaphat still held Ezion-geber, where he built ships to trade to Ophir; and that 'there was then no king in Edom: a deputy was king' (1 K 22<sup>47</sup>). This means that there was no independent king there, since, in the war against Moab, when Edom had to follow its suzerain, its ruler is called 'king' (2 K 3<sup>9, 10, 12, 26</sup>).

In the reign of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's successor, Edom revolted, 'and made a king over themselves.' The revolt spread to the south of Judah, where Libnah was the centre of disaffection; and though Jehoram defeated the Edomites at Zair, he was unable to reduce them to obedience (2 K 8<sup>20-22</sup>). About fifty years later Amaziah invaded Edom, slaying 10,000 of the enemy in the Valley of Salt, and taking Sela (or Petra), which he named Joktheel (2 K 14<sup>7</sup>). Edom seems to have been crushed by this defeat, as Amaziah's successor, Uzziah, 'restored' Elath to Judah, and rebuilt it (2 K 14<sup>22</sup>). It remained in Jewish hands till it was captured by Rezin of Damascus, who colonized it with Syrians* (2 K 16<sup>6</sup>). This was in the reign of Ahaz, when 'the Edomites had come and smitten Judah, and carried away captives' (2 Ch 28<sup>17</sup>). Rezin, however, was conquered and put to death in B.C. 732 by Tiglath-pileser III. of Assyria, who thereupon held Damascus, where he received the homage and tribute of numerous princes, among them being 'Jehoahaz (Ahaz) of the land of the Jews,' and 'Kaus-malaka (Kaus-melech) of the land of the Edomites.' Schrader has pointed out that Kaus is the name of a god which appears as Kos in Greek inscriptions, with which Halévy compares the name of the early Arab deity Kais (Heb. Kish, Kishon). In B.C. 711, Edom joined the league against Sargon along with Judah, Babylon, Egypt, and Merodach-baladan of Babylon; but Ashdod, the Syrian centre of the league, was taken by the Assyrians, and Edom, like Moab and Judah, joined the Assyrian conqueror. Edom again joined the revolt against Assyria in B.C. 701, of which Hezekiah was the head; but when Sennacherib marched into Palestine, A-rammu of Edom submitted like the kings of Moab and Ammon. Esar-haddon caused Kaus-gabri, 'king of the city of Edom,' to agree with the other vassal kings of the west, including Manasseh of 'the city of Judah' and the king of 'the city of Moab,' to convey to Nineveh timber from Lebanon and various stones for the construction of his palace. When Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, the Edomites took part with the enemy, and rejoiced over the calamities of Judah,—conduct which aroused bitter feelings against them on the part of the Jews (Ez 4<sup>21, 22</sup>, Ezk 35<sup>3-15</sup>, Ob 10-16). These feelings were not diminished by their occupation of southern Judah, with Hebron as their capital, and their attacks upon the Jews during the Maccabæan war. Judas Maccabæus, however, drove them from the south of Judah (B.C. 164); and John Hyrcanus, in B.C. 109, conquered their country, and compelled them to adopt Judaism. Mount Seir, as far north as Petra, had already fallen into the hands of the Nabateans, who spoke an Aramaic dialect. Hyrcanus II, the grandson of John Hyrcanus, on his return to Jerusalem, was induced by the king of Petra, Pompey, however, intervened, and after sacking Jerusalem, made Hyrcanus high priest (B.C. 63), while Antipater was subsequently (B.C. 47) appointed by Julius Caesar procurator of Judaea, Samaria, and Galilee on account of his services against Pompey. His son was Herod the Great.

* So the Kethibh מְרִימִים. The Keri, however, reads מְרִימִים (Edomites); and this, which has the support of the LXX, is adopted by Siegfried-Stade and Oxf. Heb. Lexicon.

Edomite proper names show that the language of Edom was practically identical with Hebrew. Of Edomite names we know only the names of Hadad (also Dad), Kaus, Kozé, Edom, and A. The name of Esau's son Jeush (Gn 36<sup>5</sup>), however, corresponds phonetically with that of Yaghúth, a pre-Mohammedan deity of Arabia.

LITERATURE.—Bathgen, Der edomitische Stamm in der Geschichte, 10 ff.; Richard, Pal. Hist., 183 ff.; B. de la Motte, Pal. Hist., 183 ff.; Hull, Mount Seir, 85 ff.; Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea; Hommel, Ancient Hebrew Tradition, 263 f.

A. H. SAYCE.

EDOS (B 'Hdôr, A 'Hdals, AV Edes), 1 Es 9<sup>38</sup>= Iddo, Ezr 10<sup>48</sup>.

EDREI (עֲדְרֵי, 'Edôreu, Edrai).—1. Edrei was a city of Bashan (now the Haurân, eastward of Lake Tiberias), where the Amorite king Og was defeated and slain by the Israelites (Nu 21<sup>33</sup>, Dt 3<sup>1</sup>, Jos 13<sup>12</sup>). It was then given to Machir, the son of Manasseh (Jos 13<sup>31</sup>, see Jg 5<sup>4</sup>), the district in which it was situated being known as Gilead (Nu 32<sup>30</sup>). The Amorites do not seem to have been long in possession of it, as one of the letters of Tel el-Amarna, about a century and a half before the Exodus, is from Artama-Samas, the governor of Ziri-Basana, 'the field of Bashan.' Edrei is the Adraha of classical geography, and in Christian times was the seat of a bishop. It has been identified with the modern Der'ât or Der'a, where there is a large reservoir, as well as an aqueduct and mausoleum. About 10 miles to the north of it is Tell 'Ashtera, the supposed site of Ashtaroth, which is associated with Edrei, and in the time of Abraham was inhabited by the Rephaim (Gn 14<sup>8</sup>). In one of the Tel el-Amarna letters (B. M. 43. 10) it is called Astartu, and the writer of the despatch accuses a certain Biridasyi of 'leading his chariots out of it and giving them to the king.' The neighbouring city of Buzruna (Bostra) was at the time under a king of its own. W. Max Müller identifies the city of Autará in the Karnak List of Thothmes III. (No. 91) with Edrei. Philologically the names would correspond, but the identification is impossible, as Autará is enumerated among the towns of southern Palestine. Astartu or Ashtaroth is in an earlier part of the list (No. 28).

2. EDREI is mentioned in Jos 19<sup>37</sup> between Kadesh and En-hazor, in the tribe of Naphtali. The site of it is unknown.

Past, New Series, v. 47, 77, 12. Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 121-147; Dillmann on Nu 21<sup>33</sup> and Dt 3<sup>1</sup>; Driver on Dt 14<sup>31</sup> 31<sup>30</sup>, and his art. ASHTAROTH in present vol.; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 528 n., 576.

A. H. SAYCE.

EDUCATION.—Every student of the history of education will endorse the statement of the Alexandrian scholar (Prol. to Sirach), that Israel must needs be commended for its zeal in the cause of moral and intellectual culture (παιδεία καὶ σοφία), since the canonical Books of Deuteronomy and Proverbs, the Wisdom of Jesus ben-Sira, and the Sayings of the Fathers (פִּרְשֵׁי אֲבוֹת Pirshê 'Abôth), provide a catena of pedagogic principles without a parallel in ancient literature. Two sentences only may be selected for quotation at this stage. The one is the motto prefixed to the Book of Proverbs: 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge' (Pr 1<sup>7</sup>, cf. 9<sup>10</sup>); the other is from Simeon, the son of the famous Gamaliel: 'Not learning is doing is the chief thing' (Ab. i. 17). In these maxims we find the two elements of Hebrew education, which in the past was at once religious and practical—an education which sought to combine instruction in the positive truths of the ancestral faith with preparation for the practical duties of life. It was this successful combination which led Josephus in his treatise Against Apion to contrast the education of his countrymen with that of the Lacedæmonians and Cretans on the one hand, and with that of the Athenians on the other—the former being too exclusively practical, the latter too exclusively theoretical. But our lawgiver with great care combined these two methods, for he neither left the practice of right habits without oral instruction (lit. 'dumb,' κωφίην), nor did he permit the rules thus taught to remain unpractised.

* Now read Artama-Ya or Artama-anyu by Winckler.

We propose here to study the educational methods of the Israelites historically. For this purpose it will be convenient to group the material under three historical periods, as follows:—

i. HEBREW EDUCATION FROM THE CONQUEST TO THE EXILE.—When the Hebrews came to settle in the valleys west of the Jordan, they found themselves among a race or races immensely their superiors in all the arts of civilization and culture. Of this there can be no reasonable doubt, though we may doubt whether the country was so thickly studded with schools, teachers, and libraries as has recently been maintained. In any case the troublous times of the conquest were not the most suitable for assimilating the higher civilization of the Canaanites. Reading and still more writing (Jg 8<sup>14</sup>) must rather have been the accomplishment of the few than the custom of the many. However that may be, one fact of Hebrew history remains indisputable, namely, that throughout the long period closing with the exile, education was almost entirely domestic and private. It is true that Jewish writings, Talmud, Targum, and Midrash—those storehouses of magnificent anachronisms—represent even the patriarchs as attending school and college, but such statements are merely harmless flights of fancy. In the whole range of pre-exilic literature there is no trace of any provision by public authority for either elementary or higher education. The word 'school' occurs neither in the OT nor in the NT only of the lecture-

Greek rhetorician at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>8</sup>). The explanation is that the home was the school, and the parents, in all but the highest rank of society, were the only teachers. The duty of reverence for and obedience to parents imposed on children by the oldest legislation (Ex 20<sup>12</sup>), had its counterpart in the duty incumbent on the parents (and in particular on the father) to instruct their children in religion and morals. This aspect of parental responsibility is repeatedly emphasized in the Book of Deuteronomy (4<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>), 'Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up' (620-25 11<sup>19</sup> 32<sup>48</sup>). The special provision of Dt 31<sup>10-13</sup>, requiring the presence of the children at the reading of the law in 'the year of release,' i.e. every seventh year, can have had only a very limited effect before the great calamity of the exile (cf. with Neh 8<sup>17</sup>). In the families of the aristocracy the place of the parents, the child's natural teachers, was taken by tutors (צוּרִים 2 K 10<sup>1, 6</sup>). The infant Solomon, according to the simplest rendering of 2 S 12<sup>25</sup>, was entrusted to the care of the prophet Nathan.

* Quotations from Abôth will be made from 'The Authorized Daily Prayer-Book of the United Jewish Congregations of the British Empire' (ed. Singer), as providing the most easily accessible text and translation. References to other treatises of the Mishna are given acc. to the sections of Jost's edition.

† Contrast this with the statement of Iwan Müller: 'Special instruction in religion was not known to either the Greeks or the Romans of antiquity' (Handb. d. klass. Alterthumswissenschaft, iv. p. 451 b).

‡ Esp. by Sayce in Patriarchal Palestine (passim), and elsewhere.

It is now impossible to form an exact estimate of the extent to which education, as tested by the ability to read and write, was common among the people. The standard of learning would naturally be higher in the cities than in the country districts, highest of all in the neighbourhood of the court. Yet such facts as that Amos and Micah among the literary prophets belonged to the ranks of the people; that Mesha, king of Moab, could count on readers for the stele commemorating his victories; that the workmen who excavated the tunnel from the Virgin's spring to the pool of Siloam carved in the rock the manner of their work,—these facts, which show that they had one passage of Isaiah (8 1-4) '... them'; cf. 29<sup>11, 12</sup> the distinction between the literate and the illiterate, should make us pause before drawing the line of illiteracy too high in the social scale.

A single word must suffice for the schools of the prophets (an expression with no scriptural authority), of which so much was made by scholars of former days. All that the Scripture narrative warrants us in holding is that in a few centres, such as Bethel (2 K 2<sup>3</sup>), Jericho (2<sup>9</sup>), and Gilgal (4<sup>38</sup>), men of prophetic spirit formed associations or brotherhoods (hence the name 'sons of the prophets') for the purpose of their devotion to J<sup>h</sup> through the community of the brotherhood. Edification, not education, was the main purpose of these so-called 'schools.'

ii. FROM THE EXILE TO SIMON BEN-SHETACH, c. B.C. 75.—The arrival in Jerusalem of Ezra the 'ready scribe' (כֹּתֵב) in the law of Moses (Ezr 7<sup>6</sup>) was an event of epoch-making importance in the educational not less than in the religious history of the Jews. For Ezra had set his heart to study (שָׁרַף) the law (Torah) of J<sup>h</sup> and to do it, and to teach (לִמֵּן) in Israel statutes and judgments (Ezr 7<sup>10</sup>). The story of Ezra's activity belongs to the general history of the period. For our present purpose it is enough to recall the fact that the culmination of that activity was the acceptance by the Jewish community of the Torah in its written form, as the regular norm in every relation of life. From this time onwards the Jews were pre-eminently 'the people of the book.' But in order that the moral precepts of a book may be obeyed, and its ritual requirements duly observed, the book must be circulated, must be read and studied. The first step in this direction was the great assembly of which we read in Neh 8 ff. The centre of interest throughout is not the living word of a prophet, but the book of the law and the exposition of its contents by accredited teachers (note Neh 8<sup>7-8</sup> כֹּתֵב, the same word as is rendered 'teacher' in 1 Ch 25<sup>8</sup> and in Ezr 8<sup>16</sup> RV). We would gladly know what measures were taken by Ezra and his associates for the continuance of the public instruction so auspiciously begun. Unfortunately, we have no information on this point from contemporary records, and what a late age has to tell of the work of the so-called 'Great Synagogue' belongs to the world of fable.* There can be little doubt, however, that one of the oldest institutions of Judaism, the synagogue, goes back to the time of Ezra, if not indeed to the days of the exile. The synagogue, it is important to remember, was not originally a place of worship but a place of religious instruction, and indeed it is so named by a writer so late as Philo of Alexandria (Vita Mosi, iii. 27, τὰ προσευκτήρια τί ἐτερόν ἐστιν ἢ διδασκαλεῖα, κ.τ.λ.). With this agrees the fact that in NT times διδάσκειν, to teach, is still used to express the function of the preacher in the synagogue (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Mk 1<sup>21</sup>, Lk 4<sup>15</sup> and often).† But whether we regard Ezra as the immediate founder of the synagogue or not, there can be no doubt of the fact that, by securing the recognition by the public authorities of the need of religious instruction, he accomplished a step of great importance in the educational history of the Jews. 'The Bible became the book of the community a school, a place of teaching and learning. Piety and education were inseparable; whoever could not read was no true Jew. We may say that in this way were created the beginnings of popular education. In what way this took place is, it is true, wrapped in mystery; in the synagogue men did not learn to write and read, and the scribes were not elementary teachers. But the ideal of education for all was set up and awoke emulation, even though the goal was not reached all at once' (Wellhausen, Isr. u. jud. Gesch. p. 159).

During the whole of the period under review the early education of the Jewish child continued, even more than before, to be the business of his parents. Elementary schools were still unknown. Now, as in much later times, it was 'the duty of the father to instruct his son in the Torah (Kiddushin, 29a), a duty in which the mother took her share (Pr 6<sup>20</sup> 31, Sus<sup>9</sup>). The obligation extended even to 'children's children' (Dt 1<sup>7</sup>). A noteworthy feature of the pentateuchal education, from the view-point of pedagogic method, is the extent to which certain religious rites are to be used as object-lessons to the children [Ex 12<sup>28-13</sup> (passover) 13<sup>4</sup> (first-fruits), cf. Jos 4<sup>6</sup>]. Their interest and attention are first to be aroused, and only after question asked is the explanation of the rite to be given. In the case of the passover the question, 'What mean ye by this service?' (Ex 12<sup>28</sup>)—now expanded to four—has remained as part of the ceremony to the present day.

The leading feature of the educational history of the period is the rise of a body of men as professional teachers. These are the Sôphêrim (סֹפְרִים, literally 'book men'), or scribes. For the circumstances which led during the exile to a species of literary renaissance, or rather to a new interest in the literature of the past, and thereby to the growth of a body of litterati (γραμματεῖς),—students, copyists, and teachers,—we must refer to the article SCRIBES. We have seen, however, under what circumstances the study and the exposition of the Torah, in particular, were begun among 'the children of the captivity' in the new community at Jerusalem. From that time to the end of the Jewish state and beyond it, the office of the scribe was one of ever-increasing importance. But to identify, as is too often done, the scribes of the Persian and early Greek period with those whose character and aims are familiar to us from the Gospels, is to do the former great injustice. For these ancient scribes have shared in the rehabilitation of the late Persian and early Greek periods of Jewish history, which is so remarkable a feature of the critical scholarship of the day.† Here we are concerned with them only in so far as they continued the work of instruction committed to them by Ezra. Unfortunately, from the lack of historical material, it is now impossible to trace the development of education under their guidance. We know, however, that by the time of the Chronicler (1 Ch 2<sup>35</sup>) they had been 'organized in regular "families," or as we should now say "guilds," an institution quite in accordance with the whole spirit of the East, which forms a guild or trades-union of every class possessing special technical knowledge' (W. R. Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 44). From the proverbial form of 1 Ch 25<sup>28</sup>—'as well the small as the great, the teacher as the scholar'—we may further infer that the relation of master and pupil was by this time (c. B.C. 300) a familiar one; which, of course, implies facilities for education other than the Levitical music schools to which the proverb is here applied.

* See esp. Kuenen's classical essay, 'On the Men of the Great Synagogue,' now accessible in German in Budde's Gesammelte Abhandlungen, etc., von Dr. A. Kuenen (1891).

† For further testimony by Philo and Josephus to the teaching function of the synagogue see Schurer, HJP ii. ii p. 54. † See, inter alios, Wellhausen, Israelitische u. jüdische Geschichte, p. 154.

Here we are met by one of the most interesting but difficult problems in the history of Hebrew education. Not the least important of the critical results above referred to, is the bringing down of the compilation of our present Book of Proverbs, and so of the Golden Age of the Wisdom Literature, to the Persian period. In this case, who are the 'Wise' (חכמים), the sages of whom this department of Hebrew literature is the characteristic and enduring memorial? May we identify them with the older race of Sopherim, the book-men or literati of the period? The temptation is great. Thus the scribes were the accredited teachers of the people (see above), and the most venerable of the traditions preserved by the fraternity from the 'men of the Great Synagogue' was the obligation to 'raise up many disciples' (Ab. i. 1). But the sages were also teachers (חכמים, חכמים Pr 5<sup>13</sup>), who address a pupil as 'my son,' and whose teaching is known as 'the words of the wise' (Pr 1<sup>6</sup> 22<sup>17</sup>, Ec 9<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>; see also the Oxf. Heb. Lex. sub חכם). Again, the scribes formed, as we have seen, a guild or corporation. But we have abundant evidence that the sages are also to be regarded as forming a distinct fraternity (Pr 1<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>17</sup> 24<sup>23</sup>, Ec 12<sup>11</sup>). Cf. Cherns, Jeh. und Sopherim, p. 123 and passim; Riehm, Handwort. d. Bibl. Alt.<sup>2</sup> sub 'Weise'; Kautzsch, Abriß d. Gesch. d. AT Schrifttums<sup>2</sup>, 1897, p. 135 ff.). Wellhausen in his recent history, while maintaining their original independence, admits that by the time of Jesus ben-Sira (B.C. 200–180) the scribes 'were scarcely any longer to be distinguished from the sages' (Gesch. p. 154, note 1). This admission is due to the fact—and here perhaps we have the strongest argument for the identity of the two classes—that Ben-Sira, the last of the sages, was himself a scribe. Of this there can be no doubt; one has but to read his glowing panegyric on 'the wisdom of the scribe,' and the glory of his calling (Sir 38<sup>24</sup>–39<sup>11</sup>). It is therefore but natural that 'the best, and almost the only data regarding the earlier scribes, are to be found in the Book of Ecclesiasticians, 3<sup>25ff.</sup> 9<sup>14ff.</sup> 14<sup>20ff.</sup> 38<sup>24ff.</sup>' (Wellhausen, loc. cit.).

For our present purpose the final answer to our question is that the personnel of the sages is identical with the Sopherim or book-men, or regard them as forming a distinct but allied class in the pre-Maccabean community, the fact remains that the sages represent a great educational force in the period under review. The Book of Proverbs is the repository of their pedagogic experience (see esp. 1<sup>2–3</sup>), and so the oldest handbook of education. Life is here conceived as a discipline (חִסּוּךְ, a word used 30 times in the book acc. to Driver, LOT<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>2</sup>). Its central thought. 'The whole of life is considered from the view-point of a pedagogic institution. God educates men, and men educate each other' (O. Holtzmann in Stade's GVI<sup>2</sup> ii. 296–97). Father and mother are the child's natural instructors (1<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>1–4</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>17</sup>); from them he shall first learn that 'fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom' may be the key to this life; they are to study their child, since his character is known by his conduct (20<sup>11</sup>). To them is addressed the golden maxim, 'train up a child in the way he should go, and even when he is old he will not depart from it' (22<sup>6</sup> RV). The child is by nature foolish, and needs the 'rod of correction' (22<sup>15</sup>). Corporal punishment is repeatedly advocated ('he that spareth his rod hateth his son,' 13<sup>24</sup>, cf. 19<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>13</sup> 14 29<sup>15</sup> 17, also La 3<sup>27</sup>), yet with the intelligent child reproof is better than 'a hundred stripes' (17<sup>10</sup>). From the parents' care the child—of the upper classes only, in all probability, cf. 17<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> (RV) with Sir 51<sup>28</sup>—if he would attain to 'wisdom,' passes into the hands of professional teachers (5<sup>13</sup>), the sages, whose words 'spoken in quiet' (Ec 9<sup>17</sup> RV) 'are as goads' (Ec 12<sup>11</sup>), and whose direction (חִסּוּךְ) is 'a fountain of life' (Pr 13<sup>14</sup>). The pupil's progress in religion and morality is the teacher's highest joy (23<sup>15</sup> 16), but not all are capable of receiving this higher instruction (27<sup>22</sup>). Prudence and forethought (24<sup>7</sup>), temperance (21<sup>17</sup> 23<sup>20</sup> 21. 23–25) and exactness (1<sup>1</sup> 29<sup>5</sup> and oft.), diligence (6<sup>11</sup>) and truthfulness (17<sup>7</sup>), consideration for the poor (14<sup>21</sup> 19<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>), and a truly noble charity towards enemies (25<sup>21</sup> 22 = Ro 12<sup>20</sup>), the value of true friendship (17<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>24</sup> 27<sup>10</sup>), and the dignity of woman (31<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>3</sup>)—these are some of the moral lessons to be learned in 'the house of discipline' (olkef paideias, Sir 51<sup>28</sup>) from 'the lips of the wise' (Pr 15<sup>7</sup>).

The foundation of a Jewish library was an event the importance of which in the history of Jewish life and thought even in Palestine it is impossible to over-estimate. What would we not give to be able to trace the working of the subtle influences on the Jewish mind of the time, in particular, of those which were the result of the contact with the Hellenistic world by which the little Jewish state was girt about on every side (cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>11</sup>)! For something like a century Alexandria, with its great library and university, its brilliant array of scholars and littérateurs, was the capital of Southern Syria as well as of Egypt. How was the Jewish mind affected by this close connexion with the Hellenistic world and Jerusalem? A solitary notice, so far as we have been able to discover, from the period in question, almost warrants us in believing that the Greek educational methods had penetrated to Jerusalem. The infamous tax-farmer Joseph (c. B.C. 220),† we are told, sent his sons 'severally to those that had the best reputation for instructing youth' (Josephus, Ant. xii. iv. 6). The education required was certainly of the Greek type, and this fact, taken in connexion with the rapid progress of Hellenism at this particular epoch, even under the shadow of the Maccabees (see 1 Mac 1, 2 Mac 2–4), makes it very probable that schools on the Greek model were then established in Jerusalem. When the author of Ps 119 says, 'I have more understanding than all my teachers,' etc. (vv. 99, 100), there is good reason for thinking that he wishes

* This identification was first proposed by A. T. Hartmann (Die enge Verbindung d. AT mit d. Neuem, 1831), and more recently and independently by Smend in his Alttest. Religionsgeschichte, 1893, p. 512 ff. Cf. Montefiore, Ibb. Lect. 396 f.

† They (the sages) occupy in the everyday life of ancient Israel a position precisely similar to that of the scribes in later Judaism. Riehm is, of course, assuming the pre-exilic date of Proverbs.

* It is in the 'wonders of what is best in our Scottish character' (cf. 1 Mac 1) to the use till almost the other day of this great book (ἡ παλαιὰ βιβλία) as the reading-book of our parish schools?

† For this corrected date see Wellhausen, op. cit. pp. 197–98.

to exalt the study of Holy Scripture above the secular learning of the Greek schools. However this may be, Ben-Sira was still true to Jewish traditions and uninfluenced by Hellenistic culture. He had travelled in other countries, and studied perhaps in other literatures, but he remained 'a true "scribe," and gloried in the name' (38<sup>24</sup>). The object his translator had in view, as we learn from his preface to his grandfather's work, 'was to correct the inequalities of moral and religious culture (paideia) among the Jews of Egypt by setting before them a standard and a lesson book of true religious wisdom' (Cheyne, Job and Solomon). 'The Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach,' or 'Ecclesiasticus,' is therefore avowedly a manual of ethics, and as such deserves more space than we can give it in this review of Jewish educational history. 'Draw near unto me, ye unlearned,' we read in the epilogue, 'and lodge in the house of instruction. Say, wherefore are ye lacking in these things, and your souls are very thirsty?' (Sir 51<sup>22a</sup>). His religious standpoint is essentially that of the Book of Proverbs, on which his own is modelled. Thus the fear of the Lord is not only 'the beginning of wisdom' (1<sup>14</sup>), but also wisdom's fulness (1<sup>40</sup>) and crown (1<sup>18</sup>). Yet the author's ethical tone is distinctly lower than that of his model. As a disciplinarian he is severe even to excess (30<sup>1-13</sup> 7<sup>20-24</sup>). The principles of humane conduct are exhibited in many lights, including even the 'manners' of the dinner table (31<sup>16-21</sup>). The notable passage (38<sup>24</sup>-39<sup>21</sup>) in which he sketches his ideal of the scribe has been already adverted to. One point, however, must be further emphasized, viz. the assertion that learning is the monopoly of the wealthy: 'The wisdom of the scribe cometh by opportunity of leisure. How shall he become wise that holdeth the plough,' etc.? (38<sup>24a</sup>). Education is not for the poor (cf. 51<sup>22b</sup>).

Regarding the practical aspects of education in the period suggest themselves, to which only tentative answers can be given. Where, for example, did the teachers of whom we read (Pr 5<sup>13</sup>, Ps 119<sup>99</sup>, perhaps Dn 12<sup>3</sup>)—be they sages or scribes—meet their pupils? What were their methods of instruction? The synagogues first occur to one as the scene of those expositions of Scripture to which the name of Midrash was already applied (2 Ch 13<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>27</sup>). The scribes were instructed on Sabbaths and were competent expounders of the Scriptures, as a rule, no doubt, by the scribes, although these never had a monopoly of the synagogue teaching. As early as the beginning of the 3rd cent. the scribes had apparently facilities for teaching within the temple precincts: such, at least, seems the legitimate inference from their description as 'scribes of the temple' in the edict of Antiochus III. (Jos. Ant. xii. iii. 3). 'Within the massive city gates or in the adjacent squares or "broad places" on which the streets converged (Pr 1<sup>20-21</sup>, cf. Job 29<sup>7</sup>) the "wise men" awaited their disciples' (Cheyne, op. cit. p. 124). Most of the instruction, however, was doubtless given by sage and scribe alike in private houses, their own or those of wealthy disciples. 'My son,' says Ben-Sira, 'if thou seest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him, and let thy foot wear out the steps of his house' (Sir 6<sup>6</sup> RV). With this advice we compare that of José ben-Joezer of Zeredah, in the early Maccabean days: 'Let thy house be a meeting place (beit ha-rabim) for the wise; sit amidst the dust of their feet, and drink their words with thirst' (Ab. i. 4).*

* The תלמוד which, according to Sota, ix. 9, ceased since Josë's time, cannot, as some have thought, mean schools (תלמוד—in late Heb. 'תלמוד'; see Derenbourg, Hist. de la Palestine, p. 456 ff.

Here was found the opportunity for those 'words spoken in quiet' that were 'like nails fastened by the masters of assemblies' (Ec 12<sup>11</sup>).

As to methods, we have still less information. To judge from the practice of a later age, the pupils would learn by frequent repetition the proverbs of the wise (cf. Cheyne, loc. cit.). The תלמוד was already used in ways calculated to aid memory, as in the 119th Psalm. To this period may be assigned the invention of the mnemonic device known as Athbash (אבבש), of which the present text of Jer 25<sup>26</sup> 51<sup>1</sup> affords the classical examples (see Giesebrecht's Comm. in loc.), as also the introduction of the 'numerical' proverbs, so much in vogue in later times (cf. Pr 30<sup>1-21</sup> with Aboth, v.).

Finally, we may assume that, at least from the beginning of the Greek period, a fairly high standard of general culture prevailed. It was now that the editor, if not the author, of Ecclesiastes could write: 'Of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh' (Ec 12<sup>12</sup>). At the beginning of the Maccabean revolt, also, the possession of copies of the 'book of the covenant' was certainly not the exclusive privilege of priest and scribe (1 Mac 1<sup>57</sup>).

III. SIMON BEN-SHETACH (c. B.C. 75) TO THE END OF THE JEWISH STATE (A.D. 70).—Just as the synagogue was the novel feature of the preceding period from the educational point of view, so is the elementary school the feature of this third period. Such, at least, is the tradition preserved in the so-called Talmud of Jerusalem. In a passage commemorating the merits of the famous scribe and leader of the Pharisees, Simon ben-Shetach (or Shätach),* brother of queen Alexandra, we read that three additions were made by him to the statute-book, so to say, the second of which runs thus—שֶׁיֶרֶק הַיִּלְכוּ לְבֵית הַסֵּפֶר 'that the children shall attend the elementary school' (Talm. Jer. Kethuboth, viii. 11, p. 32b; see the whole passage in Derenbourg, op. cit. p. 108). The word-quoted, it will be seen, are not at all of their free import. Their ambiguity. They may mean, interpreted to mean that attendance on schools becoming rising was henceforth to be compulsory. In view of what was said above regarding the spread of Greek ideas in pre-Maccabean days, it is difficult to believe that schools were not to the more advanced instruction in the scribal college (see below) were not to be found—at least in Jerusalem. One can hardly escape the conviction that the erection of the Greek gymnasium at Jerusalem (1 Mac 1<sup>54</sup>, cf. 2 Mac 4<sup>9a</sup>) was not the first step, but the last, in the assimilation of Jewish and Greek education. Be this as it may, there is no good reason for rejecting the tradition regarding Simon ben-Shetach's efforts on behalf of popular education. All that we know regarding the predominant influence of the scribes in the reign of Alexandra (B.C. 78-69) prepares us for more aggressive measures for the extension of their influence among the people. According to unanimous tradition, the elementary school (beit ha-sefer 'house of the book,' see below) was always in intimate connexion with the synagogue. Either the synagogue proper—in this period to be found in every considerable village in the land—was used for this purpose (Löw, Die Lebensalter in jüd. Literatur, p. 287, where the reference is to Berachoth, 17a, Taanith, 23b, Kiddushin, 30a), or a room in the same building. The school might also be held in the teacher's house (Hamburger).

By all writers on Jewish education it is stated that the synagogue officer (חזקן) — the minister (ὀρχήστρως) of Lk 4<sup>20</sup> — was the teacher of the synagogue school. This uniform tradition seems founded on a precept of Sabbath observance in the Mishna, '... name, where, even on the sacred day, 'the חזקן (Hazzān) is allowed to look on where the children are reading, but he may not read himself' (Shabbath, i. 3). Now it will be observed that the proper title of the synagogue officer, as above, is not found here — a ... For חזקן is a word of general application meaning 'overseer,' 'inspector,' or 'supervisor,' and its exact ... has to be decided by the context (see the Lexx. of Buxtorf, Levy, and Jastrow). In the passage quoted the context requires us to render 'overseer' or 'master (of the school).' This rendering is supported by a passage in the treatise Sota (ix. 15), where R. Eliezer says: 'Since the destruction of the temple the sage (חכם) has become like the scribe (סופר), and the scribe like the Hazzān (חזקן), and the Hazzān like the uneducated man.' Here we have evidently the hierarchy of the teaching profession, and it may fairly be assumed that they all belong to the ranks of those who, in the NT, are known as νομοδιδάκαλοι, 'doctors of the law' (Lk 4<sup>17</sup>), i.e. the scribes. Now this passage of St. Luke (cf. Mt 9<sup>13</sup>) is of the utmost importance, as showing that these doctors or teachers were to be found in 'every village (κώμη) of Galilee and Judaea.' It is absurd to suppose — even granting the hyperbolic nature of the evangelist's statement — that the higher colleges, where alone the scribes are usually supposed to have taught, were to be found in such numbers throughout the country. But there would, at this time, be an elementary school wherever there was a synagogue. We conclude, therefore, that teachers of all grades were members of the powerful guild of the scribes (οἱ γραμματεῖς, cf. γραμματιστής, 'a schoolmaster'). In the Aramaic of the period סופר no doubt already meant 'teacher' in general, since we find ספרא = 'school' (see the Lexx., and cf. Targum on 1 Ch 25<sup>8</sup>, where 'the teacher as the scholar' is rendered ספרא עם חכמים). It follows, therefore, that the Hazzān or master, who conducted the elementary school, was an official of a higher social grade than the 'Hazzān of the synagogue,' who had to perform such menial offices as the whipping of criminals (Makkoth, iii. 12).

* See Schürer, III, index; Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire de la Palestine, pp. 96-111, and the Jewish historians Gratz, Herzfeld, et c.

The most usual form of address to a teacher was Rabbi (רבי, 'my master,' lit. 'my great one'), but it 'does not seem to have been used as a title [e.g. Rabbi Eliezer, Rabbi Akiba, etc.] till after the time of Christ' (Schürer). In the NT our Lord is addressed by His disciples as πατρις (πατρις, κύριε, διδάσκαλε, and — in Lk only — as ἐπιστάτα.

The opinion just stated, that in the time of our Saviour every place of any size in the country was provided with an elementary school, does not quite coincide with that of the Jewish doctors of a later day, unless we suppose (as is not unreasonable) that the political and religious troubles of the period injuriously affected the provincial schools. We refer to the oft-quoted eulogium on Joshua ben-Gamala (Gamaliel), who was high priest about A.D. 63–65:

'Verily let it be remembered to that man for good, R. Joshua ben-Gamala is his name, for had he not been, the Law would have been forgotten in Israel. At first every one that had a father (alive) received from him instruction in the Law, but he that had no father (alive) learned not the Law. . . . Thereafter teachers for the children were appointed in Jerusalem. . . . But even this measure sufficed not, for he that had a father was brought by him to school, and was taught there, but he that had no father was not brought to be taught there. In consequence of this, it was ordained that teachers should be appointed in every district. To them the children were sent when they were 16–17 years of age. When a teacher became angry with a scholar, the latter stamped his feet and ran away. In this condition education remained until the time of Joshua ben-Gamala, who ordained that in every province and in every town there should be . . . to whom children should be . . . of six or seven years' (Baba

It is not now possible to speak with certainty regarding the condition of the elementary school at the period of which one would most like to know, the period of the childhood of our blessed Lord. The Mishna, almost our only authority, is not, as a whole, older than A.D. 200. Accordingly, we must be content to infer — and always with caution — that some, at least, of the methods here referred to as of long standing may have been operative in the 1st cent. But before attempting even such hesitating results, it will be convenient to give at this point what requires to be said of the education to be got beyond the elementary schools. For the great mass of the boys — or the girls no public . . . was made (see below) — these schools . . . Only those destined for the study of the Law were sent to the colleges (בתי חכמה) or 'house of study,' as the colleges of the scribes were called. These colleges were probably a development of this period. They were, naturally, most numerous in Jerusalem, where the most famous scribes seem to have had each his 'house of study.' Josephus mentions two by name (Wars, i. xxxiii. 2; Ant. xviii. x. 5) who drew crowds of students in the last days of Herod the Great. But by far the most famous of these 'doctors of the law' were the two heads of the rival schools, Hillel and Shammai, although for Christian students a greater interest attaches to Hillel's grandson, himself the most respected teacher of his day, Gamaliel I., who numbered the young Saul of Tarsus among his pupils (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). At these colleges the scribe-aspirant received a professional rather than a general education, for which reason the further discussion of their subjects and methods of study belongs rather to the article SCRIBE.

Returning now to the elementary school, we propose to touch briefly on such of the outstanding features of the school system as we have reason to believe existed in the century preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. As regards the age of the pupils on admission, our authority, though often quoted, is unfortunately too late to be of value for the period in question. 'At five years the age is reached for the study of the Scripture (ספרא), at ten for the study of the Mishna, at thirteen for the fulfilment of the Commandments, at fifteen for the study of the Talmud, at eighteen for marriage,' etc. (Ab. v. 24). There is a consensus of opinion, on the other hand, in the Talmudic writings that six was the earliest age at which school life should begin.† The child had already learned from his parent to repeat the Shema (see Driver on Dt 6<sup>4</sup>), selected proverbs, and verses from the Psalms. He had also had the historical significance of various rites and ceremonies explained to him (see p. 647<sup>b</sup> above).

It is extremely unlikely that the subjects of instruction included more than reading, writing, and, perhaps, the elements of arithmetic. The first of these was by far the most important, and

* The above is Wünsche's translation in Der babyl. Talmud, etc.

† For the curious ceremonies observed at a later period on the child's first appearance at school, see Schechter, Studies in Judaism, p. 368.

It has become a commonplace that the scribes taught gratuitously. This may have been true of the great doctors of the capital,—although even

We have said nothing hitherto of the education of Jewish girls. These were from their birth to their marriage their mother's special care, by whom they were taught, like their brothers, 'to fear God and keep his commandments.' By her, too, they were taught to read, and perhaps to write, as boys in former days were taught by their father, and thereafter instructed in the domestic arts corresponding to their station. The deeper study of the Torah, and still more the higher secular learning, were discouraged. The ideal to which every Jewish daughter was—and we may add, is—taught to aspire is that of the 'virtuous woman' who 'looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her, saying, 'Thy daughters have done virtuously, but I will praise thee more than all' (Pr 31<sup>27-29</sup>). Truly a noble ideal of womanhood!

LITERATURE.—A critical history of Hebrew education is still a desideratum. The standard works of its historians, Jewish and Christian, contain only incidental references. Professor Laurie's Historical Survey of Pre-Christian Education, 1895, pp. 69-105, gives a good account of the subject from the conservative standpoint. Quite a number of Jewish writers have dealt with it in recent years, mainly, however, as organized by the Jewish authorities from the 2nd cent. A.D. onwards. The following are the best of these special works (only those with the number of pages added have been consulted): M. Duschak, Schülererziehung und Melchizedek d. alten Talmuden, 1872; E. van Gelder, Die Jüdische Schulbildung des Mittelalters, 1892, 31 pp.; S. C. Heller, die Pädagogik der Propheten, 187; S. Marcus, die Pädagogik der Juden im Altertum, 1877, 2 vols., 119 p., 119 p.; A. Astruc, Étude sur les écoles juives de la Bible, 1881; B. Spiers, The Synagogue of Antiquity, 1882, 27 pp.; R. Strassburger, Geschichte d. jüdischen u. d. christlichen Schulen Israels, etc., 1887, 310 pp. (for Talmudic method, pp. 1-24); bibliography of Jewish pedagogics, pp. 273-75), J. Löwy, Bildungsgeschichte der israelitischen u. rabbinisch-pädagogischen in judäo-arab. Sprache, 1896, 80 pp.; Oehler, "Pädagogik d. Alten Test." in Schmidt's Encyclopädie d. orientalischen Erziehungs- und Unterrichtswiss., vol. v. 1866, pp. 653-675 (1893) pp. 657-578), is full and authoritative, but in great part antiquated; Gustav Baur in Schmidt's Encl. d. Erziehung, 1892, pp. 554-570 (not seen). Hunzinger's Rationalencyclopädie d. Judenthums, 1833 (vol. i. art. "Erlebung"; ii. "Lehrer," "Schule," "Unterricht," etc.), is a mine of information for the later period; see also Schurer's HJP vi. 25, "Scribism," vol. ii. 27, "School and Synagogue" (older literature of the subject, p. 46); Ginsburg in Kitz's Biblical Cyclopaedia, art. 'Education'; Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social

§ On the latter method of teaching the alphabet on the 'A-was-an-Archer' principle see Shabbath, 104a, given in full in Wünsche's Der Babylon. Talmud, etc., i. pp. 155-57, cf. Lewit (title below), p. 47.

Life in the Days of Christ (esp. chs. vii. viii.), and Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah; L. Low, Die Lebensalter in d. jud. Literatur, 1875, passim (esp. p. 130 ff.: 'Education in Bible Times, and relative notes'); S. Schechter, Studies in Judaism, 1896 (p. 243 ff.: 'The Child in Jewish Literature'). The standard authorities for Jewish education in the Middle Ages (to be added for completeness' sake) are the works of: Die Geschichte d. jüd. Juden, etc., France and Germ., 1888. See also I. Abrahams, Jer, 1896 (esp. chs. ix. xx.).

EFFECT.—In 2 Es 9<sup>6</sup> 'effect' is used in the obsolete sense of 'deed,' 'the times also of the Highest have . . . endings in effects and signs' (consummatio in actu et in signis); cf. Shaks. Lear, II. iv. 182—

'Thou better know'st
The offices of nature, bond of childhood,
Effects of courtesy, dues of gratitude.'

In Ezk 12<sup>28</sup> the sense is purport, significance. 'The days are at hand, and the effect of every vision' (דבר 'word,' as RVm). So Chancer, Merch. Tale, 153—

'And for his freendes on a day he sente,
To tellen hem th' effect of his entente.'

With the exception of 'effect' is much as in mod. English, the word is not used. Ro 9<sup>6</sup> may be noticed, 'as though the word effect' (ἐπίστασις, lit. 'has fallen out of the mouth of the Lord'). The usual phrase is 'to make of one's self' (ἐκ τῆς αὐτοῦ). In the original, of which the most interesting is καταργῶ (Ro 4<sup>4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>17</sup>; tr. 'make without effect' (RV); Pauline word. Its opposite is ἐνεργῶ, 'power at work, esp. in the world'; ever 'effectual' and 'effective'. They translate either ἐνεργῶ, as Gal 2<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>13</sup> 'work effectually'; 2 Co 1<sup>6</sup> 'be effectual'; Ja 5<sup>16</sup> 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much' (RV 'the supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working'; Rendel Harris, 'the energized prayer of a righteous man is of great force'); its adj. ἐνεργῆς, as 1 Co 1<sup>6</sup> Phil 2<sup>13</sup>; or its subst. ἐνεργία, whence Eng. 'energy,' as 1 Pt 1<sup>3</sup> 'the continual working'; RV 'working.' In all these places we should now use 'effective' (RV).

J. HASTINGS.

EGGS.—See FOWL.

EGLAH (אֵילָה 'a heifer').—One of the wives of David, and mother of Ithream (2 S 3<sup>3</sup>). Both here and in 1 Ch 3<sup>3</sup> she is distinguished by the title 'David's wife.' Jewish tradition (cf. Jer. Quest. Heb. in libros Regum) identified E. with Michal, since the latter was his first and best-loved wife. More probably the name of E.'s first husband is concealed in the word 'David.' J. F. STENNING.

EGLAIM (אֵילַיִם), Is 15<sup>2</sup>.—Noticed with Moab. The name has not been recovered. In the Onomasticon (s.v. Agallim) it is placed 8 Roman miles south of Areopolis. C. R. CONDER.

EGLATH-SHELISHYAH (אֵילָת־שְׁלִישִׁיָּה) occurs in an ancient oracle against Moab, which is quoted in Is 15<sup>2</sup> and Jer 48<sup>34</sup>. In both these passages RV takes the word to be a proper name, giving in margin the alternative tr. '[as] an heifer of three years old,' which is AV in Jer 48<sup>34</sup> and AVm in Is 15<sup>2</sup>. In the latter passage, AV text omits '[as].' It is still somewhat uncertain whether the word is an appellative or a proper name, although the latter view has commended itself to the majority of modern scholars (Ewald, Reuss, Graf, Rothstein in Kautzsch's A.T. etc.). Delitzsch (Isaiah, ad loc.) defends the rendering of AV and Luther, laying stress upon the fact that both in Is and Jer אֵילָת occurs asyndetically. He points out that it might be an appellative of Moab (cf.

Jer 46<sup>20</sup> 50<sup>11</sup>, Hos 4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>, in all of which 'heifer' is similarly used), but thinks it more probable that the reference is to Zoar (Is) or Horonaim (Jer) as beautiful, strong, and hitherto unsubdued cities. In Is 15<sup>2</sup> after שִׁיגֹר (Zoar) LXX has δάμαλις γὰρ ἐστὶν τριετής, referring to Moab. In Jer 48 [Gr. 31]<sup>34</sup> the MSS show a perplexing variety of readings (see Swete). B has, after Horonaim, καὶ ἀγγεῖαν Σαλασειδ. Aq. and Symm., however, had δάμαλις τριετής (see Field).

LITERATURE.—Comm. on Is and Jer; Baudissin in SK, 1888, p. 509 ff.; Dietrich in Merr' Archiv, i. 342 ff.

J. A. SELBIE.

EGLON (אֵגְלוֹן).—A king of Moab who, upon the relapse of the children of Israel into idolatry after the death of Othniel, was the divine instrument for their punishment. He is represented as forming a league with Amalek and Ammon, and in conjunction with them taking possession of Jericho ('the city of palm trees,' Jg 3<sup>10</sup>).† For eighteen years he ruled over them, till a deliverer arose in the person of Ehud, of the clan of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin. With the excuse of taking Egion his tribute (or, perhaps, a present), Ehud with a retinue of servants went to the king's court. The king, we are told, in order that we may understand what is coming, was a very fat man. The present was offered, and the whole party started on their way home again. When they reached the graven images (LXX, Vulg. AVm, RVm), or perhaps graven stones (by some connected with the twelve stones of Jos 4<sup>20</sup>), or the quarries (AV, RV, following Targ. Syr.),‡ Ehud went back to the king by himself, and, by giving him to believe that he had a secret to communicate to him, obtained an interview with him by himself alone. He was sitting in his cool upper-chamber. Now that he has the king by himself, Ehud claims that his message for the king is from God, upon which Egion rises out of respect to the source of the message. Ehud then draws his two-edged dagger, taking advantage of his left-handedness, which would enable him to do so without much notice being taken of his act, and stabs E. with such force that the dagger, haft and all, goes into him, while the fat closes upon the blade.§ It is some little time before the murder of E. is discovered, and meanwhile Ehud has escaped and summoned his countrymen to the destruction of the Moabites on the W. of Jordan with such success, that 'the land had rest fourscore years.'

Jos. (Ant. v. iv.) makes several additions to, and variations in, the story told in the Book of Judges; that E. built a palace at Jericho; that Ehud also dwelt there, and became familiar with E. by means of his presents, and was beloved by E.'s courtiers. Ehud gathers the Israelites together to destroy Moab almost before his murder of E. is known.

LITERATURE.—For the latest description of the history of Egion, see Moore, Judges, 39 ff. H. A. REDPATH.

EGLON (אֵגְלוֹן).—An ancient town in the Shephelah, close to Lachish. Its king, Debir, joined in the alliance formed by the king of Jerus. against the Isr. under Jo-hua. and after the battle of Ajalon it was captured and destroyed (Jos 10<sup>37</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>). It is not again named in Scripture, so that it was prob. utterly destroyed. In LXX, cf. Jos 10, Adullam takes its place by some (prob.) early mistake, they

* This is held to be an exaggeration of D by those who distinguish various hands in this book; see, however, Ps 83<sup>6</sup> 7, which seems to refer to the period of the Judges.

† The fortifications, at any rate, of Jericho must have been in ruins (cf. Jos 6<sup>26</sup> with 1 K 16<sup>34</sup>), but we are never told that the ruins left from the burning of Jericho were pulled down.

‡ The notion that they were boundary stones, or images, scarcely deserves mention.

§ For the meaning of the last clause of verse 22 see Moore, pp. 97, 98.

* Having given 'earnest' as one meaning of 'effectual' when used of prayers, the Oxf. Eng. Dict. (s.v.) adds: 'Cf. Anglo-Lat. effluosae supplicantes "earnestly entreating," A.D. 1229 in Ritter 1 375. Perhaps this use was originally due to confusion with effluosae; but the translators of AV ingeniously availed themselves of it in Ja 5<sup>16</sup> to render Gr ἐνερgeticῶς. It is to be observed, however, that AV uses two words, 'effectual fervent,' for this one Gr word. Tindale's tr. is 'if it be fervent.'

are in consequence identified in the Onomasticon. The name remains in 'Ajlan, some 15 miles N.E. from Gaza and 2 miles N. of Tell Hesi, now conclusively identified with the ancient Lachish. But Flinders Petrie (PEFSt, 1890, pp. 161-163) points out Tell Nejileh as probably the true site. Khurbet 'Ajlan his practised eye pronounced unlikely to be the site of an ancient town. On the other hand, 'it is certain,' he says, 'that Tell Hesi and subordinately Tell Nejileh must have been positions of first-rate importance from the time of the earliest settlements; they would then agree to the character of Lachish and Eglon. The history of Tell Hesi begins about B.C. 1500, and ends about B.C. 500; while Tell Nejileh, as far as can be seen on the surface, is of the same age, or ruined even earlier.' 'There are no sites in the country around so suited to the importance of the two Tells.' To this may be added that Joshua (ch. 10) brought him first to the place lying between Lachish and Hebron, and that the account of Tell Nejileh in this account better than that of 'Ajlan. See LACHISH.

See also PEFSt ii. 49; Porter, Giant Cities of Egypt, 1894, 165; Bliss, Ancient Egypt (1894), 142. A. J. D. L. R. S. O. N.

EGYPT.—

- i. Name.
- ii. Physical character.
- iii. Fauna.
- iv. Flora.
- v. Ethnology.
- vi. Language.
- vii. Chronology.
- viii. History.
- ix. Relations with Asia.
- x. Religion.

i. NAME.—The name by which the Egyptians at all times designated their country was Kimēt (Copt. KHME, χΗΜΙ), a word of which the probable etymology—root km 'black'—would confirm the statements of Herodotus and Plutarch, who connect it with the dark colour of the soil. The contrasting redness of the neighbouring desert sand gave to that the name of 'the Red Land.' It is impossible to connect Kimēt with Qimr (qf). To the Semites the country was known as Mizraim (מִצְרַיִם, seldom מִצְרַיִם, Mesraim, Mesrapaim), the termination here being no doubt locative and not a dual. The older cuneiform texts vocalize Muṣr, the later Misr; the Amarna letters have generally Misri, pl.* For this word a favourite though undemonstrable derivation is that from muṣr 'fort.' The Greek name Αἴγυπτος (Arab. Kūbt, Eth. Gebs, and European Copt) is of equally obscure origin. It cannot be satisfactorily derived from any Egyptian or Semitic word or combination of words. In the earliest Greek writers (Odyssey generally) it is the name of the river, for which Νεῖλος (cf. נֵּל, נֵּלִי) is first found in Hesiod. In the later epochs and in poetical texts we meet with many other names for Egypt. Of such Ἐμρι is among the most frequent, and seems connected specially with Lower Egypt and the inundation. 'The Land of the Sycamore,' 'of the Olive,' 'of the Sycamore,' are names which require for their explanation a greater knowledge of the geographical myths than we possess.

ii. PHYSICAL CHARACTER.—The geological constitution of Egypt is simple; its elements are three—the bed of rock (limestone for the most part, with sandstone and granite in the S.), which stretches across the N.E. corner of Africa; then the sand which lies upon this, and extends from the Arabian desert hills on the E. to the Libyan W.; lastly, the black Nile mud, which covers the sand in the centre of the valley, and the great stream on which the country depends. The number of the elements at all periods gave a high importance to the geological elements of the country. The limestone obtained near Memphis (Turrāh) furnished the material for the principal works of the early periods. The great temples higher up the valley, especially those of Thebes, are built of sandstone, conveniently obtainable at Silsileh. Red granite for statues, sarcophagi, etc., was worked at the first Cataract (Aswān); black granite and diorite for similar purposes came from the eastern desert (Hammāmāt). Alabaster, a favourite material, usually for smaller objects, was quarried at Siut, or (a better quality) at Farafra, near Siut. It was extracted under the earliest Dynasties. In metals the Nile valley itself is poor; those most valued come from abroad,—gold in plenty from Nubia or the eastern desert; silver, which was rarer, probably from Cilicia; copper from Sinai, later also from Cyprus; malachite and lapis lazuli from Sinai and Mesopotamia. Bronze, familiar during all later epochs, was made with tin, the provenance of which is uncertain, but which was introduced under the 6th Dynasty. Nor can we tell whence iron, well known at any rate from about 800 B.C., was obtained, though a limited amount could be got from the western desert.

The course of the Nile through Nubia is hindered by a succession of rocky barriers, the last or northernmost of which—the first Cataract—has often been the political as it is the natural frontier of Egypt. Between the Cataracts and the Delta the country is of a very uniform character. The valley is extensive or narrow as the two hills recede from or approach the stream. Its breadth varies from about nine to four miles. As the river progresses northward, the hills fall back and the valley expands into the Delta, across which the river makes its way by various channels to the Mediterranean. Although the surface-denudation recognizable at certain points of the river's course and the petrified forests still extant testify to very different climatic conditions at a remote geological period, it is unlikely that during the five or six thousand years of historic Egypt there has been much change in the aspect of the country. By the opening of that period the valley had been dried, the river-bed raised, and the stream's course fixed practically to its actual extent, though the number of its mouths was greater than it is to-day.

History is concerned during the earlier periods almost exclusively with the upper valley; the Delta was evidently still but partially reclaimed, though certain towns there are already met with in the myths and in the earliest history. Physical contrasts are coincident with that division into Upper and Lower Egypt which we find an established fact of the remotest historic times; already the two kingdoms—for such undoubtedly they once had been—are united, each, however, retaining its own tutelary deity, and its independent capital, Nūb (El-Kab) and Buto.

Beyond this twofold partition, Egypt appears from the earliest times subdivided into a number (about 22 in south and north respectively) of smaller districts (nomes, from nomos), which become later the basis of an administrative system, but which originated probably in the vaguely defined settlements of different tribes. The lists of the nomes are our chief source of topographical knowledge; but no full lists are preserved from early periods, although several most ancient documents (tomb of Intef, Pyramid texts) mention a few of the nomes. In the lists each nome is personified by its guardian deity, fetish, or emblem, which serves as a kind of coat-of-arms. A nome was held to be composed of four elements: (1) the metropolis, the seat of the tribal religion and residence of the chief; (2) the cultivated land; (3) the canals by which the fields were fed with river-water; (4) the marshes which, rarely cultivable, served as a hunting-ground for the local nobles. The hieroglyphic  which expressed one of the words for 'nome,' is a testimony to some primitive system, as it does a  and a  of the 1st Dynasty is credited with the construction of the  which still protects the province of  a too extensive inundation, while his successors had all to occupy themselves with the  water, the cutting of canals, and  of local claims upon the benefits of proximity to the river itself. Variations in the annual height of the inundation were no doubt carefully observed in the remotest ages; we know that they were recorded in the Cataract district by the kings of the 12th Dynasty, and at Karnak in later times.

* According to W. Max Müller (Z. Ass. viii. 209), Muṣru, whence Shalmaneser i. received presents, was Egypt, not a N. Syrian or Armenian district (Winckler, Hommel, etc.) Winckler has suggested (Alt. For. 24 ff.) that another Muṣru, which he locates in the S. of Egypt, have been the real origin of the Exodus. The name of wanderings in this district has been connected with the name of Egypt. In the Amarna letters this Muṣru and Egypt are distinguished as Muṣru and Ḫem (Hommel in Leutschke, J. Ebers, 27).

The Nile is not only the great fertilizer; it is also, now as formerly, the main highway. We hear relatively little of journeys by road; locomotion was normally by water, either upon the river or upon the subsidiary canals. The commonest words for journeying implied the idea of sailing up or down stream. The dead were drawn to their rock-cut tombs on boat-formed cars; the solar gods were thought to traverse the sky in a divine bark. Such roads as we do hear of are chiefly those leading from the Nile across the desert—eastwards (from Coptos) to the Red Sea, westwards to the Natron Lakes, or southwards into the Soudan.

iii. FAUNA.—The bones of sacrificial animals from various periods, and countless animal mummies from the base epochs, might, if carefully preserved and located, teach much as to the ultimate homes of several species, while an extensive knowledge of both the domesticated and wild animals might be had from the frescoes of the tombs—especially those of the Middle Kingdom. Each animal is there accompanied by its name, though it is often difficult to find for these their modern equivalents. For the earliest times the hieroglyphic signs themselves would supply a considerable list, giving evidence that the species then known have since changed little. The lion is frequently depicted, though probably seldom met with until the desert had been reached. The lion hunts recorded in the New Kingdom refer mainly to Syria or Nubia, though  hunted lions in the neighbourhood of Memphis. Leopards (or panthers?) seem to have been seen in the south; elephants and giraffes were not unknown to those who traded on the Upper Nile; jackals, then as now, were very familiar; desert wolves and hyænas somewhat less so; many kinds of antelopes were well known. The hippopotamus, once commonly met in the river and hunted in the swamps, has by now been driven far up the Nile. Of oxen various breeds were kept; the familiar long-horned species existed until the plague in the middle of the present century. Oxen are often represented ploughing or threshing. Certain varieties, or rather individual members of certain varieties, distinguished by peculiar, carefully sought markings, were held sacred from the earliest times—Apis at Memphis, Mnevis at Heliopolis, Bacis at Hermonthis. Sheep were no doubt kept, but occur rarely on the monuments. Varieties of the long- and the spiral-horned ram were sacred. The ass was the usual beast of burden, and was not rivalled by the camel till a very late date. It will be remembered that in Gn 12<sup>13</sup> (Abraham and Pharaoh) and Ex 9<sup>1</sup> (Moses) camels are nevertheless mentioned—both by J—as if known in Egypt. The horse is likewise unknown in the older epochs; as it appears first after the Hyksos period, it is assumed to have been introduced by those invaders. The reference to Egyptian horse-breeding in 1 K 10<sup>28</sup> should more probably be applied to some Asiatic country (Winckler, Alt. Unt. 173 A). The Egyptian name for the horse meant properly 'a pair,' and was due probably to its first employment in the war-chariot. Foreign names, among them Semit. , once borrowed, became even more usual. The horse appears to have been seldom ridden. Several breeds of dogs were known; some were valued for the chase. The names of some breeds are preserved, and show that certain Libyan (or Nubian?) varieties were popular. The cat, sacred to the goddess Bast, was larger in ancient than in modern Egypt. It figures in a very ancient solar myth (Book of the Dead, ch. 17). The pig, except for its mention in the sacred books, is not met with until late times. Of birds a great number are depicted—geese, ducks, herons of many sorts; migratory birds, e.g. swallows, plovers, quails. Eagle, vulture, hawk, and owl are among the most  hieroglyphics, while the vulture, hawk, and ibis were sacred to prominent divinities, and were embalmed in numbers (in the base epochs) in the localities of which those divinities were the patrons. It is remarkable that, though hen-breeding is universal in Egypt to-day, that bird was  unknown to the ancients. Of the larger reptiles the most important was the crocodile, now no longer to be met with below the Cataracts. There is a variety of snakes, the best known being the uraeus, emblem of the patron-goddess of Lower Egypt and hence of the king, and the horned viper. From the importance and frequency in the earliest religious literature of charms against large snakes, it may be inferred that their numbers and dimensions were once greater than they are at present.

The texts show us several insects, notably the scarabeus-beetle, regarded,  in later times, as a symbol of eternity  the sun-god, and the bee, associated in writing from the remotest times with royalty in Lower Egypt.

Fish are often represented. The most peculiar is the  the badge of the 19th nome of Upper Egypt. Fish were much eaten; some of the oldest frescoes depict them speared in the marshes, landed in drag-nets, and then split for drying; while texts equally ancient tell of the construction of fish-ponds.

iv. FLORA.—Egypt is remarkably poor in variety of vegetation. Many of the cultivated plants most common now—cotton, sugar, rice—are modern importations.

In prehistoric ages the valley was no doubt considerably wooded; but to-day, with the exception of the various palm species, trees occur only singly or in small groups. The representations of the flora—of trees especially—in the frescoes, carvings, or hieroglyphics are generally too far conventionalized to be instructive. More can be learned from extant remains of edible grains or funerary floral wreaths (from the New Kingdom onwards), or of woodwork (from all periods). From these it is clear that the native vegetation has altered very little during the course of history. The Egyptians were at all times ill off for workable woods, and were compelled—where the stalks of river plants would not serve—to make the best of their own sycamore or acacia (the latter especially in the older epochs), or to import yew from Cilicia (?) and ebony from Nubia. More than one Pharaoh of the New Kingdom brought specimens of trees and vegetables from Syria or the Red Sea coasts, either as curiosities or with a view to their introduction. From the nature of the soil, agriculture must always have been the main occupation of the population, and we learn from the monuments the names of several cereals, of which wheat and barley were the commonest, durah being well known since the New Kingdom. Gardens were laid out, and much interest was shown in them since the 4th Dynasty. Many vegetables are represented in the frescoes and as hieroglyphic signs, especially the bulbous sorts—onions, leeks, etc. (cf. Nu xi. 5). The vine was always largely cultivated, and from the Delta came several famous wines of Greek and Roman times. The fig, too, is early represented. Many plants were valued medicinally, as can be shown from the numbers occurring in the medical works, notably in the Papyrus Ebers; others were used for dyeing. The most important of all plants to the Egyptians was the papyrus, which, unknown now in the Delta, grew there once in vast thickets where the nobles hunted, and whence was obtained the material, not only for writing, but also for numerous other purposes, decorative and useful. As the papyrus became one of the pictorial emblems of Lower Egypt, so the lotus was often that of the southern country, although a sort of water-reed seems also to have been so employed.

v. ETHNOLOGY.—The problem of the origin and relationship of the Egyptian race is still unsolved. Investigation is to be sought in the evidence of (1) philology; (2) mythology; (3) physical anthropology; and (4) material culture. In these various fields have hitherto given results partially concordant. (1) The most ancient linguistic remains point to an undeniable though already very remote relationship with the Semitic languages (see below). (2) The divinities and myths familiar to the earliest texts were, with scarcely a few exceptions, growths of the Egyptian soil, the indication being to recognize in extraneous elements, if any, the influence of neighbouring African races. Hommel indeed invites us to take other considerations into account by pointing out certain coincidences between the ancient religions of Egypt and Babylonia. (3) Racial types, as depicted on the monuments, and the measurements, etc., of mummies, have led to no uniform results. Formerly, anthropologists saw in the sculptures and paintings one race, identical with the Copts of to-day; now they generally discern various types among the most ancient portraits, and seek on such evidence to distinguish at least two races. Few mummies remain from the oldest epochs—one of the most ancient is that from Medûm, at present in the Royal College of Surgeons, London,—and those from later times point apparently to a short-skulled, while the modern Egyptians are of a long-skulled type. Probably the oldest group of remains from Abydos, 1895-96) seems to point to a tall, slender, orthognathous, smooth-haired race; but the type there is not homogeneous. Whether it is that of the Medûm race, or whether its relationship to the race of historic Egypt is not yet clear. (4) There is certainly evidence of African elements, whether due to primitive kinship or to mere proximity, in some branches of the material civilization, such as dress, weapons, possibly circumcision. On the other hand, Hommel seeks to show that a very early form of religious or sepulchral architecture (pyramid) is derived from Babylonia. It must be owned that the oldest remains of Mesopotamian civilization do exceed in antiquity any hitherto known in Egypt.

Most are agreed that, whatever be the case with their forerunners, the Egyptians from the 3rd or 4th Dynasty onwards were not a negroid race; that they came, on the contrary, from Asia. But the questions of their previous home there and the route by which they reached the Nile,—whether by Bab el-Mandeb and Abyssinia or the Wady Hammâmât and Coptos, or by the Syrian desert and the Isthmus,—are as yet unanswered. The route S. Arabia-Hammâmât-Coptos has for it the evidence (a) of certain remains at Coptos, pointing to a people coming from the Red Sea; (b) of certain facts—physical resemblance, peaceful relations, and the apparently reverential attitude of the Egyptians—which have been held to point to Punt, i.e. the country about the southern end of the Red Sea, as a former home of the race. To this may be added the tradition that the founders of the monarchy came from Thinis, a town not far distant from Coptos—a tradition which has been confirmed by the recent discovery of the First Dynasty tombs in the same neighbourhood (Abydos). No reminiscence has been discerned in the literature of a prehistoric immigration. The people are generally considered themselves aborigines, and called themselves merely Rômet (i), 'men' par excellence. Traces of a stone age, undeniable though complicated by the long historic survival of flint-working, show that the country has been inhabited since the Pliocene period. Palæolithic remains are rare, but some half-dozen stations are said to have been recognized. Considerable evidence has been adduced (though contested) to demonstrate a New Stone age. That a Hebrew writer of the 6th or 7th cent. speaks (Gn 10<sup>6</sup>) of Mizraim as related to Cush (Ethiopia), Put (S. Arabia, Punt), and Canaan, is not a fact of much ethnological importance. By the earlier annalist (ib. 12<sup>a</sup>) eight names—mostly of Semitic origin—are given which may point to the current Hebrew view of Egypt's racial relationships.

vi. LANGUAGE.—The position of the Egyptian language among its neighbours is a question closely associated with that as to the racial connexions of the race. Our means of comparison with the Semitic idioms are not of equal value. For the Semitic languages—for the Mesopotamian dialects at least—we have documents perhaps as ancient as any from Egypt. For the Berber and Cushite languages of Africa we can but infer from quite modern evidence the linguistic conditions of earlier ages; and in this important field, therefore, little has as yet been attempted.

The Egyptian language, together with certain languages of Barbary, Nubia, and Abyssinia, used to be regarded as forming one of the distinct main divisions of human speech; now it is clear that this isolating classification cannot be justified. The group is not independent. Since Benfey's attempt to demonstrate the affinity of the Egyptian and Semitic languages, his main contention has received increasing confirmation, until it is no longer possible to deny an originally very close relationship—collateral rather than filial—between the proto-Hamitic and proto-Semitic groups. The affinity is specially prominent in grammatical features common to both. Of these the principal are—(1) the same gender-endings, masc. u, fern. t; (2) an all but identical series of pronominal suffixes; (3) the use in both of a peculiar adjectival termination, 'nisbeh'; (4) identity in four or five of the numerals; (5) analogous treatment of the weak is not always correct, nor is more than a selection (political or ritualistic?) from the full series of past kings given. They supply no data as to length of reign. (2) The lists in a dilapidated papyrus of the Ramesside period at Turin, which probably enumerated when complete all kings from the 1st to the Hyksos Dynasty. (3) Dates are found in, or can be reckoned from, the annals inscribed in the temples by certain kings, or incidentally in the tombs of private persons. This is the most reliable class of document, and the records in private tombs are the sole contemporary source for a chronology of the early Dynasties.

B. Of Greek writers, by far the most important is Manetho, a native priest, c. B.C. 250, whose works are known only by the excerpts preserved by Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius, or by the medium of still later chronologists. We are ignorant of the sources upon which his Aegyptiaca was based; presumably, he had at his disposal documents far fuller and more reliable than any now available, though his chronology of the remoter periods can be proved much at fault. Nor can we judge how far he manipulated his authorities to suit his own views; and it is, moreover, probable that his Jewish and Christian abbreviators had their own systems to harmonize with his statements. The misfortunes inevitable in the long transmission of such writings must also be considered in estimating their present value. The lists appended to Manetho's history divided the Egyptian kings into 31 Dynasties. The grounds for such divisions are often difficult to appreciate; they do not always coincide with the divisions in the Turin papyrus. The lists compiled by Eratosthenes, B.C. 275-194, in which pretended Greek names are given, contain many inaccuracies, but accompanied the names.

Many scholars have occupied themselves with these Greek chronologists. Bockh sought to demonstrate an astronomical era as the basis of Manetho's calculations. Lepsius appealed to the 'Sothis' book, — a Christian forgery, — which ascribed 3555 years as total duration to the Egyptian monarchy; while, according to Unger, Manetho's system gave 5613 as the date of its foundation. Brugsch has attempted to derive from the basis of average length of reigns and reigns, and thus arrives at 4400 for the same event. Ed. Meyer lays stress chiefly on data as to length of reigns actually recorded on the monuments, and has thus constructed a series of 'minimum dates,' i.e. dates below which, at any rate, the various periods could not be brought down; but C. Torr has since re-examined the monuments with the result of a possible further reduction of Meyer's figures.

The most important assistance towards the establishment of indisputable dates is derived from astronomical calculations, based on the following ascertained facts as to the Egyptian calendar. The Egyptians did not use a leap year. Consequently in every four years a day was lost, and in 1460 years these losses had resulted in a complete shift of all the nominal months throughout the seasonal year. An absolute method of reckoning could, however, be obtained by observing the variation in the sun's position. This variation was gauged by the first visible (heliacal) rising of Sothis (Sirius), an event which coincided with the beginning of the Inundation. When the 'natural' year, reckoned from this point, amount to 1460, that total is therefore called a Sothic period. The natural or Sothic year was probably of importance to the Egyptians only for agricultural and ritualistic calculations; but to us it is of great value. For the known fact that a Sothic period began in A.D. 139 enables us to fix its previous occurrences in B.C. 1322, 2784, 4242, etc. With these as a basis, and taking into consideration the Sothis risings under kings Thutmose I. and Amenophis I., Ed. Mahler fixes the reign of Thutmose III. at 1503-1449. He has, indeed, also calculated exact dates for the remainder of the 18th and 19th Dynasties; but results drawn from documents still often disputable cannot be relied on. To such astronomical dates Flinders Petrie has contributed 3410 as the probable commencement of the 6th Dynasty. The following are selected dates, from those provisionally adopted by Petrie,* Ed. Meyer, Mahler, and Steindorff (in 'Baedeker,' 1897):—

|              | Petrie. | Meyer. |
|--------------|---------|--------|
| Dynasty.     | B.C.    | B.C.   |
| I.           | 4777    | 3180   |
| IV.          | 3998    | 2830   |
| VI.          | 3410    | 2530   |
| XI.          | 2985    |        |
| XII.         | 2778    | 2130   |
| XIII.        | 2565    | 1930   |
| XVIII.       | 1587    | 1530   |
| XIX.         | 1327    | 1320   |
| XX.          |         | 1240   |
| XXI.         | 1089    | 1060   |
| XXII.        |         | 930    |
| XXV.         |         | 728    |
| XXVI.        |         | 663    |
| XXVII.       |         | 525    |
| XXX.         |         | 382    |
| Macedonians. |         | 332    |
| Romans.      |         | 30     |

viii. HISTORY.—Modern historians conveniently partition Manetho's series of 31 Dynasties into the following groups: (a) the Old Kingdom, Dyns. i.-vi.; (b) the Middle Kingdom, Dyns. xi.-xiii.; (c) the New Kingdom, Dyns. xviii.-xx.; (d) the Foreign Domination, Dyns. xxii.-xxv.; (e) the Restoration, Dyn. xxvi.; (f) the Persian Domination, Dyn. xxxi. Between these lie obscure, or unassigned periods, not assignable to any of the more distinctly defined groups.

(a) The Old Kingdom.—Although nothing is known of the history of the earliest Pharaohs, the tombs of the 1st and 2nd Dynasties have lately been discovered at Abydos (Om el-Gaah), the legendary cradle, it will be remembered, of the monarchy. Unfamiliar royal names of the same remote age have come to light somewhat farther south (Negadeh);† while the so-called 'New Race' cemetery—the remains of a very rude stage of culture—in the latter locality, is regarded as dating from at least as distant a period. In Greek times legends could still be collected, attributing to some of these early kings notable achievements, such as the first damming of the river, the establishment of a certain divine cult, or the regulation of succession to the throne; to others, some memorable experience—a devastating plague, or an earthquake.

It is to be remembered that, while the first historic Dynasty and that of demigods which preceded it are said to be native to Upper Egypt, the legends of the still remoter Dynasty of gods are localized in the North; the great gods were at home first in Heliopolis and the Delta. This may point, it is said, to a racial contrast which, however strong at first, was early obliterated. One of the prehistoric races had occupied districts about the river's mouth; another—that, perhaps, to which the rude monuments at Coptos are due—had arrived in the upper valley, and one of its chiefs, attaining, we may suppose, at Abydos, or more properly Thinis, to a position of supremacy, had been able to extend thence his power down the river, settling near the later Memphis, subduing or absorbing the Delta tribes, and finally identifying himself with the religion of the district which became thenceforth the state religion of the nation. Relics of a possible monarchy can be traced in archaic titles, functions, dress, etc., of the later kings; but of the people ruled by these primitive Pharaohs, or of the limits of their domains, little can as yet be said. Interments, flints, pottery, regarded by some as prehistoric, are by others assigned to far later ages.

* So far as yet published: see History, vols. i. & ii.; Meyer's are the minimum dates referred to above.

† See Eg. Zeitschr. xxxv. 147.

History properly so called opens with Dyn. 3. Yet here still we have knowledge of only one or two out of half a dozen kings. Some fragments on which the name of Nbk (Nebka) occurs are held to belong to his time; Dsr (Zeser), his successor, in all probability built (possibly usurped) the step-pyramid of Sakkara. He was a monarch of some power, for he extended his activity to the mines of Sinai, where his name is found, and his cult was revived at quite a late epoch. The Dynasty closes (or the next begins) with a better known king, Sfrrw-Soris, whose name survives on numerous monuments, the most important being his at Medûm. He, too, exploited the nomads there show, until he had crushed the hostile nomads of the neighbourhood. The tombs of several of his nobles are extant in the cemeteries of Abusir, Dahshur, and Medûm. The 4th Dynasty has left a memorial more indelible than that of any that followed it; for the successors of Soris built as their tombs the three great pyramids of Gizeh. Their relationships to Soris and to one another are uncertain. Some close blood connexion can be argued from genealogies in contemporary tombs and from hieroglyphs. Hwfw-Cheops, Hfr-Chephren, and Mnkwr-Mykerinus appear to have spent their energies chiefly on the construction of their pyramids. With this object they brought granite from Aswân and alabaster from quarries near Tel el-Amarna. Cheops, however, continued the work in Sinai, and built in the Delta (Dahshur and Bubastis). Indeed we learn from the inscriptions of Mfn (Methen), a magnate of the time, that the Delta was already, at any rate in part, controlled and worked for the crown by great magnates. Of the remaining three or four kings of the Dynasty, one at least is known to have built a pyramid. The great Sphinx is usually attributed to this period, though it possibly belongs to a considerably later age. The relative scarcity of remains of the 4th Dynasty probably points to the small development of the custom of building monumental tombs.

Tradition regarded the 5th Dynasty as a new family, possibly as one of usurpers. One legend—probably not without interested motives—ascribes to it an origin half-priestly, half-divine, and places its home in the Delta. The Dynasty consisted of some nine kings, mostly little more now than names; for we know of no achievements more remarkable than work in the mines of Sinai or Hammâmât and a trading expedition down the coasts of the Red Sea. The pyramids of all but one of the kings are identified—mostly at Abusir. That of Wn-Onnos, the last of the Dynasty, is at Sakkara, and, though smaller than most tombs of its class, is to us of much greater importance than the gigantic but barren erections of earlier reigns; for in it are inscribed the most ancient texts of all Egyptian literature (see below).

The 6th Dynasty, in its widespread activity abroad and at home, is a strong contrast to its forerunner. Inscriptions of its kings meet us in all parts of Upper and Lower Egypt, as well as in Sinai and the desert quarries. And now, moreover, we may read in the earliest of narrative inscriptions—those of Wni (Una) and Hrkhwf (Herkhuf), the generals and ambassadors of kings Ppy (Pepy) I. and Mnwr (Merenera)—of expeditions against both the Syrian and Nubian barbarians. These resulted, indeed, in little but booty and conciliatory presents from the tribes over whom a temporary victory could probably be achieved with little trouble, by the (at least partially) disciplined troops of Egypt. One of the latter kings of this Dynasty, Ppy II., sat longer on the throne than any monarch in the world's history; native and Greek documents assign him a reign of over 90 years.

We know not under what circumstances the 6th Dynasty had reached the throne,—whether through a blood claim or by violence,—nor do we know amidst what events its rule closed. Evidently, however, it had no peaceful end. The last of its kings are but empty names, and indeed in the latter years of Ppy II. complete obscurity surrounds the political and social existence of Egypt. When, some two or three centuries later, that obscurity is dissipated, the country has assumed a new face, the capital is no longer at Memphis, the centre of gravity is several hundred miles farther south.

The outward characteristics of the Egyptian polity show little change under the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Dynasties. The southern and northern kingdoms, bound together, it has been said, in a sort of personal union, each retains to some extent its separate organization, although important offices, once proper to one or other of them, are often found united in the hands of a single functionary, just as the official nomenclature of the Pharaoh combined the royal titles of both South and North. The king is omnipotent; his ministers—a mere bureaucracy—are members of the royal house or of the great territorial families. The ancient division of the country into nomes forms the basis of an elaborate financial and judicial administration, yet controlled by the court through officials dependent on the central government, by whom the royal dues are collected and settled independently of the local authorities. But as time goes on, (as we may infer) weak rulers and the old provincial independence reasserts itself, and the nomarchs begin to move beneath the weight of central despotism. One of the first signs of this decentralizing tendency is the growth of the custom of burial, now no longer at Memphis, beside the king, but at home, in the cemeteries of the provincial capitals, at Akhmim, Abydos, Thebes, Elephantine, and elsewhere. The court of the nomarch was modelled upon that of the king; its officials grew in number, its militia in strength. The kings of the 6th Dynasty are left surrounded only by courtiers and placemen; the magnates seem to have withdrawn, and to be ready, when opportunity offers, to reassert the primitive independence of their position.

The period between the 6th and the 11th Dynasties is one of the most obscure in Egypt's history; yet the complete dearth of monuments can scarcely be attributed to Manetho localizes the 7th and 8th Dynasties still at Memphis, and we may indeed suppose that there was no sudden break with the past. The provincial nobles could only gradually assert their strength, and the Pharaohs still reigned, at least nominally, in their ancient capital. But of these kings we know nothing, scarcely their names. Possibly they were, in later times, regarded as usurpers. Genealogies in certain tombs (El-Bersheh) appear to reach back to their times, and show how the nomarchs already flourished. The succeeding Dynasties, the 9th and 10th, would be equally unknown were it not for the inscriptions of Siut, whose princes record their participation in the struggle of the petty Dynasty of Heracleopolis (Ahnas) against 'the South.' The 9th and 10th Dynasties are indeed currently ascribed to Heracleopolis, while subsequent events make it evident that by 'the South' is here meant the Thebes. That town had been the family under the 6th Dynasty; and while the royal power had grown weak, the Theban nomarchs had nursed their strength, till at length, having overcome the central power, they by degrees re-established unity and order.

(b) The Middle Kingdom.—The claims of these first Theban Pharaohs—the 11th Dynasty—to be the legitimate successors of the Middle Kingdom kings were recognized in their own and in later generations. Their number and sequence is not clear. They bear alternately the names Mntwhtp and Intf (Intef), though it is pretty generally not imply the undisturbed succession of one family. The royal honours were not attained by the first member of the series, who bears merely the title of nomarch; the kingly titles are assumed by his successors. One at least of them—Mntwhtp III.—had a long reign, and left evidence of his power from the Cataracts to the Delta. Another records a trading expedition on the Red Sea as well as quarrying work in the eastern desert.

Whether the 12th Dynasty succeeded the 11th without disturbance is not certain. It gave to Egypt seven of the most active, powerful, and long-lived of her kings, and seems in every sense to have been worthy of the admiration bestowed on it in after ages. To Imhotep-Amenemes I. fell the task of completing the work of union and pacification initiated by his predecessors. The magnates of Middle Egypt (Beni-Hasan) have recorded his intervention to settle local disputes as to territory on the basis of former judgments, and to confirm his faithful vassals in their possessions. Elsewhere we read of revolts suppressed and of conquests abroad. Indeed, Egypt had now for the first time a royal house whose aspiration it was to extend the frontiers of their dominions. It is true that booty or tribute were still the chief inducements to war; but the campaigns were now upon a larger scale, the enemies attacked more distant, and the results of victory more lasting. The energies of the kings were turned chiefly southward, towards the great mines of Nubia. That country, once subdued—mainly by the expeditions of Wsrtsn (Useresen) III.—was to be held by means of fortresses, of which two can still be traced beyond the second Cataract. All Egypt contains scattered remains of the building activity of the 12th Dynasty, whose kings resided in various capitals—the chief in Thebes, where the nucleus of the Amun temple dates from their time, and possibly at Memphis; the later, in the Fayyûm, where Amenemes III. built the most colossal of Egyptian funerary temples, known in later ages as the Labyrinth, and where he utilized an extensive natural lake (L. Moeris) to fertilize the whole district. The custom of burial in pyramids, maintained on a modest scale by the 11th Dynasty at Thebes, was carried on by their successors, who built large tombs of this class near Memphis (Lisht, Turrah, Dahshur) or in the Fayyûm (Illahun, Hawarah). There are grounds for supposing the later kings of the Dynasty to have had foreign blood in their veins; their portraits show features singularly different from the accustomed type of the age. The internal history of the middle kingdom is the history of the development of the decentralizing tendencies which had their rise in the conditions of the 6th Dynasty. The development can be traced in the inscribed tombs of the noble families buried at Beni-Hasan, El-Bersheh, Siut, and Aswân. The nomes of Middle and Upper Egypt are the centres of interest, each of them in the hands of a family of which the, in some cases, be traced back to the. The nomarchs were still, however, under certain obligations to the central power. But the crown was no longer in the position of irresponsible despotism which it had enjoyed in former times. Its powers were restricted on all sides by the growth of the provincial power. The nomarchs, some of whom had married their daughters to become lords of several provinces at once, had their own courts, officials, and levies, though the latter were apparently at the king's disposal for external wars. So far, however, as we can judge, the country suffered little as yet from these conditions. The age of the Middle Kingdom, though differing rather in degree than in kind from that of the Memphite Dynasty, was one of probably greater material, intellectual and literary wealth, and appeared, not undeservedly, to succeeding generations as a golden age.

The obscurity which gradually follows the extinction of the 12th Dynasty is no less impenetrable than that which follows on the Dynasties of the Old Kingdom. On some sides, indeed, the decline is scarcely perceptible; the outward aspect of the kingdom is little changed; the southern conquests are maintained, commerce on the Red Sea continues, and the art of the period does not fall far short of the high standard lately set. But of the individual Pharaohs of the 13th Dynasty we know scarcely anything; of those of the 14th, absolutely nothing. The former series, with the names (among others) of Sbkhtp (Sebekhotep) and Sbkmsr (Sebekemser), is localized in Thebes; the latter in Chiois, an obscure Delta town, though it is quite possible that the Theban tradition was being upheld by a contemporary Dynasty in the south. The whole interval, indeed, between the 12th and 17th Dynasties may have been occupied by the struggles of rival houses, each claiming legitimate rights to the throne, yet none strong enough to vindicate its claims permanently.

We do not know at what point in this dark period of some 150 years the internal troubles were first complicated by foreign invasion. The name of one or the kings assigned to this time is regarded as evidence for an Ethiopic invasion; on the other hand, there is perhaps no better way of placing here one of the frequent Libyan invasions. Of trustworthy contemporary documents there is a complete dearth; the Theban papyrus and the Manethonian fragments are our sole authorities. In Manetho's arrangement these two obscure Dynasties are followed by two more of which still less is known; yet they are of greater interest, for they are drawn from those foreign invaders who by this time had subdued at least a part of northern Egypt, and whom Manetho names as Hyksos (Ἰϣϣαῖοι, pl. Ἰϣϣαῖοι). The racial position of this people is still unknown. Their Greek (=Egyptian) name means merely 'Sheikhs of the (south Syrian) Bedawin,'* and it has been supposed that they consisted of mixed hordes, partly Semite, partly of some other race. Another hypothesis, based on the fact that the word Set (Set) was common to Hyksos and the later, and on the occurrence in cuneiform documents of Hy'n (Khyan) as a Hittite king's name, while his namesake in Egypt is regarded as a Hyksos king, would make of Hyksos and Hittites one race. From the latter we can draw no arguments, for we know of no Egyptian names. Nor can we appeal to the portraits of the kings; for the Sphinxes, etc., formerly regarded as such, are now held by many to belong rather to the latter kings of the 12th Dynasty.

* The gloss 'shepherd' for šsw is demonstrable only at a far later period of the language.

Asiatics had undoubtedly been crossing the frontier for ages past; but only in small numbers. Now they appear to have made a much more formidable onslaught upon the eastern Delta, and, after slaying, plundering, and burning, to have established themselves there in a dominant position. The events which had produced this southward migration from Asia are quite unknown; possibly, the Assyrian attack on Elam or Mesopotamia gave them the impetus.

Egypt was weak, and the earlier at least of the Hyksos princes were strong rulers; and though resistance was persistent farther south, northern Egypt remained in their hands for two or three centuries, possibly longer. They resided in the eastern Delta, in the fortress of Hwt'rt-Avaris or at D'nt-Tanis (Zoan), where they soon so far assimilated Egyptian civilization that the remains of their work is indistinguishable from that of the native kings.

(c) The New Kingdom.—Just as the disorders of a former period had been ended by the energy or fortunate position of the Theban nomarchs, so now resistance to the Hyksos oppression centred at Thebes, which may even itself have suffered at their hands, since traces of them have come to light still farther south. Their expulsion necessitated a long struggle, and they probably only finally quitted the Delta many years after being driven from Upper Egypt. The 17th Dynasty, which began the war of liberation, seems for some time to have been contemporary with the Hyksos kings. It is, however, only of its later members that we have any knowledge. There is preserved from this period the autobiography of an Egyptian officer, Thms-Amosis, who took part in the war, and from it we learn that, Avaris having been captured, the foreigners were not merely expelled from Egypt, but pursued into S. Palestine and their stronghold (or, perhaps, place of temporary retreat) Sharuhen (Jos 19th) taken.

The military expeditions here described are the first-fruits of a new tendency in the history of the nation. The art, language, and social organization of the early period of the New Kingdom bear a close resemblance to those of the age that had sunk in the obscurity of the Hyksos invasion. Indeed, that the change had been so slight may be an argument for the relatively short duration of the foreign occupation. But the political history of Egypt, with the rise of the new Theban Dynasty, begins to follow a new course. Instead of a nation content with victories over the wild tribes of Nubia and the Soudan, both kings and people appear now to be eager for conquest among races of quite other attainments, in the arts both of peace and war. The nations of Syria had not, so far as we know, seen an Egyptian invasion since that conducted by Wni (6th Dynasty). The Pharaohs of the New Kingdom, however, initiated into Asiatic warfare by the circumstances of the Hyksos expulsion, soon came to regard such campaigns—aggressive now—as their most important occupation. But first they set about the reconquest of Nubia, and before long carried their southern frontier as far as Dongola.

The decisive strokes in the war of liberation were fought under the first king of the 18th

Dynasty, Thms-Amosis, who seems to have been the direct descendant of his predecessors. The relationships and sequence of the kings and queens—the latter, heiresses in their own right—who followed him are much disputed. His son and successor, Thms-Amosis I., was a king of no great political importance, though popularly revered, as we see from his special dedication in later times. His chief achievement was the reorganization of the Nubia.

He was followed by his son, Thutms-Thutmose I., though this prince's succession was only legitimized by marriage with a half-sister, the direct heiress. Whether he was the father of his three successors Th. II., Th. III., and queen H'tpswt (Hatasu) or only of Th. II. and the queen, Th. III. being a generation farther off, it is difficult to decide. The queen, though certainly daughter and heiress to Th. I. and wife of her brother Th. II., may have been either half-sister or aunt (and step-mother) to Th. III. She was, at any rate, a princess of strong character, and a very important factor in the politics of the time, acting at least once as co-regent and, during the minority of Th. III., ruling on his behalf. We have evidence, however, in the successive erasure of these royal names upon the monuments, that, whatever was the sequence of the changes of rule among them, such changes were not made in any spirit of friendly acquiescence. Queen H'tpswt never really reigned alone, though for years, whether owing to the insignificance or youth of the king, the fortunes of the country were in her hands. Beyond the proofs of her activity recorded at Deir el-Bahri (Thebes), we know little of the direction her energies took. The Hyksos were no doubt not yet completely expelled, and there is again mention of a Syrian campaign. The event of which we know most, however, is her expedition to Punt, i.e. the Somali coast. Her fleet had, like its predecessors from the 6th Dynasty onwards, solely a commercial object. Punt (Punt), the 'Land of the Gods,' the home of the 'bearded' people,* was rich in frankincense, and a market for ebony, ivory, and panther skins. Beyond the vast temple, on whose walls the expedition is depicted, the queen found it necessary to build also in other quarters of Thebes, and erected at Karnak the loftiest (with one exception) of extant Egyptian obelisks.

Left free by the death or final retirement of H'tpswt, Thutmose III., who had already reached the age of thirty, at once set about a campaign in Syria which culminated in a great defeat at Megiddo of the confederated Syrian princes, who forthwith recognized the Pharaoh as overlord, and professed themselves, with more or less sincerity, the vassals of Egypt. Not, however, that one campaign sufficed to ensure this condition of things. During twenty years Thutmose III. himself led some fifteen expeditions into Syria, where the withdrawal of his armies was repeatedly the signal for a rising among the subjugated states. His most distant vassals at the time of his death were in the neighbourhood of Mt. Amanus and the upper Euphrate; he was suzerain of the Canaanite plain and coasts and of the Amorite hill-country, while Egypt's 'sphere of influence' embraced, moreover, 'the isles of the Great Sea,' i.e. the Aegean islands, as well as Cyprus, the nearer parts of Asia Minor, and the Hittite territory around Kadesh (on the Orontes). 'Tribute' is recorded from Assyria, though here, as often elsewhere, the annalist probably refers but to propitiatory gifts, which indicated a desire to stand well with the powerful invader. The Nubian dependencies were also extended in this reign as far south as Gebel Barkal and probably far across the Soudan, while we hear, too, of campaigns against the Libyan nomads. Thutmosis III. was not less active as a builder than as a warrior; his architecture meets us on all hands. In every considerable town he built or enlarged a temple, as at Thebes, where he surrounded the central shrine of Amon with extensive halls and corridors. His name, engraved on scarabs, etc., is more frequent than that of any other king, and seems, in later ages, to have been regarded as a talisman.

* So W. Max Müller, Z. Ass. xi. 82, and not حبشي Abyssinians.

He was succeeded peacefully by his son, Amenophis II., whose long reign is not remarkable. His father's energy had secured, for the time, the Syrian conquests. Nubia seems to have occupied him somewhat more, and from his reign date the most southerly of Egyptian monuments (Ben-Naga). The reign of the next king, Thutmosis IV., was short and still less remarkable. There were occasional demonstrations of supremacy to be made in Syria and Nubia, and tributes of respect to be paid to the gods by some additions to their temples. That the contact with Asia was already of influence is shown by this king's marriage with a princess of Mitanni, the then leading power beyond the Euphrates.

Amenophis III. sat for thirty-five years on his father's throne. He seems to have been still able without much exertion to maintain abroad the position he inherited, for we hear nothing of Asiatic and but once of Nubian campaign. Extensive building and much observance of religious ceremonies are—for us, at least—the characteristics of the reign. At this period of the 18th Dynasty the royal marriages were of the most significant and influential in Egyptian history. Amenophis III., himself possibly the son of his father's foreign wife, took into his harem Kargip (cuneif. Girhipa), another daughter of the house of Mitanni, while we know that among his wives was also a Babylonian princess. He had, moreover, already married a lady named Tyî, who may or may not have been of foreign parentage, but who, at any rate, took a prominent share in the public life both of her husband and son. It is thought, indeed, that Amenophis IV. was influenced by his mother towards those reforms in the state religion, initiated a few years after his accession, which have left to his name a peculiar interest. (See below.)

The marriages, domestic relations, and foreign history of this period can be followed in exceptional detail owing to the records deposited at el-Amarna, where a portion of the correspondence between the Egyptian court and its allies, envoys, and vassals in Syria lay stored until its discovery in 1887. The correspondence was almost wholly in the Babylonian language,—clearly the diplomatic medium of the age,—though the writers were not, with one or two exceptions, Babylonians. Some of the letters are from the kings of Mitanni, but most are from the Syrians entrusted with the government of the subjugated provinces. Those letters which belong to the reign of Amenophis III. show a condition still of peaceful allegiance to Egypt and respect for its king. Those, however, dating from his son's reign bear witness to the defection of the vassals and speedy loss of the Asiatic empire, which resulted from the neglect and incapacity of the suzerain power. Amenophis IV. was too fully engrossed at home to spend time or money upon external affairs.

Although this king reigned for some seventeen years, there is nothing recorded of him beyond his religious activity. The religious revolution was accompanied by an ephemeral, though for the time complete, revolution in art, traceable throughout the remains of the great palace and temple which Amenophis, no longer content to reside at Thebes, had built at el-Amarna in Middle Egypt. Place and personal names were changed, in accordance with the reformed cult; the new residence was called 'Horizon of the Sun,' the king took the name Akhenaten (Khuenaten), 'Spirit of the Sun,' the names of his wife—another princess of Mitanni and his own cousin—and daughters being likewise altered. There has been much speculation as to the king's personality, owing to the wide divergence between his youthful and mature portraits. The latter, almost deformed, type of the latter has in some way connected with the religious change. It is scarcely likely that the very similar portraits of his courtiers are due to more than

On the death of the reformer-king, he was presumably interred in the great tomb hewn for him at el-Amarna. His courtiers had planned to lie around him there; but only some of them were destined to crowd their tombs. For in a short time it was clear that the schism had depended on the energies of its originator; with him dead, the ancient religion quickly reasserted itself. His two sons-in-law, who succeeded him, were not the men to resist the reaction which, within twenty years of his death, was complete, and left the 18th Dynasty to end its course where it had begun it, at Thebes.

The most conspicuous results of the intercourse with Asia of which the 18th Dynasty had witnessed the growth, are naturally seen in the military character of the age, the new basis on which the army was levied, and no longer on the feudal nomarchs, but directly on the king,—and the new methods of warfare taught by the introduction of the hitherto unknown horse and chariot into Egypt. The gradual extinction of the nomarchs—an effect of civil war—implied a corresponding change of the crown; and the power seem mostly to have passed into the king's hands. Conquest gave to the new monarchy a prestige and resources (treasure and slave-labour) which placed it in a position of hitherto unattained magnificence. The country became, as in the early 19th Dynasty, filled with royal officials and favourites, who soon rose to form a new nobility; a royal tax was levied upon all land, and royal justice administered by mixed courts of officials and priests. The Asiatic provinces were governed chiefly by native viceroys, whom the Egyptian court controlled by means of envoys. Nubia and part of S. Egypt were entrusted to an official known as the 'Prince of Kush.' The evils of the irresponsible security attained by the capacity and fortune of the earlier Pharaohs of the New Kingdom and those resulting from their close alliance with the all-powerful priesthood, become visible first under the following Dynasty.

Whether Hermph-Armais be reckoned the last king of the 18th or the first of the 19th Dynasty, it is he who really initiates the new epoch. The disturbance for which Amenophis IV. had been responsible could not be quieted without vigorous reorganization, and this was the main work of Armais, a strong ruler, and probably already acting regent when called by his patrons, the priests of Thebes, to the throne. Beyond reconstructive work at home, we hear of one Asiatic war in which the principal enemy is the Hittite power, now advanced southward (probably from the Armenian highlands) and making havoc among Egypt's allies and vassals in N. Syria. It is uncertain whether this reign saw a treaty between them and Egypt. Armais was followed by the first of the famous Ramesside Pharaohs who ruled Egypt during the following 200 years. But Ramses I. died after a short and uneventful reign, and his son *Sety-Sethô*s was the first whose hands were free enough at home to allow of any real attempt to regain abroad the ground of late lost. Yet now even *Sethô*s was unable to do more than assure his hold upon such districts as the Hittites had not already annexed. A march through Palestine to the Orontes and back by the Phœnician coast overawed Bedawins and Canaanites; but he made no fresh conquests, and finally came to terms with the Hittite king, who was to be suzerain from the Lebanon northwards, while Palestine remained in Egyptian hands. Nubia, Libya, and, with the aid of the Mediterranean pirate hordes who now begin to appear on the N. and W. for the first time, were likewise chastised or repelled; but most of the reign must have been spent peacefully, as the king's colossal monuments at Thebes and Abydos testify.

His son, Ramses II.—the best known of Egyptian Pharaohs, because the most industrious in recording his own glory,—succeeded young, and reigned for 67 years. Of these the first score were occupied in the war with the Hittites, till it became evident that a peace, similar to that of the last reign, could alone end a struggle in which neither side was strong enough to retain the mastery. An alliance, offensive and defensive, was at the same time concluded and cemented, some years later, by a marriage. The war had been signalized by at least one great battle—that at Kadesh,—in which prodigies of valour are ascribed to the king. But the position of Egypt in Asia, as defined by the peace of the king's 21st year, was far inferior to that attained two centuries earlier by Thutmosis III. Instead of the frontier at the Euphrates and Mt. Amanus, Ramses II. had to be content with one which crossed the Lebanon about Beirût. As a means of controlling Phœnicia and Palestine, he erected a series of forts across the desert, while strengthening various Delta towns (cf. the Hebrew tradition of 'Pithom and Raameses,' Ex 1st), and choosing for his favourite residence Tanis (Zoan), a much more apt centre than Thebes for the direction of operations in Syria.

After the Hittite peace, Ramses II. appears to have devoted himself principally to the building of temples. Not only did he build endless temples to the gods (and some even to himself) throughout the country, but he did not scruple, while restoring, to appropriate the work of his predecessors, whose names he frequently replaced on their buildings and statues by his own. He had more than 150 children. His successor was his fourteenth son, Merenptah (Merenptah), whose reign is as yet the only one in which reference has been found to the Israelites (see below). As well as his famous Libyan war, Merenptah boasts of a campaign in Syria, where he still claimed the allegiance of the southern half of the country. The great Libyan host, defeated in his 5th year, had come allied again with those pirate hordes which had appeared in the Delta under *Sethô*s, and whose homes it is impossible to localize, owing to the difficulty in exactly identifying their names. They came, at any rate, from the Mediterranean coasts; but whether Asia Minor, the Aegean islands, and the Italic countries all sent contingents, cannot be decided. The name of Merenptah is found on numerous monuments, but we know little of his doings.

The long reign of Ramses II., and perhaps apathy and self-indulgence in his latter years, had enfeebled the royal power, and by the time of Merenptah's death the country was ready for revolution. Power fell into the hands of the magnates and great officials, and only after half a century of disturbance did Stnht succeed in re-establishing order. This prince, who presumably had claimed the throne by a direct descent, left the throne to his son, Ramses III., whose reign lasted over 30 years. During its first decade, three formidable attacks from without had to be repelled: two by Libyan coalitions, and one by a host of the northern maritime invaders, whom the wealth of Egypt had more than once attracted under former kings. This time, however, they were repulsed in the eastern Delta by land through Syria as well as by sea, and it was only after a destructive battle at the frontier fortress of Magdolos that they were repulsed. The hold of each successive Pharaoh upon the Asiatic provinces was weaker, and it is doubtful how far the policy of Ramses III. was effective there, even though the Hittite empire had long been dissipated. At home the king's tranquillity was broken by a series of disturbances originating in the palace, and supplemented by great severity. Otherwise, the reign appears to have been peaceful. The king's chief ambition was the imitation in all points of his ancestor, Ramses II. The wealth of the country was enormous. The king lived the life of a self-indulgent despot, while the real power was with the Egyptian priests and the foreign mercenaries—mainly Libyans and Sardinians, i.e. Sardinians, of whom the latter had already served the Pharaohs of the preceding Dynasty.

Ramses III. was followed by a series of his sons and grandsons, who each bore the name of Ramses. Under their weak rule Egypt finally lost her Syrian dependencies, and left them open to the conquests of Assyria. Each king seems to have been principally occupied with the preparation of a vast rock-tomb (Biban el-Mulûk), and meanwhile the ascendancy of the priests of Amon grew always greater, until Herhor (Herhor), who had already added to the office of chief priest the principal political and military titles, felt strong enough to mount the throne and thus put an end to the Ramesside rule. The Ramesside Pharaohs had, with even more than their predecessors, displayed the same apathy and distaste for foreign intercourse which had marked its earlier history. Mercenary troops became therefore the only means of retaining a hold on the foreign provinces, and the king grew more and more completely the tool of the military leaders. On the other hand, the recent revival of orthodoxy had further strengthened the position of the priesthood, on whom royal piety required the expenditure of vast quantities of treasure, the product of the foreign tributaries. The royal power, in the hands of a mere bureaucracy were effective only in filling the royal treasury, while the population at large was starving and discontented.

(d) The 21st Dynasty. The 21st Dynasty does not consist of the priestly successors of Herhor. The legitimate Pharaohs he held to be the Tanite princes (Smenkhu-Smenes, Pshhot-Pshousennes, etc.) who rebelled against this usurpation, and were acknowledged first in the North, then also in the Thebaid. Before long the rival families intermarried and so restored unity; but their relationships and sequence are not clearly ascertained. On the monuments little more than their names occur, though mummies (of the priestly family) and much genealogical evidence were found in the famous cachette at Deir el-Bahri.

The next Dynasty, the 22nd, owed its rise to the political conditions of the period. The captains of the Libyan mercenaries had by this time attained a position, territorial as well as military, which made usurpation easy, and, when the opportunity offered, their chief Sousakim-Shishak was able without serious opposition to assume the royal titles. He was ambitious, and had pretensions to a reconquest of Syria. His inscription records a raid against both the Libyean kingdoms—not against Judah only (1 K 14<sup>28a</sup>). The Dynasty resided at Bubastis, and built extensively upon the ancient temple of the goddess Bstt (Bast); but we know little of its kings beyond their names, S'snk, W'srln-Osorkon, T'rt-Taketlothis. The Dynasty by which they were followed, likewise Libyan. The times may well have been too disturbed by dynastic rivalries to leave leisure for building; at any rate, the history of the 23rd Dynasty is as yet totally obscure.

During the period of weakness and dissension through which the Nubian princes of the Delta had been growing in strength, and were able now to shake off the Pharaoh's sovereignty, and even to contemplate the invasion of Egypt. This adventure was not difficult to carry out in the southern country, where there was no leader to withstand them; but as they advanced northward, the Ethiopians found an obstinate opponent in the powerful prince of Sais (V. 1). The supremacy was so far south as Hermopolis (Eshmuné), and the Ethiopian king, P'ny (Piankhi) (775-760 B.C.). The Saïtes capitulated, and the Ethiopians retired, while the victors advanced to Memphis. A treaty was, however, soon arranged, neither party being strong enough to suppress the other. The Ethiopians retired up the river, nominally in possession of the whole valley; but the Delta remained in the hands of Tnephachthos and his family, who seems to have finally extended his authority up to Thebes, and reigned for some time in comparative tranquillity. The Ethiopians, however, had not abandoned their ambitions, and, encouraged by a marriage with a Tanite princess, and favoured by the still powerful Theban priesthood, they again marched northward and put an end to the rule of Bocchoris. This time their conquest was more complete. Their family, whose relationships and history are as yet far from clear, constitutes Manetho's 25th Dynasty, and its most conspicuous member is its first king, S'b'k-Sabakon (707-695). His successors were not, however, strong enough, at such a distance from home, to maintain a dominant position in the North, though the petty princes of the Delta towns accepted for the moment the Ethiopian suzerainty. One of the latter—and probably not Sabakon himself, as was formerly assumed—was the So (σω=Sewe*) of 2 K 17<sup>4</sup>, who ventured, in alliance with Gaza and Israel, to withstand the threatening growth of the Assyrian power in Palestine. Sargon, however, defeated the coalition at Raphia, though he seems afterwards to have made a treaty with Egypt.

Throughout this period the hopes of the small Syrian states were placed on Egypt, whence, however, in the confusion of party strife, no effectual help could come. Yet it was toward Syria that the ambitions of Sabakon's son, T'rt-Tirhakah (690-664), were directed. He was there brought, however, into speedy collision with Sargon's successor, Sennacherib, who, at Eltekeh, defeated the combined troops of several Egyptian princes. Attempts at interference in Asia were thus for a time checked, and Tirhakah had leisure for considerable building, both at Napata and at Thebes. But the Syrians still counted on an Egyptian alliance, and it was clear that, if the Assyrian rule was ever to be peacefully accepted by them, Egypt must once and for all be rendered powerless. An Assyrian army proceeded therefore southwards, and, while Tirhakah fled to Ethiopia and the minor princes submitted, Isarkaddon advanced as far as Thebes and subsequently organized a government under twenty local regents, of whom the most notable was N'w-Necho of Sais. Yet still Tirhakah had hopes, and his advances from the south, abetted by some of the local princes on whom Assyria relied, resulted at length in the expulsion of the invaders from Memphis. Assurbanipal, the son of Esarhaddon, thereupon hastened to Egypt, and, with small trouble, re-established the Assyrian supremacy, while Necho, who had joined Tirhakah, became a temporary captive in Nineveh. At length Tirhakah died, and his successor, Tneptimn (cuneif. Tandamanne), having failed to recover the lost position, the Ethiopians finally retired homeward, while Assurbanipal requited the sympathy his opponent had received in Upper Egypt by driving them from Thebes. For two or three years N'w-Necho was undisputed master of Egypt. Then came an Elamite war and simultaneous revolts in Babylon, Arabia, and Lydia.

(e) The Restoration.—Incited by Gyges, king of the last country, Psmtk-Psammitichus of Sais (663-610), son of Necho, whom the Assyrians had reinstated, seized this opportunity to raise a fresh insurrection. He was himself of either Libyan or Nubian descent, and the success of his policy depended wholly on the foreign troops he employed. With the help of Lydia and of Ionian and Carian mercenaries (the χάλκιοι άνδρες of the Περσ. ii. 152), Psammitichus overthrew the Assyrian regents, and, by marriage with a niece of Sabakon's, gained the approval of the Theban priests and so of Upper Egypt. He pursued the Assyrians into Palestine, and expelled them from the town of Ashdod. The Assyrians, however, favoured the attempts of the Saïte Pharaohs to re-establish their dominance in Asia, and during this and the following reign (Necho II.) Syria was again brought under Egypt's sovereignty. But the rise of Babylon under Nebuchadrezzar put a check on this revival, and Necho II. (610-594), after defeating Josiah of Judah at Megiddo,* was himself routed by Nebuchadrezzar at Carchemish, and expelled from Syria.

The energies of the 26th Dynasty were directed before all things to taking advantage of Egypt's geographical situation and bringing her, by the help of hired Phœnician ships, within the sphere of Mediterranean commerce. Relations were opened with Periander of Corinth and with other Greek states. Greek traders were assigned special quarters in Memphis, where a Tyrian colony had already been settled; indeed, T'ms-Amasis, a later king of the Dynasty, allowed them to found a separate town on the Greek model—Naucratis in the W. Delta—to which their operations were to be restricted, and which only waned in importance before the rise of Alexandria. Amasis had been the general of Wh'ir-Apries-Hophra (588-569), whom the troops had driven from the throne in his favour. About this time Nebuchadrezzar appears to have invaded Egypt, though the history of the campaign is not known. His object was presumably vengeance for the part which Apries had recently played in Syria, where Judah, again trusting to Egyptian support, had begun the hostilities which ended in the fall of Jerusalem (586) and the flight of many of the inhabitants—among them Jeremiah—to Egypt, where they were settled in Tahpanhes (Tell Defeneh), a frontier fort in the E. Delta.

* Greek Σηβάς, Saba. The Lucianic text has the inexplicable variant Ἀδαμνίης.

* Presumably S. of Carmel, though this identification is disputed.

The characteristics of the Saite period are, in all but commercial aspects, those of an archaizing renaissance. To judge by art, literature, names, titles, etc., we might imagine ourselves again in the age of the Pyramid builders, though on closer inspection the resemblance is seen to be but superficial.

(f) The Persian Supremacy.—This prosperous and uneventful period was suddenly terminated by an invasion by the great power which was now overturning the political balance of W. Asia. Cyrus had seen the formation of a hostile league between Lydia, Egypt; but his death had delayed the expedition against Egypt was left for his son, Cambyses (525), who appears not to have acted with the customary clemency of Persian conquerors; for his memory was execrated throughout Egypt. The Saïtes had grown weak, and the country lay an easy prey to the invaders. The conquest was turned to full advantage by his successor Darius (521-486), who set about the reorganization of the country on its former lines, and won the acquiescence of priests and people by ancient titles and functions of the . . . . . The check suffered by the Persians . . . . ., however, gave courage to the patriotic party in Egypt, and under the leadership of a Libyan, Hbbš (Chabash), the Persians were for a time expelled. But a fresh expedition was undertaken by Xerxes (486-465), and the insurrection suppressed with severity, Egypt being constituted a . . . . . under the king's brother Achæmenes. Some years of quiet followed, and then, in the W. Delta, came a fresh revolt led by Inaros—possibly a Saïte prince—and aided by the Athenians (463). This in turn was suppressed by Megabyzus, the general of Artaxerxes, while the leadership of the party fell to Amyrtaeus, for whose support Cimon, on his Cyprian expedition, sent a fleet (449).

The history of this period is fragmentary and obscure; of native records we have none. The chronology of events cannot be accurately settled. We gather that, throughout the time of Persia's decline, various revolts of the national party took place in northern Egypt—the upper valley plays by this time no historical part. Manetho introduces, in the midst of the Persian supremacy, two more native Dynasties, the 28th and 29th, of which we know very little, and then another, the 30th, to which belong two kings, Nḥtrḥbt-Nektanebes (332-364) and Nḥtnbf-Nektanebo (361-343), the former of whom succeeded in suppressing his rivals, while the latter, during a long reign, was active as a builder throughout the country (Philæ, Edfu, Thebes, Heliopolis, the Delta). Persia, however, by a final effort, was able to reinstate herself (343), and Nektanebo, the last of the Pharaohs, abandoned his Greek allies and fled to Ethiopia.

But the Persian domination, too, was at an end. In a few years Alexander of Macedon had dismembered the empire of the Achæmenides, and in 332 he led his armies into Egypt, which submitted without resistance.

The Macedonians.—The rule of Alexander's successors, the Ptolemies, brought Egypt again into the advantageous position attained for her in some degree by the 26th Dynasty. Now, however, the Greek element became the dominant factor in her prosperity; the ancient native culture gradually faded and retreated from the North, where Alexandria, the new capital, had become the centre of the Hellenic world. But the wide dominions of the Ptolemies were not to be retained by a series of rulers so degenerate as those of the house of Lagos soon became. After a century of good government and unequalled prosperity (323-222), the political fortunes of Egypt began again to decline and anarchy to spread throughout the country. Insurrections followed each other in constant succession, while treachery and murder shortened the reigns of many of the kings. At length the Romans, under whose toleration the Lagides had for a century and a half existed, were able, by the victory of Octavius over Anthony and Cleopatra (30), to assume the actual government of the country, which remained then a part of the empire, either of Rome or of Byzantium, until conquered by the Saracens A.D. 642.

ix. EGYPT'S RELATIONS WITH ASIA.—Our sources of knowledge are (1) for the primitive periods, chiefly inferences from the foreign words already in use in the ancient Egyptian texts, especially the names of cereals, ḥwt, ḥt, etc., known to have been not native; (2) under the Dynasties of the Old Kingdom we have early evidence from the mines of Sinai,* where the troublesome nomad tribes were known as šs (cf. šš), from a 5th (?) Dynasty fresco depicting the capture of a Syrian fortress, and from at least one biographical narrative—that of Wni, Dyn. 6—recounting several military and commercial expeditions to Syria, the land of the 'mw (root probably 'm, 'boomerang,' not ḥm). We here read of the fruitfulness of the land through which the Egyptian army marched, and it is evident the description is that of S. Palestine. The same text tells, too, of a journey by sea to the Phœnician coast; (3) under the Middle Kingdom Dynasties we can see that a considerable intercourse is arising. Embassies come with presents from Semitic chiefs and are received by the king or the nobles (Beni-Hasan), and no doubt many groups of nomads had by this time crossed the frontier and got leave, as they did later (Æg. Zeitschr. xxvii. 125), to settle in the Delta. Journeys into Palestine became so frequent that they formed the subject for a story—founded, no doubt, upon fact, and popular for many centuries—whence many details of Syrian desert life at the time may be learned (Snh). The tribes among which the hero of this story passes many years are called by the general term st, 'archers' (cf. Babyl. snh). Egyptian traders visited them, and the conditions of life appear very similar to those of the modern Bedawin. (4) But the relations of Egypt with her northern neighbours were revolutionized by the Hyksos invasion and the long series of military expeditions which followed. The language receives a very strong admixture of foreign (not exclusively Semitic) loan-words, and is forced even to evolve a new system of orthography for their reproduction. Syrian slaves—females, at least, 'ml—met with in the households of the Middle Kingdom, are now employed in great numbers. Asiatic textile work, weapons, vases (pottery and metal), musical instruments, besides various wines, beers, oils, breads, etc., are imported from Syria, Asia Minor, and possibly even lands farther west, and preferred to the native products. The native names even of many objects are discarded and replaced by corresponding foreign terms. Syrian deities—Baal, Astarte, Anat, Resheph—are gradually admitted to places beside the Egyptian gods, and the Pharaohs appear now and then under their special protection.

The countries whence these new influences emanate, bear in the Egyptian texts of different epochs different names, many of which are confusing and elude exact definition. All Syria, as far as the Euphrates, is divided into the countries of Upper (Southern) and Lower (Northern) Rḥnw (cf. the more ancient ṯnw and the cuneif. Tidnu). Palestine proper bears also the name H'rw, originally only the designation of the southern (later Philistine) coast. Phoenicia, on the other hand, was known by the name D'ha, and, together with the still more northerly coast, by the vaguer term Kdi, 'the Circular (land)', perhaps from the form of the Gulf of Issus. Kft was the name, perhaps, of Cilicia, perhaps of the N. Syrian coasts. Certain peoples whom we find, under the 19th Dynasty, among the allies of the Hittites, have been localized in W. Asia Minor; the Rwk Lycians, D'rdny Dardanians, Ywnn Ionians, Ik'yu's Achæans,* and others. The difficult designation Hwnbw, found in the oldest literature, appears to embrace the peoples of the North in the vaguest way; only in late epochs was it used for the Hellenic race. Cyprus, whence much copper was imported, is sy, a part of it Irs-Alasia. Mesopotamia was, until the New Kingdom, practically unknown to Egypt; then we begin to read of presents passing between the court of Egypt and those of Bbr-Babylon, called in the Amarna letters Shankhar (S'ng'r 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲) or Karduniash, and Issur-Assyria. Asia east of these was always unknown to Egypt.

* See Æg. Zeitschr. xxxv. 7 ff.

The votive inscriptions, in which the 18th and 19th Dynasties recorded their conquests, have preserved the names of many towns, etc., in Syria, of which, however, the majority are still unidentified. The campaigns of Thutmose III. furnish the best of such material; the lists of his successors are often mere copies of his, and of relatively small value. The Amarna tablets show several of these same names in a cuneiform transcription. Of the localities identified the following are among the best known: Aleppo, 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲, Kadesh (on Orontes), Damascus, Hamath, Byblos, Smyra, Beirût, Sidon, Tyre, 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲, Akko, Joppa, Gaza, Ashkelon, Janoah, 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲. In one group of the Amarna letters Jerusalem is often mentioned, but in the Egyptian texts it has not been found. Certain names, though not yet identified, are compounded of interesting elements: for example, H'rir 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲, B'ty 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲, in which the divine names appear—the second already (Dyn. 18) abbreviated; or Y'kbi'r, Y'spir, in which have been recognized the names 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 and 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 combined with 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 (as in Israel, Ishmael). These much-discussed names are more likely to have then had local than ethnic significance. A connexion between them and the names of the patriarchs, Jacob and Joseph, cannot of course be proved; indeed the equation Y'sp = 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 has considerable phonetic difficulties. It may here be noted that certain scarabs, probably of the Hyksos period, appear to bear royal (?) names compounded of Y'kb and hr (𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲), which might point, at any rate, to the Semitic name Jacob at an unexpectedly early period. The whole tradition of Israel's early connexion with Egypt—the sojourn there of the patriarchs and the exodus of their descendants—is still obscure, and the recent discovery for the first time of 'Israel' in a hieroglyphic text seems but further to complicate the problem.

The facts as to this document are the following: In 1896 an immense stele was discovered, one text of which commemorates the victory of Mmrph, son and successor of Ramses II., over the Libyans in his 5th year.† In the latter part of the text where other triumphs are enumerated, the localities subjugated occur in the following order: the Hittite land, Canaan (? land or town), Ashkelon, Gezer, Janoah (?), Ysri'r-Israel, S. Palestine, 'all lands.' There is no corroborative evidence for an Asiatic campaign of Mmrph; possibly, in the fashion of the age, he is here merely assuming to himself the conquests of his predecessors. The name Israel is written so as unmistakably to indicate a people, not, like the other names, a locality. Further, the words used of its condition imply devastation and the destruction of crops. The obvious and only safe conclusions to be drawn from these facts are that Israel, or a part of that people, was already in some part of Syria, and had been in hostile contact with Egypt. On the assumption that 'Pithom and Raamses' were built for Ramses II., whose long reign answered the requirements of Ex. ii. 23, the Pharaoh of the Exodus has been identified as Mmrph;* though, owing to the supposed more appropriate political conditions, others would place the Exodus 30 or 40 years later, about the time of Snht.

If we assume that by the reign of Mmrph the Exodus had already been accomplished,—the name Isrw is found in the previous reigns in the territory of the tribe of Asher,—we have an argument for the proposed identification of the Hebrews with the Khabiri, of whose invasion of Palestine, some 150 years earlier, the Amarna letters say so much, and whom it is proposed to identify with the S'sw chastised by Sethos I.† The story of the priest Osarsiph (?=Osiris+sw) and the impious lepers, whose revolt he led, converted by Josephus into a history of Moses and the Hebrew struggle for freedom, has been with some probability referred rather to a reminiscence of the expulsion of the heretics of Amenophis IV.‡ The name Hebrews has not been met with in Egyptian texts. That of the foreign tribe of 'prw, found variously employed throughout the 19th Dynasty, is rarely now held to be identical with the Hebrews, and may be merely a form of a 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 term for 'workmen.' The Egyptian names given to Joseph, his wife, and father-in-law in Gn xli. 45 have received various inadmissible explanations. The only transcriptions which conform to Egyptian grammar and usage are (1) Jephnoute fonch, 'God speaks (and) he lives'; (2) [N]ysmeith, 'devoted to (the goddess) Neith'; (3) Pedephre, 'he whom the sun-god gives.' All three names are cast in forms increasingly frequent from the time of the 22nd Dynasty onwards, but practically unknown earlier—except, indeed, the second; and this fact agrees with the date (8th cent.) to which the document E is assigned.§ For a difficult word used in the story of Joseph, 𐎲𐎠𐎫𐎲 Gn xli. 43, a parallel expression has been noticed in a text of the 21st Dynasty, where the words ib rk seem to form an interjection, 'Give heed!' or the like.||

x. RELIGION.—Our sources of information on this subject are very numerous, but at the same time very inadequate. Egyptian texts not bearing, even indirectly, upon some aspect of the religion are in an extremely small minority; yet some primary questions remain unsolved for lack of explanatory documents. Since it is wholly owing to the supreme importance attached to the preparation for a future life that Egyptian antiquities come again within our reach, it is natural that the side of religious life upon which we are best informed should be that dealing with the dead. Of the everyday religion of the people we know practically nothing. We have the names of many deities, and can enumerate their functions, attributes, and temples; but we are quite ignorant as to the way in which they were worshipped. It has been mentioned that Hommel

* On the still less demonstrable assumption that the Hebrew immigration had been a part of the Hyksos invasion, Mahler bases calculations which give 1335 (i.e. Ramses II.) as the year, and, with the help of Rabbinical tradition, March 27 as the day of the Exodus (Der Pharaon des Exodus, 1899).

† See Ed. Meyer in Festschr. f. Ebers, 75.

‡ Ed. Meyer, Gesch. Äg. 276; Wilken in Festschr. f. Ebers 146.

§ See Steindorff, Äg. Zeitschr. xxvii. 41.

|| See Spiegelberg in Not. et Extr. xxxiv. 261.

* See Streitberg in Indoger. For. vi. 134.

† The former, which occurs twice, can be localized in the district Ephraim-Dan (see W. M. Müller, Asien, 164).

‡ His reign began, according to Mahler, in 1280.

is eager to demonstrate a Babylonian origin for the civilization of Egypt. One of his chief contentions is that some of the principal Egyptian deities can be proved identical with those of Babylon, from the identity of their attributes, distinctive animals, legends, etc. It is, however, as yet in many cases impossible to recognize what were the original rôles and functions of the Egyptian gods, and it seems more probable that, should a prehistoric immigration from Mesopotamia ever be demonstrated, the invaders will be found to have at most adopted certain of the native divinities and combined them with corresponding figures from their own Pantheon.

No religious document of the earlier ages compares in importance with the great body of texts—some 4000 lines—collected and copied on the interiors of the 5th and 6th Dynasty Pyramids, but in partial use, too, in all succeeding ages. Some of the documents themselves belong undoubtedly to a far earlier period. The evidence that the official religion was even then well developed, many of the gods having rôles by which they are characterized throughout history, and several of the most popular myths—notably that of Osiris—referred to as already current. Other gods are conspicuously absent from the Pyramid texts; Amon, for example, who being originally but the local god of Thebes, remained obscure until his city rose (Dyn. 11) to political importance.

Indeed the local divinities as such play a remarkably small part in these texts. Yet the local cults were the real basis of the popular religion, which did not, so far as we can see, recognize any single deity before the various tribal districts had been united under the first historic Dynasties. The nomes (see above) corresponded to independent cults, each centred in the shrine of the local god, who revealed himself to his worshippers in an animal, tree, or other material object—perhaps once the tribal totem. One aspect of the advance from this primitive stage of fetish worship can be seen in the semi-human and finally completely human representations of certain of the gods in art. Yet the sacred animal was revered side by side with the anthropomorphic god, receiving, as we know, much honour even in Greek and Roman times.

Beyond the famous story of Osiris and many otherwise unknown legends, the Pyramids contain countless allusions to that cycle of myths which produced the doctrines of the otherworldly life of the afterlife. For as Abydos appears very early—though probably not originally—as the home of the Osirian legend and of the all-important views of future life and retribution attached to it, so does Heliopolis (Heliopolis) become the centre of the solar theology represented by the myth of Re, the sun-god, and his daily contest with the dragon of darkness.

A number of the many local deities once—had been gradually drawn within the cycles of Osiris or of Re. The chief actors in the former story are, besides Osiris himself (whose original locality and character are very obscure), his brother Sêti-Typhon, regarded now as the impersonation of darkness (when Osiris is a solar god), now as the god of the barren desert (when Osiris is the fruitful river-valley); Isis, wife of Osiris, a goddess (from the Delta or Philæ) of merely mythological importance until the base epochs; Horus, his son and avenger, a puzzling figure owing to the variety of his local forms; and Thoth, the god of Hermopolis, the ally of Horus.

The myths of the sun-god are concerned either with the phases of the sun's daily and also supposed nightly, invisible journeys, or with cosmic phenomena. In the former, Horus, now as the son of Re; in the latter, such as Itm (Tum) of Heliopolis, or elemental gods, as Kb, Nwt, Su, Tfnwt, are introduced. Cosmic speculations produced a variety of myths. In one heaven and earth are female and male; in another the sky is a cow with spotted hide (the stars); another held the earth to be a box, with the sky for its raised lid, supported on the encircling hills or on four tree-stems. The gods and goddesses associated with Re are 9 in number (Ennead), and are regarded as a related family, just as later theology grouped several of the local deities into family 'triads.'

Not all cosmic doctrines, however, were concerned with the Heliopolitan gods; various local gods had once been regarded as creators, e.g. Hnmw-Chnouphis who, in the clay districts near the Cataracts, had formed the world upon a potter's wheel; and Ptah of Memphis was a similar artisan god.

Other and very ancient divinities were the local earth and harvest gods, e.g. Min of Coptos and (perhaps) Amon of Thebes. Others, again, were water deities, e.g. Sbk-Souchos of the Fayyum and Ombos—for the same god is frequently met with in several localities, though, no doubt, to but one of them. Several were guardians of the local cemeteries, e.g. Sokaris at Memphis, Anubis at Siut, 'The Lord of those in the West' at Abydos.

The doctrines and practices of which the Osirian legend was at once the pattern and consequence are chiefly to be studied—beyond very numerous passages in the Pyramid texts—in the great heterogeneous collection of incantations known to us as the 'Book of the Dead,' but to the Egyptians probably as ('the Book of) coming out from (i.e. departing from) the Day and from the Necropolis.' The work is composed of texts ('chapters'), some as ancient as those of the Pyramids, others much later, and was intended as a guide through the various difficulties, and a magical talismanum by which the enemies to be encountered by whom a copy of it was buried. Some of the texts seem to be remnants of primitive rituals, but all had been by the time of their definite collection (probably of the New Kingdom) edited for the use of the dead himself. It is this more than once repeated editing which has rendered the Book for the most part unintelligible to us. It may be asserted that none of the older chapters are now available in their first simplicity. The oldest MSS (Dyn. 12, 13) already show the glosses of more than one redactor, and each successive gloss seems but to obscure the original text.

Several totally divergent views, Solar and Osirian, as to the future life are represented in the work. The soul is, according to some chapters, to take the form of a bird and quit the tomb, and may accompany the sun bark on its heavenly journey; elsewhere it is regarded as appearing before Osiris, and, after the famous 'judgment scene,' receiving merited justice. In the 'Book of the Dead,' i.e. correctly pronounced, the potent magic formulæ, the 'words of power' to the 'Fields of Iru,' and spends eternity in a very materialistic paradise, conceived upon the model of rural life in Egypt.

The elements in man which survived death were four: b' soul, iw spirit (?), h' ybt shadow, and k' double. What were intended by the first three of these it is difficult to say; the fourth is that of which we hear most; for its maintenance was the object of all the funerary rites which from the earliest times occupied so much attention among all classes. The double, in appearance the exact counterpart of the man, after accompanying him

Krenkel, following Holtzmann, Hausrath, Keim, and the author of Supernatural Religion, attempts to show that the author of the Acts is indebted to Josephus for his knowledge of this event. He is quite unsuccessful. There are no signs of literary obligation, and very definite discrepancies. Josephus gives different numbers; he does not definitely connect the Egyptian with the Sicarii, but rather contrasts him; the wilderness as the place where led, but the Mount of Olives. It may be quite possible to explain these discrepancies so as to save the historical accuracy of both writers, but they are fatal to our regarding Josephus as the source of information. The only reasonable opinion that can be held is that we have two independent and contemporary accounts of the same event, and that the resemblances arise from this fact.

LITERATURE.—Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 6; BJ ii. xiii. 5; Schurer, HJP i. ii. 180; Krenkel, Josephus und Lucas, p. 240.

A. C. HEADLAM.

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS.—The various Egyptian dialects and the Versions contained in them are a subject of so much confusion that it will be well for the sake of distinctness to deal in this article first with the Dialects and their proximate dates, and then with the extant remains of the Versions and their proximate dates. We will conclude with a short study of the Greek Text implied by the Versions, and the history of the criticism of them.

1. DIALECTS OF COPTIC.—The latest stage of the Egyptian language, and that which was spoken in Egypt at the present time, is now known by the name of Coptic. The word itself comes from a corruption of the Greek Αἰγυπτιος. Coptic was written in Greek characters, with the addition of some extra letters representing sounds which could only imperfectly be expressed by the Greek alphabet. These letters were modifications of characters found in Demotic—the popular form of the old Egyptian language spoken in the centuries immediately before the Christian era. Although it is still used in the services of the Church, Coptic is now practically a dead language. Our knowledge, therefore, of it must be derived from manuscripts and inscriptions. When these began to be studied by European scholars, it soon became evident that the language as spoken in different parts of the country presented certain dialectical peculiarities. Not only was it early recognized that the dialect used in the North differed considerably from that used in the South, but a third dialect was also detected, which, as a general rule, resembled the southern: it had, however, many northern forms, and sometimes showed peculiarities of its own. A long controversy, lasting for more than a century, was waged over the district to which this third dialect was to be assigned. The attention of Coptic scholars was early directed to a noteworthy passage from Athanasius, a bishop of Kos in the Thebaid, who flourished in the 11th century. In his Arabic-Coptic Grammar, Athanasius says: 'Know that the Coptic language is divided into three branches. One of them is the Coptic of Misr, which is the Sahidic; and another is the Bohairic Coptic, which gets its name from El-Bohaira; and the other is the Bushmuric Coptic, which is used in the country of El-Bushmur, as thou knowest. But those now in use are only the Bohairic Coptic and the Sahidic. And the origin of them is one language.'<sup>1</sup> Here we have a mention of three dialects—Sahidic, Bohairic, and Bushmuric. The first two are, as Quatremère pointed out, clearly the same as those sometimes called Thebaic and Memphitic. But what was the last? Was it to be identified with the third dialect known to us? Or was it the name of a still unknown dialect? Before this question could be answered, the position of Bushmur had to be determined. Quatremère proved that it could not be placed in the South of Egypt, nor in the Oasis and neighbouring deserts, but that it must be situated in the North.<sup>2</sup> It is the country in the east of the Delta, bordering on the sea.<sup>3</sup> Quatremère was of opinion that our third dialect had no connexion with Bushmuric, of which we had only a single word preserved to us.<sup>4</sup> But if it was not Bushmuric, how came it not to be mentioned by Athanasius? Quatremère answered the question by supposing that it was in use not exactly in Egypt, but in a country close by—the great and little Oases, 'which, situated at a little distance from Egypt, stretch from north to south, from the parallel of Assouan as far as the frontier of the Fayûm.'<sup>5</sup> Since Quatremère's time a large number of fragments have come to light which prove that he was right in refusing to call the dialect Bushmuric. Whether or not it was spoken in the southern Oasis, we now know for certain that it was used in the neighbourhood of the Fayûm and Memphis; and a study of Middle Egyptian shows us that the reason why Athanasius did not mention it may have been that he did not regard it as a separate dialect. This third dialect, lying as it does geographically between Sahidic and Bohairic, may conveniently be termed Middle Egyptian. When we come to examine it more carefully, we are confronted with fresh difficulties. Whilst Sahidic and Bohairic are for the most part clearly defined and regular dialects, Middle Egyptian presents us with an almost infinite number of alternative forms. When we turn to the Valley the dialect is a kind of mixture between Sahidic and Bohairic. But in some of the fragments which come from the Fayûm—a district some distance to the west—the dialect has developed more decided peculiarities of its own. It is dangerous, however, to draw any hard-and-fast line between the forms of the language current in the two places; for at a later date the dialect used in the Fayûm bore a considerable resemblance to that used at one time in Memphis.<sup>6</sup> Many of the other varieties are no doubt due to ignorance or indifference on the part of scribes, some of whom in the Fayûm belonged to the peasant and artisan class.<sup>7</sup> Such an explanation does not, however, cover the case of some fragments recently found in Akhmîm and in the Fayûm, which present further dialectical peculiarities unknown to us before. Stern has carefully examined the dialect of these fragments, and has shown good reason to believe that it presents us with an earlier form of Middle Egyptian, closely allied to the dialect found in fragments written at Memphis.<sup>8</sup>

We may sum up these results as follows:—

Sahidic=Dialect of Southern (or Upper) Egypt: sometimes called 'Thebaic.'

<sup>1</sup> Quatremère, op. cit. p. 22.

<sup>2</sup> Ib. p. 147 ff.

<sup>3</sup> See Yâkût, i. 634.

<sup>4</sup> Quatremère, op. cit. p. 214.

<sup>5</sup> Ib. p. 217.

<sup>6</sup> Sometimes it very closely resembles Bohairic. See the dialect of the Fragment of the Song of Moses given by Crum, Coptic MSS brought from the Fayûm, p. 12 ff.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. the dialect of the Fayûm fragment published by Quatremère, op. cit. p. 248 ff., with the dialect of those edited by Revillout, Papyrus Coptes (Paris, 1876), p. 101 ff.

<sup>8</sup> See Krall, Mithelungen aus der Sammlung der Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer (Vienna, 1887), i. p. 65.

<sup>9</sup> Zeitschrift für Ägyptische Sprache, 1886, p. 129 ff.

<sup>1</sup> I.e. the district south of Alexandria.

<sup>2</sup> The original of the passage is given in Quatremère, Recherches sur la Langue et la Littérature de l'Égypte (Paris, 1808), p. 21.

Middle Egyptian=Dialect of (a) Memphis and neighbourhood, and (b) the Fayûm.

Bohairic=Dialect of district south of Alexandria: sometimes called 'Memphitic' (or 'Coptic').

2. RELATIVE DATES OF DIALECTS.—The Arabic historian Maacrizi, who flourished at the beginning of the 15th century, speaks of Sahidic as 'the primitive source of the Coptic language, and that from which is derived the Bohairic dialect.'<sup>a</sup> Such evidence as there is confirms his statement as to the late date of Bohairic. Bohairic (which was originally confined to the district south of Alexandria) is the most literary and artificial of Coptic dialects. The form of many of its words, when compared with the corresponding Sahidic, points to of development. Its frequent use of articles, reminding us of Greek rather than Egyptian, seems also to point in the same direction. It was most probably developed from Middle Egyptian, which at one time may possibly have been spoken in the neighbourhood of Alexandria itself.<sup>β</sup> To what extent it was used for other than ecclesiastical purposes we have at present no means of ascertaining.<sup>γ</sup> But if it was in the main a literary rather than a popular language, this fact would explain why it died out, except for ecclesiastical purposes, earlier than Middle Egyptian and Sahidic.<sup>δ</sup> There is, on the contrary, no doubt that the last-named dialects were the language of the people. We have numerous fragments of letters in Middle Egyptian and remains of school-books in Sahidic.<sup>ε</sup> The line of demarcation between the two dialects was not sharp, and sometimes pieces of writing are found in which single sentences are almost entirely written in Sahidic, whilst others are almost entirely in Middle Egyptian.<sup>ζ</sup> Thus, whilst we find Sahidic forms in use in documents written in the neighbourhood of Hermopolis Magna and Antinoë,<sup>η</sup> we have evidence that as far south as Thebes pure Sahidic was not always written.<sup>θ</sup> When Middle Egyptian and Sahidic began to be written we do not know. As far as the evidence

<sup>a</sup> Quatremère, op. cit. p. 42.

<sup>β</sup> See the interesting fragment published by Krall, at the end of an art. "über die Anfänge der Koptischen Schrift," op. cit. i. p. 112, where an Alexandrian, whose name makes use of the Fayûm dialect, is quoted. However, must not be taken as evidence, for Mommsen points out, 'the belonging to a particular dialect is not necessarily hereditary. The Egyptian in the Coptic period lived to it with his dependents, just as much when he had his abode in Alexandria as the Alexandrian dwelling in Chemmis belonged to the language of Alexandria' (Die Provinzen der Römischen Kaiserzeit, p. 235). The arguments put forward in the article are of great value for the Bohairic dialect (see also the same in Scribner's Introduction to MSS, i. 129 ff. and Handbook to the Bible, 1897, No. 1, p. 67) are, however, (1) The abbreviations found in Coptic MSS for 'God' and 'Lord' need not have originated in Bohairic. If they occurred (and they never do, as far as I know) in MSS written in pure Sahidic, they might as easily have been taken from M.E. as from Bohairic. Indeed an abbreviation of 'Lord,' which is almost exactly the same as the one in common use in Bohairic, is found in a M.E. MS, which 'in its writing,' says Krall (p. 110 f.), 'reminds us of the Codex Sinaiticus.' (2) Even if Krall's hypothesis of the origin of the last letter of the Coptic alphabet were satisfactory, it does not prove his point. The contraction might have arisen in M.E. as easily as in Bohairic. But most probably his hypothesis is wrong, and the letter is derived from Demotic (see Steindorff, Ägyptische Grammatik, § 1).

<sup>γ</sup> Attempts to use Bohairic for letter-writing, using throughout Greek, by Krall, op. cit. ii. iii. p. 56, v. 11, Cum, 'artificially,' as Krall says, 'the geographical and climatic conditions of the Delta are not favourable to the preservation of papyrus.' We cannot therefore be certain of the exact dialect when the hermits near Lake Menzah spoke, when Cassian visited them at the end of the 4th century. It may have been a form of M.E. or Bohairic. We gather from Cassian (Coll. xi. 3, xvi. 1; Migne, P.L. xix. 850, 1011) that some of them did not know Greek.

<sup>δ</sup> Quatremère, op. cit. p. 41 f.

<sup>ε</sup> Krall, op. cit. ii. iii. 43 ff., iv. 123 ff.

<sup>ζ</sup> Krall, op. cit. i. 64.

<sup>η</sup> Krall, op. cit. i. 64, ii. 63 f.

<sup>θ</sup> ZAS, 1884, p. 140 ff.

of documents is concerned, we have fragments in Middle Egyptian (earlier and later) and Sahidic, some of which take us back to the 4th or 5th centuries.<sup>a</sup> The 2nd century efforts were made to write in characters not unlike our present Coptic ones.<sup>β</sup>

3. EXTANT REMAINS OF VERSIONS.—We have remains of biblical versions in all three dialects; but a considerable portion of the Sahidic has disappeared, whilst only very short fragments of the Abkade Egyptian are extant. A number of MSS containing portions of the Coptic Bible has been given by M. Livy in the Revue Biblique Internationale for 1896, No. 4, p. 540 ff. We shall here confine ourselves to editions of the versions.

(a) Sahidic.—The fullest collections of extant fragments of the version of the NT are those published by Woide<sup>γ</sup> and Amélineau.<sup>δ</sup> Some fragments of the Apocalypse have recently been brought together by Goussen.<sup>ε</sup> A complete collection, together with a translation, is urgently needed. The best collection of the fragments of the OT have been made by Clascas,<sup>ζ</sup> Maspero,<sup>η</sup> and Lagarde.<sup>θ</sup> Quotations from the Sahidic Bible are found in the 'Pistis Sophia,'<sup>ι</sup> and other Sahidic books. The Psalms quoted in the former work resemble the Sahidic version. In fact, the version of the Bible current in that dialect.<sup>κ</sup> Other collections of fragments of the Sahidic Bible are described in the Revue Biblique Internationale, 1897, No. 1, pp. 55-62.

(b) Middle Egyptian.—That there was a separate Middle Egyptian recension of part, at least, of the Bible is proved by the text of some of the NT fragments published by Zoega<sup>λ</sup> and Maspero.<sup>μ</sup> These are written in the dialect as spoken in the Fayûm, and sometimes in text and translation differ considerably from the corresponding Sahidic and Bohairic. How far all the biblical fragments extant in Middle Egyptian really constitute a separate version, we shall be able to judge with greater certainty when more fragments have been discovered, and when the Sahidic NT has been edited. Meanwhile, it is unsafe to conclude that a fragment written in this dialect necessarily presents a distinct recension. It may give, with merely verbal differences, the same version as the Sahidic. We can only state where specimens of the Bible written in Middle Egyptian may be found, without venturing to determine whether they are parts of a single version. Besides the fragments already alluded to,<sup>ξ</sup> Bouriant has published two Gospel fragments, together with a

<sup>a</sup> Crum, op. cit. plate i. No. 2; Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, p. 163 (plate xvi.); Krall, op. cit. i. 110; Führer durch die Ausstellung (Vienna, 1892), p. 33, Tafel iii.; Steindorff, Ägyptische Grammatik, § 2.

<sup>β</sup> Apocrypha ad editionem Novi Testamenti Graeci (Oxford, 1780).

<sup>γ</sup> ZAS, 1880-1888.

<sup>δ</sup> Scripturae Aegyptiae (Leipzig, 1805).

<sup>ε</sup> Bibliographie des Manuscrits Coptes de la Bibliothèque Muséum

Bouriant, Rome vi. 1, 1887.

<sup>ζ</sup> Mémoires de la Mission Archéologique de la Haute Égypte, vol. vi.

<sup>η</sup> Revue Biblique Internationale, 1896, No. 4, p. 540 ff.

<sup>θ</sup> Revue Biblique Internationale, 1897, No. 1, p. 55-62.

<sup>ι</sup> See e.g. F. Robinson, Texts and Studies, vol. iv. No. 2, p. xix.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue de Travaux relatifs à la Phil. et à l'Arch. Égypt.

<sup>λ</sup> Catalogus Codicum Copticorum (Rome, 1810), p. 149 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Fragmenta Basiniensis Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Copenhagen, 1811), p. 20 ff.

of Isaiah, the end of 2 Co and the Hebrews.<sup>a</sup> A single verse from Jon 2 will be found in Tuki;<sup>β</sup> the last part of La and most of the Epistle of Jer. (with Latin translations) in Quatremère.<sup>γ</sup> Crum has given a few verses from Mt 11, 12,<sup>δ</sup> and Krall some verses of Ro 11, 12.<sup>ε</sup> Besides these, Von Lemm has made another short collection of fragments in this dialect.<sup>ς</sup> To this list must be added some interesting biblical remains written in Old Middle Egyptian.<sup>η</sup> Small portions of Exodus, Sirach, and 2 Mac are published by Bouriant.<sup>θ</sup> We have an incomplete MS of the Minor Prophets, from which Krall has published some verses,<sup>ι</sup> briefly the rest of the Minor Prophets, which he has published.<sup>κ</sup> Part of the same MS has recently been edited by Bouriant.<sup>λ</sup> The NT fragments published by Crum<sup>μ</sup> are unfortunately very minute. Jude 17-20 and part of Ja 4<sup>12-13</sup> alone survive.

(c) Bohairic.—The best edition of the Gospels is that of Schwartz,<sup>ν</sup> and of the Acts and Epistles, that of Lagarde.<sup>ξ</sup> The NT as a whole has never been satisfactorily edited. A serviceable edition was made by Wilkins, but the Latin translation which it contains is unsatisfactory.<sup>ο</sup> A new edition of the Gospels is being prepared by the Clarendon Press by G. Horner. The first published by Wilkins (with a translation),<sup>π</sup> and then more carefully by Lagarde.<sup>τ</sup> The latter has edited and translated (but not printed) the Major and Minor Prophets and the Book of Job.<sup>σ</sup> The best editions of the Psalms have been made by Schwartz<sup>ρ</sup> and Lagarde,<sup>υ</sup> the latter edition being unfortunately printed in Latin characters. F. Rossi has lately edited a MS containing part of the Psalter.<sup>φ</sup> Only small portions of the rest of the OT have been printed. For a list of these portions and of editions not mentioned here, see Hyvernat, op. cit. 1897, No 1, p. 48 ff.

4. DATE OF VERSIONS.—The earliest evidence for the existence of a Coptic version is usually said to be afforded by the Life of St. Antony, commonly attributed to St. Athanasius. We are there de Indole Versionis Novi Testamenti Scilicet, Copenhagen, 1789, p. 78 ff.). Maspero has published Mt 5:4-6:10a, Revue des Études Égyptiennes, vol. II (Cairo, 1897), p. 567 ff. The Gospel fragments are parts of Mt 13, 14, and of Mk 8, 9. The difficulty of drawing a sharp line of distinction between the various forms of the M.E. dialect is shown by the fact that Headlam is inclined to regard two parts of one MS of the Gospels as belonging to two dialects (see Headlam, op. cit. II, p. 141 f.; cf. Hyvernat, op. cit. 1896, No 4, p. 563 ff.).

<sup>β</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes (Rome, 1778), p. 446.
<sup>γ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 222.
<sup>δ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.
<sup>ε</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.
<sup>ς</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>η</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>θ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>ι</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>κ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>λ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>μ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>ν</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

<sup>ο</sup> Revue des Études Égyptiennes, p. 117. The fragments of the Song of Songs are the Song of the Lord. Cf. Hyvernat, p. 12 ff.

told that he was an Egyptian, that his parents were Christians, and that as a child he went with them to church, and 'gave attendance to the readings' (i.e. from the Scriptures).<sup>a</sup> When about 20 years of age 'he went into the church, and it happened that the Gospel was then being read.'<sup>β</sup> He heard a text which influenced him profoundly. On other occasions, also, he heard passages read, and 'he gave such attendance to the reading that none of those things which were written fell from him to the ground, but he retained all, and thereafter his memory served him for books.'<sup>γ</sup> From these passages it has been argued that, since we further know that St. Antony as a boy refused to learn letters,<sup>δ</sup> and was unable throughout life to speak Greek,<sup>ε</sup> there must have been in his boyhood a translation of the Scriptures in the Egyptian tongue. This, it is maintained, is confirmed by other passages in his Life, especially by the discourse which begins at c. xvi. We are there told that he spoke to the monks in the Egyptian tongue, saying, 'The Scriptures are sufficient for teaching; but it is good for us to exhort one another in the faith, and encourage with words.'<sup>ς</sup> In the discourse which follows there are quotations from, or allusions to, texts from various parts of the Bible. Since Antony, shortly before his death in A.D. 356, said, 'I am well-nigh one hundred and five years old,'<sup>η</sup> he must have been born about A.D. 250. Therefore there must have been a translation of the Bible into Egyptian about the middle of the 3rd century. But such reasoning is not conclusive. This Life never speaks of Antony as reading the Bible. He only hears it read. The Coptic translation which he heard might well have been made at the time by an interpreter. The need of a written translation in the services of the Church would not at once be felt.<sup>θ</sup> The first to be rendered into Greek, and then into Coptic, would be the Gospels, as at a later date the Coptic was rendered into Arabic by 'anyone who had the gift of speaking, so that he could interpret aright.'<sup>κ</sup> In so far as Antony was in the habit of repeating texts in his discourses, he was enabled to do so by his remarkable memory. For we have no reason to suppose that he had a Bible of his own. But the speeches put into the mouth of the hermit cannot be used as evidence in such a case. For, even if we admit the historical character of the biography, it does not in the least follow that the discourses are verbatim reports.<sup>λ</sup> On the authority, therefore, of this Life alone it is unsafe to base any conclusion as to the existence of a Coptic version of the Bible in the 3rd century.

There is, however, good ground for believing that a version existed in the 4th cent. It was at the beginning of this century that St. Pachomius first gathered solitary ascetics together in the south of Egypt under a common rule. If we may trust the

<sup>a</sup> Athan. Vit. Ant. 1 (Migne, PG, xxvi. 840 f.).

<sup>β</sup> ib. 2. The Syriac version of the Life has, 'There was the reading in the church; and at the end of all the Scriptures the Gospel was read' (see Schulthess, Probe einer syrischen Version der Vita St. Antonii (Leipzig, 1894), Syriac text, p. 6, lines 12 f.).

<sup>γ</sup> Vit. Ant. 3.

<sup>δ</sup> ib. 1.

<sup>ε</sup> ib. 74; Hier. Vit. HZ. 30 (Vall. II. 31); Pallad. Hist. Laus.

26 (PG, xxxiv. 1076).

<sup>ς</sup> Vit. Ant. 16.

<sup>η</sup> ib. 89.

<sup>θ</sup> See Renaudot, Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio (Paris, 1716), vol. I, p. 203 ff.

<sup>ι</sup> ib. pp. cxxiii, 207.

<sup>κ</sup> ib. p. 204.

<sup>λ</sup> ib. p. 74. Robertson, who believes in the genuineness of the Life, admits that 'even an Athanasius would not so entirely rise out of the biographical habits of his day as to mingle nothing of his own with the speeches of his hero' (Athan. in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers p. 191).

accounts given in his Life, he himself spoke Egyptian, and only acquired Greek in later years.<sup>a</sup> His monks as a rule were common Egyptian peasants, who knew no language but their own. The Greeks and Romans of his settlement were in a separate house, presided over by Theodore of Alexandria.<sup>β</sup> Yet the study of the Bible is laid on the study of the Bible. There are frequent allusions to learning passages by heart.<sup>γ</sup> Pachomius himself was in the habit of speaking from the Scriptures to his monks.<sup>δ</sup> When a novice first came, according to the rules of the monastery extant in Greek, he began by receiving 'the Prayer of the Gospel' (τὴν εὐχὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) and learning certain Psalms.<sup>ε</sup> Unless our accounts of Pachomius' life and work are most misleading, we can scarcely doubt that there was, early in the 4th cent., a Coptic version of the Bible. The attempt to trace the translation further back is beset with difficulties. We know very little concerning Christianity in Upper Egypt before the time of Pachomius. Eusebius indeed tells us that in the persecution under Severus (A.D. 202), which was especially felt at Alexandria, martyrs were brought to that city from 'Egypt and all the Thebaid'.<sup>ς</sup> But no such tradition survives in Coptic literature. We have no evidence that in early days the Alexandrian Church seriously attempted any work. If the Alexandrians had done so, it would have been no easy task. For they were regarded as foreigners by the rest of Egypt;<sup>η</sup> and their position was not unlike that which Englishmen occupy in India to-day.<sup>θ</sup> Besides the difficulty of the language, they found it, as Origen says, no easy task to persuade an Egyptian to give up idolatry and 'despise those things which he had received from his fathers'.<sup>κ</sup> Heathen worship down to a late time 'retained its firmest hold in the pious land of Egypt'.<sup>λ</sup> The incursions of the Persians into the Episcopate under Demetrius (c. 189-232 A.D.), and more especially under his successor Heraclas (c. 233-248 A.D.), must indeed be regarded as an indication of missionary activity.<sup>μ</sup> But the time of Demetrius had spread as far south as Antinoë, the Church was too large for the personal supervision of the bishop at Alexandria.

The bishop who succeeded Heraclas—Dionysius

<sup>a</sup> Act. SS. Pach. et Theodor. 27. pp. 147, 629; SS. Pach. et Theodor. 27.

<sup>β</sup> Amél. op. cit. pp. 147, 150. <sup>γ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. pp. 12, 18, 22, 37, 41 f., 50 f., 73 f., 92, 99.

<sup>δ</sup> Ib. p. 141; Mission Arch. Mémoires, iv p. 553. <sup>ε</sup> Migne, PG, xl, 949. For the <sup>ς</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. pp. 12, 18, 22, 37, 41 f., 50 f., 73 f., 92, 99.

<sup>η</sup> In the Life of Theodore we hear of brethren 'who interpreted his words in Greek to those who did not know Egyptian, because they were strangers (ξένοι) and Alexandria'. <sup>θ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11.

<sup>κ</sup> See Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (Dickson's ed.), i, 11. <sup>λ</sup> See Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, c. xv. Bury's ed. ii. p. 60. For the Alexandrian diocese might have been, like the early dioceses of Gaul and N. Italy (Duchesne, Fastes Episcopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, i p. 33 ff.), of very considerable extent. See Pearson, Vindicta Epist. S. Ignatii (Cambridge, 1872) i p. 170.

<sup>μ</sup> Between the years c. 212-216 A.D. we find Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, writing to the Antinoites and exhorting them to the Great—has given in his letters a vivid picture of the Alexandrian Church of his time, but has told us little of the rest of Egypt. In his day no imperial edict was needed to start a persecution of Christians (A.D. 249). A large part of the population of Alexandria was still pagan, and only needed a leader to revive 'their native superstition' (τὴν ἐπιχθρῖον δαισιδαίμονιαν). When the Decian persecution (A.D. 250) broke out, he specially mentions four 'Egyptians' as among the sufferers.<sup>a</sup> The persecution was not confined to Alexandria, but many others 'in cities and villages' were martyred, and the bishop of Nilus (in Middle Egypt) fled from his see.<sup>β</sup> Coptic traditions of this persecution are scanty, and we do not precisely know how far they extend. We find the same bishop writing letters to the brethren in Egypt<sup>γ</sup> and to Egyptian bishops.<sup>δ</sup> He also went to the Fayûm district. Here the teaching of Nepos, an Egyptian bishop (ἐπίσκοπος τῶν κατ' Αἴγυπτον), had for a long time prevailed, so that 'schisms and defections of whole churches had taken place.' Dionysius therefore called together 'the presbyters and teachers of the brethren in the villages,' and discussed their difficulties with them for three successive days.<sup>ε</sup> We cannot gather, from any letters of his which have come down to us, information regarding Christianity farther south. We have to wait for such information till the beginning of the next cent. In the latter part of the Diocletian persecution Eusebius in person visited the Thebaid. He was an eye-witness of the massacres, and of the fanatical enthusiasm of many of the martyrs. The persecution continued, 'not for a few days or for a short time, but for a long period of whole years' (ἐπὶ μακρὸν ὅλον ἔτων διδομένη). Most of the sufferers apparently belonged to the lower classes of society, but there were some of high birth and distinction.<sup>η</sup> Many bishops suffered for the faith,<sup>θ</sup> but Eusebius does not say whether any of them came from the south. He has described the sufferings of the rest of the Egyptian Church in Egypt itself and elsewhere;<sup>κ</sup> and has preserved an account by an eye-witness of the persecution in Alexandria.<sup>λ</sup> But when we bring together all the historian's statements, it is extremely difficult to determine how far they imply the existence of a widespread native Christianity. We can only conjecture that amongst the numerous martyrs some of those in a lower station of life were natives. A century had passed since the bishop of Jerusalem wrote to the Greek-speaking population of the capital of the Thebaid.<sup>μ</sup> In the meantime the Christians in that town may have done good work amongst the 'barbarians,' even if they had not attempted such work at first.

be of one mind (ἑνωμένοι). See Eus. HE, vi. 11. In the next century Antinoë was present at the Council of Nicaea.

<sup>a</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>β</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>γ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>δ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>ε</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>η</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>θ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>κ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>λ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11. <sup>μ</sup> See e.g. Amél. op. cit. p. 371; Amél. Annales du MG, i, 11.

Isidore, and Nemesion. Dionysius seems to imply that most of the others at Alexandria were Greeks. Arguments cannot be safely based on the absence of Egyptian names. Thus we have in the Fayûm a son of Sabatius bearing a Latin and Greek name 'Aurelius Diogenes.' See Benson, Cyprian, Appendix B, p. 542.

<sup>β</sup> Dion. ap. Eus. HE, vi. 42. <sup>γ</sup> See Amél. Actes d'Égypte pp. 14-17. 'Matra' (p. 15) is probably the same as 'Metras,' who suffered the year before the Decian persecution (175, HE, vi. 41). See also Malan, Calendar of the Coptic Church, p. 10.

<sup>δ</sup> HE, vi. 46, vii. 22. <sup>ε</sup> The bishop of Hermopolis (vi. 46), Hierax, an Egyptian bishop (vii. 21).

<sup>η</sup> HE, vii. 24. <sup>θ</sup> HE, vii. 9.

<sup>κ</sup> HE, vii. 9, 13, ix. 6; De Mart. Pal. 13. We gather from Epiphanius, Haer. lxxviii. 8 (PG, xlii. 197), that Potamo of Heraclea lost an eye in the persecution.

<sup>λ</sup> HE, vii. 6, 8, 13, ix. 11; De Mart. Pal. 8, 13.

<sup>μ</sup> HE, vii. 6 f.; De Mart. Pal. 8, 10, 13.

<sup>ν</sup> Phileas, ap. Eus. HE, vii. 10. The account of Phileas' own trial is given by Ruinart, Act. Smc. 2nd ed. p. 494 ff.

<sup>ξ</sup> Eus. HE, vi. 11.

The Coptic accounts of this persecution were written at a later date, and are disfigured by legendary additions. Yet the traditions of martyrdoms having taken place in the towns lying between Antinoë and Latopolis must have some historical foundation. They point to the fact that the persecution was particularly severe in the south. Many of the martyrs bear Greek names, and are connected with the army.<sup>β</sup> Comparatively few bishops are mentioned.<sup>γ</sup> Diocletian is hated with a wild, unreasoning hatred, due no doubt in part to political considerations. A new religion has gained in popularity among the native Egyptian, disorderly native or Upper Egypt, simply because Diocletian and the Government were opposed to it. In fact we find, as we study these Coptic traditions, that however much the new religion had already appealed to the natives, a fresh era began with Diocletian, and Christianity became, in a fuller sense than ever before, the religion of the people. Hatred of Diocletian, the faith of the martyrs, the sufferings which they endured, all contributed to this result. The consequence was that, when the persecution was over, the repugnance of the heathen (ῥῶν ἑθνῶν) was multiplied in the Church, the bishops leading the way unto God, according to the teaching of the apostles.<sup>ε</sup>

It will be evident from this brief study of the subject, that but little is known of Egyptian Christianity outside of Alexandria before the time of Pachomius. The state of the Church in his time—the history and legends of the Diocletian persecution—the increase of the Egyptian episcopate under Demetrius and Heraclas—suggest, but do not prove, that some time before the end of the 3rd cent. there was a considerable number of native Christians. They would soon feel the need of a translation of the Bible. Historical evidence, then, on the whole, points to the 3rd cent. as the period when the first Coptic translation was made.<sup>ζ</sup> But this view can only be regarded as tentative. In the light of future discoveries it may have to be modified. This translation was most probably made, not in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, but in Middle or Upper Egypt. Here the native element was stronger than in the north; and, as Greek was less spoken, the need for a translation would be more keenly felt. All the evidence that we possess at present goes to prove that Coptic literature, whether orthodox or heretical, took its rise in the south; its development being assisted by the hatred felt towards the foreign or Greek element.<sup>η</sup>

<sup>α</sup> Amél. Actes des M. p. 30 ff.

<sup>β</sup> Ib. pp. 26, 30, 103, 219.

<sup>γ</sup> Zoega (Cat. pp. 237, 239) and Amélineau (op. cit. pp. 39, 53 f.) speak of the martyrdom of the bishops of Ptolemais and Hermopolis Magna. Amélineau (op. cit. p. 47 ff.) tells of the martyrdom of the bishop of Latopolis. Pisura and three other bishops (Zoega, Cat. p. 52; Hyvernat, Actes des M. i. p. 117 ff.), and the bishop of Prosopis in Lower Egypt (Cat. pp. 62, 133; Hyvernat, Actes des M. i. p. 117 ff.) are also mentioned. The bishop of Atmim fled (Amélineau, Actes des M. p. 32). The bishop of Lycopolis used the persecution as a means of self-aggrandisement (Hyvernat, Actes des M. i. 280), and, according to Athanasius (Apol. c. Arianos, 59) and Socrates (H.E. i. 6), actually sacrificed.

<sup>δ</sup> The era of the martyrs, on which Coptic chronology is usually based, begins with A.D. 234, the year of the accession of Diocletian.

<sup>ε</sup> See Amél. Vie de Pakhôme, Annales du M.C. xvii. pp. 2, 339; Actes SS. Mai. xiv. Vlt. Pach. Prolog., cf. also Migne, PL, lxxvii. 281.

<sup>ζ</sup> The evidence of MSS does not help us much. Our oldest MSS are of the 10th cent. and their date a matter of uncertainty. In the 10th cent. part of 2 Th 3 (Kenyon, op. cit. plate xvii.) and fragments of the Old Middle Egyptian of Jude (Grum, op. cit. plate 1, No. 1, and of the Minor Prophets (Krall, Führer, p. 33, Tafel III.) take us back to the 4th or 5th cents. Cf. also Stern, Z.A.S. 1888, p. 135.

<sup>η</sup> Cf. Guidi, Nachrichten von der K. G. d. W. zu Göttingen, 1889, No. 3, p. 501.

5. GREEK TEXT IMPLIED BY VERSIONS.—All three versions of the NT must be more carefully edited before we can determine with certainty the underlying Greek text. The Sahidic NT contains some remarkable interpolations, usually classed as Western. Two striking ones are found in Lk. The parable of Dives and Lazarus begins thus in the Sahidic Bible: 'Now there was a certain rich man, whose name was (lit. is) Nineveh' (16<sup>9</sup>).<sup>α</sup> When Joseph had laid the body of Jesus in the tomb (23<sup>53</sup>), the Sahidic adds: 'Now when he had laid him, he placed (or laid) a stone at the door of the sepulchre, which twenty men could not have rolled' (cf. Do). Several interesting 'Western' interpolations are found in the Acts. Three examples may be quoted.<sup>γ</sup> After the words 'ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence,' the Sahidic has a strange gloss, 'but (ἀλλὰ) until Pentecost' (1<sup>5</sup>, cf. D). The negative form of the 'Golden Rule' is placed at the end of the apostolic injunctions to Gentile converts (15<sup>10</sup>, cf. D). After the vision of the man of Macedonia to St. Paul, the tenth verse of Ac 16 runs thus: 'And when he had risen, he told us the vision. Straightway we sought to go forth into Macedonia, telling (or showing) them that the Lord had called us for to preach unto them' (cf. D). On the other hand, several 'Western' interpolations, which we might have expected to find, are absent from the Sahidic.

The text of the Bohairic version, as is well known, corresponds in general with that of Codex Vaticanus. Whether it is yet more closely allied to the text used by Cyril of Alexandria is a matter which still remains to be determined. There can be but little doubt that in their original form the Bohairic and Sahidic were free from the 'Western' interpolations. A collation of the versions in those parts of the NT, where all three are extant together, proves that the Middle Egyptian is often closely related to the Sahidic. This is most clearly seen in the Pauline Epistles. Thus an examination of the three versions in 1 Co proves that the Sahidic and Middle Egyptian are not entirely independent translations. Sometimes they are based on a different Greek text from that which underlies the Bohairic. But, even when they are translating the same original, their renderings are often strikingly different from that of the Northern version. We may take 1 Co 15<sup>12-14</sup> as an example. Here the Sah. and M.E. translations are practically identical: 'But if Christ is preached that he rose from the dead, in what manner do some among you say that the dead do not rise? If the dead do not rise, then Christ did not rise. If Christ did not rise, then is our preaching vain, and vain is our faith also.'<sup>ζ</sup> The Bohairic translation is not so free: 'But if Christ is preached that he was raised from the dead, how (ἵνα) do some among you say that there is no resurrection (ἀνστάσις) of the dead? But if there is no resurrection (ἀνστάσις) of the dead, then not even (οὐδὲ) was Christ raised. But if Christ was not raised, then (ἵνα) vain is our preaching, vain also is your faith.'<sup>η</sup> This instance—and it is one among many—shows us that the Sah. and M.E. must in some way be related to one another. A cursory examination might suggest that they are practically the same version,

<sup>α</sup> Cf. Harnack, Texte u. Unters. xli. 1, 75 ff.

<sup>β</sup> In the bilingual MS described by Amélineau (Notice des MSS Coptes de la Bibl. Nationale, Paris, 1895) the Gr. runs thus: καὶ θύρας αὐτοῦ ἐτίθηκον τὴν πέτραν λίθον μέγαν οὗ μέρους ἑκατοσὶ ἀνδρῶν. The corresponding Sahidic is not published.

<sup>γ</sup> Other interpolations will be found in Ac 13<sup>23</sup> 23<sup>3</sup> 53<sup>5</sup> 66<sup>8</sup> 94<sup>10</sup> 127<sup>14</sup> 141<sup>15</sup> 23<sup>3</sup> 34<sup>18</sup> 181<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>2</sup> 202<sup>4</sup> 211.

<sup>δ</sup> M.E. omits 'but.'

<sup>ε</sup> So Engelbreth's Sah. Amélineau has 'your.'

<sup>ζ</sup> Sah omits 'also.'

<sup>η</sup> A Coptic word for 'faith' is used. B. and M.E. employ the Greek πίστις.

and that the differences between them are purely dialectical. But when we inquire more closely into the passages where all three are extant, we find that such an explanation is not satisfactory. Sometimes each version is an independent translation. . . . Sahidic and Bohairic agree . . . in underlying text as against the . . . In other places—and this is especially the case in the Gospels<sup>a</sup>—the Bohairic and Middle Egyptian are opposed to the Sahidic. Thus, in St. Matthew's account of the Lord's Prayer the difficult word ἐπιούσιος is represented in Sahidic by that which is coming, in the other two versions by of to-morrow.<sup>β</sup> When we have recovered a . . . Middle Egyptian version, . . . already known have been . . . shall be able to speak with greater security. Meanwhile we may provisionally state our view as follows. The New Testament was first translated into Sahidic from a text containing a considerable 'Western' element. The translation was idiomatic and in some cases inexact. The Middle Egyptian,<sup>γ</sup> probably made very soon afterwards, was largely influenced by the Sahidic. The Bohairic, made last of all, though in places influenced by the two previous translations, . . . an effort to translate with more . . . less what was felt to be a superior Greek text.

The Coptic versions of the Old Testament are based upon the LXX. The study of them is of great interest, because it may help us to reconstruct the edition of the LXX made by Hesychius, which, as we learn from Jerome, was well known in Alexandria and Egypt.<sup>δ</sup> Whether any of the versions of the Coptic Old Testament are free from the influence of Origen's revision is doubtful. Some Sahidic MSS give the Book of Job in a shortened form. The claim has been put forward<sup>ε</sup> that we have in these MSS a witness to the original text of the LXX, before Origen made his copious additions from Theodotion's version.<sup>ζ</sup> But the last word on this subject has not been said. (Cf. Burkitt, Tests and Studies, iv. 3, p. 8.) The relation of the Middle Egyp. of OT to the Sah. has yet to be worked out.<sup>η</sup>

5. HISTORY OF CRITICISM OF VERSIONS.—A careful study of the Coptic versions of the New Testament is given by Lightfoot in Scrivener's Introd. to the New Test.<sup>θ</sup> Lightfoot, as many distinguished scholars before him, believed that 'we should probably not be exaggerating, if we <sup>a</sup> An examination of Mt 6<sup>2-15</sup> and Jn 4<sup>28-30</sup> will prove the truth of this statement.

<sup>β</sup> This translation in the Bohairic of Mt is probably the . . . The older rendering (cf. Lat. . . .). At the end of the prayer . . . The Sah. has, 'For thine is the . . . for ever and ever, Amen.' The M.E. has, 'For thine is the power and the glory for ever, Amen' (cf. Didache viii. ὅτι ἐστὶς ὁ θεὸς καὶ ἡ δόξα σου αἰῶνας).

<sup>γ</sup> The fragments of the NT written in old M.E. are too minute for classification. The little that remains shows the same text as the Sahidic. But when we recover more, we may find that it differs only dialectically from the ordinary M.E. version.

<sup>δ</sup> Proef. in Par. (Vall. ix. 1405); Apol. adv. Rufin. ii. 27 (Vall. ii. 522).

<sup>ε</sup> See Ciasca, op. cit. vol. ii. p. xviii ff.; Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 216.

<sup>ζ</sup> Hier. Proef. in Job (Vall. ix. 1097).

<sup>η</sup> The translations of Zec 13<sup>1</sup> in Sah and Old M.E. cannot be independent. Both add (cf. Field) καὶ θεὸς με—a reading evidently derived from Theodotion, and omitted in Boh. The words θεὸς καὶ θεὸς ἰσχυρὸς καὶ ἰσχυρὸς are found in the Old M.E.

<sup>θ</sup> Scrivener . . . the Criticism of the NT, ed. iii. p. 365 ff.; see also Gregory, Prolegomena (1884), 859 ff. For an interesting and concise account of these versions see Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient MSS (1895), p. 75 ff. A useful summary of the literature of the subject is given by Nestle, Urtext und Übersetzungen der Bibel (1897), p. 111 ff. See Quatremere, op. cit. p. 9. Cf. Schwartz, E. in Dual Memph. p. xviii.

VOL. I.—43

placed one or both of the principal Egyptian versions, i.e. the Bohairic and the Sahidic, 'or at least parts of them, before the close of the 2nd cent.'<sup>a</sup> This view has been followed by Westcott and Hort, who maintain that 'the greater part of the' Bohairic 'version cannot well be later than the 2nd cent.' whilst 'the Version of Upper Egypt . . . was probably little if at all inferior in antiquity.'<sup>β</sup> . . . whom, in the last edition (1894) of Scrivener's Introduction . . . a summary of the history of the . . . the Coptic NT from the point where Lightfoot stopped, considers that 'it has been sufficiently proved that translations into Coptic existed in the 3rd cent., very probably in the 2nd.'<sup>γ</sup> Ciasca, in the introd. to his edition of the Sahidic OT (where references will be found to the work of former editors<sup>δ</sup>), discusses the text and date of the Book of Job.<sup>ε</sup> His examination of the book confirms him in the belief that Lightfoot was right in assigning part at least of the Coptic versions to the 2nd cent.<sup>ζ</sup> It is with the greatest diffidence that we have ventured to suggest that this early date (even if it is right) has not been proved. Our belief in the historical evidence for such a date was shaken by an article<sup>η</sup> published by Prof. Guidi, to which reference has already been made; and subsequent study has confirmed us in the view that there is, as yet, no adequate evidence of the existence of a Coptic version at such an early date as is often maintained.

FORBES ROBINSON.

EHĪ (אֵהִי).—The eponym of a Benjamite family, Gn 46<sup>21</sup>, where, however, אֵהִי אֵהִי אֵהִי must be corrected after Nu 26<sup>32</sup> to אֵהִי אֵהִי. 'The corruption was perhaps prior to the adoption of the square character; א and ע in the old script being similar and liable to confusion. It may, however, be due to mere transposition of the two letters' (Ball in Haupt's Genesis, ad loc.). See further. AHIRAM, and cf. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 35.

J. A. SEBIE.

EHUD (אֶהוּד), son of Gera, a left-handed Benjamite, delivered his people by a bold exploit from Eglon, king of Moab, who had captured Jericho and oppressed Israel for eighteen years. This history is given in Jg 3<sup>12-30</sup>. The compiler has furnished an introduction and conclusion in his usual manner (vv. 12-15a, 30b); the narrative itself (vv. 15b-30a) is one of the most ancient in the book, and a characteristic specimen of the best style of Heb. storytelling. Doubts have been cast upon the name of the hero, because Ehud and Gera elsewhere are names of Benjamite clans. Gera is a son (Gn 46<sup>21</sup>) or grandson (1 Ch 8<sup>8</sup>), Ehud is . . . (1 Ch 7<sup>10</sup>), of Benjamin (Nöldek, . . . 179 f.; Stade, Gesch. i. 68). But E. may well have been the name of the hero before it was the name of the clan called after him (Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 100). Wellhausen (Gott. Nachrichten, 1895, p. 480) suggests that אֶהוּד may be an abbreviation of אֶהוּדִים in 1 Ch 8<sup>8</sup>. G. A. COOKE.

EITHER.—1. Now alternative, one or the other. in older Eng. 'either' was comprehensive, each of

<sup>a</sup> Scrivener, op. cit. ed. iii. p. 371.

<sup>β</sup> Westcott and Hort, The NT in the Original Greek, smaller ed. p. 574.

<sup>γ</sup> Ciasca, op. cit. ed. iv. vol. ii. p. 105 f.

<sup>δ</sup> Ciasca, op. cit. vol. i. p. viii f.

<sup>ε</sup> Ciasca, op. cit. vol. ii. p. xviii ff.

<sup>ζ</sup> Ciasca, op. cit. vol. i. p. xxxv.

<sup>η</sup> A. J. Guidi, Revue de la K.G. d. W. zu Göttingen, 1889, No. 3, p. . . . (op. cit. § 2) suggests the end of the 3rd cent. as the date of the Coptic translation of the Bible. Stern in his Critische Anmerkungen zu der bohairischen Übersetzung der Proverbia Salomons (ZAS, 1882, p. 191 ff.) conjectures that the Boh. Version may be much later than the Sah., which, in part at least, was made in the 3rd cent. (p. 202). He thinks it possible that the Boh. and Sah. Versions may prove to be based on some form of the M.E. (ZAS, 1886, p. 136).

two, like its German equivalent 'jeder.' Thus Lv 10<sup>1</sup> 'Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer'; 1 K 7<sup>15</sup>; Jn 19<sup>18</sup> 'on either side one,' and Rev 22<sup>2</sup> 'on either side of the river was there the tree of life.' Cf. Ridley, Brief Declaration (1555), p. 102 (Moule's ed.), 'as some of them do odiously call either other'—changed in the Oxf. ed. 1688 into 'each other.' 2. 'Either' was formerly used to introduce the second or any later alternative, as well as the first; so Ja 3<sup>12</sup> and Ph 3<sup>12</sup> 'Neither . . . nor . . . had . . . attained, either were . . .'; (RV 'or'); and so Lk 6<sup>42</sup> 'Either how canst thou say to thy brother' (RV 'Or'). In this sense 'either else' is also found, as Stubbes, Anat. Abus. ii. 10, 'Either else they would never be so desirous of revenge.'

J. HASTINGS.

EKER (עקר).—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 27<sup>2</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

EKREBEL (Ἐκρεβήλ), Jth 7<sup>18</sup>.—Apparently the town of 'Akrabeh, E. of Shechem, the capital of Akrabattine (SWP ii. sh. 12).

EKRON (עקרון, 'Akrapōn), one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, the one farthest to the N. (Jos 13<sup>3</sup>). It was a centre, having towns and villages . . . upon it (Jos 15<sup>45</sup>). In the first division of the land E. and W. of the Jordan it was assigned to Judah, being on the N. boundary of that tribe (Jos 15<sup>45, 46, 47</sup>), but in the later division the boundaries were so rectified as to give it to Dan (Jos 19<sup>43</sup>). It is mentioned as among the cities not captured under Joshua (Jos 13<sup>3</sup>). After his death it was taken by Judah (Jg 1<sup>18</sup>); but the possession was not . . . for we afterwards find it in the hands of the Philistines till the time of David. It is prominently mentioned in the history of the time when the ark was in the land of the Philistines (1 S 5, 6), and in connexion with later events (1 S 7<sup>14</sup>, 17<sup>52</sup>). Like the rest of the Phil. cities, it became . . . dependent soon after the disruption. . . in history in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 K 12<sup>3, 4, 16</sup>), in the time of Amos (Am 1<sup>8</sup>, Zec 9<sup>6, 7</sup>), and in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 25<sup>20</sup>). The records of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, mention a revolt of E. from the Assyrians to Hezekiah, and the condign punishment inflicted (see, e.g., Sennacherib's Annals, pp. 304–306). It is found in the Assyrian list No. 10<sup>30</sup>, AV Accaron) as a place given by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabæus in reward for his services. It is spoken of in connexion with a march of king Baldwin the crusader, A.D. 1100 (Robinson, BRP ii. 228). It is apparently identified with 'Aktr, 4 miles E. of Yebna, and is now a station on the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem. (See PHILISTINES. See also Smith, HGHL 193, 218). Ekroneite.—A citizen of Ekron. The word is used in the singular in Jos 13<sup>3</sup>, where 'the Ekroneite' is spoken of, meaning the people of Ekron collectively, and in the plural in 1 S 5<sup>10</sup>, where the citizens are spoken of individually.

W. J. BEECHER.

EL.—See GOD.

ELA (Ἐλά). 1. 1 Es 9<sup>7</sup>=ELAM, Ezr 10<sup>36</sup>. 2. (1 K 4<sup>18</sup> אֵלָה, AV Elah) Father of Shimei, who was Solomon's commissariat officer in Benjamin.

ELAH (אֵלָה 'terebinth').—1. (Gn 36<sup>41</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>52</sup>) The fifth 'duke of Edom.' These names prob. indicate districts called after certain chieftains. Comp. the use of Mamre, Caleb, etc. 2. (1 K 16<sup>6–14</sup>) King of Israel, son of Baasha. His reign can scarcely have lasted two years, since he came to the throne in the 26th year of Asa, and was killed in the 27th. The story of Elah's death suggests that he was a worthless sot ('drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza his steward,' 1 K 16<sup>9</sup>). Jos. (Ant. viii. xii. 4) says that Zimri took advantage of the absence of the army at Gibbethon (1 K 16<sup>15</sup>) to kill Elah while unprotected. His death was followed by the extirpation of his family, in fulfilment of the prophecy of Jehu (1 K 16<sup>8, 9</sup>); but the sacred narrative reminds us that the fact of a man's being the rod of God's anger does not exempt him from punishment for the crimes he commits in accomplishing the design of Providence (1 K 16<sup>7</sup>), cf. Hos 1<sup>2</sup>, Am 1<sup>4</sup>. The office which Arza held was a very high one, see 1 K 4<sup>2, 6</sup>. 3. Father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 K 15<sup>30</sup>, 17<sup>1</sup>, 18<sup>1, 9</sup>). 4. (1 Ch 4<sup>15</sup>) Second son of Caleb. Rawlinson suggests that the last words of the verse should be: 'and the sons of Elah, Jehallelel and Kenaz.' (So Keil.) Similar omissions occur in 6<sup>28</sup>, 8<sup>39</sup>, 9<sup>4</sup>. 5. (1 Ch 9<sup>8</sup>) A Benjamite who dwelt in Jerus. in the time of Neh. He is not mentioned in the parallel list, Neh 11.

N. J. D. WHITE.

ELAH, THE VALLEY OF (אֵלָה רָמָה; ἡ κολλὰς Ἐλά, Α τῆς ὀρυθὸς 'the valley of the terebinth').—The scene of the defeat of the Phil. champion Goliath at the hands of David (1 S 17<sup>19</sup>, 21<sup>9</sup>). The valley of E. is probably the modern Wady es-Sunt (=terebinth), the third and most southerly of the valleys which cut . . . the Shephelah, and so lead up from the . . . to the heart of Judæa. 'An hour's ride from Tell es-Safi' (at the entrance to the Phil. plain) 'up the winding vale of E. brings us through the Shephelah to the spot where the Wady es-Sunt turns S. towards Hebron, and the narrow Wady el-Jindy strikes up towards Bethlehem. At the junction of the three there is a level plain, a quarter of a mile broad, cut by two streams, which combine to form the stream down Wady es-Sunt. This plain . . . the scene of David's encounter with . . . A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. p. 227).

The Philistines had pitched their camp between Socoh and Azekah, i.e. on a ridge separated from the rest of the low hills, and facing the Israelites across the valley. The 'gai' (גַּי) or ravine, which separated the two armies, is the deep trench formed by the combination of the two streams; this, in fact, forms . . . the valley. The Israelites had . . . on the farther or eastern side of the vale, somewhere on the slopes of the Wady el-Jindy, thus securing their line of retreat up the Wady. The natural strength of both positions was thus very great, since, if either army attacked, they must not only cross the ravine, but also climb the opposite slopes, and so place themselves at a great disadvantage; the long delay of the two armies, in face of each other, was probably due to this fact.

J. F. SILKING.

ELAM (אֵלָם).—1. A son of Shem (Gn 10<sup>22</sup>=1 Ch 1<sup>17</sup>), the eponymous ancestor of the Elamites (see following article). 2. A Korahite (1 Ch 26<sup>3</sup>). 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8<sup>34</sup>). 4. The eponym of a family of which 1254 returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2<sup>7</sup>, Neh 7<sup>12</sup>, 1 Es 5<sup>12</sup>) and 71 with Ezra (Ezr 8<sup>7</sup>, 1 Es 8<sup>33</sup>). It was one of the Ben-Elam that urged Ezra to take action against mixed marriages (Ezr 10<sup>2</sup>), and six of the same family are reported to have put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10<sup>20</sup>). Elam acc. to Neh 10<sup>14</sup> 'sealed the covenant.' 5. In the parallel lists Ezr 2<sup>31</sup>, Neh 7<sup>34</sup> 'the other Elam' has also 1254 descendants who return with Zerubbabel. It appears certain that there is some confusion here (cf. Berth.-Ryssel, ad loc., and Smend, Listen, p. 19). 6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the walls (Neh 12<sup>40</sup>).

J. A. SELBIE.

ELAM, ELAMITES (אֵלָם, Ἐλᾶμ, Elymais).—The Heb. Elam is the Assy. Elamtu, 'the Highlands'

(a name also applied to the Amorite 'Highland' in the west), Elamû, 'an Elamite.' Elam is the Semitic translation of the Sumerian Numma or Nimma, which has the same signification, and was the name applied by the Proto-chaldeans to the mountainous land to the east of them. Elam possessed two ruling cities, Susa or Shushan, called Susun ('the old') in the native texts (now Shuster), on the Ulai or Eulæus, and Anzan or Ansan, nearer Babylonia in the south-west. The two cities gave their names to the districts in which they were situated, an inhabitant of Susiana being called Susunka, the 'Susanchite' of Ezr 4<sup>9</sup>. The district of Anzan was more extensive than that of Susa, and at one time was equivalent to 'the land of Elam' among the Babylonians (W. A. I. ii. 47. 18). Cyrus and his immediate predecessors were kings of Anzan, the country having been conquered by the Persian Teispes. The decline of the Assyrian empire. Sir H. Rawlinson notices that an early Arab. writer, Ibn en-Nadîm, states that writing was invented by Jemshîd, who lived at Assan, one of the districts of Shuster. The kings of Susa, however, eventually got possession of Anzan, and so founded the kingdom of Elam. They call themselves lords 'of the kingdom of Anzan'; and as this title is found on their bricks at Bushire, the kingdom must have extended as far as the sea.

To the east is the plain of Mal-Amir, where there are sculptures and cuneiform inscriptions from which we learn that here was the kingdom of the 'Anzanites' of Ezr 4<sup>9</sup>. In the second transcript of the Achaemenian texts the name is written Khapirti, and it has there taken the place of Anzan or Susa as the equivalent of the Bab. Elamtu. The equivalent in the Persian transcript is Uwaja, whence the modern Khuzistan.

The dialects of Mal-Amir, of Susa, and of the second Achaemenian transcripts differ but slightly from one another. They are agglutinative, and, so far as can be judged, unrelated to any other known language. The statement in Gn 10<sup>22</sup>, that Elam was the son of Shem, does not imply any racial or linguistic connexion, the object of the statement being apical.

(x) as reported by Strabo nations' inhabited the mountainous region east of the Euphrates, the Amardians or Mardians who bordered on the Persians, the Uxians and Elymeans on the frontiers of Persia and Susa, and the Kossæans contiguous to the Medes. The Amardians may be the people of Khapirti, the Uxians belonged to Uwaja, Elymais (1 Mac 6<sup>1</sup>) is Elam, and the Kossæans are the Kassî of the Assyrian inscriptions, of whose language many words are preserved, which, however, seem to have no connexion with the dialects of Elam.

'Ansan, in the land of Numma' or Elam, was conquered by Gudea, an early viceroy of southern Babylonia (in B.C. 2700), whose monuments have been found at Telloh; and Mutabil, another early viceroy (of Dur-ilu on the eastern frontier), 'broke the head of the armies of Ansan.' Kudur-Mabug, the prince of Iamutbal, a district of Elam immediately eastward of Chaldæa, was the father of Eri-Aku or Arioch (which see), and 'father of the land of the Amorites' or Syria. At the same period Chedorlaomer (Kudur-Lagamar) was suzerain of Babylonia and Palestine (Gn 14<sup>1-16</sup>), and the notices in the Bab. astrological tablets which refer to 'the king of Anzan and Subarti' or Mesopotamia probably belong to the same date. The defeat of the Elamites by Khammurabi, king of Babylon, enabled him to overcome Eri-Aku, and make Babylonia a united monarchy (B.C. 2330). In B.C.

2280 the Elamite king Kudur-Nankhundi made a raid into Babylonia, and carried away the image of the goddess Nanæa (see 2 Mac 1<sup>23</sup>), which Assurbanipal recovered 1635 years afterwards. Nearly a thousand years later we find Khurba-tila of Elam going to war with Kuri-galzu II. of Babylonia (B.C. 1340); but his own men revolted from him, and he was defeated and captured at Dur-Dungi by Kuri-galzu. About a century afterwards (c. B.C. 1230) Kidin-Khutru invaded Babylonia, and, after taking Dur-ilu, put an end to the Kassite dynasty at Babylon. A second invasion by the same king was not so successful. In B.C. 1115(?) Babylonia seems to have been conquered by the Elamites, as a dynasty of two Elamite kings then began to rule it. In B.C. 742 Khumbanigash or Khumbanigash became king of Elam, and in 721 assisted Merodach-baladan against Sargon of Assyria, whom he repulsed at Dur-ilu. He died in 718, and was succeeded by his sister's son, Sutrak-Nankhundi, who in 711 again assisted Merodach-baladan, but this time to no purpose. Sargon defeated and captured his general Singusibu, and added the Elamite districts of latbur, Lakhiru, and Rasi to Assyria. After a reign of eighteen years Sutrak-Nankhundi was imprisoned by his brother Khaludus, who seized the crown. He captured Babylon in the rear of Sennacherib, who had gone by sea to Nagitu, on the Elamite coast, in order to destroy a settlement made there by the fugitive Merodach-baladan, and the Bab. king, who was a son of Sennacherib, was carried captive to Elam. A year and a half afterwards (B.C. 693) the Elamite nominee at Babylon was killed by the Assyrians, and in the following year Khaludus was murdered. Kudur-Nankhundi succeeded him, and Sennacherib ravaged Elam, capturing even Madaktu north of Susa, until driven back by the winter. The following July, Kudur-Nankh. was killed in an insurrection, and Umman-menanu put on the throne. In B.C. 690 came the great battle of Khalulê, when Sennacherib met the combined forces of Elam and Babylonia, and both sides claimed the victory. The king of Elam had under him the troops of Parsuas (Persia), Anzan, Pasiru, and Ellipi (where Ecbatana afterwards stood), besides the Arameans and Kaldi or Chaldeans of southern Babylonia. On the 15th of Nisan, B.C. 689, he was killed, and died the following November. His son, his successor, reigned eight years, when he was burnt to death on the 3rd of Tisri, and Umman-Khaldas II. ascended the throne. He was murdered in 675 by his two brothers, Urtaki and Te-Umman, the elder of whom took the crown, and about ten years later made an unprovoked raid into Babylonia. The result was the conquest of Elam by the Assyrian king Assurbanipal, who placed Umman-gas the son of Urtaki on the throne as a tributary prince. He joined the great revolt against Assyria, which was headed by the viceroy of Babylonia; but he had hardly sent his army into that country when his son Tammariu conspired against him, and, cutting off his head, sent it to Assurbanipal. Tammariu then joined the Babylonians, and, during his absence, one of his servants, Indabigash, usurped the throne. Thereupon Tammariu surrendered to the Assyrians. Shortly afterwards Indabigash was murdered by another military adventurer, Umman-Khaldas III., and the Assyrian army again entered Elam, took Madaktu, and restored Tammariu to the throne. He was soon found to be plotting against his masters; and as Umman-Khaldas once more possessed himself of the country, the Assyrian general wasted it with fire and sword. Susa and the other cities were levelled with the ground, the temples and palaces destroyed, and the sacred groves cut down. Thirty-two statues of the kings were carried to Assyria, as well as the images of all the Elamite deities—Susinak, the god who delivered oracles, and whose image was concealed from the sight of the laity, Sumudu, Lagamar, Partikira, Amman-Kasimas, Uduzan, Sapak, Ragiba, Sungursara, Karsa and Kirsamas, Sudanu, Apak-sina, Bilala, Panintimri, Silagura, Napsa, Nabritu, and Kindakaru (to whom we have to add also Laguda, Nakhkhunte or Nankhundi, and Khumba). The kingdom of Elam perished, and a desolated province was added to the Assyrian empire. But the empire was already on the decline, and in a few years Elam ceased to belong to it. In B.C. 606, the year probably of the destruction of Nineveh, Jeremiah refers to 'the kings of Elam' (Jer 25<sup>25</sup>), and eight years later he declares that Elam is about to be consumed by its enemies, its king and princes destroyed, and its people scattered (49<sup>37-39</sup>). This would fit in with the conquest of Anzan by Teispes the Persian, the ancestor of Cyrus (which see). When Elam and Media are called upon to besiege Babylon in Is 21<sup>2</sup>, Cyrus, king of Anzan, must be meant, as Anzan was synonymous with Elam among the Babylonians. It would appear from Ac 2<sup>9</sup> that the old language of Elam was still spoken there in the first century of our era.

LITERATURE.—Bullinger, Susa (1898); Dienlaff, L'Acropole de Susse (1905); Sayce, 'The Inscriptions of Mal-Amir,' in the Transactions of the Oriental Congress (1885); Loitus, 'Die Elamische Sprache' (1885).
A. H. SAYCE.

ELASA (Ἐλάσα), 1 Mac 9<sup>5</sup>.—The site may be at the ruin U'asa, near Bethhoron (SWP iii. sh. 17).

ELASAH (עֵלָאֵשׁ 'God hath made').—1. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>22</sup>). 2. The son of Shaphan, who along with Gemariah, the son of Hilkiyah, carried a message from king Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer 29<sup>3</sup>). For no apparent reason, RV retains the AV spelling Elasah in both the above passages, while both AV and RV give for the same Heb. the form Elasah (wh. see) elsewhere.
J. A. SELBIE.

ELATH or ELOTH (עֵלָת, עֵלֹת).—A seaport in the extreme S. of Edom, at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. It is mentioned in Dt 2<sup>8</sup> in connexion with the journey of one of the 'stations' of the Israelites. Elath, Elot, and Elim may possibly be various names of one and the same place, the 'palm-grove' which was the second halting-place after the passage of the Red Sea. (See Sayce, HCM p. 263). E. is probably identical with El-paran of Gn 14<sup>6</sup> and Elah of Gn 36<sup>4</sup>. It has also been suggested that it is referred to in 1 Ch 4<sup>35</sup>, where for 'Iru, Elah' (עֵרָא, עֵלָה) we might read 'Iru and Elah' (עֵרָא וְעֵלָה). See further Dillmann on Gn 36<sup>4</sup>. The history of E. was a chequered one. Coming into the possession of Israel when Edom was subdued by David (2 S 8<sup>14</sup>), it was an important naval station during the reign of Solomon (1 K 9<sup>26</sup>). When the disruption of the kingdom took place, Edom continued to be a vassal of the house of David, until it recovered its independence in the time of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat (2 K 8<sup>20</sup>). The port of E. passed once more into the possession of Judah, when Amaziah and Uzziah had inflicted a succession of defeats upon Edom (2 K 14<sup>22</sup>). It was wrested permanently from Judah during the operations undertaken against Ahaz by Pekah and Rezin (2 K 16<sup>6</sup>), and either the Syrians (Kethibh) or the Edomites (Kere) became its possessors. With this event (c. B.C. 734) ends its history as far as OT is concerned. E. is the modern Akabah.
J. A. SELBIE.

EL-BERITH (Jg 9<sup>46</sup>).—See BAAL-BERITH, and

cf. Moore, Judges, 242, 265; W. R. Smith, RS 93 n.; Baudissin in PRE<sup>3</sup> ii. p. 334.

EL-BETHEL (עֵל־בֵּית־אֵל).—The name which Jacob is said to have given to the scene of his vision on his way back from Paddan-aram, Gn 35<sup>7</sup> (P?). The LXX (Βαθλὰν), Vulg. (Domus Dei), Pesh. and Arab. VSS omit 'El,' which Ball (in Haupt's OT) suggests may have been corrupted from הַיָּד 'that,' which would naturally be attached to בֵּית־אֵל (so in Pesh. and Vulg.). Ball justly adds that God of Bethel is an extraordinary name for a place. See, however, the note (*) on p. 278<sup>a</sup> of the present volume.
J. A. SELBIE.

ELDAAH (עֵלְדָּאָה, perhaps 'God hath called').—A son of Midian (Gn 25<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>38</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ELDAD (עֵלְדָּד).—One of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the government of the people. On a memorable occasion in the wilderness journey, he and another named Medad were not present with Moses and the rest of the elders at the door of the tabernacle to hear God's message and receive His spirit. But the spirit of the Lord came upon them where they were, and they prophesied in the camp. Joshua regarded this as an irregularity, and reported to Moses to forbid them. But he received the reply, 'Art thou jealous for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, that the Lord would put His spirit upon them!' (Nu 11<sup>26-29</sup>).
R. M. BOYD.

ELDAD AND MODAD, BOOK OF.—The fact that the prophecies of these men are unrecorded in Nu 11<sup>26-29</sup> furnished an inviting theme for imagination to some unknown seer and author. His book is quoted in Hermas, Vs. ii. 3: 'Thou shalt say to Maximus. Behold the tribulation cometh . . . "The Lord is near to them that turn to Him," as it is written in the (book) of Eldad and Modad.' The Pal. Targums (Jerus. i. and Jerus. ii.) both supply us with the subject of E. and M.'s prophecy, filling in, as is their wont, the supposed hiatus in the Heb. Bible. They agree with Hermas that it had reference to pre-Messianic tribulation, which is described under the coming of Magog against Israel at the end of days. Jerus. ii. says that Gog and Magog shall both fall by the hand of King Messiah. Jerus. i. omits this; but adds, 'The Lord (see Levy, s.v. קִיּוּ) is near to them that are in the hour of tribulation.' The close resemblance thus pointed out between Hermas and the two Targums seems certainly to indicate that all three authors were acquainted with the same Bk of E. and M.; and renders the hesitancy of Schürer and Zöckler no longer necessary. In 1 Clem. xxiii. 3. 4 and 2 Clem. xi. 2. 3 is a long quotation, called in the one case γραφὴ, in the other προφητικὸς λόγος, but not in OT, which Lightfoot and Holtzmann conjecture to have been taken from our book. In both cases, as well as in Hermas, the quotation is designed to refute one who is sceptical about the near-coming tribulations 'at the end of the days.' Our book is found in the Stichometry of Nicephorus (400 στίχοι), and in the Synopsis Athanasii (see ABRAHAM, BOOK OF).

LITERATURE.—Fabricius, Codex pseudep. i. 7. i. 801-804; Schürer, HJP ii. iii. 29; Zöckler, Avoc. des A.T. 439; Weber, Lehren des Talm. 1886, p. 370 (who, however, translates the Targ. Jerus. i. in the line cited); Holtzmann, Einleitung, 553.
J. T. MARSHALL.

ELDER (IN OT).—In ancient days the institution of Elders was not peculiar to the Jewish people, and the word elder did not suggest those purely ecclesiastical and religious functions with which it is now associated. The origin of the office is easily traced. Under the primitive conditions of society that prevail in the early history of all nations age fought at Bethzacharias against Antiochus v. Eupator, B.C. 163 (1 Mac 6<sup>44-46</sup>). His name occurs also in 2 Mac 8<sup>24</sup>. 8. 'One of the principal scribes' martyred during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 168 (2 Mac 15<sup>37</sup>). 9. The father of that Jason who was sent on an embassy to Rome by Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 161 (1 Mac 8<sup>17</sup>). 10. An 'E' is mentioned in the genealogy of our Lord given by St. Matthew (1<sup>15</sup>).

W. C. ALLEN.

ELECTION [ἐκλογή. The subst. is rare, not found in LXX (yet Aq. Is 22<sup>7</sup>, Symm. Th. Is 37<sup>24</sup>, cf. Ps.-Sol 9<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>). In NT, Ac 9<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>5,7,28</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>. Cf. ἐκλέγομαι (in LXX generally for ἵκναι) = to 'choose,' implying (see Cremer's Lex.) (1) a special relation between the chooser and the object of his choice, and (2) the selection of one object out of many: ἐκλεκτός (in LXX for ἄνθρωπος or ἄνθρωποι, also fairly often for var. forms of ἄνθρωπος, besides being used occasionally, sometimes by a misreading of the Heb. text, for 17 other Heb. roots = 'chosen' or 'choice' (adj.)). The word is common in Dt and II Is. It is not in Hos, Am (but idea in 3<sup>4</sup>), or Is (yet cf. LXX Is 28<sup>16</sup>, which is the source of 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>). It is used of God's choice of Israel out of all the peoples of the world to be His own people (Deut 7<sup>6-8</sup>, etc., and of Jerus. to be the covenant city of God, Dt 12<sup>5</sup> etc. It is used also of God's choice of individuals to the chief offices in the nation, e.g. His choice of Aaron and his family for the service of the sanctuary His choice of the king, and especially of David. It is once used of Abraham; and in Is 40-66 it passes naturally from its use in connexion with Israel to the 'Servant of the Lord.'

It is rare in the Apocrypha; yet cf. Wis 3<sup>9</sup>, Sir 46<sup>1</sup> etc. It is constant in Enoch. Cf. Ps.-Sol 9<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>.

In NT it is used once of God's choice of OT Israel (Ac 13<sup>17</sup>), but for the most part it passes over with other theocratic titles to the 'Israel of God,' and describes either the Church as a whole, or individual members of it, sometimes merely in virtue of their membership, sometimes as chosen to some special office or work, e.g. the Twelve, St. Peter, St. Paul. It is twice used as part of the title of our Lord (Lk 9<sup>38</sup> [var. lect.] 23<sup>35</sup>, Jn 1<sup>34</sup>). The word appears constantly in the Apostolic Fathers, especially in 1 Clement and Hermas.

The thought of 'election' has formed so prominent a feature in all the most important attempts that have been made in Western Christendom for the last 1500 years to provide a complete and formulated scheme of Christian doctrine, that it is peculiarly hard for us to approach the consideration of the original meaning of the term in Holy Scripture without distracting associations. And yet the effort is worth making. The only hope of any further progress in the elucidation of the problem, the only prospect of its discussion from the deadlock at which it has arrived, lies in a careful reconsideration of the scriptural premisses on which the whole argument has been based.

The questions that require examination fall naturally into three divisions. i. The questions touching the author of election—who chooses the elect? What can we know of His character? What are the grounds of His choice so far as He has vouchsafed to reveal them? ii. The questions touching the persons of the elect—who are they? and for what end are they chosen? iii. The question belonging to the effect of election—what influence does the fact that they have been chosen by God exert over the elect?

i. On the first part of this question there is no difference of opinion. Every theory of election is based on the fact, constantly affirmed in Holy Scripture, that election is the direct work of God. It is His act as directly as creation is.

In fact, God's purpose in creation, His eternal purpose (ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν αἰώνων, Eph 3<sup>11</sup>), is revealed in Holy Scripture as working to its end by the method of election. It is in St. Paul's language κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις, Ro 9<sup>11</sup>. The two thoughts are in reality inseparable. We can understand, therefore, how it is that St. Paul should say that God chose His elect before the foundation of the world in His Son (Eph 1<sup>4</sup>). He is only expressing the truth that underlies our Lord's words when He says, 'To sit on my right hand and on my left hand is not mine to give, but it is for them for whom it hath been prepared of my Father' (Mt 20<sup>23</sup>). Our first conclusion then, the one fixed point in the whole discussion, is this: God is the author of election. He Himself chooses His own elect.

When we go on to ask on what grounds His election is based, by what considerations, in accordance with what law His choice is determined, we find ourselves at once on debatable ground. To some minds, indeed, the question put in this form seems foolish, not to say irreverent. It involves in their judgment a pitiable blindness in regard to the inexorable limits of human knowledge. In the spirit, sometimes in the very words of Zophar the Naamathite (Job 11<sup>7</sup>), they ask, 'Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection?' 'The main facts of the divine government may, indeed, be known, but the reasons which underlie them, the motives which prompt them, are unfathomable; only an unchastened curiosity can seek to intrude into such secrets.' To some minds, again, the question involves an assumption inconsistent with one of their primary philosophical or theological postulates. It seems to them inconsistent with the reality of the divine freedom, which in this connexion is only another name for the divine omnipotence, to suppose that God should acknowledge any law as governing His choice.

If either of these objections is well grounded, further discussion of the question is, of course, precluded. We must therefore begin by defining the position we are prepared to take up with regard to them. Let us consider the second objection first. No doubt, if in its ultimate analysis our conception of God resolves itself into a conception of abstract omnipotence or of an absolutely sovereign will, and if omnipotence means the power to do anything, and if no will can be absolutely sovereign which is not as free to do wrong as to do right, it is meaningless if not profane to inquire into the laws which regulate the choice of God. An abstract omnipotence must be inscrutable. We cannot even begin to understand the action of a will in this sense 'absolute.' But if goodness, and not power, lies at the heart of our conception of God, then we shall not be ashamed to confess that for us, in Westcott's magnificent phrase, 'Truth and justice define omnipotence.' And we shall not shrink from pressing to the full the human analogy which is present, though latent, every time we use the word 'will' in relation to God. We shall contend that the action of the divine will, like the action of the human will, of which it is the archetype, must be at once determined by, and reveal, the character which lies behind it. We shall maintain the paradox, if paradox it be, that the will of God is free, only because, by the blessed necessity of His being, He cannot will anything but that which is perfectly holy and righteous and good. And we shall claim every revelation that He has given us of His character as a revelation of the principles which regulate His choice, the laws of His election.

And if we are met at this point by the warning, that as men our powers of apprehending and expressing truth are limited, and that there must be infinite depths of mystery in the divine nature which we are powerless to fathom, we shall hope to learn humility and patience from the caution. But we shall not desist from pushing our inquiries to the utmost limit of the power that is given to us. We believe that, in spite of all our limitations, we yet were created to know God. And it is a matter of life and death for us that we should be able to bring this revealed method of His working into harmony with the rest of the revelation. He has given us of His character. Nor can we doubt that He will justify us as He justified Job for refusing to be satisfied with any explanation of the facts of the divine government which cannot be reconciled with the sense of justice which He has Himself implanted in us. He has revealed election to us as the method of His working. There can be no presumption in asking whether in making this revelation He has given us any help to enable us to understand His purpose and enter into His plan.

When in this spirit we enter into the examination of the scriptural revelation, the result may well, at first sight, seem disappointing. Great pains are taken to negative what we are naturally inclined to regard as the simplest and most obvious solution. The ground of a man's choice lies not so much in himself as in the object that he chooses. It is, of course, true that his own character determines what qualities in an object will, and what qualities will not, prove attractive to him. But, for all that, it is the real or revealed loveliness of the object that rules his choice. It would be natural, therefore, to assume that the choice of God is in like manner determined by the loveliness of its object. But it is just at this point that the analogy of the human will is necessarily imperfect. It is not, indeed, that we are required to believe that God can love that which is, in itself, neither lovely nor capable of developing loveliness; but that since the root of all loveliness is in God, and since there can be no goodness apart from Him, we cannot argue as if it were possible for man to possess or develop any goodness or loveliness independent of, and so constituting a claim on, the choice of God. We ought not, therefore, to be surprised when we find Israel expressly warned in Holy Scripture to reject the flattering assumption that they had been chosen on the ground of their own inherent attractiveness. They were not as a nation either more numerous or more amenable to the divine discipline than other nations (Dt 7<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>6</sup>). We can understand why St. Paul declares that the election of Christians does not depend on the will or the energy of men (Ro 9<sup>16</sup>). It is not of works but of grace (Ro 11<sup>6</sup>, cf. Jn 1<sup>13</sup>).

It must therefore be a mistake to try to discover the ultimate ground of God's choice in any consideration drawn from outside Himself, even though it be in His foreknowledge of the faith and obedience of His chosen; for the goodness in which He takes delight is, after all, from first to last His own creation. The testimony of Scripture is not, however, really limited to this negative result. The choice which is not determined from without is all the more certainly determined from within. And the ground of the choice which we are forbidden to look for in ourselves or in human nature is expressly declared to lie in the love (Dt 7<sup>8</sup>) and the faithfulness (Dt 9<sup>5</sup>, Ro 11<sup>28</sup>) and the mercy of our God (Ro 9<sup>15</sup>).

ii. We pass on now to consider the second group of questions connected with our subject. Who are the elect? and for what end are they chosen? In OT the term 'elect' is most often applied to the nation of Israel, regarded as a whole. They are at all periods of their history taught to regard themselves as the 'chosen people.' At the same time special divisions of the nation, e.g. the tribe of Levi and the house of Aaron, are chosen to perform certain functions on behalf of the whole body; and certain prominent individuals, e.g. Abraham and David, are regarded as the objects of a special election. In Is 40-66 the term is applied to the nation generally and to the 'servant of J<sup>h</sup>' in all the different connotations of that many-sided title,—so little is the word conscious of any fundamental distinction between the idea of a national and an individual election. In NT the universal Church takes the place of Israel as the 'chosen race,' and not only her head and her most prominent ministers, but also all her individual members, sometimes by name, sometimes by an inclusive form of address, which it is impossible to narrow down, are described as 'elect,' just as they are described in similar connexions as 'called' and 'holy' and 'faithful' and 'beloved.'* It does not seem possible to determine on NT evidence whether the individuals are regarded as owing their membership in the Church to their election, or as becoming elect by virtue of their membership. Three points are clear—(1) that they were chosen before the foundation of the world; (2) that they were chosen 'in Christ'; (3) that membership in the Church is treated as an objective assurance to each individual of his personal interest in this eternal election.

Such in outline are the different classes described as 'elect' in Holy Scripture. We must consider next what can be learned regarding the purpose for which they were chosen. We must not, of course, assume that the purpose is the same, or even in all points analogous in the different cases. Still it is not unnatural to suppose that we shall gain some help towards understanding the application of the method in any one case by a careful study of its application to the rest.

The selection of the family of Aaron and the tribe of Levi need not detain us. It is a simple case of the choice of certain individuals to fill an office of trust, a position at once of privilege and of responsibility on behalf of their fellow-countrymen.

The choice of Israel presents a more complicated problem. The choice in the first instance involved a call to occupy a special position in relation to J<sup>h</sup>—to be, and to be acknowledged before the world as, His peculiar people. 'Ye are my witnesses,' saith the Lord, 'my servant whom I have chosen; that ye may know and believe me, and understand that I am he' (Is 43<sup>10</sup>). And this position of Israel involved a special responsibility towards the rest of mankind. On the one side, they were the trustees of God's glory in the world, 'his witnesses,' 'the people which he formed for himself, to show forth his praise.' On the other, they were the heirs of the promise made at the call of the Father of the elect, that 'in him and in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed' (cf. Gn 18<sup>18</sup>). And this work for others is the characteristic function of the ideal 'servant of the Lord,' who embodies in himself all that is most characteristic of the chosen Israel.

In NT connotation the little is told us of the purpose of election. 'The poor in this world,' St. James writes, 'God chose (to be) rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him.' 'God chose you,' writes St. Paul to the Thessalonians, 'from the beginning (or "as a firstfruit," ἀπαρχήν for ἀπ' ἀρχῆς) unto salvation.' 'He chose us,' he writes again (Eph 1<sup>4</sup>) 'in him (i.e. in Christ) that we should be holy and without

* There is, indeed, one passage in the Gospels, which will call for notice later on, in which a distinction is drawn between the many 'called' and the few 'chosen.' But the existence of this one text does not invalidate the statement in the text, which merely asserts that there are other passages in which the narrow significance for 'elect' is excluded.

blemish before him in love.' The Christian, therefore, stands as the Israelite stood before him in a special relation of intimacy with God, receiving from Him the spiritual gifts and graces together with the assurance of eternal salvation, of which that intimacy is at once the foretaste and the pledge.

The indications of a wider purpose in the election of the Christian are not, indeed, as definite as in the case of OT Israel. It would, however, be a mistake to regard them as altogether wanting. Our Lord (Jn 15) Himself told His apostles that He had chosen them that they might bear much fruit. The chosen race exists, as St. Peter reminds us (1 P 2), of the words of Is 43, 'to show forth the excellencies of him who called them out of darkness into his glorious light.' And St. Paul, in the same sentence (Eph 1-14) in which he speaks of our election in Christ 'to the praise of the glory of his grace,' reveals as the final goal of the eternal purpose, 'the summing up of all things in Christ, the things in heaven and the things upon the earth'; a goal towards the attainment of which our election cannot be regarded as more than a preparatory stage.

We conclude, therefore, that the predominant use of the term in Holy Scripture, election is an attribute of the visible Church, and finds its true goal, not simply in the salvation of certain elect individuals, but in the evangelization of the race. There is indeed good scriptural analogy for a concurrent use of the term in a narrower sense, to describe as it were an election within the elect. For St. Paul uses it (Ro 11) to describe the inner circle in Israel who accepted the gospel when it came to them—'the remnant' to which alone an immediate salvation had been promised by Isaiah (Ro 9<sup>7</sup>, Is 10<sup>23</sup>). And our Lord again and again warns us in His parables that the members of His Church will be subjected to a searching judgment—as the result of which the unworthy will be cast into the outer darkness. It is in this connexion that He uses the warning words about the many called and the few chosen to which allusion has already been made. But there seems no authority for restricting the use of the term, as some theological systems do to this narrower sense—refusing to recognize as elect in any real sense, either those Israelites who in St. Paul's day were disobedient to the gospel, or those members of the visible Church who fail to stand in the judgment. Still less justification is there for assuming that the object of the election of this restricted circle has no end beyond the personal salvation of the individuals who compose it.

iii. We pass on now to the last stage in our inquiry, the consideration of the effect of election. We ask what influence does the fact that they have been chosen by God exert over the elect? May we assume that the divine purpose working through election must of necessity attain its goal? Can we, granting this assumption, find a place in our system for any self-determining power in the human will?

The theological systems, which adopt the restricted sense of the term election, and limit the scope of its operation to its effect on this limited circle, find no difficulty in supplying a logically coherent set of answers to these questions. It is inconsistent with any real faith in the divine Omnipotence to suppose that any deliberate purpose of God can finally fail of its accomplishment. The elect, therefore, being chosen for salvation, cannot fail to attain salvation. No power from without or from within can prevent this result. The fact that they have been chosen for this end carries with it the divine determination to provide all the means required to ensure its attainment. The elect, therefore, receive first a gift of 'irresistible grace' to raise them out of their naturally depraved state, and then a gift of 'final perseverance,' as the result of which they are assured, whatever their intervening lapses may have been, of being found at the moment of death in a state of grace.

These systems do not seem to find room, at least in the all-important moment of conversion, for any true act of self-determination on the part of the human will. A doctrine of reprobation forms an inevitable, however unwelcome, complement to the doctrine of election so defined.

It is impossible not to regard with the deepest respect systems which embody the conclusions of the most strenuous thinkers on this subject, from St. Augustine to Calvin and Jonathan Edwards. It is a remarkable fact that these conclusions have never been able to secure general acceptance. Unassailable as they may be in logic, it is felt that somehow they fail to fit the facts of life. There are elements in human experience and elements in the divine revelation for which they fail to account. And the general result is one from which the Christian consciousness seems instinctively to shrink in horror. It can only be accepted, if it is accepted at all, as a dark enigma, which our present faculties have no power to solve.

What, then, we seem forced to ask, are the foundations on which these conclusions rest? Can it be that the results of the argument are vitiated by any unsuspected flaw in the premisses?

The premisses are these—(1) God is omnipotent. (2) Because God is omnipotent, the final goal of creation must correspond at all points to His original purpose. (3) The final goal of creation, as far as it affects the human race, involves the division of mankind at the day of judgment into two sharply defined classes, the saved and the lost. (4) The position of any individual man in one or other of these two classes must be traced back in the last resort to the original purpose of God with regard to him.

It seems impossible to take exception to either of the first two of these premisses. It is part of the idea of God, that He must be able to effect what He purposes. To speak in human language, there may be enormous difficulties to overcome in the tasks to which He sets Himself. We have therefore no right to assume that at any moment before the end all things are as He would have them to be. But the end must be a perfect embodiment of His original design.

Again, if the third of these premisses is sound, the fourth seems to follow from it by an inevitable deduction. Everything, therefore, depends on the validity of the third premiss. Is it, or is it not, a true and complete statement of the end towards which 'the whole creation moves'? Now, there can be no doubt that it expresses accurately one side of the scriptural teaching on the subject. It is, however, very far from expressing the whole. On this point, as is well known,* the evidence of Holy Scripture seems divided against itself. It speaks of eternal punishment (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>). It speaks also of the divine will that all men should be saved (1 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>). It speaks of those who shall be cast into the outer darkness on their Lord's return (Mt 24<sup>51</sup> etc.). It speaks also of an end, when God shall be all in all (1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>). It seems clear that to our apprehension these two sets of statements must be mutually exclusive, unless we may regard the judgment as being not the end, but only a means towards the end. If we reject this solution of the difficulty, we must remain content with an unreconciled antinomy. But, in any case, it is important to remember which side of the antinomy was dominant in St. Paul's mind in the chapters (Ro 9-11) which contain his most explicit teaching on the subject of election.

* Westcott, Historic Faith, p. 50 ff.

These chapters are devoted to a consideration of the problems raised by the failure of Israel to accept the offer of salvation made to them in the gospel. The first line of solution is suggested by the thought, to which attention has already been called, of an election within the chosen people (Ro 9<sup>11</sup>). Such an election has parallels in the history of the patriarchal family (9<sup>8-13</sup>). It is in accordance with express utterances of the Lord (9<sup>27</sup>). It is therefore no evidence of a failure of the divine plan that Israel, as a whole, should for a time be shut out from salvation, and only the election should attain it. St. Paul, however, expressly and emphatically refuses to accept this as a complete solution (11<sup>17</sup>). It is very far from the perfect triumph, the vision of which has been opened before him. He finds in the salvation of the part a sure pledge of the ultimate deliverance of the whole. 'If the first-fruit be holy, the lump is holy too' (11<sup>16</sup>). However much the nation as a whole had incurred the divine wrath by their opposition to the gospel, they were yet dear to God for their fathers' sake (11<sup>28</sup>). The power of their original election was by no means exhausted. The gifts and the calling of God are without repentance (11<sup>29</sup>). In the end all Israel shall be saved (11<sup>26</sup>). And lest we should think that in this respect Israel stands on a different footing from the rest of the world, he adds—'God hath shut up all men unto disobedience, that he may have mercy upon all' (11<sup>32</sup>).

In the face of these utterances no scheme of election which assumes the doctrine of everlasting punishment as one of its fundamental postulates, can claim to rest on the authority of St. Paul.

Leaving, then, on one side the attempt to consider the effect of election in its relation to the elect in the narrower sense of the term, what are we to say of its influence in the case of the wider circle? St. Paul's argument in relation to Israel (11<sup>28-32</sup>) is sufficient to show that in his view, even in the wider sense, the fact of God's election carries with it an unalterable declaration of the divine purpose for good towards those to whom His call came. He believed also that the will of each man was in its natural state so utterly enslaved to evil that nothing but the divine power could set it free (Ro 7<sup>14-25</sup>). At the same time, the action of the divine will on the human was not to overwhelm it, but to restore its power of action. He exhorts men to work out their own salvation, just because it is God who is working in them both to will and to do of His good pleasure (Ph 2<sup>13</sup>). The love of Christ is indeed a constraining motive (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). Without faith in that love as its abiding source and spring the Christian life is impossible (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>19</sup>).* And surrender to that love is the last act for which a man could dream of claiming any credit to himself. It is the gift of God (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). Yet the refusal to surrender is not due to defect of grace. It is possible to receive the grace of God in vain (2 Co 6<sup>1</sup>).

Again, the presence of the divine grace does not supersede the necessity for constant watchfulness (cf. Mk 13<sup>37</sup> etc.). Even the 'chosen vessel' (Ac 9<sup>15</sup>) contemplates the possibility of becoming himself a castaway (1 Co 9<sup>17</sup>). Branches have been cut out of the good olive tree before now—and what has been done once may be done again (Ro 11<sup>25</sup>). While, however, his language does not leave us room to believe that he regarded himself, at least at this part of his career, as possessing any inalienable gift of 'final perseverance,' or as absolved from the necessity for strenuous effort on his own part 'to make his own calling and election sure' (2 P 1<sup>10</sup>), it is clear that he had an unflinching faith in the perseverance of God. He knows whom he has trusted (2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>), and is convinced that He is able to keep what has been entrusted to Him. He can trust God to bring to perfection any good work in a man when He has once set His hand to it (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>). Even the human potter, whom the prophet watched at his work (Jer 18<sup>4</sup>), when the vessel that he made of clay was marred in his hand, made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it.

... this is the truth about the ... we need no longer shrink from the contemplation of it as if it were 'a portion of eternity too great for the eye of man.' The favoured few are not chosen, while the rest of their race are left to their doom in hopeless misery. The existence of the Church, however much it may, nay must, witness to a coming judgment, has in it a promise of hope, not a message of despair for the world. As Israel of old was chosen to keep alive in the hearts of men the hope of a coming Saviour of the world, so the Church is chosen to bear abroad into all the world the gospel of a universal redemption, forbidden to leave out one single soul from the vast circle of her intercessions and her giving of thanks, because she is called to live in the light of a revelation which bids her believe and act in the belief that God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>). We can enter with full hearts into the spirit of the marvellous doxology with which St. Paul concludes his study of the subject, and cry with him in exultant adoration, 'Oh, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out. . . . For of him and through him and to him are all things; to whom be glory for ever.'

LITERATURE.—The history of the various controversies connected with election is given in outline in various treatises on the subject, e.g. by G. T. Fisher, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part I, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part II, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part III, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part IV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part V, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part VI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part VII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part VIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part IX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part X, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XL, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part XLIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part L, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXX, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXXI, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIII, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXIV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXV, The History of the Doctrine of Election, 1821, 1833; Part LXXXXXXXVI, drink were 'features of the world's life,' which, for its times and seasons, was under the governance of the heavenly στοιχεῖα. And, further, κόσμος, as it is used in biblical Greek, seems to refer rather than towards οὐρανός, and must, at any rate, include the world inhabited by men. Hence, we must seek a consistent interpretation for the Pauline passages in a meaning of στοιχεῖα clearly sanctioned by usage at a later date, and also in harmony with ideas prevalent in St. Paul's day. It may be called an extension of the meaning we have just been considering, for it maintained that not only the heavenly bodies, but all things, in the heavens and in the earth alike, had their angels, and were under the governance of spirits. This view reveals itself not only in the later Jewish literature, but also in OT and NT.

In the former region we find it in the Book of Jubilees, a Jewish composition belonging to the century immediately preceding the Christian era (see Charles, Eth. Version of the Heb. Book of Jubilees, Oxford, 1895), the following passage (c. 2): 'On the first day created he the heavens which are above and the earth and the waters and all the spirits that serve before him, and the angels of the face (or presence), and the angels that cry "holy," and the angels of the spirit of fire, and the angels of the spirit of wind, and the angels of the spirit of the clouds of darkness and of hail and of hoarfrost, and the angels of the depths and of thunder and of winter and the angels of the spirits of cold and of spring, of autumn and of summer, and of all the spirits of his works in the heavens and on the earth and in all depths, and of darkness and of light, and of dawn and of evening, which he has prepared according to the discernment of his wisdom.' The Book of Jubilees also mentions (82<sup>1-2</sup>) angels of the stars, with names of leaders, 60<sup>1-2</sup> (angels appointed over the various phenomena of nature); Ascensio Isaie (2nd cent. A.D. according to Harnack) 4<sup>18</sup> (angel of the sun, etc.); 2<sup>1-2</sup> (A.D. acc. to Schurer) 82<sup>1</sup> (army of angels . . . in wind and fire), and Sibyll. Orac. (2nd cent.) 733-36 (angels of fire, rivers, cities, winds).

The same view is found in the region of OT and NT. In Ps 104<sup>1</sup> (according to the LXX, as quoted also in He 1<sup>7</sup>) angels take the shape of winds and fire; in Rev 7<sup>2</sup> there are the four angels of the four winds, in 14<sup>18</sup> there is an angel of the fire, in 16<sup>8</sup> an angel of the waters (cf. the angel of the pool of Bethesda in the spurious passage Jn 5<sup>4</sup>). In Dn 10<sup>13, 20</sup> we have angels as princes of Persia and Greece, and in 12<sup>1</sup> Michael as the great prince 'standing' for Israel, just as he stands for the Church as a whole (Rev 12<sup>7</sup>), and as each of the seven Churches has its angel (Rev 2, 3), and perhaps also each individual human being (Mt 18<sup>10</sup>). Everything that happens is wrought by angels: 'there are no secondary causes.' Angel powers are the invisible background of human life and of nature. Such angels are sometimes called 'gods,' as in Ps 82<sup>1-6</sup>, being 'sons of the Most High' (the Peshitta actually gives angels in both clauses of the first verse), and God Himself is the 'God of gods' and 'Lord of lords' Dt 10<sup>17</sup>, Ps 136<sup>2-3</sup>; cf. Apoc. of Zephaniah. 'In the fifth heaven . . . angels called lords,' quoted by Clem. Alex. Strom. v. xi. 77. Hence St. Paul's expression 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> 'are called gods, whether in heaven or on earth, just as there are gods many and lords many,' yet (Gal 4<sup>8</sup>) 'by nature not gods' like the 'one God' and the 'one Lord' (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). Thus there was common ground for heathen nature-worship and for Jewish worship of the law had been 'administered by' 3<sup>19</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup>, Ac 7<sup>58, 59</sup> (cf. Jos. Ant. xv. v.

3; II. i. 3), and was thus on a level lower than the new dispensation; He 2<sup>5</sup> 'For not to angels did he subject the world to come, whereof we speak.' Angels were the media of God's government; and, having 'a certain independence' (1 Co 11<sup>10</sup>) of their function, could stand (to use the phrase) in "relative opposition to God," so that, in some cases, their service was an imperfect representation of God, in other cases an actual misrepresentation of Him, and consequently a veiling rather than an unveiling of Him. In this light we can more easily understand how St. Paul can attribute to angels the imperfect and transitory dispensation of the law; and the perplexing passage Col 2<sup>15</sup>, where Christ is said to have "stripped off from himself the principalities and the powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in [his cross],"—or, as it may be rendered, "worded," "exhibited them in their real nature, leading them in his triumphal train,"—may possibly find its elucidation in the idea that these ἀρχαὶ and ἐξουσίαι (cf. ἐξουσίαι ἐν τῶν ὕδατων Rev 11<sup>6</sup>) had hidden His personal activity, and even attracted worship to themselves.* This relative opposition may become absolute, the relative independence may become absolute insubordination, as in the case of the Prince of Persia (Dn 10<sup>13</sup>), and Satan and his angels (2 P 2<sup>4</sup>, Jude 6), yet never in the dualistic sense. Accordingly, Christ can speak of 'the prince of this world' (Jn 12<sup>31</sup>), and St. Paul of the 'god of this age' (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>): both can attribute evils and hindrances to Satan (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>, Mk 8<sup>33</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>18</sup>), and St. Paul can see the δαμόνια in the dark . . . of idolatry (1 Co 10<sup>20</sup>). Over all these powers ' . . . Co 15<sup>24</sup>), either by crushing . . . destroying the insubordinate (Rev 19<sup>20</sup>), or by . . . His real headship, which by the . . . men' has been concealed (Ph 2<sup>10</sup>, Eph 1<sup>20</sup>, Col 2<sup>15, 16</sup>), and delivering the 'heirs' from the tutelage of the ἐπίτροποι, the 'governors,' the στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, under whom they had been enslaved (Gal 4<sup>1-4</sup>) (cf. Everling, Angelologie, 74 n., for Michael as called ἐπίτροπος of Israel in later Jewish literature, the word being transliterated into Hebrew).

The suggestion by St. Paul in his τοῖς φύσει μὴ ὁδοῦ θεοῖς (Gal 4<sup>8</sup>), that by his στοιχεῖα he means angelic powers, is not illustrated by any actual use of the word in this sense in the extant literature of the 1st century . . . (p. 70) quotes the following . . . Testament of Solomon (date uncertain, probably not very early; Harnack, Gesch. Alt. Christ. Lit. i. 2, 858), where the spirits that appear to Solomon say, 'We are the so-called στοιχεῖα, the world rulers of this world.'

For the 'Stoicheolatry' of the modern Greeks and their belief that there is a στοιχεῖον in every stone to be propitiated, see Kean in Expos. Times, viii. (1897) 514.

LITERATURE.—Klumper, Brief an die Kol. 1882; Spitta, Zweite Brief des Paulus an die Kol. 1897; . . . Angelologie, 1888; . . . 188-192; and head, as above quoted. J. MASSIE.

ELEPH (אֵלֶפֶת), Jos 18<sup>28</sup> only.—A town of Benjamin, probably the present village Lifta W. of Jerus., which has often been wrongly identified with Nephtoah. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

C. R. CONDER.

ELEPHANT (Ἐλέφας, elephas).—This animal is mentioned in 1 and 2 Mac as employed in war. It is not found in AV of OT, except in the marg. for behemoth (Job 40<sup>15</sup>), and elephants' teeth for ivory (1 K 10<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>21</sup>). The word is שֵׁנִי shen-

* . . . by the present writer in the Thinker, May . . . of the Greek gods.'

habbim. The word shên is the ordinary word for ivory in OT, and habbim seems to be the same as the modern vernacular word for elephant in the languages of Malabar and Ceylon. See IVORY.

G. E. POST.

ELEUTHERUS (Ἐλευθερος), 1 Mac 11<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>30</sup>.—A river which flows into Syria and Phœnicia (Strabo, xvi.), and is the mod. Nahr el-Kebir or 'Great River,' which divides the Lebanon in two north of Tripoli.

C. R. CONDER.

ELHANAN (אֶלְחָנָן).—1. In 2 S 21<sup>19</sup> we read: 'and Elhanan the son of Jaide slew the Bethlehemite slew Goliath the Philistine, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam'; in the passage, 1 Ch 20<sup>5</sup>, by a slight change in the text this becomes 'and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, etc.' The ductus litterarum in each case is so similar that most moderns agree that the two passages represent but one original text. It is evident that the superfluous 'oregim' in 2 S has merely crept into the text from the following line ('oregim' = weavers); for the rest, it can hardly be disputed that 'Lahmi the brother of' (אֶלְחָנָן, 1 Ch) is a corruption or harmonistic correction of 'the Bethlehemite' (אֶלְחָנָן, 2 S), whilst 'Jaare' (יָרֵי, 2 S) is merely a transposition of the letters of 'Jair' (יָרֵי, 1 Ch). It is impossible that any one who had a similar text to that of 1 Ch before him, and who knew the story of 1 S 17, should have altered it into direct contradiction with the earlier narrative, whilst the correction of 2 S by the Chronicler is clearly due to harmonistic motives. It is admitted by most modern critics that the story of David and Goliath in 1 S 17<sup>1-18</sup> embodies a later tradition as to the introduction of David to Saul (as opposed to the earlier account, 16<sup>14-23</sup>), in which the exploit of the warrior Elhanan was transferred to his royal master. The reading of 1 Ch, then, is merely an attempt to harmonize the two independent narratives. 2. Son of Dodo the Bethlehemite, one of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23<sup>24</sup> = 1 Ch 11<sup>26</sup>). See DODO (2).

J. F. STENNING.

ELI (אֵלִי) belonged to the house of Ithamar, the fourth son of Aaron, and was apparently the first high priest of that line; cf. 1 Ch 24<sup>3</sup>, where Abiathar the son of Abiathar (2 S 8<sup>17</sup>), who escaped from the massacre at Nob (1 S 22<sup>20</sup>), is expressly stated to be one 'of the sons of Ithamar.' It is owing to this fact that neither E. nor his immediate successors in the high priestly office, up to Abiathar, are mentioned in the list of the high priests from Aaron and Eleazar down to the destruction of the temple (1 Ch 6<sup>3-15</sup>). The last high priest mentioned before E., Phinehas, belonged to the house of Eleazar (Jg 20<sup>28</sup>); but no account is given of how or when this change in the priestly succession took place, though it would seem to have had the divine sanction (1 S 2<sup>28</sup>). The high priesthood returned to the descendants of the house of Eleazar in the reign of Solomon, when Abiathar was deprived of his office and banished from Jerus. because of his participation in the revolt of Adonijah; his place was filled by Zadok, of the house of Eleazar (1 K 2<sup>26</sup>), 'the faithful priest' of 1 S 2<sup>28</sup>.

In the person of E. were united for the first time in the history of Israel the two offices of high priest and judge. He is stated to have lived for 40 years (1 S 4<sup>18</sup> LXX ἔκοιτο ἔτη); but this chronological notice, as also the statement of his age (4<sup>15</sup>), is prob. due to a later deuteronomic redactor. We learn little of the life and character of E. from 1 S, the first eight chapters of which are mainly concerned with the history of Samuel. We gather, however, that he was a man of kindly disposition, and, setting aside the treatment of his sons, sincere and upright in the performance of his twofold office; while his ready submission to the divine sentence pronounced against his house, proves the reality of his belief in the God of Israel. Thus while officiating, by virtue of his priestly office, at Shiloh, he first reproves Hannah, and then, on her prayer, pronounces a blessing; while, on the death of Samuel, he shows himself in his treatment of the youthful Samuel. It was, however, the kindness, not of a strong but of a weak character, and as such was destined to come into conflict with the stern dictates of duty. His two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, were, in the language of Scripture, 'men of Belial' (or worthlessness); they 'knew not the Lord,' and profaned their service by their greed and licentiousness. Their father shrank from the distasteful task of punishing their conduct in the way that it deserved, and contented himself with administering a mild rebuke. Their punishment, therefore, must be left to a higher tribunal, and on two occasions was the aged priest warned of the fate that would befall his sons in consequence of their neglect of duty. At the first an anonymous prophet is sent to show him his sin in honouring his sons above God, and to announce the downfall of his house ('there shall not be an old man in thy house for ever'). In token of the certainty of this impending doom, E. is given a sign, viz. the death of his two sons in one day (1 S 27<sup>32-33</sup>). The text of this section is apparently in disorder, and would seem to have been corrected by a later deuteronomic author. On one occasion, the Lord Himself appears to the child Samuel and confirms the sentence which had previously been announced. His faith unshaken, E. submits without a murmur to the divine decree (1 S 3<sup>15</sup>). The end is not far off; the Philistines once more swarm across the Shephelah, and at the first attack defeat the Israelites. In vain is the ark of the covenant brought to Shiloh by Hophni and Phinehas. The Lord renews the battle, and inflict a further crushing defeat on the Israelites; the ark is captured, and Eli's two sons are slain. Overcome by the terrible news, the aged E. fell from his seat by the gate of the city; 'his neck brake, and he died' (1 S 4<sup>18</sup>). J. F. STENNING.

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI and ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.—Slightly different forms of the exclamation uttered by Jesus, according to the evangelists Matt. (27<sup>46</sup>) and Mark (15<sup>34</sup>) respectively, shortly before his death. Both evangelists follow it with the translation, in slightly varying terms: 'My God, my God (in Gospel of St. Peter ὁ δυνάμεις μου 'my power') why hast thou forsaken me' (or 'why didst thou forsake me')—which shows the cry to be a reminiscence of Ps 22<sup>1</sup>. But the Heb. of the psalm is אֵלִי אֵלִי לָמָּה אֶזְבַּחְתָּנִי, i.e. eli, eli, lama azabhtani; neither form of the saying is given by the evangelists. Indeed the MSS of the Gospels exhibit considerable variety of spelling in the case of nearly every word (see Tischendorf, Nov. Test. Gr. ed. octava crit. maior, l.c.). These variations start interesting inquiries, which this is not the place to follow out. Suffice it to say, that there is in the words a singular and somewhat perplexing combination of Heb. and Aramaic. Whether, for instance, the Eloi (Ελωι) represents a provincial (Galilean?) pronunciation of the Heb. Eli (אֵלִי), or the (poetic) sing. Eloah (even the reading Ελωεμ occurs; cf. too, Ελωεμ, Jg 5<sup>6</sup> Sept.), or is intended for a transliteration of the Aram. alohi (alahi), has been questioned. Either form, we must suppose, could be so perverted as to serve the mocking pretence that the sufferer was invoking Elijah. For the form lama or lamma (so in Mark the Geneva version of 1557, and Rheims), representing the Heb. (?), even some modern translators read lama, after the Aramaic. κρavel or σα.

substitution in the majority of texts of χ for κ being due, perhaps, simply to the ordinary law of Greek euphony; or, should the spelling with χ be equally ancient, it may indicate a variant pronunciation; for the Heb. pis transliterated by χ in other words also (as κρavel or σα, Tdf.; see Dalman, Gramm., p. 304). The curious readings κρavel and κρavel (see Tischendorf, u.s.) show the influence of the Hebrew. This mixture of tongues points, perhaps, to independent traditions; see the ed. of the Vulg. by Wordsworth and White, esp. the note on Matt. l.c. It seems, however, to afford but equivocal support to the theory that an Aram. version was current in our Lord's day, as the ecclesiastical or popular Bible [cf. Gesenius, Gesch. d. Hebr. Sprache u. Schrift, Leip. 1815, p. 73; De Wette, Eint. ins A.T. § 57 (ed. Schrader, 1869, § 68); E. Bohl, Forsch. nach ein. Volksbibel zur Zeit Jesu, Wien, 1873]. J. H. THAYER.

ELIAB (עֲלִיָּאב 'God is father,' A 'Ελιὰβ, except in 1 Ch 15<sup>13</sup>, B 'Ελιὰβ, * 'Ελιὰβ, 2 Ch 11<sup>13</sup> B 'Ελιὰβ, Jth 8<sup>1</sup> B 'Ελιὰβ, * 'Ελιὰβ).—1. According to P, son of Helon, and prince of Zebulun, who represented his tribe at the census and on certain other occasions, Nu 1<sup>9</sup> 27<sup>7</sup> 72<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> (P). 2. A Reubenite, father of Dathan and Abiram, Nu 16<sup>13-12</sup> (JE), Dt 11<sup>1</sup>. P gives, as further details, Eliab's father's name, Pallu, and the name of another son, Nemuel (Nu 26<sup>81</sup>). The father's name, Pallu, probably stood in the original text of Nu 16<sup>13</sup>. See Dillmann, ad loc., and art. KORAH. 3. Eldest son of Jesse, and brother of David. His entrance led Samuel to suppose that he must be the chosen of J<sup>h</sup> to succeed Saul. With his two brothers, Abinadab and Shammah, he joined Saul's army at the time that Goliath was insulting Israel; during this time David visited his brother in the camp, and was addressed by E. in insulting terms. E. had a daughter named Abihail (see art.), 1 S 16<sup>21</sup> 17<sup>13-23</sup>, 1 Ch 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 11<sup>13</sup>: on 1 Ch 27<sup>13</sup> see ELIHU. 4. According to the reading of 1 Ch 6<sup>37</sup> (Heb. <sup>12</sup>) the name of an ancestor of Samuel—an Ephraimite. Variants are Eliel, 1 Ch 6<sup>34</sup> (Heb. <sup>12</sup>), and Elihu, 1 S 1<sup>4</sup>. See ELIHU. 5. One of the Gadite warriors who joined David during his wanderings, 1 Ch 12<sup>9</sup>. These warriors and their doings are described in 1 Ch 12<sup>8-14</sup>. 6. A Levite who, at the time of David to play the psalter (זָמַר), in the first instance in connexion with the bringing up of the ark to Jerus., 1 Ch 15<sup>20</sup>. Perhaps the name was that of a (post-exilic) family of singers. Cf. references in AMMIEL (No. 3). 7. According to the genealogy in Jth 8<sup>1</sup>, a remote ancestor of Judith, and consequently a Simeonite, cf. 9<sup>2</sup>; and with 'Salamiel, the son of Salasadai' (8<sup>1</sup>), cf. Nu 1<sup>6</sup> (Heb. and LXX). G. B. GRAY.

ELIADA (עֲלִיָּאָדָה 'whom God takes notice of,' or 'cares for'; lit. 'knows.' For this nuance of the verb, cf. Gn 18<sup>19</sup>, Ex 2<sup>25</sup>, Ps 1<sup>6</sup> RV).—1. 'Ελιὰδ, repeated as Βααλειὰδ B, 'Ελιὰδ A, Βααλιὰδ Luc. A son of David (2 S 5<sup>16</sup>), called Βααλειὰδ Beeliada (which see) in 1 Ch 14<sup>7</sup>. 2. 'Ελιὰδ A, om. B Luc. Father of Rezon, a Syrian, captain of a marauding band which resisted Solomon's authority (1 K 11<sup>23</sup>). 3. 'Ελειὰδ B, 'Ελιὰδ A Luc. A warrior of Benjamin (2 Ch 17<sup>17</sup>). C. F. BURNLEY.

ELIADÁS ('Ελιὰδᾱς), 1 Es 9<sup>28</sup>.—In Ezr 10<sup>27</sup> ΕΛΙΟΝΑΙ.

ELIAHBA (אֶלְיָהָבָה 'God hideth'), one of David's 'Thirty,' 2 S 23<sup>32</sup>, 1 Ch 11<sup>32</sup>; שְׁלֹמֹה 'the Shalbonite' of the Heb. text, should be more correctly pointed שְׁלֹמֹה 'the Shaalabbinite' (cf. Jos 19<sup>42</sup>).

J. F. STENNING.

ELIAKIM (אֶלְיָקִים 'whom God sets up'; cf. Sabbean אֶלְיָקִים, אֶלְיָקִים; 'Ελιακιμ & Q<sup>a</sup> in Is 22<sup>20</sup>).—1. Son of Hilkiah, and prefect of the palace in succession to Shebna during the latter or middle portion of Hezekiah's reign (Is 22<sup>20</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>18</sup> = Is 36<sup>18</sup>). This prefecture, described as אֶלְיָקִים 'over the household,' seems to have embraced the discharge of all the domestic affairs of the king, and was of the highest rank, being held by a son of the king heir to the throne, after his father king Azariah had been smitten with leprosy (2 K 15<sup>5</sup>). First mention of the office occurs during Solomon's reign (1 K 4<sup>5</sup>), and it existed, apparently with similar powers and dignity, in the kingdom of Israel as in Judah (1 K 16<sup>8</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 10<sup>5</sup>). Delitzsch and others compare it to the office of major domus (maire du palais). The prefect appears to have also been known as שֹׁכֵן, rendered by RV 'treasurer,' m 'steward.' This title is connected by Cheyne (Is. ii. 153) with the Assy. šaknu 'a high officer,' from šakin 'to set up, place'; but the fact that the fem. שֹׁכֵנֶת šōkeneth is used of Abishag in 1 K 1<sup>2</sup> seems rather to connect the word with the verb שָׁכַן hiskin, 'deal familiarly with,' from which was derived the general meaning of caretaker or attendant (see the writer's note on 1 K 1<sup>2</sup>). The title occurs in a Phoen. inscription from Lebanon (see art. SŌKĒN) probably to the S. C. C. B.C.: 'Sōkēn n. n. n. City, servant of Hiram, king of the Sidonians' (CIS i. i. 5).

E. appears to have been a disciple or political ally of the prophet Isaiah, who predicts in glowing terms his succession to the office of prefect in place of his unworthy predecessor (Is 22<sup>20</sup>). At his institution he is to be invested with long tunic and girdle, the insignia proper to his office, and is to receive as prime minister the title of 'Father' of the kingdom (v. 21, cf. Gn 45<sup>8</sup>, 1 Mac 11<sup>32</sup>). In figure, if not literally, as part of the ceremony of institution, the key of the house of David is said to be laid on his back, i.e. he is to act with full powers as the king's vizier or representative (v. 22, quoted as a Messianic type Rev 3<sup>7</sup>; cf. Mt 16<sup>19</sup>). At Sennacherib's invasion of Judæa, B.C. 701, Isaiah's prediction has come to fulfilment, and E. appears as prefect, while Shebna holds merely the lower office of scribe.

The last two vv. of the prophecy (Is 22<sup>24-25</sup>) are involved in considerable obscurity.

(a) Most obviously 'the nail that was fastened in a sure place,' v. 25, must refer, as in v. 23, to E., whose fall will result from the abuse of his high position by the undue exercise of nepotism (v. 24, the vessels large and small denote the various members of his family of greater or less importance). RV 'all the glory,' is rendered by Delitzsch 'the whole heavy lot'. Such a prediction, however, is scarcely consistent with the enthusiasm of vv. 20-23, supposing the whole prophecy to have been written down by Isaiah at one sitting, either prior to E.'s elevation (Orelli), or 'after the fate of both dignitaries, revealed to him at two different times, had found its fulfilment' (Delitzsch). If, therefore, vv. 24-25 refer to E., we must conclude (Hitzig, Cheyne) that they were penned subsequently to the former part of the prophecy, whether by Isaiah himself, or by some other hand.

(b) Gesenius, Ewald, Driver, Dillmann consider the 'nail' of v. 25 to be different from that of v. 23, and to refer back to Shebna, whose fall is to take place 'in that day,' i.e. simultaneously with the rise of E.

2. The orig. name of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, which see (2 K 23<sup>31</sup>=2 Ch 36<sup>31</sup>). 3. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerus. under Nehemiah (Neh 12<sup>41</sup>). 4. 5. In Mt 1<sup>13</sup> and in Lk 3<sup>30, 31</sup>; ancestors of our Lord (see GENEALOGY). C. F. BURNEY.

ELIALI (A 'Ελιαλῆ, B 'Εδαιλῆς), 1 Es 9<sup>34</sup>.—The name either corresponds to Binnui in Ezr 10<sup>38</sup> or is unrepresented there.

ELIAM (עֲלִיָּא 'God is kinsman'; 'Ελιᾶς, BA in 2 S 11<sup>3</sup>, and B in 2 S 23<sup>34</sup>, where A has Οὐελιαφ). *—1. Father of Bath-sheba, whose first husband was a Hittite, 1 S 11<sup>3</sup> (=1 Ch 3<sup>5</sup>, where Eliam is called Ammiel; see below). Eliam himself, therefore, may have been a '...'. 2. Son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and ... heroes. It is not impossible that this Eliam is the same as the preceding, but there is no evidence that such was the case (2 S 23<sup>34</sup>). The omission of the name from the parallel list in 1 Ch 11 is probably due to textual corruption. See Driver, Samuel, note on 2 S 23<sup>34</sup>. G. B. GRAY.

ELIAONIAS (A 'Ελιαωνίας, B 'Ελιαωνίας), 1 Es 8<sup>31</sup>.—A descendant of Phaath-moab, who returned from Babylon with Esdras. In Ezr 8<sup>4</sup> ELIEHOENAI.

ELIAS.—See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH (עֲלִישָׁפ 'God has added,' 'Ελισάφ).—1. Son of Deuel, and prince of Gad at the first census (Nu 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>20</sup> P). 2. Son of Lael, and prince of the Gershonites (Nu 3<sup>24</sup> P).

ELIASHIB (עֲלִישִׁיב 'God will (or, does) bring back (or, restore).') In LXX the most frequent forms are 'Ελεισούβ (B), 'Ελισούβ (A), 'Ελειασελβ (B), 'Ελιασελβ (AB)].—A popular name after the Exile; perhaps, in spite of 1 Ch 24<sup>12</sup>, it was not in use in pre-exilic times. The persons of this name mentioned in OT are—1. The high priest who was contemporary with Nehemiah. He was son of Joiakim, grandson of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, the contemporary of Zerubbabel (Neh 12<sup>10</sup>, Ezr 3<sup>2</sup>), and father of Joiada (Neh 12<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>). He assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerus. during Nehemiah's governorship (Neh 3<sup>4</sup>). He can have had no sympathy with the exclusive policy of Ezra and Nehemiah, for both he himself and members of his family allied themselves with the leading foreign opponents of Nehemiah (Neh 2<sup>10</sup>). The exact nature of Eliashib's own alliance with Tobiah the Ammonite is not stated (Neh 13<sup>4</sup>), but a son of his son Joiada, during the period of Nehemiah's recall to the Pers. court, married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and was in consequence driven away by Nehemiah on his return (Neh 13<sup>28</sup>). This, combined with the expulsion of Tobiah from the temple-chamber provided for him by E. (Neh 13<sup>45</sup>), must have created, even if it had not existed before, an open schism between E. and Nehemiah. Cf. further below (No. 7), and Ryle's notes on the passages cited above in the Cam. Bible ed. of Ezr-Neh. 2. A singer of the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>24</sup>), called in 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup> Eliasibus. 3. An Isr. of the family of Zattu (Ezr 10<sup>27</sup>, in 1 Es 9<sup>28</sup> Eliasimus); and 4. another of the family of Bani (Ezr 10<sup>36</sup>), who had married foreign wives. 5. A son of Elhoenai and descendant of David. From the position of the name ... this E. must have lived after the ... as late as the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. 6. According to the Chronicler (1 Ch 24<sup>12</sup>), E. was the name of a priestly house in the time of David. But see the references and the literature cited in AMMIEL 3. 7. Father of Jehohanan, to whose chamber in the temple Ezra resorted (Ezr 10<sup>6</sup>). But the suggestion (see, e.g., Ryle on Ezr 10<sup>6</sup>) that this E. is identical with No. 1 is not improbable. See art. JOHANAN. G. B. GRAY.

ELIASIB (A 'Ελιασιβος, B Νδσειβος), 1 Es 9<sup>1</sup>.—A high priest in the time of Neh. Ezr 10<sup>6</sup>, ELIASHIB.

ELIASIBUS (A 'Ελιασιβος, B -σεβος, AV Eleazurus, perhaps from the Aldine 'Ελιαζουρος, ρ being read for φ), 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup>.—One of the 'holy singers,' who put away his strange wife. In Ezr 10<sup>24</sup> ELIASHIB.

ELIASIMUS (A 'Ελιασιμος, B -ει-ει-, AV Elisimus), 1 Es 9<sup>28</sup>.—In Ezr 10<sup>27</sup> ELIASHIB.

ELIASIS ('Ελιασις), 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup>.—This name and Enasibus may be duplicate forms answering to Eliashib in Ezr 10<sup>38</sup> (Speaker's Comm.).

ELIATHAH (עֲלִיָּאִתָּה or עֲלִיָּאִתָּה 'God hath come').—A Hemanite, whose family formed the twentieth division of the temple service (1 Ch 25<sup>4, 27</sup>).

ELIDAD (עֲלִידָד 'God has loved,' 'Ελιδάδ).—Son of Chislon, and ... representative for dividing the land, Nu 11<sup>26, 27</sup> (perh.=Eldad, one of the elders, Nu 11<sup>26, 27</sup> E).

ELIEHOENAI (עֲלִיְהוֹנָי '...').—1. A Korahite (1 Ch 26<sup>3</sup>, AV: ... head of ... of exiles that returned (Ezr 8<sup>4</sup>, AV Elhoenai, called in 1 Es 8<sup>31</sup> Eliaonias).

ELIEL (עֲלִיֵּל, prob. 'El is God').—1. A Korahite (1 Ch 6<sup>34</sup>), prob.=Eliab of v. 27 and Elihu of 1 S 1<sup>1</sup>. 2. 3. 4. Mighty men in the service of David (1 Ch 11<sup>46, 47</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>). 5. A chief of eastern Manasseh (1 Ch 5<sup>24</sup>). 6. 7. Two Benjamite chiefs (1 Ch 8<sup>20, 22</sup>). 8. A Levite mentioned in connexion with the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15<sup>9, 11</sup>). 9. A Levite in time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31<sup>13</sup>).

ELIENAI (עֲלִיֵּנָי, textual error for עֲלִיָּנָי Elhoenai).—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8<sup>40</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ELIEZER (עֲלִיעֶזֶר 'God is help').—See ELEAZAR. 1. ... servant, a Damascene (Gn 15<sup>2</sup>, A), RVm. ... construction here is difficult, but the words can hardly be rendered as a double proper name as RV, 'Dammesek Eliezer.' Whatever the exact construction, the words, unless there is a corruption in the text, must be intended to suggest that E. was in some way connected with Damascus. See Delitzsch, New Com. on Gen. ii. 4). This same E. is prob. the servant referred to in Gn 24. 2. A son of Moses by Zipporah; so named to commemorate the deliverance of Moses from Pharaoh (Ex 18<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ch 23<sup>15, 17</sup>). 3. The son of Becher a Benjamite (1 Ch 7<sup>8</sup>). 4. The son of Zichri, captain of the tribe of Reuben in David's reign (1 Ch 27<sup>16</sup>). 5. The son of Dodavahu of Mareshah, who prophesied the destruction of the fleet of ships which Jehoshaphat built in co-operation with Ahaziah (2 Ch 20<sup>37</sup>). 6. An E. is mentioned among the 'chief men' whom Ezra sent from Ahava to Casiphia to find Levites and Nethinim willing to join the exiles to Jerusalem (Ezr 8<sup>16</sup>). 7. 8. 9. A Levite, and a son of Harim, who had married 'strange women,' i.e. wives of non-Israelitish descent, in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10<sup>12, 23, 33</sup>). 10. One of the priests to blow with the trumpets before the Lord when David brought it from the house of Obed-edom to Jerus. (1 Ch 15<sup>24</sup>). 11. A Levite mentioned in 1 Ch 26<sup>28</sup>. 12. An E. is mentioned in the genealogy of our Lord given by St. Luke (3<sup>29</sup>).

* Note on the genuineness of the name.—The name occurs twice in MT, in one case (2 S 11<sup>3</sup>) all VSS except Vulg., and in the other the LXX, name. In spite of this a close comparison of the ... the correctness of the Masoretic tradition of the rare name Eliam, which certainly occurs in Phoen. (CIS 147, עֲלִיָּא, on a Sardinian inscription) as against the commoner names which appear in the VSS. Ammiel (1 Ch 3<sup>5</sup>) may be an actual alternative name of the same man (cf. Jehoiachin and Coniah), or may be the alteration of an offensive, because misunderstood, name (Eliam being regarded as 'God of the people') into a less exceptional form (Ammiel regarded as 'People of God'), see further, Gray, Stud. in Heb. Proper Names, p. 45.

W. C. ALLEN.

ELIHOREPH (אֱלִי־הֹרֶפֶחַ) 'God of autumn,' or 'of ripe age'; cf. Job 20 R.V. 'Ελαδφ B, 'Εναρέφ A, 'Ελαδφ Luc.).—One of Solomon's scribes (1 K 4<sup>3</sup>).

ELIHU (אֱלִי־הוּ) —1. An ancestor of Samuel, 1 S 1<sup>1</sup>, called in 1 Ch 6<sup>34</sup> Eliel and in 1 Ch 6<sup>27</sup> Eliab (wh. see). 2. A variation in 1 Ch 27<sup>18</sup> for Eliab, David's eldest son, 1 S 16<sup>6</sup>. Kittel (in Haupt's OT) emends the text of Ch to אֱלִי־הוּ. 3. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12<sup>20</sup>. 4. A Korahite porter, 1 Ch 26<sup>7</sup>. 5. See next article. 6. ('Ηλειού) an ancestor of Judith, Jth 8<sup>1</sup>.

ELIHU (אֱלִי־הוּ, LXX 'Ελιούς, 'my God is He,' cf. Elijah, 'my God is J').—Described in Job 32<sup>2</sup> as 'son of Barachel the Buzite, of the family of Ram'; he would therefore be descended from Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gn 22<sup>21</sup>, J). E. is introduced as an interlocutor in the Book of Job, speaking after the three friends Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar have failed to convince Job by their arguments. He is described as younger than the three; he undertakes, however, to act as moderator between the disputants, and speaks at length in chs. 32-37. But the fact that E. is mentioned neither in the prologue nor in the epilogue of the book; that his name does not add substantially to the discussion; that his appearance is a transition from ch. 38 to ch. 39 is abrupt and awkward; together with certain features of style in the speech of E.,—have led most critics to the conclusion that chs. 32-37 represent a later addition to the book. Lightfoot, Rosenmuller, Derenbourg, and others support the strange conjecture that E. is the name of the author himself (see JOB, BOOK OF).

W. T. DAVISON.

ELIJAH (אֱלִיָּהוּ; אֱלִיָּה in 2 K 1<sup>3, 8, 12</sup>, אֱלִיָּה in 1 K 17<sup>1</sup>, 18<sup>1</sup>, 19<sup>1</sup>, 22<sup>1</sup>, 23<sup>1</sup>, 24<sup>1</sup>) 'J' is God'; LXX 'Ηλειούς; NT 'Ηλίας. 1. The loftiest prophet of the OT, raised up by J' at a crisis in the history of Israel to save the nation from lapsing into heathenism. His public life is sketched in a few narratives wonderful for their vivid representations and graphic details. His personal history is full of human interest, and presents lessons of the highest ethical and spiritual value. His first appearance is surrounded with an element of mystery which is in keeping with his whole history. There is but a single brief reference (1 K 17<sup>1</sup>) to his origin, and even that is not without ambiguity. The words are tr. by AV, in accordance with the MT, 'E. the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead.' If this rendering is correct, it signifies that a certain place called Tishbeh or Tishbi of Gilead, not named elsewhere, had the distinction of giving birth to the prophet. Some have sought to identify it with 'Hisbe of Naphtali, mentioned in To 1<sup>2</sup>. They point out that the correct rendering of giving birth to the prophet is 'to be born of' (on the assumption that it is a common, not a proper name) is not 'of the inhabitants,' but 'of the sojourners' (so RV), which would imply that E. came from another or foreign district. But the LXX makes the disputed word a proper name, and reads 'E. the Tishbite from Thesbon of Gilead.' This reading seems to be followed by Josephus (Ant. viii.

xiii. 2). It is supported by the fact that, whenever the word is a common noun, it is written תִּשְׁבִּי. There seems therefore little reason to doubt that E. was a native of the wild but beautiful mountain district of Gilead, the eastern side of Palestine, on the eastern side of the Jordan, bordering on the great desert. There he had a prophet's nurture in solitude. He always loved the wild defiles and rushing torrents of his native land. Lonely mountains and bleak deserts were congenial to his spirit. He learned to dwell familiarly on the sterner aspects of religion and morality. He had the austere, ascetic, monotheistic spirit of the desert. He learned the fear of J' which knew no other fear.

Nothing is said of E.'s early life, the omission is in striking contrast with the detail with which the descent of some other prophets is stated. E. occupied from the first a unique and exalted position in the goodly fellowship. He seemed to be like Melchizedek 'without father, without mother, without beginning, having neither beginning of day nor end of day.' Similar conditions arose in later times among the prophets, as that he was Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, returned to life, or an angel in human form.

E.'s whole manner of life is meant to stand against a corrupt civilisation. He was a Nazirite, the habits of the ancient Nazirite, and not a few of the characteristics of the modern Bedavin. His unshorn locks hanging down his shoulders and his rough mane of grizzled hair (2 K 1<sup>8</sup>) alone make him a remarkable figure in Israel. He has the fleet foot of a true son of the desert (1 K 18<sup>46</sup>), and an iron frame which enables him to endure a forty days' fast (19<sup>8</sup>). He dwells in the clefts of the Cherith (17<sup>3</sup>), and carries a desert broom (19<sup>5</sup>), lodges in the caves of Carmel (19<sup>9</sup>), and haunts the slopes of Carmel. If he enters a city, it is only to deliver the message of J' and be gone. His startling appearances, abrupt speeches, and sudden disappearances create around his personality a profound air of mystery. He is believed to be borne hither and thither by the Spirit of J' (1 K 18<sup>12</sup>, 2 K 2<sup>16</sup>). He comes down from the hills of Gilead as the champion and prophet of J' in the dark days of Israel's apostasy. He comes to bear witness to truths which ought never to have been denied in Israel. Like every true reformer, he takes his stand upon old principles. He is the personified conscience of the nation. He comes, a prophet of heroic mould, to witness by deeds rather than by words.

The spiritual danger which E. was called to avert arose out of a political alliance formed between Israel and Phœnicia, and cemented by the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel, the son and the daughter of the allied kings. A covenant between two Semitic peoples was always supposed to imply a friendship between their gods. Its natural sequel was a syncretism of faith and worship. That Ahab did not at first think of denying J' is proved by the names he gave his sons—Ahaziah (J' holds) and Jehoram (J' is high). But his religious instincts were as dull as his political instincts were keen. Brave enough in battle, and on the whole a successful ruler, he was morally weak, and came completely under the baneful influence of his strong-minded Tyrian wife, a fanatic in her own faith. It was to please her that he not only erected a temple to Baal at Samaria (1 K 16<sup>2</sup>) and introduced a multitude of foreign priests (18<sup>19</sup>), but allowed a religious persecution, in which many of the prophets of J' are said to have been slain (18<sup>13</sup>). The effect of these events on the religious life of Israel could not be small. The people had hitherto been ensnared only by the gods of the hostile tribes of Canaan whom they had subdued. They were now tempted to adopt the cultus of a great allied nation, and the temptation proved too strong to be resisted. The worship became the court religion, and, if its progress had not been effectually checked, would soon have become the national religion.

To prevent this disastrous consummation is E.'s life-task. His fiery zeal against the Tyrian cultus springs from moral at least as much as religious considerations. That superstition had such accompaniments as would soon sap the moral vigour of any nation. A patriot as well as a prophet, E. comes to save his country. His ruling passion is jealousy for the Lord God of hosts (1 K 19<sup>10</sup>). He knows the God of Israel as a moral and spiritual being, and all his demands on behalf of J' are moral and spiritual. The details of ritual do not trammel a man of his spiritual force. He knows nothing of the Deuteronomic law which condemns local altars (1 K 18<sup>32</sup>). It is not recorded that he ever visits Jerusalem. But Gilgal, Bethel, Carmel, and other ancient sanctuaries of the true religion, are dear to him. Sinai is, from its associations, the holiest ground. He believes in a covenant in virtue of which J' became the God of Israel, and Israel the people of J'. And the conviction is burned into his mind that there can be no alliance between the God of Israel and any other divinity. His jealousy for J' is the counterpart of J' jealousy for Israel. It is to E. an intuitive truth that J' can brook no rival in His kingdom, and he is amazed that any can doubt it: his spirit blazes with contempt against all 'weak-kneed' persons (1 K 18<sup>21</sup>) who halt between two opinions.

It is contended by some critics (Wellhausen, Stade, etc.) that E. was not a monotheist, like Amos, Hosea, and the other literary prophets: that he was like the mass of the people of his time regarding J' as only the God of Israel—a local god—and believing that every other nation had its own deity. It is affirmed that E. was a 'henotheist.' Now, it is sufficiently clear that the faith of many of his contemporaries is of this rudimentary order: the contest between J' and Baal is to them a real struggle between rival deities. But E.'s lofty conception of J' virtually excludes all other objects of worship—makes all the gods idols. It is difficult to believe that the Baal whom he treats with such irony and contempt (1 K 18<sup>27</sup>) has to his mind any reality. At any rate, it is but a short step from E.'s 'henotheism' to absolute monotheism.

The memoirs of E. seem to be derived from several sources. The narratives in 1 K 17–19, 21, 2 K 2, form a unity. They took shape in Northern Israel, as is indicated by the reference to the 'brook Cherith' (1 K 17<sup>3</sup>). They were probably written under the influence of the literary prophets of the Northern Kingdom, about the beginning of the 7th cent. B.C. These narratives are composed in the highest style of literary art. Their distinctly popular character is apparent, and it has been noted by W. R. Smith that they read like a transcript of a vivid oral tradition (Prophets of Israel, 116). Like other historical parts of the OT, they may have lived in the mouths of the people for generations, forming a powerful means of religious education, before they were committed to writing.

E. comes on the stage of history with the same startling abruptness with which he makes his first appearance before Ahab. He is sent to announce that J' is about to avenge the apostasy of Israel by bringing a long drought on the land. This message delivered, he vanishes into solitude. He is guided by the Spirit of J' to the brook Cherith 'that is before,' i.e. to the east of,

'Jordan' (1 K 17<sup>3</sup>), probably in his native Gilead. See CHERITH. There his life is miraculously sustained by ravens, which bring him flesh every morning and evening (vv. 4–6). Prosaic critics have tried to eliminate the marvellous element from the story. They call attention to the fact that the word וְרָא, which is so pointed in the MT as to mean 'ravens,' signifies with another set of vowel-points 'Arabs,' with another 'merchants,' or 'inhabitants of Oreb.' But, not to emphasize the fact that ravens eat flesh, which Arabs generally avoid, it is to be noted that the marvellous element is quite in keeping with other parts of E.'s story. In the oral tradition the וְרָא birds were doubtless 'ravens': the וְרָא birds not have been וְרָא worth preserving but for the miracle וְרָא, which is reproduced in all the ancient versions.

When the brook Cherith dries up in the long drought, the prophet goes, under divine direction, to Zarephath, a city of heathen Tyre (17<sup>8</sup>), where he is hospitably received by a poor widow whom the famine has reduced to her last meal (v. 14). The prophet finds a well-spring of kindness in the heart of a heathen country. He learns to sympathize with one of another race and a strange religion, and his stern nature is in some degree softened by contact with human suffering. He rewards the widow's charity first by increasing her small store of meal, later by restoring her child to life (vv. 14–24). His experience begins to prepare him for a higher revelation, which he is in due time to receive.

Meanwhile the king, in his rage against the prophet of evil, sends messengers into all nations (1 K 18<sup>10</sup>) to search for E., but they report that their quest has been fruitless. For three years there falls no rain or dew in Israel. The famine is so severe that the king and his chamberlain, Obadiah, have to scour the country in search of provender for the royal stables (v. 18). While they are engaged in this quest, E. suddenly appears before Obadiah and bids him summon his master (v. 19). The וְרָא of the prophet and the king is very וְרָא. Obadiah has never been able to stifle the conscience of an Israelite, and cannot withhold his respect from the prophet of J'. He bitterly accuses E. of being the troubler of Israel; but when the prophet flings back the charge, the king is silenced (v. 19). E. challenges, or rather commands, him to summon the worshippers of Baal to a contest between J' and Baal on Mount Carmel. The worshippers of Baal shall sacrifice to their God; E. himself will sacrifice to J': the god who answers by fire, he shall be the God. The king consents (v. 19). The narrative of the contest (1 K 18<sup>20–40</sup>) is one of the grandest in the OT. Apart from its historical value, it is precious as an ideal representation of the conflict which is always being waged between true and false religion, and of combatants who are always meeting. On the appointed day the king and the 400 prophets of Baal, E. and 'all וְרָא' assemble on Carmel. The prophets of Baal, וְרָא, built an altar and laid their sacrifice, pray to their god from morning till evening, and are excited to a frenzy by their fruitless efforts and the biting sarcasm of E. In the evening E. rebuilds the ancient altar of J'—thrown down in these times of persecution—and utters a few calm words of prayer to J'. The lightning falls and consumes not only the sacrifice, but the altar and the water poured into trenches around it. The people fall on their faces, and with loud voices acknowledge that J' is God. Then, in an access of irrepressible zeal, they fall upon the 400 prophets who have deceived the nation, and put them all to the sword. E. prays that the drought may cease, and before nightfall there is a tempest of rain, in the midst of which the strange prophet is seized by a sudden impulse, carried away by the emotion of triumph, rolls his mantle together and runs like an avant-courier in front of the royal chariot all the sixteen miles from Carmel to the gates of Jezreel (vv. 42-43).

E. imagines that the battle for truth has been fought and won, and that his task is virtually accomplished. But his triumph is brief. When he receives a message that Jezebel has sworn to have his life (19<sup>2</sup>), his sanguine hope for the restoration of the true religion is changed in a moment into blank despair. He feels with a sinking heart that he has laboured for naught and in vain. God Himself has contended in vain with human folly. Nothing can be made of a king whom miracles will not convince, but who is turned round the finger of a woman. The apostate nation will remain apostate. Seeing all this (the LXX and other ancient versions, instead of 'and he saw it,' read 'and he was afraid,' 19<sup>3</sup>), E. flees for his life to Judaea, and, leaving his servant at Beersheba, plunges into the desert, where he is alone with J<sup>r</sup>. Weary, famished, and heavy of heart, he lies down under a desert broom [so RVm; see JUNPER], and is willing to die. He feels that his life has been a failure. He has been worsted in the battle of life, and something tells him that he has deserved to be. He is no better than his fathers. He has now nothing more to live for. It is vain to continue the unequal struggle. All men have forsaken him. He has no friend but J<sup>r</sup>, and he prays that He would release him from his fruitless task (vv. 3-4).

God is very kind to his servant, first satisfying his bodily wants, and then giving him a new revelation such as his soul needs. As the prophet sleeps under the desert bush, he is awakened by the touch of an angel, who sets meat and drink before him, and on the strength of that food he goes a forty days' journey (forty being, as usual, a round number) to Horeb (vv. 5-8). It is not difficult to understand what the prophet seeks at that mountain sanctuary. He desires to meet J<sup>r</sup>. Men have failed him: he wants to make sure of God. He goes to Horeb to stand where Moses stood. His heart cries out for the vindication of the moral law. Finding a cave, he lodges there (v. 9). (In the Heb. it is the cave, either as already a place to which many have fled, or from the fame of this single v. . . . the cave is in a secluded plain under the highest peak of Jebel Musa; see SINAI.) The narrative which follows (vv. 11-18) is spiritually one of the profoundest in the OT. J<sup>r</sup> represents to E., by a magnificent acted parable, the contrast between law and grace, judgment and mercy. As the prophet of J<sup>r</sup>, E. has been using the weapon of force. He has never conceived it possible to defeat the enemies of God by any other weapon. He has magnified God's strictness with a zeal He will not own. And he has failed. Force has left men hard and indifferent. J<sup>r</sup> here makes experiment upon E. with his own weapon. He visits the mountain with a hurricane, with an earthquake, and with a fire. The prophet's wounded spirit is not moved by any of these. J<sup>r</sup> is not in them. But in the calm which follows the tumult he hears a still small voice (RVm 'a sound of gentle stillness') which thrills his inmost being; he feels that God is there; self-abased, he wraps his face in his mantle and waits to receive the divine communications. He is thus taught the meaning of his failure. He is shown in a parable 'a more excellent way.' In the heart of Sinai he learns the gentleness of God. Others like himself may be won by grace, whom might and wrath have failed to move. The kingdom of God comes not so much by startling miracles, but through quiet human agencies and in the slow movements of history. E. is therefore shown that J<sup>r</sup> has still a great work for him to do: he must shape the destinies of two great nations, and provide for the continuance of the prophetic succession. Three commands are laid upon him: to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, Jehu to be king over Israel, and Elisha to be his own successor. And he is comforted with the assurance that the work in which he has been engaged has not been a failure: J<sup>r</sup> reserves for Himself seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal.

With faith restored E. returns to his task (vv. 19-21). On his way to Damascus he finds Elisha at the . . . his mantle over him—a symbolic . . . claims him as his son and invests him with the prophetic office. Elisha leaves all, and ministers unto him. From this time E. is never alone: he has a companion to whom he becomes a true spiritual father (2 K 2<sup>2</sup>), winning his filial affection as well as profound veneration.

Here there is a break in the narrative. It is nowhere stated by what means E. sought to fulfil the other two parts of the commission which he received at Horeb. The account of the actual completion of his task by Elisha in 2 K 9, 10 is . . . by another narrator. Nor . . . what means E. afterwards . . . advancement of the true religion. But there are deeply interesting hints in the memoirs. Cheyne's . . . (143), . . . the lesson of Horeb was lost upon him, do not seem to be warranted. On the contrary, there are not wanting indications that from the day on which E. heard the still small voice there was another spirit in him. He does not again attempt to suppress Ahab's idolatry by force. He leaves the . . . alone, and waits the course of events. . . . not entirely abandon his lonely desert life, he at least becomes a familiar figure in the schools of the prophets at Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho (2 K 2<sup>4</sup>). His personality, and probably his teaching, make a profound impression upon the young prophets. He kindles in their minds his own zeal for J<sup>r</sup>; he transfuses his spirit into them; the homage which they pay to Elisha (2 K 2<sup>5</sup>) is entirely due to the fact that they perceive in him the spirit of the greater prophet.

When E.'s moral indignation once more flashes out against the house of Ahab (1 K 21), it is not now for the destruction of idolatry but in the cause of justice and humanity. . . . he appears. He has become the champion of the civil and moral rights of the people. Ahab violates the ancient laws of property, which are the charter of the people's liberties, by forcibly alienating the vineyard of Naboth. He deepens his guilt by allowing his wife to compass the innocent man's ruin by peculiarly nefarious means (1 K 21<sup>8</sup>). This crime is the signal for E.'s reappearance at Jezreel. On the day after Naboth's murder, the king is proceeding in state to take possession of the covetous garden, when he is confronted by the prophet, and quails once more before his moral indignation. His enemy has found him (v. 20). His own sin finds him out. His conscience condemns him. He stands speechless while the prophet's words of doom smite him like thunderbolts: Ahab's house shall fall; dogs shall eat the carcase of Jezebel; the king's whole posterity shall perish, and their bodies be given to the dogs of the city or the fowls of the air (so D<sup>2</sup> in vv. 26b-28). In the chariot behind Ahab on that memorable day was an officer named Jehu, on whose mind the words of E. left an indelible impression (2 K 9<sup>25</sup>); and though the execution of the sentence was deferred in consideration of the king's penitence, this man was the instrument chosen by J" for the overthrow of the house of Ahab.

The episode of Naboth's vineyard produced a great change in the popular sentiment. It revealed the true character of the issues in E.'s conflict against idolatry. It showed that while idolatry went hand in hand with crime, the religion of J" was the bulwark of righteousness and liberty. At the same time, it opened their eyes to the real grandeur of the prophet in their midst, and doubtless we are to date from this event a great increase in his power as the prophet of J".

It is impossible to determine the extent and duration of E.'s subsequent labours. There are two other narratives, one of which brings him into contact with Ahaziah, son of Ahab (B.C. c. 853), while the other implies that he lived on till the reign of Jehoram of Judah (c. 849-844). It is difficult to harmonize this chronology with that of 2 K 3, which makes it clear that E.'s career ended and Elisha's began before the death of Jehoshaphat (c. 874-849). It is possible, however, that Jehoram reigned for a time during the life of his father Jehoshaphat (2 K 8<sup>18</sup>; the text is doubtful).

According to the narrative in 2 K 1, Ahaziah, son of Ahab, having injured himself by falling from a balcony of his palace, sends messengers to the shrine of Baal-zebub, god of Ekron, to inquire if he shall recover. On their way they are intercepted by Elijah, who indignantly asks them if there is not a God in Israel of whom they might inquire, and commands them to go back and tell the king that his injuries will certainly prove fatal. When the messengers describe to the king the person who waylaid them, he immediately recognizes in him the old enemy of his house, and in the true spirit of Jezebel, his mother, sends out a band of fifty men to capture him. They find the prophet seated 'on the top of the hill' (name not given: Carmel, say some critics, but it is not on the way to Ekron). At his word, fire comes down from heaven and consumes them all. Another band of the same number meet the same fate. A third company is sent out, but their leader takes warning, adopts a humble tone, and he and his men are spared. E. then goes in person to the king, and repeats the declaration that his doom is sealed.

This narrative differs widely in language, style, and spirit from those of the preceding group. The prophet's personal appearance has altered (1<sup>8</sup>); his name has changed from Elia to the later form Elija; and instead of being directly inspired and guided by J" as hitherto, he receives the word of prophecy from an angel (1<sup>2-16</sup>). 'The representation of the prophet assumes gigantic proportions, but at the same time becomes rigid and lifeless: it ceases to be available as a pattern of human action' (Ewald). The narrator tells the story, without apology, for the glorification of his hero; but no narrative in the OT presents greater moral difficulties. If it is regarded as literal history, one's moral sense is shocked at the destruction of a great number of men whose only fault is obedience to the orders of their captain and their king. One cannot conceive the story to have been penned by the historian who related the parable of the still small voice at Horeb. The best comment on the story was supplied by Christ. He condemned with unmistakable plainness the vindictive spirit which His disciples, by citing the example of Elijah, sought to justify (Lk 9<sup>55-56</sup>). Others besides the disciples have used the story as an argument for persecution. E. was the patron of the Inquisitors. Even Calvin and Beza argued from this narrative that fire was the proper instrument of punishment for heretics. But the story itself can hardly be regarded as history. It is rather one of those imaginative apologies—abundant in the schools of the scribes—which borrowed the names of ancient heroes to lend vividness and concreteness to abstract doctrines.

The other narrative (2 K 21<sup>1-17</sup>) is given only by the Chronicler, and bears distinct marks of lateness. Jehoram, king of Judah, son-in-law of Ahab and Jezebel, having fallen under the spell of sensuous Baal-worship, E. is represented as sending him a letter warning him that J" will bring a plague upon Judah, by which all the king's house will be afflicted, and to which the king himself will early fall a victim. This is the only narrative which brings E. into connexion with the kingdom of Judah, and the only one which represents him as carrying on his work by means of writing. The style and language of the letter correspond very closely with those of the Chronicler.

The narrative of E.'s translation (2 K 21<sup>18-19</sup>) returns to the lofty style of the writer of 1 K 17-19. 21. Ewald, indeed, regarded it as the work of the same great narrator; more recent critics consider that from a literary point of view it is more closely connected with the history of Elisha (2 K 21<sup>18-19</sup>). E.'s end is still more mysterious than his beginning. He alone shares with Enoch the glory of being 'translated,' so that he should not taste death (He 11<sup>5</sup>). Of him alone is it recorded, as of Christ (Lk 24<sup>41</sup>), that he was carried up into heaven. He is residing at the ancient sanctuary of Gilgal (now Jiljilia, between Shechem and Bethel, not the town of the same name on the Jordan), where a prophetic guild is established, when he is warned that the time of his departure is come. His invisible Guide calls him for the last time into solitude. The appointed place is beyond Jordan, not now in the ravines of his native Gilead, but southward in the wild region of Nebo, where his greatest forerunner fell asleep. As he went to Horeb for inspiration in his time of spiritual storm and stress, so he is drawn in the final crisis of his life to the mountain region in which Moses was summoned to die, away from the face of man. But he begins his last journey by visiting the prophetic guilds at Bethel and Jericho, probably for the purpose of confirming the young prophets in the faith. Wishing to spare Elisha the pain of witnessing the last fiery ordeal, he tenderly entreats him to remain at Gilgal. His faithful companion cannot brook the idea of separation: he solemnly vows that he will never leave his master. At Bethel the sons of the prophets, foreboding E.'s coming removal, ask Elisha if he knows that his master is to be taken away from him. He knows it well, but is too straitened in spirit to speak of it, and entreats them to hold their peace. From Bethel E. proceeds to Jericho, where he again endeavours to persuade his disciple to let him go on this journey alone; but Elisha repeats his vow. At Jericho some of the prophetic guild wish to question Elisha about the impending event, but he begs them to be silent. Fifty sons of the prophets ascend the heights above the city to watch the prophet as he descends with his disciple to the Jordan. They see him strike the river with his mantle; the waters part; the two men cross by the bed of the river and pass out of sight. As they approach their destination, E. asks his disciple if he has any last request to make. Elisha seeks 'a double portion' of his master's spirit—not twice E.'s inspiration, but the portion of an eldest son, who received twice as much as the younger sons (Dt 21<sup>17</sup>). E. replies that it is a hard request. Spiritual gifts are the most difficult of all to transmit. Nevertheless, he assures his follower that if he prove his fitness for prophetic gifts by remain ing with his master to the end, and looking without fear on the dread messengers of the invisible world, his request will not be denied. They now enter the dark mountains of Moab. Somewhere here J<sup>h</sup> Himself laid His servant Moses to rest. No man knew the exact place. 'The whole region is a sepulchre.' As they still advance and talk together, black clouds gather, and a storm descends, the air is filled with fire, and, '... appear chariots of fire and horses of fire, and E. is taken up to heaven in a whirlwind.' Elisha sees him no more. He rends his clothes, and mourns for his master as one mourns for the dead. He is bereft of the prophet who has been to him a father, and to Israel a power as great as its chariots and horsemen. But he has stood the severe test imposed upon him, and receives the reward—the spirit of E. rests upon him. Taking up the mantle which has fallen from his master, he returns from the scene of the translation to the Jordan, and puts his new power to the proof by striking the waters with the mantle and calling upon the God of Elijah. The waters divide as before, and he passes over on dry land. When the sons of the prophets at Jericho hear of what has happened, and perceive that the spirit of E. rests upon his disciple, they bow themselves to the earth and acknowledge Elisha as their new master. But the story of the translation awakens their scepticism, and they send out fifty strong men to make search for the missing prophet. Elisha trying in vain to dissuade them. For three days they prosecute the search among the mountains of Moab, expecting to find E. on some lonely peak or in some dark valley, cast away as at other times by the Spirit of J<sup>h</sup>. When they return and confess that the search has been vain, Elisha gently chides their unbelief (2 K 2<sup>18</sup>).

E. is thus removed from the scene of his labours before the whole task laid upon him (1 K 19<sup>16</sup>) is finished. But Elisha and others enter into his labours, sons of the prophets animated by his spirit are raised up in hundreds, his teaching spreads, his spirit penetrates the nation. Then the harvest is reaped. After two short reigns the idolatrous house of Ahab falls (2 K 9). The enemies of J<sup>h</sup> and of E. perish. Superstition dies hard, but there is never again any question of rivalry between J<sup>h</sup> and Baal. There is no more danger of Baal-worship becoming the national religion. It sinks into the superstition of a sect, known to later prophets as the remnant of Baal (Zeph 1<sup>4</sup>).

The weapons by which this reformation was accomplished were mainly spiritual. It cannot be denied that some of E.'s own actions may have furnished an excuse for certain deeds of violence. It is like a Nemesis that the finishing touch has to be given to the work by a man of blood like Jehu. Yet it was not the fire and sword of Carmel, but the still small voice speaking in the schools of the prophets and the hearts of the faithful that again made Israel a people prepared for J<sup>h</sup>.

E.'s moral power lies in the simplicity of his faith. He realizes the belief in J<sup>h</sup> intensely, and lives a heroic life in the strength of it. 'J<sup>h</sup> before whom I stand' is his favourite formula (1 K 17<sup>18</sup>). He stands erect and haughty before kings; but in the presence of J<sup>h</sup> he wraps his head in his mantle, or crouches to the ground with his face between his knees (1 K 18<sup>42</sup> 19<sup>18</sup>). Stern and rugged by nature, a prophet moulded for heroic work in evil days, he is led through an experience which awakens in him the tenderness that is only to be found in union with strength. His personal history, the narrative of the breakdown of his faith, brings him into touch with human beings in all ages. He is so great that readers of his story are not unthankful for his failings. 'E. was a man of like passions with us' (Ja 5<sup>17</sup>).

Critics differ widely in their estimates of the historical importance of E. Wellhausen thinks that his influence is appraised too highly in the biblical narratives. His struggle with Baal cannot have possessed the importance attributed to it from the point of view of his time. Israel was never torn asunder by such a religious commotion as that described in 1 K 18. It was not Baal that brought about the fall of the house of Ahab, but common treason on the part of Jehu (Proleg. 291). Wellhausen is given occasion to discuss the part played by E. in the eyes of his contemporaries. 'In the eyes of his contemporaries,' he says, 'the prophets were completely overshadowed by the kings; only to later times did they become the principal personages.' E. must hide his diminished head before Ahab. 'He effected nothing against the king, and could not draw the people over to his side.' Wellhausen states no convincing reasons for this interesting view. There is more truth in the opinion of those who think the history of Israel is essentially the history of prophecy. And Kuenen's estimate of E. appears much fairer: 'The consequences of the struggle with the Syrian Baal and the victory of Jahvism were most important. Had the issue of the conflict been different, the existence of J<sup>h</sup>-worship would have been at stake; the danger was an onward the belief in "J the God of Israel" is assailed no longer. The prophets of the eighth century are able to start from it as a universal conviction. For this foundation for their preaching they have to thank Elijah and his school' (Religion of Israel, i. 360).

No OT hero fills a larger place in Jewish tradition than Elijah. How he impressed the minds of his own people in after-ages is shown by the striking eulogium pronounced upon him by the son of Sirach (Sir 48<sup>47</sup>). It became a fixed belief that E. would appear again for the deliverance and restoration of Israel. This is expressed in the very last words of the OT (Mal 4<sup>5-6</sup>). Jesus teaches that this expectation was fulfilled by the appearance of John the Baptist (Mt 17<sup>12-14</sup>). Jesus' cry on the cross, 'Eli, Eli,' was mistaken for a call to Elijah to come for His deliverance (Mt 27<sup>47</sup>, Mk 15<sup>35</sup>). No prophet is mentioned so frequently in the NT as Elijah. The priests and Levites (Jn 1<sup>21</sup>) cannot understand John's right to baptize, if he is neither the Christ, nor Elijah, nor that prophet (like unto Moses, Dt 18<sup>18</sup>). As E. was with Moses in spirit at Sinai and Nebo, so these two prophets appear together conversing with Jesus on the Mount of the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>3</sup>, Mk 9<sup>4</sup>, Lk 9<sup>30</sup>).

It only remains to be said that E. occupies a conspicuous place in the legends and rites of many peoples. Among the Jews he is the expected guest at every passover, for whom a vacant seat is reserved. Among the Greeks he is the patron saint of mountains, and many summits in Greece are now called by his name. In the Roman Catholic Church he is revered as the founder of the Order of the Barefooted Carmelites. By the Mohammedans he is often confounded with the great and mysterious El-Khudr, the Eternal Wanderer, who having drunk the water of life retains everlasting youth, and appears ever and anon to right the wrongs of men. E. is canonized both in the Greek and the Latin Church, his festival being on the 20th July.

LITERATURE.—Driver, LOT 184 ff.; Wellhausen, Comp. 281 ff., Proleg. 290 ff., Hist. of Isr. and Judah, 64 ff.; Stade, Ges. d. V. Isr. i. 524 ff.; W. R. Smith, OTJC 236 f., Proph. of Isr. 76 ff., 116 ff.; Cornill, Isr. Proph. 12, 15, 20, 29-36, 157; Kittel, Hist. of Heb. li. 2:3, 236 ff., 275, 279; Ewald, HI iv. 63 ff.; Gratz, Hist. of Jews (tr. by B. Lowy), i. 204 ff.; Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 126 ff.; Schurer, HJP II. ii. 156 f. iii. 25 f.; Kliefohn, Rel. of Isr., 311 f.; R. H. H. Hist. of People of Isr. (Long tr.) i. 229-242; Montague, Univ. Lect. p. 91 f.; Editor's Sermons on OT Subjects, 185, 209; Milligan, Elijah ('Men of Bible'); Cheyne, Hallowing of Criticism; Farrar, Books of Kings, U. et., Walker and Paterson in Expos. Times, iv. 252 ff., 321.

2. (עֲלִיָּה, AV Eliah) A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8<sup>27</sup>.
3. 4. A priest and a layman who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10<sup>21-22</sup>. J. STRACHAN.

ELIJAH, APOCALYPSE OF.—This is the title of a lost pseudopigraph. work which stands eighth in the stichometrical list of Nicephorus and tenth in an Anglo-Saxon early list. In the first of these it is called Ἡλία προφήτου, and said to consist of 316 verses. In the other its title is Ἡλίου ἀποκάλυψις. The Constitut. Apost. vi. 16 also contain a reference to a writing bearing the name of Elijah. Origen (Comm. Mt 27<sup>9</sup>) informs us that this work was the source of the quotation in 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> 'Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not,' etc. Similar testimony is borne by Euthalius and others, and it is probable that the statement is correct, although Jerome (Comm. Is 64<sup>3</sup>, Ep. 57 ad Pam.) denies it for apologetic reasons. On the other hand, there seems to be less probability in the statement of Epiphanius (Hær. ch. 43), that Eph 5<sup>14</sup> 'Awake thou that sleepest,' etc., was quoted from the same Apoc. of Elijah. Origen makes no mention of this where he might be expected to do so, and Euthalius alleges that the words of Eph 5<sup>14</sup> are derived from a lost Ἡλία, which bore the name of Jeremiah. For information and for the patristic quotations in full, see Fabricius, Cod. Pseud. V.T. i. 1070-1086; Schürer, HJP II. iii. 129 ff. J. A. SELBIE.

ELIKA (עֲלִיקָה), the Harodite, one of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23<sup>25</sup>).—The name is omitted in B, and in the parallel passage 1 Ch 11, owing to the repetition of the gentilic 'the Harodite.'

J. F. STENNING.

ELIM (עֵלִים).—One of the stations in the wanderings of the children of Israel (Ex 15<sup>27</sup>, Nu 33<sup>9</sup>); apparently the fourth station after the passage of the Red Sea, and the first place where the Israelites met with fresh water. It was also marked by an abundant growth of palm trees (cf. Ex 15<sup>27</sup>, twelve wells and seventy palm-trees).

If the traditional site of Mt. Sinai be correct, the likeliest place for Elim is the Wady Ghurundel, where there is a good deal of vegetation, especially stunted palms, and a number of water-holes in the sand; but some travellers have pushed the site of Elim farther on, and placed it almost a day's journey nearer to Sinai, in the Wady Tayibeh, where there are again palm trees and a scanty supply of brackish water. The Greek monks who have located Elim at Tôr were probably guided thereto by the luxuriant palms and a special taste for the extravagant in miracle. The biblical account takes the Israelites from Elim to a camp by the sea; and this accords very well with the experience of travellers who go to Mt. Sinai by the southern route, camping one night in the Wady Ghurundel, and the next night by the shore of the Red Sea.

It should be remembered, however, that grave doubts have been cast upon the popular identification of Mt. Sinai (see SINAI); and as these doubts turn, in part, upon the identification of Elim and of the encampment by the sea, we must be careful not to fall into a topographical reasoning in a circle, so as to identify Sinai by means of Elim, and then Elim by means of Sinai.

It has been suggested that the Elim of Ex 15, Nu 33, is only a variant form of the plural name Eloth which we find in 1 K 9<sup>26</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>17</sup>, a place which was certainly situated near the head of the gulf of Akabah, and whose name still survives in the Arabic Aileh (cf. the suggestive doublet of Hazeroth, Nu 11<sup>28</sup>, and Hazerim, Dt 2<sup>28</sup>). If this be so, then the camp by the sea is to be sought for in the neighbourhood of Akabah, the position of Mt. Sinai is unknown, and the earlier stages of the journey of the children of Israel are to be sought in the vicinity of the present Haj route from Egypt to Mecca. See Beke, Origines Biblicæ, 1839; Baker Greene, The Hebrew Migration from Egypt, 1879; Sayce, HCM, 1894; and the art. EXODUS (ROUTE). J. RENDEL HARRIS.

ELIMELECH (עֲלִמֶלֶךְ 'God is king,'* so the name Malchiel).—The husband of Naomi and father of Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah (cf. 1 S 17<sup>12</sup>). He was driven by a famine into the country of Moab, where, after a residence of undefined length, he died. He is spoken of as if he were the head of a clan in the tribe of Judah (cf. Ru 2<sup>1-8</sup>). This would be the Hezronites (1 Ch 2<sup>9</sup>, cf. Gn 46<sup>12</sup>).

H. A. REDPATH.

ELIOENAI (עֲלִיֶּזֶר 'to J' are mine eyes').—1. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4<sup>38</sup>). 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 7<sup>3</sup>). 3. A descendant of David who lived after the Exile (1 Ch 3<sup>23-24</sup>). 4. A son of Pashhur who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>22</sup>), called in 1 Es 9<sup>22</sup> Elionas. 5. A son of Zattu who had committed the same offence (Ezr 10<sup>27</sup>), called in 1 Es 9<sup>28</sup> Eliadas. 6. A priest (Neh 12<sup>41</sup>).

ELIONAS.—1. (A Ἐλιωνάς, B Ἐλιωνας), 1 Es 9<sup>22</sup>.—In Ezr 10<sup>22</sup> ELIOENAI. 2. (A Ἐλιωνάς, B -δᾶς), 1 Es 9<sup>22</sup>=Ezr 10<sup>21</sup> ELIEZER.

ELIPHAL (עֲלִיפָל 'God hath' 'delivered').—One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>34</sup> Eliphelet (wh. see)).

ELIPHALAT.—1. (A Ἐλιφάλαρος, B Ἐλιφάλα, AV Eliphalet), 1 Es 8<sup>39</sup>.—In Ezr 8<sup>18</sup> ELIPHELET. 2. (Ἐλιφάλατ), 1 Es 9<sup>38</sup>=Ezr 10<sup>38</sup> ELIPHELET.

ELIPHAZ (עֲלִיפָז, possibly 'God is fine gold'; but in the absence of analogous meanings this must be considered very doubtful. LXX generally Ἐλιφᾶς (so A in Gn) or Ἐλειφᾶς (so B in Ch and Job, except 2<sup>11</sup>) or Ἐλιφᾶδ (so A in Ch and Job, and D in Gn 36<sup>16</sup>) is the name of two persons mentioned in OT. 1. E. appears in the genealogy of Gn 36 (and hence 1 Ch 1<sup>35</sup>) as son of Esau by Adah (vv. 4<sup>10</sup>), and father of Amalek by his Horite concubine Timnah (vv. 12<sup>22</sup>). In v. 15<sup>15</sup> various other sons are mentioned, as 'the dukes that came of E. in the land of Edom,' noticeable among them being 'Duke Teman,' and another is the well-known tribal name Kenaz. See further, art. EDMOM. 2. See next article. G. B. GRAY.

ELIPHAZ (עֲלִיפָז, LXX Ἐλιφᾶς, an Idumæan name, transposed=Phasaël?).—Described as the first, and apparently the oldest and most important, friend of Job. He is called 'the Temanite.' Teman was a son of Eliphaz, the eldest son of Esau (Gn 36<sup>10, 15</sup>); and ἔϕ was a district of Idumæa, proverbially known for its wisdom (Jer 49<sup>7</sup>). It is mentioned in close connexion with Edom in Jer 49<sup>20</sup>. E. speaks at greater length than either Bildad or Zophar; his speeches are recorded in Job 4. 5. 15. and 22. He is also more moderate in tone than the others; his first speech, especially, is gravely tender towards what he holds to be Job's errors. Many of his utterances, taken by themselves, contain important truth; but his orthodox statements and maxims fail to cover the facts of Job's case. In his later speeches E. speaks more directly and sharply, but he never becomes violent or cruel. For an outline of his arguments, see JOB, BOOK OF. W. T. DAVISON.

* Or acc. to others, 'My god is Melek' (the god-king).

ELIPHELEHU (עֲלִיפְהֵלֵהוּ 'may God deliver him,' AV Elipheleh).—A doorkeeper (1 Ch 11<sup>16</sup>).

ELIPHELET (עֲלִיפְהֵלֵט 'God is deliverance').—1. One of David's sons (2 S 5<sup>16</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>7</sup> AV Eliphalet), 1 Ch 35<sup>8</sup>=Elpelet of 1 Ch 14<sup>5</sup>). The double occurrence of the name in Chronicles, as if David had had two sons named E., is probably due to a scribal error. 2. One of David's mighty men (2 S 23<sup>34</sup> AV Eliphelet of 1 Ch 11<sup>35</sup>). 3. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Ch 8<sup>5</sup>). 4. One of the sons of Adonikam who returned from exile (Ezr 8<sup>18</sup>=Eliphlat of 1 Es 8<sup>39</sup>). 5. A son of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10<sup>33</sup>=Eliphlat of 1 Es 9<sup>33</sup>).

ELISABETH (Ἑλισάβετ 'God is an oath,' Ex 6<sup>23</sup>).—The mother of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>57</sup>). E. herself belonged to the priestly family of Aaron, and was a kinswoman (συγγενὴς) of the Virgin Mary, though we do not know what the actual relationship was. She is described, along with Zacharias, as 'righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.' Upon her, however, had fallen what to a Jewish woman was the heaviest of misfortunes, the reproach of barrenness. And not till she and her husband were 'well stricken in years' was the promise of a son given them. Five months later Elisabeth was visited in her home in the hill-country of Judah by her kinswoman Mary, and the degree of illumination which she had reached is proved by her addressing Mary as 'the mother of my Lord' (Lk 1<sup>43</sup>). See ZACHARIAS. G. MILLIGAN.

ELISEUS.—See ELISHA.

ELISHA (עִישָׁא 'God is salvation'; LXX Ἐλισαῖος; NT Ἐλισαῖος, AV Eliseus).—The son of Shaphat, of the tribe of Issachar, the disciple and successor of the prophet Elijah. He is first mentioned in the threefold commission with which Elijah is charged by J' at Horeb (1 K 19<sup>16</sup>). Obeying the divine voice, Elijah goes to Abel-meholah ('meadow of the dance,' probably Ain Helweh) in the N. part of the Jordan Valley, not far from his native Gilead, where he finds E. ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen in one of the rich level fields of his father's heritage, eleven yoke being with his servants, and he left with the twelve (19<sup>19</sup>). Leaving the highway, Elijah passes over to him, and throws his mantle over his shoulders—a symbolic act of double significance: he adopts E. as his son, and invests him with the prophetic office. No word is spoken, but the symbol is understood. Elijah, probably resuming his mantle, strides on, leaving E. amazed at the sudden call, and bewildered by the necessity of making so tremendous a decision. But the young man's natural shrinking from so high a calling—a hesitation similar to that of Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah—is quickly overcome by the consciousness that this is a call from God. Running after Elijah, he declares his readiness to follow him, only begging permission to return and give the kiss of farewell to his father and mother. The mention of domestic ties opens Elijah's eyes to the greatness of the sacrifice he is calling E. to make: perhaps it is too great for the youth; at any rate his choice must be voluntary and deliberate; the casting of the mantle over him was in itself nothing. There is no accent of rebuke, but tender consideration for E.'s natural feelings, in the austere prophet's testing words. 'Go back again, for what have I done unto thee?' E. however, has made his choice. He is ready to leave father and mother, and houses and lands, and marks his act of self-renunciation by a sacrifice which has sacramental significance. Unyoking the oxen from his plough, he slays them, and taking the plough, the goad and the yokes for fuel, roasts the flesh of the oxen, and invites his people to a farewell feast. Then, having kissed his parents, he follows Elijah, and ministers unto him. One graphic touch indicates his relation to the greater prophet: he is referred to as 'E. the son of Shaphat, who poured water on the hands of Elijah' (2 K 3<sup>11</sup>). They seem to have been together some six or seven years (1 K 22<sup>1</sup>, 2 K 1<sup>17</sup>). How and where this time was spent is not definitely stated. There is no evidence that Elijah ever called E. to be a dweller in desert solitudes. There are rather indications that during these years they lived in familiar intercourse with the sons of the prophets (2 K 2). The narrative of Elijah's last journey shows the deep filial affection, as well as reverence, which he had awakened in E. See ELIJAH. From the scene of the parting, Elisha returns bearing Elijah's mantle, and endued with a 'double portion' of his spirit. Thus began a prophetic career in N. Israel which lasted for more than half a century, during the reigns of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Joash.

E. is Elijah's spiritual successor, but he presents in many respects a new type of prophet to his teacher. Only in one respect does he wear Elijah's mantle: after the death of his teacher, he appears no more. He wears the common garments (2 K 2<sup>24</sup>), and carries the walking-staff of ordinary grave citizens, sometimes using it for working miracles (2 K 4<sup>20</sup>). With his bald head, he does not escape unfavourable comparison with the prophet of the flowing locks (2 K 2<sup>2</sup>). E. is no son of the desert. Brought up at a peaceful farm in the Jordan Valley, amid the sweet charms of home (1 K 19<sup>20</sup>), he always prefers human companionship. He is generally found in cities, sojourning at Jericho among the sons of the prophets, or dwelling in his own house at Samaria or at Dothan (2 K 6<sup>14, 25</sup>). A prophet's chamber is built for him by a lady of Shunem (4<sup>10</sup>). Elijah's power was derived from communion with J' in lonely mountains and valleys; E. is helped by the strains of music—the 'hand of J'' is upon him when the minstrel plays (2 K 3<sup>15</sup>).

Elijah's short career was memorable for a few grand and impressive scenes, E.'s long career is marked by innumerable deeds of mercy. Both in public and in private life his activity is incessant. He enters palaces not as an enemy, but as a friend and counsellor. Kings reverently address him as 'father' (2 K 6<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>24</sup>). The kings of Israel, Judah, and Moab come to seek his advice in war (3<sup>11-19</sup>). The king of Syria consults him in sickness, and offers him costly presents (8<sup>7-9</sup>). The king of Israel comes to receive his parting counsels (13<sup>15-19</sup>). His influence at court and in the army would immediately secure a boon for a friend from the king or the captain of the host (4<sup>23</sup>). He is expert in camp-life, ambush, and scouting, and more than once is the means of saving the life of the king (6<sup>10</sup>). Even more than in palaces is he welcome in the homes of the people. He is 'the holy man of God who passeth by us continually' (4<sup>9</sup>). Most of his miracles are deeds of gracious and homely beneficence. Elijah began his career by predicting a famine in the land; E. begins his by healing a spring, that there might not be 'from thence any more death or barren land' (2<sup>21</sup>).

Several of E.'s recorded words and deeds seem to show how much he profited by the chastening experience—and it may be by the direct teaching—of Elijah. He has learned the lesson of toleration: when Naaman inquires if it is possible to reconcile the homage due to Rimmon with loyalty to J', E. sends him away with a word of peace (5<sup>18</sup>). He knows how to temper justice with mercy: he forgives his own and his countrymen's sins when he has them entirely in his hands (6<sup>2</sup>). Yet he has his master's sternness when it is needed. He refuses to speak to Jehoram king of Israel, that 'son of a murderer' (3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>32</sup>). Not in vain was it prophesied at Horeb, 'him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu shall E. slay.' It is E. who devises the plot that leads to the overthrow of the house of Ahab (9<sup>1-9</sup>). And though he weeps for his country when he foresees the coming of the ferocious Hazael will bring upon Israel, yet he does not shrink from anointing him king of Syria (8<sup>12</sup> 13).

As a prophet E. had no new truth to proclaim. But he exercised a wide and lasting influence as the head of the prophetic guilds for more than half a century. The sons of the prophets regard him with profound reverence (2<sup>15</sup>), and obey him implicitly (9<sup>1</sup>). E.'s single aim is to complete the reforms begun by Elijah—to re-establish the ancient truth, and repel heathen superstition. He is a statesman as well as a prophet. Among all the prophets, none intervene in the high national affairs more boldly than E., and none so successfully. For many years he eagerly watches every turn of events. When the nation is ripe for revolution, he summons the destined man at an opportune moment, puts an end to the Tyrian domination, and extirpates the base Tyrian superstition. After the fall of the Omride dynasty, he is the trusted friend and sagacious adviser of the house of Jehu, and the strength and inspiration of Israel in all its trials. Even to old age his zeal burns unquenchable: in the closing scene of his life the patriot is as evident as the seer; and his bequest to Israel is hope (13<sup>15-19</sup>). E. has no stormy spiritual experience like his master, and does not hold such immediate converse with J', yet he too has visions. He sees Elijah borne away to heaven by chariots and horses of fire; and at Dothan, when the town is surrounded by enemies, and his servant cries out to him in fear, he bids the young man look to the mountains, and see that they are full of chariots and horses of fire round about Elisha (6<sup>17</sup>).

It is impossible to arrange the events of E.'s life in chronological sequence. While the topography of the narrative is often precise, there is a singular want of definiteness as to personal names and dates. The only indication of time afforded by several of the anecdotes is the mention of the 'king of Israel'; but as no name is specified, the reader is left to conjecture which of the four kings who were the prophet's contemporaries may be referred to. It is impossible to say in whose reign the cure of Naaman, or the attempt of the Syrians to capture E., took place. In some cases occurrences are obviously grouped together, according to the connexion of their contents (2 K 2. 4). In others no principle of arrangement is apparent, and the loose connexion of the narratives becomes very awkward. For instance, the siege of Samaria by the Syrians is described immediately after it has been stated that 'the bands of Syria came no more into the land of Israel' (6<sup>32</sup>). Gehazi appears in familiar intercourse with 'the king of Israel' after the account of his punishment with leprosy (5<sup>27</sup> 8<sup>4</sup>); and the visit of Joash to E. during the prophet's last illness is related just after the mention of the death of Joash (13<sup>12</sup>). Most of E.'s deeds and experiences are set down before the account of Jehu's revolution; but the prophet lived 45 years after that event, and his influence in the nation was certainly greater, and his deeds of beneficence probably more numerous, after than before the overthrow of his enemies.

The narratives are for the most part a record of E.'s activity as a seer, diviner, and worker of miracles, rather than as a prophet in the usual sense of the word. The ordinary prophet is a revealer of spiritual truth, and a preacher of righteousness. If he is represented as working miracles at all, they are in connection with his teaching functions.

The traditions of E. represent him chiefly as a wonder-worker. He suspends the laws of nature (6<sup>8</sup>), foresees future events (8<sup>12</sup>), divines the secret thoughts of men (5<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>), and knows what events are happening out of sight or at a distance (6<sup>32</sup>).

It will be convenient (A) to group together E.'s deeds in his more private life, and afterwards (B) refer to his achievements as the friend and adviser of kings.

A. (1) Recessing at the Jordan after Elijah's translation. E. either dwells or sojourns (עָוָה) at Jericho, lately rebuilt (1 K 16<sup>34</sup>) in a 'pleasant situation' (2 K 2<sup>19</sup>), the fertility of whose groves and gardens was due then, as always, to its perennial springs. At the time of E.'s visit one of these springs has noxious properties, which make it unfit for drinking, and injurious to the land (2<sup>19</sup>). The citizens represent the facts to E., who, taking salt in a new vessel, casts it into the spring, and in the name of J' declares the water healed (2<sup>21</sup>). (2) From Jericho E. goes to Bethel, which he had lately visited with Elijah (2<sup>23</sup>). Passing through the wooded gorge (now called the Wady Suweinit), which leads up to the town, he is met by a noisy troop of boys, who, though they were probably very respectful to the great and awful Elijah, stand in no fear of his youthful successor, and rudely greet him with shouts of 'Go up, thou bald head!' E. turns and curses them in the name of J', and two she-bears come out of the wood and rend forty-two of them in pieces. One naturally asks if this narrative is literal history. The extreme severity of the punishment is evidently out of all proportion to the offence. The deed is strikingly in contrast to E.'s conduct on other occasions (see especially 2 K 6<sup>20-22</sup>). One MS. of the Sept. inserts the word ἐλθόντων ('they pelted him with stones'), the transcriber evidently feeling the moral difficulty. Some of the Rabbis say that E. was punished with sickness for the deed. The story probably had some basis in fact, but in its present form it reads like a folklore tale, of the kind familiar in all lands, intended for the admonition of rude and naughty children. (3) The widow of one of the sons of the prophets—the name and place are wanting—is in debt, and her sons are about to be taken away by her creditor and sold as slaves. She has nothing left in her house but a pot of oil, but E. causes the oil to multiply till it fills all the vessels she can borrow from her neighbours. Having sold the oil, she pays her debt, and lives with her sons on the surplus (2 K 4<sup>1</sup> 7). (4) The next reminiscence (2 K 4<sup>28-37</sup>) gives a charming picture of private life in Israel. As E. chances to pass the village of Shunem (now Sôlam, three miles from Jezreel, on the slopes of little Hermon), he is pressed to accept hospitality by a lady of substance. Whenever he passes that way again, he turns in to eat bread. The lady is so impressed by the character of the man of God that she persuades her husband to build a chamber on the roof of the house, to which the prophet may have free access at all times. As a recompense for her kindness, E. grants her fondest wish: a child is born to her. After some years— the narrative goes on without break—her son dies of sunstroke. The lady rides to Carmel, and summons E., who comes and restores the boy to life. (5) E. is next found residing at Gilgal, with the sons of the prophets, during a famine (4<sup>38-41</sup>). People are subsisting on any roots that can be found. One of the young prophets brings home some wild gourds (נִרְאָה, Vulg. colocynthis agri), and shreds them into the caldron. But when they begin to eat, the taste reveals the presence of poison, and they cry out, 'O man of God, there is death in the pot.' 'Bring meal,' answers the wonder-worker, and forthwith the dish is rendered harmless and wholesome. (6) Apparently during the same famine, while E. is still living at Gilgal, he is visited by a farmer from Baal-shalishah (4<sup>42a</sup>), who brings him a present of first-fruits—twenty loaves of new barley and a sack full of fresh ears of corn (Lv 24<sup>23-24</sup>). E. bids his servant set them before a hundred men. The servant hesitates, but the small supply is miraculously rendered sufficient for the whole company. (7) The next narrative (2 K 5) gives an account of the healing of Naaman—the only miracle of E. which is referred to in the NT (Lk 4<sup>47</sup>). Naaman, commander-in-chief of the army of Syria, being afflicted with the most malignant kind of leprosy (צִנְעָה, white variety, v. 25), hears of the prophet E. through a Hebrew maid, kidnapped in a border foray and taken into his household. He resolves to visit the great healer. When he arrives at the prophet's door, attended by his train of horses and chariots, E. sends a servant to direct him to go and bathe seven times in the Jordan. Naaman, who has expected a deferential reception and a striking ceremonial, is enraged by the seeming want of courtesy, and even more by the nature of the prescription. But his servants calm his ruffled temper; and when he obeys the prophet's command, his flesh comes again as the flesh of a little child. He returns to thank and reward his benefactor, but E. refuses to touch any of the presents which are pressed on his acceptance. Naaman, made to feel by E.'s self-denial that the glory is due to E.'s God, resolves to become a worshipper of J'. He asks permission to take earth from Israel, that he may erect an altar to the God of Israel; his idea being the popular one, that J' was a local deity, and could only be worshipped on his own soil. E. does not seek to correct his mistake. He even gives the proselyte permission to continue to pay outward homage to Rimmon, the god worshipped by the king of Syria (5<sup>18-19</sup>). Naaman having departed in peace, E.'s servant Gehazi follows him, and by dint of lying obtains the treasure which E. refused. But E. divines his dishonesty, and dooms him and his house to be afflicted with the leprosy of Naaman for ever (5<sup>27</sup>). (8) The sons of the prophets, who are increasing in numbers, resolve to build a larger dwelling-place by the Jordan. While they are engaged in felling trees, the head of a borrowed axe flies off and falls into the water. It would be vain to search for it in the deep and turbid river. But a cry brings the man of God to the spot. He breaks off a stick and casts it into the stream, and forthwith the iron comes to the surface, and is restored to its possessor.

B. The remaining narratives exhibit E. in his relation to kings and rulers, and recount some of his services to his country as an inspired seer and wise counsellor. (1) E. is with the confederate armies of Israel, Judah, and Edom, in a campaign against Mesha, king of Moab (2 K 3<sup>1-20</sup>). His presence is not discovered till the armies are perishing for lack of water. When the three kings, in their extremity, come to him for counsel, he refuses to have anything to do with the king of Israel, bidding him go to the prophets of his father

Ahab and his mother Jezebel. But out of respect for Jehoram, king of Judah, he consents to give his advice. When a minstrel plays before him, and the hand of J' is upon him, he commands that deep trenches be dug, and prophesies that though they shall see no rain, yet the valley will be filled with water. His orders are obeyed, and next morning, owing to a plentiful fall of rain high among the mountains of Moab, the torrents swell, and all the country is filled with water. (2) The next narrative (2 K 6<sup>23-25</sup>) presents the prophet in a very pleasing light, fearless though an host encamps against him, confident though war rises against him, and untroubled by his treatment of his baffled enemy. Bands of Syrians have made numerous incursions into the north country, but all their movements have been mysteriously checkmated. Whenever they have laid an ambush in 'such and such a place,' E. has warned the king of Israel to avoid the spot, thereby saving the king's life 'not once nor twice.' Benhadad, finding all his designs frustrated, begins to suspect treachery in his camp. When he hears the true explanation, he sends a strong force of horses and chariots to Dothan to capture Elisha. After comforting his alarmed servant with a vision of the spiritual hosts that always surround the dwellings of the just, the prophet goes down to meet the Syrians, and in answer to his prayer they are struck with blindness (עִוְרָה, a word found only here and in Gn 19<sup>11</sup>, probably meaning illusion, ἀσθένεια). Then telling them, evidently not without a relish of the ludicrous aspect of the situation, that they have lost their way and come to the wrong city, he offers to conduct them to the person whom they are seeking. He leads them into the heart of Samaria. When their eyes are opened in answer to E.'s prayer, they find themselves at the mercy of the enemy. The king would have executed them, but E. enjoins him to set food before them, and send them back to their master. An enemy at once so powerful and so merciful makes such an impression upon the Syrians that their marauding expeditions entirely cease. (3) The next incident (6<sup>27-32</sup>), though introduced without remark immediately after the last, evidently occurred at a different time. The king of Syria gathered a great army to besiege Samaria. E. exhorted the men of Israel to defend their city to the last. When the besieged are reduced to famine, he still counsels no surrender, and heartens the people with the prophecy of coming deliverance. The king of Israel—who is not named—wishes to capitulate. He vents his helpless rage upon E., and vows to take his life, because the prophet will not swerve from his purpose even when the people of the city are eating the flesh of their own children. While E. is in his house giving counsel to the elders of Israel, he divines that a messenger of the king is on his way to take his life, and that the king is following close behind. When the king enters, the prophet declares that on the morrow there will be abundance of food at the gate of the city. One of the king's officers sneers at the sanguine prediction: 'Yes, no doubt, J' will open windows in heaven! And yet can this thing be?' E. retorts that the officer will see the abundance, but shall not eat of it. During the night there is a panic in the Syrian host, the camp is deserted, and every part of the prophecy fulfilled. (4) We next find E. at Damascus. Having heard of the mortal sickness of Benhadad, he realizes that the time has come to execute the commission which Elijah received at Sinai, by anointing Hazael to be king of Syria. No sooner does E., whose fame as a prophet has now spread far beyond Israel, enter the city of Damascus, than the tidings are carried to the palace. King Ben-hadad immediately sends Hazael, his commander-in-chief, laden with presents, to inquire of the seer if he may recover of his sickness. E.'s reply is uncertain: according to one reading, he bids Hazael return and tell the king that he shall surely recover; according to another reading, '... and he,' and therefore probably authentic, Hazael is to reply that Benhadad shall surely die. At any rate, E. leaves Hazael in no doubt that the king is not to recover, and that his successor is none other than Hazael himself. But it is a hard task which J' has laid upon E.—to anoint the man whom he knows as the destined scourge of Israel. E., as he looks steadfastly in the fierce captain's face and foresees the coming evil, bursts into tears. When J' ... what his weeping means, E. shows

The Syrian, who has no ear for the tale of Israel's sufferings, and thinks only of the promise of personal distinction, replies ironically that the task is too great for a dog like him. But E. assures him in plain words that J' has chosen him to be king of Syria. (5) The chief business of E.'s life is to avenge the crimes and apostasy of the house of Ahab. The mission to anoint Jehu king over Israel, which Elijah did not live to fulfil, must be carried out by his successor. During a war between Israel and Syria for the possession of Ramoth-gilead, Ahab's son Jehoram is wounded, and goes home to Samaria to be cured. His ally the king of Judah leaves the army, and goes to visit him (8<sup>2d</sup>). During their absence E. calls one of the sons of the prophets, and sends him to Ramoth-gilead, with instructions to seek out Jehu, and secretly anoint him king. As soon as Jehu divulges the secret to his brother officers, they proclaim him king, and the whole army at once espouses his cause. The nation has long been ready for a change, and the house of Omri falls without being able to strike a blow in self-defence (9<sup>1st</sup>). (6) E. lives to extreme old age, and his last

... given to his country. It is sad to ... in spite of all his labours, Israel has become feeble and dependent. During the reigns of the pusillanimous sons of Jehu, the Syrians have done to Israel according to their will, and the nation has more than once been brought to the verge of extinction. But Jehu's grandson Joash is a youth of great promise, and E. sees in him one capable of making Israel once more independent and prosperous. The young king comes down to visit the aged prophet as he lies on his peaceful death-bed (13<sup>1st</sup>). The king is moved to tears. No words could be more appropriate than those in which he addresses the prophet: 'My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof.' E. has still the spirit of the master to whom he first applied these words (2 K 2<sup>12</sup>). To impress on the young king's mind a sense of his duty, he uses a fine piece of symbolism. The window is opened eastward, toward the country of the enemy, the king's bow is pointed in that direction, the prophet's consecrating hand is laid on the king's right hand, and 'the arrow of J''s deliverance, of deliverance from Syria,' is discharged. The king is then commanded to take up a sheaf of arrows and smite the ground. He smites only three times, and halts. This does not please the zealous old prophet: before closing his eyes he would fain have foreseen that the enemies of the people of J' would be defeated five or six times; as it is, the king has only energy enough to smite them thrice.

There is one other tradition regarding E., and that the most marvellous of all. His wonder-working power does not terminate with his life. In the spring of the year after his decease a burial is taking place in the cemetery which contains his sepulchre, when it chanced that a band of marauding Moabites comes in sight. The mourners, in their eagerness either to attack or to escape from the invaders, hastily place the corpse in the tomb of Elisha. No sooner does the body touch the bones of the prophet than the dead man revives and stands upon his feet (13<sup>2d</sup>).

The foundation of E.'s character is laid in the strong affections of his home-life (1 K 19<sup>20</sup>). He learns to call the great ascetic prophet his 'father,' but he never ceases to be attached to his fellow-men. While his career is less impressive than that of Elijah, his achievement is to make a common life illustrious. It cannot be said that all the narratives show him in an equally favourable light, but on the whole he is represented as humane, large-minded, tender-hearted, a ... led to comfort, heal, and reconcile. ... side-lights are thrown on his character. His quick perception of the fitness of things is evidenced by his choice of beasts for a burnt-offering and fuel for his sacrifice (1 K 19<sup>21</sup>), his sense of humour by his treatment of the Syrian emissaries (2 K 6<sup>19</sup>), and his tenderness of heart by his tears over Israel's coming misfortunes (2 K 8<sup>21</sup>). He is constantly (29 times in all) called the man of God, and he proves his love of God by loving men. His religion is to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction (2 K 4<sup>1</sup>). And amid all the seductions of court favour he retains the true prophetic simplicity of character and contempt for worldly wealth (5<sup>1</sup>). Like his great master Elijah, he is eulogized by the son of Sirach (Sir 48<sup>12-14</sup>).

Some of E.'s miracles—the dividing of the Jordan, the increase of the widow's oil, the restoration of the Shunammite's son—are almost identical with the recorded miracles of Elijah. The healing of the leper and the multiplying of the barley loaves bring to mind some of the miracles of Jesus. But it has often been remarked that to find parallels to the miracles of the iron axe-head made to swim, the noxious well healed with salt, the poisoned pot rendered harmless with meal, and the dead man quickened by the touch of the prophet's bones, we must go outside the Scriptures. Stanley says that 'E.'s works stand alone in their likeness to the acts of the mediæval saints. There alone in the sacred history the gulf between biblical and ecclesiastical miracles almost disappears.' And ... the stories of E. to 'other Jewish ... for edification in the schools of the prophets, but no more intended for perfectly literal acceptance in all their details than the life of St. Anthony or St. Francis.'

Elisha is canonized in the Greek Church, his festival being on the 14th of June.

LITERATURE.—Driver, LOT 1851; Wellhausen, Comp. 286 ff.; W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 85 ff., 116, 208 ff.; Cornill, Isr. Proph. 141, 33 ff.; Kittel, Hist. of Heb. ii. 214 f., 265, 275, 289 ff., 290, 292 f.; Farrar, Bks. of Kings, ii. cit.; Kuenen, Rel. of Isr. i. 380 ff.; Graetz, Hist. of Jews (tr. by B. Lowy), i. 213; Renan, Hist. of People of Isr. (Eng. tr.), ii. 229 ff.; Montefiore, Hibbert Lect. p. 94 f.; Maurice, Prophets and Kings, 142; Liddon, Sermons on OT Subjects, 195-234.

J. STRACHAN.

ELISHAH (עִלְיָשָׁה, 'Elišā, 'Elišā, 'Elišā).—The eldest son of Javan according to Gn 10<sup>4</sup>. In Ezk 27 the Tyrians are said to have procured their purple dye from the 'isles' or 'coastlands' of E., which shows that we must look for the locality in the Greek seas. Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 1) identified E. with the Æolian; phonetically, however, this is impossible; moreover, Greek ethnology made Æolus the brother, and not the son, of Ion, the Heb. Javan. Many modern writers have seen Elis in E.; but the name of Elis properly began with digamma, and is probably the same as the Lat. vallis. Dillmann proposed to identify E. with Southern Italy, and Movers with Carthage; both identifications, however, are inconsistent with the statement that it was the source of the purple dye, and it is difficult to find any name on either the Italian or the African coast which can be compared with that of Elshah.

The Tel el-Amarna tablets have thrown a new light on the question. Several of them are letters to the Pharaoh from 'the king of Alasia,' a country which a hieratic docket attached to one of them identifies with the Egyptian Alsa. Alsa, sometimes read Arosa, was overrun by Thothmes III., and is mentioned in the list of his Syrian conquests engraved on the walls of Karnak (Nos. 213 and 236; Recueil de Travaux, x. p. 210) makes Alsa or Alasia the northern part of Coele-Syria. An unpublished hieratic papyrus, however, now in the Hermitage of St. Petersburg, which describes an embassy sent by sea to the king of Gebal in the time of the high priest Hir-Hor, states that the Egyptian envoys were wrecked on the coast of Alsa, where they were afterwards hospitably entertained by the queen of the country. Alsa or Alasia therefore must have adjoined the Mediterranean, and Winckler and W. Max Müller accordingly propose to see in it the island of Cyprus. Conder had already suggested that Alasia and E. are one and the same. The two chief objections to the identification with Cyprus are that the ordinary Egyptian name of that island was Asi, and that Thothmes III. includes the country among his Syrian conquests.

It is tempting to identify E., on the phonetic side, with the Greek Hellas. We might assume that the Egyptian form of the name, Alsa, was taken from the cuneiform Alasia, in which the initial aspirate of the Greek would not be expressed. But the Homeric poems seem to show that the name of Hellas could not have migrated from its original home in northern Greece to the eastern basin of the Mediterranean so early as the age of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. Moreover, as late as the reign of the Assyrian Sargon, Cyprus was still known to the inhabitants of Asia as 'the country of the Ionians,' not of the Hellenes, while a Yivana or 'Ionian' is mentioned in two of the Tel el-Amarna letters. The termination of Alasia implies a Greek adjective in -ios, and it is possible that Crete, rather than Cyprus, is intended by the name.

LITERATURE.—Sayce, HCM 130; Conder, Bible and the East.
A. H. SAYCE.

ELISHAMA (עֲלִישָׁמָא 'God has heard').—1. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim at the census in the wilderness, son of Ammihud, and grandfather of Joshua (Nu 1<sup>10</sup> 2<sup>18</sup>, 1 Ch 7<sup>26</sup>). 2. One of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (2 S 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 3<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>7</sup>). 3. In 1 Ch 3<sup>8</sup> by mistake for Elishua (which see) of 2 S 5<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>5</sup>. 4. A descendant of Judah, son of Jekamiah (1 Ch 24<sup>1</sup>). 5. The father of Nethaniah, and grandfather of Ishmael, 'of the seed royal,' who killed Gedaliah at the time of the Exile (2 K 25<sup>25</sup>, Jer 41<sup>1</sup>). Jerome, following Jewish tradition, identifies him with No. 4. See Sayce HCM 380 f. 6. A scribe or secretary to Jehoiakim (Jer 36<sup>12</sup> 20, 21). 7. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17<sup>8</sup>). R. M. BOYD.

ELISHAPHAT (עֲלִישָׁפָת 'God hath judged').—One of the captains who helped Jehonada to instal king Joash (2 Ch 23<sup>1</sup>).

ELISHEBA (עֲלִישֶׁבָּת 'God is an oath'), LXX, Ελισβεθ B, Ελισβετ A<sup>1</sup> (cf. Lk 1<sup>7</sup>), daughter of Amminadab, sister of Nahshon, a prince of the tribe of Judah, and wife of Aaron. The name occurs only in Ex 6<sup>22</sup> (P). W. C. ALLEN.

ELISHUA (עֲלִישָׁא, 2 S 5<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>5</sup>).—A son of David born at Jerusalem. The variant in 1 Ch 3<sup>8</sup>, עֲלִישָׁא, is due to the similar name occurring in the next line. J. F. STENNING.

ELIUD (Ἐλισούδ).—An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1<sup>25</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ELIZAPHAN (עֲלִיזָפָן 'God has protected'; cf. Phoen. עֲלִיזָפָן, Ἐλισταφάν).—1. Prince of the Kohathites, son of Uzziel, Nu 3<sup>30</sup>, 1 Ch 15<sup>8</sup> (Ἐλισταφάν), 2 Ch 29<sup>13</sup> = Elzaphan (עֲלִיזָפָן, Ἐλισταφάν), Ex 6<sup>22</sup>, Lv 10<sup>4</sup> P. 2. Zebulun's representative for dividing the land (Nu 34<sup>25</sup> P). G. H. BATTERSBY.

ELIZUR (עֲלִיזֹר 'God is a Rock,' cf. ZURIEL, Ἐλισταίρ).—Prince of Reuben at the first census (Nu 1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>30</sup>, 35 10<sup>18</sup> P). A similar name occurs in the Zinjerli inscriptions (8th cent. B.C.), Bir-tsūr, 'the god Bir is a rock' (Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad., 320), or Bar-tsūr, 'son of a rock' (D. H. Muller). G. H. BATTERSBY.

ELKANAH (עֲלְקָנָה 'God has possessed').—1. The second son of Korah, brother to Assir and Abiasaph, one of the clans of the Korahites (Ex 6<sup>24</sup>). We are told that 'the children of Korah died not' in the overthrow of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 26<sup>11</sup>). 2. The son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the son of Zuph, an Ephraimite of Ramathaim-zophim,* of the hill country of Ephraim, the husband of Hannah, his favourite wife, and Peninnah. Hannah felt her childlessness very much, especially as Peninnah mocked her for it; but E. endeavoured to comfort her. At length, after several yearly visits to the temple at Shiloh, Hannah was promised a son. This son was called Samuel, and Hannah and her husband offered him to the Lord when he was but an infant, and left him with Eli on their return to Ramah (1 S 1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>11</sup>). 3. The son of Assir, the son of Korah (1 Ch 6<sup>22</sup>), apparently identical with (1), and an ancestor of (2). 4. The father of Zuph or Zophai (1 Ch 6<sup>23</sup>, 35). 5. An ancestor of Berechiah, the son of Asa, 'that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites' (1 Ch 9<sup>15</sup>). 6. One of David's mighty men, a Korahite (1 Ch 12<sup>5</sup>). 7. One of the two doorkeepers for the ark (1 Ch 15<sup>23</sup>), perhaps identical with (6). 8. 'That was next to the king,' slain in the reign of Ahaz with 'Maaseiah the king's son, and Azrikam the ruler of the house,' by Zichri, 'a mighty man of Ephraim' (2 Ch 28<sup>7</sup>).

H. A. REDPATH.

ELKIAH (Ἐλκαῖα).—An ancestor of Judith, Jth 8<sup>1</sup>.

ELKOSHITE (עֲלִקֹשִׁי, LXX Ἐλκωσιταῖος).—A gentile adjective employed to describe the prophet Nahum (1<sup>1</sup>), implying that a place named Elkosh was his birthplace. Three identifications have been proposed for the latter. (1) Jerome (in his Comm.) locates Elkosh at a village in Galilee named Elcesi (cf. also Capernaum = כְּפָרְנָחַי (?), 'village of Nahum'). (2) In a work ascribed to Epiphanius, On the Prophets, how they died and where they were buried, we are told that 'Nahum was of Elkosh, beyond Bêt Gabrê, of the tribe of Simeon.' This Bêt Gabrê is Beit Jibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis, N.E. of Lachi-h. (3) Mediaeval tradition connected Nahum with Elkush on a tributary of the Tigris, 2 days' journey N. of Mosul (Nineveh). We must be content to leave the prophet's birthplace uncertain, although weighty considerations plead in the first of these places there is no connecting link between the Elkanah mentioned and Samuel. The usual explanation given of this apparent discrepancy is that the Levites in any part of the tribe amongst whom they were dwelling; but this does not seem very satisfactory.

* For this name see art. RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM. In 1 Ch 6<sup>23</sup> 35

in favour of the second of the above identifications.

LITERATURE.—A. B. Davidson, Nahum, Introd. § 1; Nestle, Zeitsch. d. deutsch. Pal. Vereins, 1. 222 f. (transl. in PEFSI (1879), p. 136 ff.); G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 231 n.

J. A. SELBIE.

ELLASAR (עֲלָסָר, 'Ellasār, Pontus).—Arioch, king of Ellasar, was one of the vassal Babylonian kings who took part along with their suzerain, Chedor-laomer of Elam, in his campaign against Canaan (Gn 14<sup>1</sup>). In the early days of Assyriology (see F. Lenormant, La Chaldée primitive de la Chaldée (1875), pp. 377, 513), he was already identified by the decipherers of the cuneiform inscriptions with Eri-Aku, king of Larsa, who was called Rim-Sin (or Rim-Agu) by his Semitic subjects. The identification has now been verified by further discoveries, which have shown that Eri-Aku was a contemporary of Kudur-Lagamar (Chedor-laomer) of Elam, Tudghula or Tid'al, and Khammurabi or Ammi-rabi, whom recent research has proved to be the Amraphel of Genesis. Larsa is now represented by the mounds of Senkereh, in Lower Babylonia, on the east bank of the Euphrates and about midway between the sites of Uruk (Warka) and Ur (Mukayyar). One of its early names was Arama, and it was celebrated for its temple and worship of the Sun-god (see Sayce, Religion of the Ancients, pp. 166, 167). The temple, called 'Temple of the Semites', was of very ancient date, and had been restored by Ur-bau (?), B.C. 2700, by Khammurabi, by Nebuchadrezzar, and by Nabonidus. Among the ruins of its library and tombs Loftus found fragments of a mathematical work (Chaldaea and Susiana, pp. 255, 256). The biblical form of the name probably represents al Larsa, 'the city of Larsa' (but see Ball's note on Gn 14<sup>1</sup> in Haupt's OT).

LITERATURE.—Sayce, HCM 165 ff.; Loftus, Chaldaea and Susiana, 240 ff.; Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 223 f.; Tiele, Gesch. 1. 88; Schrader, OT on Gn 14. See also Hommel's art. BABYLONIA, p. 226<sup>b</sup> in present vol., and his Antient Hebrew Tradition, 148 f.

A. H. SACHS.

ELM.—A mistranslation of AV for terebinth (Hos 4<sup>13</sup>).

ELMADAM (Ελμαδμ, AV Elmodam, perh. = עֲלֻמָּדָם, Gn 10<sup>23</sup>).—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3<sup>28</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ELNAAM (עֲלֵנָם 'God is pleasantness').—The father of two of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11<sup>46</sup>).

ELNATHAN (עֲלִנָּתָן 'God has given'; cf. עֲלִי, 2 K 24<sup>8</sup>, Jer 26<sup>22</sup> 36<sup>12-25</sup>, Ezr 8<sup>16</sup>—1. The father of Nehushta, the mother of Jehoiachin. 2. The son of Achbor. A person of influence in Jehoiakim's court. He was the chief of those sent to Egypt to fetch Uriah, who had offended Jehoiakim by his prophecy, and one of those who had entreated Jehoiakim not to burn the roll. It is possible that (1) and (2) are the same person, but by no means certain when we consider the commonness of the name. 3. The name occurs no fewer than three times in the list of those sent for by Ezra when he encamped near Ahava in the course of his journey to Jerus., twice among the chief men, and also as one of the teachers. But it is extremely probable that the second occurrence of the name is a corrupt reading, arising out of the following name Nathan.

F. H. WOODS.

ELOHIM.—See GOD. ELOHIST.—See HEXATEUCH.

ELOI.—See ELI.

ELON (עֵלֹן 'a terebinth').—1. Of the tribe of Zebulun, one of the minor judges (Jg 12<sup>11-12</sup>). All that is told of him is simply that he judged Israel for ten years, that he died, and was buried in Elon (עֵלֹן) in Zebulun. The MT points עֵלֹן Aijalon; but the distinction thus made between the name of the place and the name of the judge is not maintained in both verses. 2. A son of Zebulun (Gn 46<sup>14</sup>, Nu 26<sup>26</sup>, where gentilic name Elonites occurs). 3. A Hittite, the father-in-law of Esau (Gn 26<sup>34</sup> 36<sup>2</sup>).

G. A. COOKE.

ELON (עֵלֹן), Jos 19<sup>43</sup>.—A town of Dan, perhaps the same as Elon-beth-hanan (1 K 4<sup>9</sup>), which was in Solomon's province corresponding to the territory of Dan. The site of Ananiah seems too far E., being in Benjamin. In some MSS Elon and Beth-hanan are made distinct places, in which case the latter may be Ananiah, and the former is unknown unless Aijalon was the original reading.

C. R. COOKE.

ELON-BETH-HANAN.—See ELON. ELOTH.—See ELATH.

ELPAAL (עֲלֵפָאֵל 'God of doing' (?)).—The head of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8<sup>11-12</sup> 19). See GENEALOGY.

ELPARAN (Gn 14<sup>6</sup>).—See PARAN.

ELPELET (עֲלֵפֶלֶט, AV Elpalet).—One of David's sons (1 Ch 3<sup>1</sup> 10. 1).

EL-SHADDAI.—See GOD.

ELTEKEH (Jos 19<sup>44</sup> עֲלֵתֶכֶּה, 21<sup>23</sup> עֲלֵתֶכֶּה).—A town of the territory of Dan, mentioned in connexion with Ekron and Gibbethon. It is probably the same as Altaku (Al-ta-ku-u), a town mentioned in the Prism Inscription of Sennacherib as the scene of the defeat of the Philistines and their Egypt. allies by the Assyrians in the days of Hezekiah. G. A. Smith (Hist. Geog. p. 236) urges that Altaku (Eltekeh) cannot have been situated up the valley of Aijalon, where it is marked on the PEF map, for such a site is unsuitable as the meeting-place of the main Assy. and Egypt. armies. The PEF identification may, however, be correct, and the fight may have been between detachments. Yet a site near Ekron suits Sennacherib's narrative, for after taking Altaku he tells us next that he took Ekron (Am-kar-ru-na). In any case it is improbable that the retreat of Sennacherib was the result of the encounter.

W. E. BARNES.

ELTEKON (עֲלֵתֶקֶן), Jos 15<sup>59</sup>.—A town of Judah, noticed with Maarath and Beth-anoth. It was in the mountains. The site is unknown. Possibly Tekoa.

ELTOLAD (עֲלֵתֹלָד), Jos 15<sup>50</sup>.—A town in the extreme S. of Judah, given to Simeon (19<sup>4</sup>); probably Tolad (1 Ch 4<sup>29</sup>). The site is unknown.

ELUL (עֲלֻל, 'Ελουλ, Elul, Neh 6<sup>15</sup>, 1 Mac 14<sup>27</sup>).—See TIME.

ELUZAI (עֲלֻזָּי 'God is my strength').—One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12<sup>29</sup>).

ELYMAEANS.—See ELAMITES.

ELYMAIS (Ελύμαϊς).—This name, which represents the OT ELAM, was given to a district of Persia, lying, according to Strabo (xvi. p. 744), along the southern spurs of Mt. Zagros, S of Media and N of Susiana. In 1 Mac 6<sup>1</sup>, according to the common reading, which is adopted by the AV, Elymais is named as a rich city in Persia. No such city, however, is mentioned elsewhere, except by Josephus (Ant. XII. ix. 1), who is simply following 1 Mac. There can be no doubt, therefore, that we should correct the text with A (ἐν Ἐλύμεις), * (ἐν Ἀλύμεις), and most cursives, and read 'in Elymais in Persia there was a city'; so Fritzsche and RV. In the year B.C. 164 Antiochus Epiphanes made an unsuccessful attack upon the rich treasures of a temple of Artemis in this province, but the name of the place is unknown. Polybius (xxxi. 11), like 1 Mac, merely speaks of the temple as being in Elymais; while Persepolis, which is mentioned by the later account in 2 Mac 9<sup>2</sup>, was not situated in this district. Comp. Rawlinson (Speaker's Comment.), and Strack and Zockler on 1 Mac 6<sup>1</sup>.

H. A. WHITE.

ELYMAS.—See BARSJESUS.

ELYON.—See EL ELYON, GOD.

ELZABAD (אֶלְזָבָד, 'G. . .').—1. A Gadite chief who joined David. 2. A Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26<sup>7</sup>).

EMADABUN (Ἑμαδαβούν, AV Madiabun, after the Aldine text Μαδιαβούν, 1 Es 5<sup>38</sup> (LXX)).—E., of the sons of Jesus (AV 'the sons of Madiabun'), is mentioned among the Levites who superintended the restoration of the temple. There is no corresponding name in the parallel Ezr 3<sup>8</sup>, and it is omitted in the Vulg.; it is probably due to a repetition of the name which follows, Ἑλιαδούν.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

EMATHEIS (Β Ἑμαθῆις, A Ἑμαθῆις, AV Amatheis), 1 Es 9<sup>29</sup>.—Called ATHLAI, Ezr 10<sup>28</sup>.

EMBALMING.—See MEDICINE.

EMBROIDERY was the ornamentation of cloth, usually linen, by means of variegated colour and artistic design.

(1) תַּשְׁבֵּז tashbēz (the verb in Pi and Pu, occurs Ex 28<sup>30, 39</sup> [all], the noun תַּשְׁבֵּז 8 times in Ex 28. 39, and in Ps 45<sup>13</sup>) is used (only) of the high priest's coat (חֲנֹכֶם). AV has 'broidered,' RV 'chequer-work,' Ex 28<sup>4</sup>. This was simply a surface device of lustre upon one colour giving an effect of broken light, like the sparkle of jet-bead ornament. Work of this kind is still done by hand by the Jewish women of Damascus, and by the people around Iconium. The coat is cut in two kinds of material, the outer one often of silk or of shining linen, the inner of white or coloured cotton. Then threads of cotton-twist are inserted between the two, and are carefully and patiently stitched in according to pattern. This has been copied in modern manufacture in such articles as the white honeycomb bedcover, except that the hand-wrought article is the same on both sides. This ornamental effect of light upon a uniform surface seems to be the origin of damask in all its beautiful varieties. The 'coat' of the high priest would be of this description, either sewn by hand or woven in squares and lines, so as to give t . . . . .

(2) רִקְמָה rikmah, . . . . . Jg 5<sup>30</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>10, 13, 18</sup> 26<sup>16</sup> 27<sup>18, 24</sup> (cf. Ex 26<sup>36</sup> 35<sup>35</sup>, Ps 45<sup>14</sup>). The same word is used in 1 Ch 29<sup>2</sup> of stones, and in Ezk 17<sup>8</sup> of feathers. In both instances AV and RV tr. 'of divers colours.' רִקְמָה 'work of the variegator' (QPB uses this term consistently) occurs 6 times in Ex, and רִקְמָה 'the variegator' by itself twice (cf. Ps 139<sup>15</sup> רִקְמָה 'I was curiously wrought,' AV, RV).

(3) חֵשֶׁב חֵשֶׁב 'work of the designer' (of artistic designs in weaving; QPB 'pattern weaver'), Ex 26<sup>1, 31</sup> 28<sup>6, 15</sup> 36<sup>8</sup> 38<sup>28</sup>, cf. חֵשֶׁב 38<sup>28</sup> and (some-

what more חֵשֶׁב חֵשֶׁב חֵשֶׁב Ex 31<sup>4</sup> ('to devise designs') 35<sup>35</sup>, 2 Ch 2<sup>13</sup>, cf. Ex 35<sup>35</sup> ('designed work').

Where the process was that of needlework, the cloth was stretched and held in a frame, and the sewn work in coloured thread was added; or it might be introduced during the weaving.

Anything in nature or art that was variegated by spots, lines, squares, etc., was rikmah, something embroidered. Where a principal part of the charm was due to originality of decorative design, or successful drawing of resemblances, the intellectual distinction would give it the name cunning-work ('work of the designer').

On all household cloth, whether hand-wrought or woven, is usually the same on both sides. In Damascus, prayer-cloths are made in stripes of crimson, sky-blue, white, purple, etc., with gold thread interwoven, after the manner of the tabernacle fabrics.

LITERATURE.—Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt ii. 81; Hartmann, Hebraica i. 401 ff., iii. 135 ff.; Schröder, mihiem, 221 f.; Braun, De vestitu sacerdotum, 301 ff.; Knobel-Dillm. on Ex 26<sup>1, 31</sup> 28<sup>11</sup>.
G. M. MACKIE.

EMEK-KEZIZ (עֵמֶק כְּזִיז, Jos 18<sup>21</sup>, AV 'Valley of Keziz,' mentioned among the towns of Benjamin.—A place apparently in the Jordan Valley near Jericho. The site is unknown. See Dillmann, ad loc. C. R. CONDER.

EMERALD.—See STONES (PRECIOUS).

EMERODS (that is, hæmorrhoids).—The word used in AV to denote the disease brought upon the Philistines when they had captured the ark (1 S 5). Two Heb. words are used for this disease. One of these is ophel (אֶפֶל). It is supposed to mean something swollen. It is the name of a portion of the fortifications of Jerus. (2 Ch 27<sup>3</sup> 33<sup>14</sup>, Neh 3<sup>26, 27</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>). The verb of the stem is used twice, in the sense of being puffed up, presumptuous (Hab 2<sup>4</sup>, Nu 14<sup>44</sup>). This exhausts the use of the stem, except in the six places where ophel, in the plural, is used for the disease in question (Dt 28<sup>27</sup>, 1 S 5<sup>6, 9, 12</sup> 6<sup>4, 5</sup>). So far, the disease seems to be something tumid, a swelling of some sort.

The other word, tēhōrim (תִּהְוִים), is the only word of its stem in the language. It is used in the six places last mentioned, as the kerē, or marginal reading, to be substituted for ophel, and is also used in 1 S 6<sup>11, 17</sup>. Cognate words in Syr. and Arab. convey the idea of breathing hard, of easing the belly with violent effort, of tenesmus with flow of blood. It is said that the Massoretes directed this word to be substituted for the other as being a less indelicate term.

As to the nature of the disease, not much can be inferred from 1 S 5<sup>9</sup>, where AV tr. 'They had emerods in their secret parts,' and RV 'tumours brake out upon them,' for the verb there used appears nowhere else. That the disease was externally loathsome is evident from Dt 28<sup>27</sup>, where it is classed with the boil of Egypt, the scurvy and the itch. That it was terribly fatal seems to be implied in 1 S 5<sup>10-12</sup>. That it had some particularly noteworthy symptom appears from the fact that they made golden images of it.

The traditions handed down in Josephus, and in the added specific forms in the S. p. and Vulg., are sufficiently specific and horrible. According to the Vulg. computrescebant prominentes extales eorum. Josephus says, 'They died of the dysentery, a sore distemper that . . . upon them very suddenly; for . . . up their entrails, which were eaten through, and vomited them up entirely rotted away by the disease' (Ant. vi. i. 1). Josephus is imaginative, but the evidence indicates some form of dysenteric or typhoid disease, in which a loathsome rectal protrusion was a prominent symptom. See MEDICINE.

LITERATURE.—Driver and Dillm. on Dt 28<sup>27</sup>; T. A. W. W. hausen, and Driver on 1 S 5<sup>6</sup> 9 64; Hitzig, Urgesch. d. Paläst. (1845), p. 201; Geiger, Urschrift, 408 f.; Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade, s.v.

W. J. BEECHER.

EMIM (עִמִּים, 'Ommeliv, 'Oomeliv; AV Emims).—The name is that of a body of Rephaim or giant people, living E. of the Jordan, in the S. half of the territory between Bashan and Serr (Dt 21<sup>21</sup>). The name signifies 'formidable ones,' and we are told that it was given them by the Moabites. The Emim were in this region in Abraham's time, and were attacked by the four invading kings during their march S. (Gn 14<sup>5</sup>). They are said to have been 'a people great and numerous, and tall as the Anakim.' We are not told what became of them, but the natural suggestions of the narrative are to the effect that the Moabites destroyed and superseded them. See GIANT.

W. J. BEECHER.

EMINENT is now only metaphorical, 'exalted,' but in AV it is always literal: an 'eminent place,' Ezk 16<sup>24</sup>, 21<sup>32</sup> (עִמָּן, RVm 'a vaulted chamber,' see Davidson on Ezk 16<sup>24</sup>), 2 Es 15<sup>40</sup> (locus eminens); 'an high mountain and eminent,' Ezk 17<sup>22</sup> (עִמָּן). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, i. 4, 'he made not only herbes to garnishe the erthe, but also trees of a more eminent stature than herbes.' Eminence occurs in AV only in the compound 'pre-eminence' (Ec 3<sup>19</sup>, Sir 33<sup>22</sup>, 1 Mac 11<sup>27</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup>, 3 Jn 9). RV gives 'eminency' in Ezk 7<sup>11</sup> 'neither shall there be eminency among them' (עִמָּן לֹא־יִהְיֶה, AV 'wailing for them,' so RVm), using the word in its modern sense, and following the Arab. for the translation. See Davidson, ad loc.

J. HASTINGS.

EMMANUEL.—See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS ('Εμμαούς).—1. Lk 24<sup>13</sup> only. This place was 60 furlongs from Jerusalem. Some MSS follow & in reading 'an hundred and sixty'; but this is probably a corruption, to suit the views held as to the site in the 4th cent. A.D.; for a journey of 320 furlongs, or 40 miles, in one day (see vv. 13, 28, 29, 33), would have been improbable. In the Onomasticon (s.v.) it is placed at Emmaus Nicopolis—now 'Amudis, 20 miles from Jerus., near Aijalon. Josephus, however, speaks of an Emmaus 60 furlongs from Jerusalem (Wars, vii. vi. 6), the habitation of a colony of Titus' soldiers. The direction is unknown. The name Kulónieh or 'Colony,' and the distance from Jerus. (which, however, is not exact), have suggested the village so named in the valley W. of the Holy City. In the twelfth cent. Emmaus was shown at another village, Kubeibeh, to the N.W., at about the required distance. To the S.W. of Jerus., near the main road to the plain, is a ruin called Khramasah, which recalls the name of Emmaus. The distance is more than 60 furlongs, but perhaps not too great for a rough estimate. The site, however, remains uncertain. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

2. Emmaus Nicopolis is not mentioned in OT, but appears as a place of importance in the time of the Maccabees. It was in the neighbouring plain that the Syrian army was defeated by Judas (1 Mac 3<sup>40</sup>, 43-45). Emmaus was one of the towns fortified by Bacchides in order to 'vex' Israel (1 Mac 9<sup>50</sup>, Jos. Ant. xiii. i. 3).

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP iii. 147 f.; Guérin, Judée, i. 261, 801 f.; Reland, Pal. 427, 758; Thomson, Land and Book, i. 116, 123 ff., 132, ii. 59; Schwarz, Das heil. Land, p. 98; Neubauer, Glog. du Talmud, 101 f., 152 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Palbst. to Pal. 141; Sepp, Das heil. Land, i. 42; PEFS, 1876, 172, 174; 1879, 105; 1881, 46, 237, 274; 1882, 24, 59, 1883, 53, 55; 1884, 53, 189, 243; 1885, 116, 150; 1886, 17; Smith, HGHL 214; Schurer, HJP i. l. 215, 236, ii. 231, 253, 386 ff., ii. l. 157 ff.

Conder, Tent Work in Pal. 8, 140; Bible Places, 73, 103; Kaim, Jesus of Nazara, vi. 306; Caspari, Die Leben Jesu; Andrews, Life of our Lord, 617-619. C. A. CONDER.

EMMER (A 'Εμμήρ, B 'Εμήρ), 1 Es 9<sup>2</sup>.—In Ezr 10<sup>20</sup> IMMER.

EMMERUTH (A 'Εμμηρούθ, B 'Εμμηρος, AV Meruth), 1 Es 5<sup>24</sup>.—A corruption of Immer in Ezr 2<sup>37</sup>. Probably 'Εμμηρ was first Grecized into 'Εμμηρος, and the form in A arose from mistaking 'Εμμηρου for a nominative. The AV is due to the Aldine text, which has υἱοὶ ἐκ Μηρούθ for δ. 'Εμμη.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

EMULATION is now used only in a good sense, healthy rivalry. But about 1611 it wavered between that and a distinctly bad meaning, 'ambitious strife,' or 'malicious envy.' Shakespeare uses it in both ways, and of the three occurrences in AV, two are bad (1 Mac 8<sup>16</sup>, Gal 5<sup>20</sup>, both ζήλος) and one good (Ro 11<sup>14</sup> 'If by any means I may provoke to e.', el πως παραζηλώσω, RV 'to jealousy'). The Douay Bible uses 'emulation' of God, after Vulg. emulatio, in Ps 78<sup>38</sup> 'in their graveness they provoked him to emulation,' where AV has 'jealousy' ('moved him to jealousy with their graven images'). For the sense of 'malicious envy' take the Rheims tr. of Ac 7<sup>9</sup> 'the Patriarches through emulation, sold Joseph into Egypt.' Emulation and envy are distinguished and discussed by Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 83 ff., in his article on the Gr. words, ζήλος, and φθόνος.

J. HASTINGS.

ENABLE occurs only 1 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>, and it is used, without an infinitive following, in the obsolete or at least archaic sense of 'strengthen.' Cf. Mulcaster (1531), Positions, xli. 232, 'Exercise to enable the body'; and Melvill, Diary (Wodrow, p. 280), 'obtaining of God's mercie that might I repose, quihik I loked nocht for, to inable me for the morne's action.'

J. HASTINGS.

ENAIM (עֵנַיִם), probably the same as Enam (עֵנַם) which is mentioned among the towns of lowland Judah in Jos 15<sup>34</sup>. From the reference to Enaim in Gn 38<sup>14</sup>, 21 we gather that it was the name of a village on the road to Timnah; and, as the incident recorded in this chapter is prefaced by the mention of the sojourn of Judah with his friend Hirah the Adullamite, the village possibly stood on the road between Timnah and Adullam. In Jos 15<sup>34</sup> Enam stands in the same group of towns with Tappuah and Adullam and Azekah.

The AV in its rendering Gn 38<sup>14</sup> 'in an open place' (RV 'in the gate of Enaim'), and Gn 38<sup>21</sup> 'openly by the way side' (RV 'at Enaim by the way side'), has followed the explanation adopted by the Targums, the Pesh. Syriac, and the Latin Vulgate (in bivio itineris), on the supposition that 'enayim' had its usual meaning 'eyes,' and was not a proper name. Cf. Jerome, who, commenting on the words 'Et sedit ad portam Enam,' remarks 'Sermo Hebraicus Enaim transfertur in oculos. Non est igitur nomen loci; sed est sensus: sedit in bivio, sive in compito, ubi diligenti debet viator aspicere, quod iter gradum capiat.' The Old Latin (Lyons Pent.) and the LXX (Ainav) rightly rendered the word as a proper name. The double form Enaim and Enam may be compared with Dothain and Dothan (Gn 37<sup>17</sup> and 2 K 6<sup>13</sup>). The meaning of the name was presumably 'the two springs.' Conder has identified it with Kh. Wady Ain, which is close to Beth-shemesh and Engannim.

H. E. RYLE.

ENAN (עֵנָן 'having fountains,' or 'eyes' i.e. 'keen-eyed,' Ainav).—Prince of Naphtali at the first census (Nu 1<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>23</sup> 7<sup>78</sup>, 83 10<sup>27</sup> P).

ENASIBUS (A 'Ενδοσιβος, B -ει-), 1 Es 9<sup>34</sup>.—In Ezr 10<sup>36</sup> ELIASHIB. The form is probably due to reading ΔΙ as Ν.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA.—One of the stations in the itinerary of the children of Israel, where they encamp after leaving Elim, Nu 33<sup>9</sup> [see ELIM]. If the position of Elim be in the Wady Ghurundel, then the camp by the sea is on the shore of the Gulf of Suez, somewhere south of the point where the Wady Tayibeh opens to the coast. The curious return of the line of march to the seashore is a phenomenon that has always arrested the attention of travellers to Mt. Sinai; and if Mt. Sinai be really in the so-called Sinaitic peninsula, the camp can be located within a half-mile. [But it is within the bounds of a reason to suppose that the 'Encampment by the Sea' . . . [the Gulf of Akabah, and Sinai be out of the peninsula.] St. Silvia of . . . [in the year 333 returned from the . . . Sinai, and especially notices the approach of the line of march to the seashore ('pervenimus ad mansionem, quæ erat jam super mare, id est in eo loco, ubi iam de inter montes exiit, et incipitur denuo totum iam iuxta mare ambulari; sic tamen iuxta mare, ut subito fluctus animalibus pedes cedat'). Her identification is that of an accepted tradition which must be many years older than herself. It is very valuable evidence for a Christian tradition which is sensibly constant in her time, and shows no sign of having undergone any revision at the hands of . . . ]

J. RENDEL HARRIS.

ENCHANTMENT.—See DIVINATION.

END.—The uses of this word are not so often obsolete as biblical, and demand attention from their very familiarity.

1. The end as opposed to the beginning. To the Heb. mind, especially in the later and more rigorous days of the history of Israel, the most perplexing problem was the prosperity of the wicked; and the conclusion which gave the most satisfying shelter, was the thought of the end. Ps 37:38 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end (RV 'latter end') of that man is peace. But the transgressors shall be destroyed together; the end (RV 'latter end') of the wicked shall be cut off.' So even the author of Ps 78, who, though a true worshiper, felt the perplexity so keenly that he said, 'Surely in vain have I cleansed my heart' (v.13), found rest when he went into the sanctuary of God and 'considered their latter end' (v.37). Moreover, this is the solution of the Book of Job, if (apart from the Elihu chapters) that book may be accepted as a unity. It is Bildad's in both places. And it is a truly religious solution, since it is God that declares the end from the beginning (Is 46:1). Nor was it so precarious as <sup>the word</sup> (ἀσάριθ) had a certain elasticity. <sup>did not</sup> absolutely restrict the thought to the end of this present life. Its sense varied with the context, but it was capable of standing for even the great Messianic future. Still, we must observe that this source of <sup>the word</sup> (ἀσάριθ) is not, like frequent in the Apoc. (Wis 2:6-5; Sir 37:7-9; 11:21; 13:12-21; 15:10) is scarcely found in NT; or, (doubtless) He is <sup>considering</sup> the end of their conversation (ἐν τῇ ἐκκλῆσιᾳ αὐτῶν, v.c. 'the gathering out of luyven'; but Kendall takes it in another sense, 'the issue, sc. of the word which they had preached, ἡ ἐκκλῆσις τοῦ λόγου, 'observing by their daily course of life'; and ἐν τῇ ἐκκλῆσιᾳ 'the end is worse with them than the beginning' (τὰ ἰσχυρὰ, RV 'the last state').

2. The 'end' is used to denote the extremity. The Heb. words are (1) gabbhālūt, only Ex 28<sup>22</sup> 39<sup>15</sup> 'AV' at the ends; RV 'like cords', fr. [gabbāl] to twist). (2) peh, lit. 'mouth', 2 K 10<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>16</sup>, Ezr 9<sup>11</sup> 'full from one end to another' (AVM 'full from mouth to mouth', but Ryle thinks the metaphor has been taken from a drinking vessel) (3) pēd, Ezk 41<sup>12</sup> (usually 'side', as RV here). (4) rōš, 'head', 1 K 8<sup>9-2</sup> C 19<sup>12</sup> 'the ends of the staves' of the ark (5) sōph (a late word, 2 Ch 20<sup>16</sup>, Ec 9<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>18</sup>, JI 2<sup>20</sup>, and in Dn) But the most freq. is (6) 'ephē, only in the phrase 'āphōt 'erez, 'ends of the earth'; which is also the tr. of (7) kanəphōt hā'āreṣ, lit. 'wings of the earth' in Job 37<sup>3</sup> 38<sup>12</sup>. On the last passage Davidson says, 'The figure is beautiful; the dawn as it pours forth along the whole horizon, on both sides of the beholder, lays hold of the borders of the earth, over which night lay like a covering; and seizing this covering by its extremities it shakes the wicked out of it. The wicked flee from the light. The dawn is not a physical phenomenon merely, it is a moral agent.'

In NT cf. Mt 24<sup>31</sup> 'from one end of heaven to the other' (ἀπὸ ἑκπλευν οὐρανόων ἕως ἁπλευν αὐτόων), Ro 10<sup>18</sup> 'the ends of the world' (τὰ πειπτα τῆς οἰκουμένης). See EARTH, WORLD.

(3) The end may also be the conclusion, as Is 24<sup>5</sup> 'the noise of them that rejoice endeth' (hāhādā). The Heb. is 'they are always kāzāh and its derivatives'; but once we find yāzāh, 'to go out,' see 23<sup>18</sup> 'in the end of the year'; and twice the subst. tekhophāh, 'the circuit' (of the sun, Ps 19<sup>5</sup>), used of the year, see 34<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ch 24<sup>23</sup> (AVm and RVm 'revolution'). In NT the chief word is telos, but the more precise peritēsis is found in Mt (13<sup>40, 49</sup> 24<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>30</sup>), always followed by to telos, EV 'end of the world,' RVm 'consummation of the age' and in He 9<sup>26</sup> (e. telos aiōnōn, AV 'end of the world,' RV 'end of the ages,' RVm 'consummation of the ages'). See ESCHATOLOG; also MILLENNIUM, PAROUSIA, WORLD, and B. W. Bacon in Old and New Test. Student, xii, 225-233. 'End' in the sense of conclusion is common in Apoc., as 1 Es 9<sup>17</sup> 'their cause . . . was brought to an end' (ἐξῆλθεν ἐστὶν αἴτιος); with which cf. He 9<sup>26</sup> 'an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife' (πίστις ἐστὶν ἀσφάλεια, RV 'is firm' for confirmation'). In the end of the Sabbath, (Mt 23) is te. 'late of the Sabbath' (ἐν τῇ σάββατον).

4. A work may be ended, not merely because it is concluded or terminated, but because it is completed or perfected. In this sense 'end' occurs both as vb. and subst. The Heb. is mostly either kālah or tāmam in some of their p. is either completeness, as of the end of tion, as of 'the end of God's' the subst.
kālah is tr. 'a full end' in Ezek 11:3 and 'an utter end' in Nal. the phrase is vālah carries the sense both of terrness, so that in Jn 13:1 it is difficult to them to the end' and 'he loved them to the uttermost.' In 1 Th 2:6 'to the uttermost' is clear; in Lk 15:6 'to the end' is most natural. In 1 P 1:12 the adv. vālah, which occurs in bibl.
Gr. only here, is tr'd in AV 'to the end', in I 'perfectly.' pass into which is manifest in 1 P 1:12, EV 'untill'
'ekēdh); Job 34:36 (adū-nezah), Jer 52 (adnezah); and 'world without end' Is 45:17 (עַד עַד עַד), Eph 3:21 (עד αἰῶνος αἰῶνος αἰῶνος, RV 'for ever and ever').

Like Lat. finis (and probably owing to it), 'end' is used in Eng. for the purpose, as in Tomson's NT (1576) Heading of Ep. to He, 'The drift and end of this Epistle is.' In AV this meaning is found only in the phrase 'to the end . . .', or 'to this end . . .', and once 'to what end' (Am 5<sup>19</sup>). In old Eng. this phrase is sometimes followed by the infin., as Bacon's Essays, p. 201, 'Some undertake Sutes . . . to the end to gratify the adverse partie.' But in AV it is followed by 'that,' or the conj. is omitted. The constructions in the orig. are: 1. יָדַעַתְּ 'in order that,' Ex 8<sup>22</sup> 'to the end thou mayest know'; Lv 17<sup>8</sup>, Dt 17<sup>18, 20</sup>, Ps 30<sup>12</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup>, Ob 9. 2. מֵעַתָּה 'for the sake of' (see Ec 3<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>), Ec 7<sup>14</sup> 'to the end that man should find nothing after him.' 3. רוֹבֵד with infin., 1 Mac 13<sup>24</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>. 4. ὥστε, 1 Mac 14<sup>40</sup>. 5. ἐς ῥό with infin., Ac 7<sup>19</sup>, Ro 1<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>13</sup>. 6. ἐς ῥοῦρο, 'to this end,' Jn 18<sup>37</sup>, Ro 14<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>2</sup>. 7. πρὸς τό, Lk 18<sup>1</sup> 'to this end that men ought always to pray' (RV 'to the end that'). RV has shown much fondness for this phrase, introducing 'to the end that' in place of the simple 'that' of AV, for יָדַעַתְּ in Gn 18<sup>10 b14</sup>, Ex 33<sup>13</sup>, Nu 16<sup>40</sup>; for ἐς ῥό with infin. (on which see Votaw, The Use of the Infin. in Bible Gr., 1896, p. 21) in Ro 4<sup>18</sup>, Eph 1<sup>12</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>2, 6</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>7</sup>; and for ἵνα in Eph 3<sup>17</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>14</sup>, Tit 3<sup>8</sup>. RV also introduces 'to this end' for ἐς ῥοῦρο in Mk 1<sup>38</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> (AV 'therefore'), Ac 26<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup> (AV 'for this purpose'), and Jn 18<sup>37</sup> (AV 'for this cause'); 'unto this end' in 1 P 4<sup>8</sup> (Gr. ἐς ῥοῦρο, AV 'for this cause'); and 'to which end' in 2 Th 1<sup>11</sup> (Gr. εἰς ὅ, AV 'wherefore').

J. HASTINGS.

ENDAMAGE.—Ezr 4<sup>18</sup> 'thou shalt e. the revenue of the kings' (πρὸς), and 1 Es 6<sup>38</sup> 'that stretcheth out his hand to hinder or e. that house of the Lord in Jerusalem' (κακοποιῆσαι). The word is still used, but is somewhat old-fashioned. Cf. Quarles, Emblems, i. xi. 47, 'The Devil smileth that he may endamage'; and H. Vaughan, Silenc, i. Pref., 'No loss is so doleful as that gain that will damage the soul.' J. HASTINGS.

ENDEAVOUR.—‘Endeavour’ seems a very in-

In Is 5<sup>11</sup> 1611 had 'enflame,' mod. edd. 'inflamm.' The word also occurs Sir 28<sup>10</sup>, Sus<sup>8</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>24</sup> (1611 and mod. edd. 'inflamm'). The meaning is always 'excite,' and the ref. is to lust in Is 57<sup>5</sup>, Sus<sup>8</sup>; to wine Is 5<sup>11</sup>; to anger Sir 28<sup>10</sup>; while the sense is good in 1 Mac 2<sup>24</sup> 'Mattathias . . . was inflamed with zeal' (ἐξήλωσε). Wyclif uses the word in Ja 3<sup>8</sup> of the tongue, 'it is enflawmed of helle, and enflawmeth the wheel of oure birthe.' J. HASTINGS.

ENGAGE.—Jer 30<sup>21</sup> only, 'who is this that engageth his heart to approach unto me?' (עָבַד; Vulg. 'applicet cor suum'). Engage is used in the sense of 'pledge,' though to 'engage one's heart' seems to be a unique expression. Shaks. has 'I do engage my life,' and 'I will engage my words,' where the meaning is nearly the same. The older VSS vary: Cov. 'what is he, that geveth over his herte'; Gen. 'that directeth his heart'; Dou. 'that applieth his hart.' RV tr. 'that hath had boldness to approach unto them,' with marg. 'Heb. hath been surety for his heart.' J. HASTINGS.

EN-GANNIM (עֵין גַּנִּים).—Two places so named are noticed in the Book of Joshua, the name signifying 'the spring of . . .'. 1. Jos 15<sup>24</sup>. A town of Judah noticed in Jos 15<sup>24</sup> and Eshtaol. It is supposed by Clermont-Ganneau to be the ruin Umm Jina in the valley near Zanoah—a suitable site. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. 2. Jos 19<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>29</sup> (in 1 Ch 6<sup>38</sup> Anem). A town of Issachar given to the Levites, now Jenin, a town on the S. border of Esdraelon, with a fine spring, gardens and palms. It marked the S. limit of Galilee, and appears to have been always a flourishing town. The 'garden house,' Beth-hag-gan, in 2 K 9<sup>27</sup> has been thought to be En-gannim, but it is more probably Beth Jenn E. of Tabor. See IBLEAM. See SWP vol. ii. sheet viii.

LITERATURE—Guérin, Samarie, i. 327; Robinson, BRP iii. 116, 337; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 2 237; Van de Velde, p. 359; Tristram, Land of Israel, 65, 130; Conder, Tent-Work in Pal. 1897, 67, 180, 265.

C. R. CONDER.

EN-GEDI (עֵין גִּדִּי, Arab. Ain Jidi, 'fountain of the kid'), the name of a spring of warm water which bursts forth from the cliffs overlooking the W. shore of the Dead Sea near its centre, and 2 miles S. of Rás Mersed. The ancient name of the spot was Hazazon-tamar (2 Ch 20<sup>2</sup>), by which it was known in the days of Abraham (Gn 14<sup>7</sup>); and it has been noticed by Tristram that a group of ruins below the cascade near the shore of the Dead Sea may mark the site of a town which marched the Assyrian host of (hedorhomer) (Gn 14<sup>7</sup>). The place was included in the wide skirts of the tribe of Judah (Jos 15<sup>62</sup>), and is associated with the City of Salt, which probably lay a few miles farther S. on the shore of the lake near Khashm Usdum (the Salt-mountain). The name 'Wilderness of En-gedi' applies to the wild rocky district forming the E. part of the Wilderness of Judah; and here amongst the deep ravines, rocky gorges, and the caves, which nature or art have hewn out in their sides, David found a safe hiding-place from the vengeance of Saul (1 S 24<sup>1</sup>). At a later period it was the scene of the slaughter of the hordes of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, who had invaded the kingdom of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20<sup>2</sup>). The limestone cliffs of En-gedi are deeply intersected by numerous river channels which descend from the table-land of Judah towards the Dead Sea. At the place itself two streams, the Wady Sudeir and Wady el-'Are-yeh, enclose a small plateau, nearly 2000 ft. above the waters and bounded by nearly vertical walls of rock. Terraces of shingle and white calcareous marl envelop their bases to a height of several hundred feet, and mark the level at which the waters of the lake formerly stood. Only a few bushes of acacia, tamarisk, Solanum, and Calotropis procera (Apple of Sodom) decorate the spot where palms and vines were formerly cultivated (Ca 1<sup>14</sup>). The district is tenanted by a few Arabs of the Jâhalin and T. . . tribes, and is the safe retreat of the . . . goat, 1 S 24<sup>2</sup>), the coney . . . and numerous birds of prey. The spot is amongst the wildest and most desolate in the whole of Palestine.

Tristram, Land of Israel, 217; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 2 175; Neubauer, Geog. du . . . 160; Pal. Bible . . . 40.

ENGINE.—Besides the . . . 'forts' dāyēk, עֲרָב (LXX προμαχώνας, Oxf. Heb. Lec. 'bulwark,' 'siege-wall'), are mentioned as used in sieges in the Chaldean era (2 K 25<sup>1</sup>=Jer 52<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 26<sup>8</sup> [all]). These forts were prob. towers on wheels manned with archers, and pushed forward by degrees against the wall to be attacked (cf. 1 Mac 13<sup>43-45</sup>). Such a fort could be combined with a . . . or at least used to cover the attack . . . see BATTERING-RAM.

In 1 Ch 26<sup>15</sup> Uzziah is said to have 'made in Jerusalem engines invented by cunning men (lit. 'contrivances, the invention of inventive men,' חֲשִׁבֹנֵי הַחֵשֶׁב, see Oxf. Heb. Lec. s. חֲשִׁבֹנֵי) to be on the towers and upon the battlements, to shoot arrows and great stones withal.' These 'engines' were . . . similar to the Roman catapulta and . . . only other occurrence of the word חֲשִׁבֹנֵי is in Ec 7<sup>29</sup> 'God made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions.'

In Maccabean times several different kinds of engines were in use. 'He encamped,' writes the author of 1 Mac, 'against the sanctuary many days, and set there artillery, and engines, and instruments to cast fire (or 'fiery darts'), and others to cast stones, and tormenta (σφοδρία) to cast darts, and slings' (6<sup>21</sup>). W. E. BARNES.

ENGRAFTED.—Ja 1<sup>21</sup> only, 'the e. word.' This tr<sup>a</sup> may be traced from Tind. 'grafted' (which would be the mod. form), through Gen. 'grafted,' Rhem. 'engrafted.'* J. HASTINGS.

ENGRAVING.—1. חָרָט hārōsheth, Ex 31<sup>5</sup> 35<sup>33</sup>. 25 [חָרָט in Ex 32<sup>16</sup> is prob. text. error for חָרָט, cf. Jer 17<sup>1</sup>]. 2. חָרָט pittūāh, Ex 28<sup>11</sup>. 38 39<sup>14</sup> 30, Zec 3<sup>9</sup> (cf. 2 Ch 2<sup>5</sup> 13), 1 K 6<sup>36</sup>, Ps 74<sup>6</sup>. 3. חָרָט miklā'ath, 1 K 6<sup>18</sup>. 29. 32 73<sup>1</sup>. 4. חָרָט hārōsheth, 1 K 6<sup>36</sup> (cf. Is 49<sup>16</sup>, Ezk 8<sup>10</sup> 23<sup>4</sup>, Job 13<sup>27</sup>). 5. חָרָט hārōsheth, Ac 17<sup>29</sup>.

Of these terms, the first possibly refers to the artistic skill of the worker, and the others to indicate the process or result of etching, punching, gouging, relief, etc. The material used was stone, wood (2 S 5<sup>11</sup>=1 Ch 14<sup>1</sup>), metal (1 S 13<sup>19</sup>), and jewels (Ex 28<sup>11</sup>). The effect sought was either that of engraving into the surface, as in the signet-ring, and the jewels of the high priest's dress, or that of relief by the removal of the surrounding material, as in the cherubim carvings on the temple doors.

The incisions made by the graving-tool (חָרָט, Ex 32<sup>4</sup>) gradually led to ornamental inlaying in

* The Gr (incutus), which occurs only here in NT, gave the late Lat impotus, whence our Eng. word 'imp.' An 'imp' is orig a graft, as Piers Plowman, v. 137—

'I was sum-tyme a frere,
And the Couentes [Convent's] Gardener, for to graffe ympes.'
So 'an mp of Satan' is a graft, scion, child of the devil.

metal, and to mosaic of marble, ivory, and mother-of-pearl in palaces (Ps 45<sup>3</sup>).

WOOD, IVORY, AND METAL 'ENGRAVING.'

The final form of engraving, amounting to complete separation, was that of the ḥṣṣ (Arab. faṣṣ) graven image (see CARVING).

LITERATURE.—Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 255 ff.; Wilkinson, Ann. Egypt. ii. 337; Herod. vii. 69; Müller, Hdb. d. Archäol. der Kunst, § 311. G. M. MACKIE.

EN-HADDAAH (עֲנַחְדָּאָה), Jos 19<sup>21</sup>.—A city of Issachar noticed with En-gannim and Remeth. It is perhaps the present village Kefr Adhān on the edge of the Dothan plain, W. of En-gannim. See SWP vol. ii. sheet viii. C. R. CONDER.

EN-HAKKORE (עֵין הַחֲקוֹרֵי), 'spring of the part-ridge'; cf. 1 S 26<sup>20</sup>, Jer 17<sup>11</sup>.—The name of a fountain at Lehi (Jg 15<sup>19</sup>). The narrator (J (?)) of the story characteristically connects hakkōrē with the word yikrā ('he called') of v. 18, and evidently interprets 'En-hakkōrē' as 'the spring of him that called.' The whole narrative is rather obscure, and the tr. in some instances doubtful, but probably the story is something to the following effect. After his exertions in slaughtering the Philistines, Samson was very thirsty, and, finding no water, he cried to J', who clave the maktēsh ('mortar' or 'hollow place') which is in Lehi, and from a cleft in one of its sides water flowed (so Moore). This certainly seems preferable to the interpretation represented by AV, which understands the water to have sprung from a hollow place in the jaw (lehi).

There is much difference of opinion regarding the situation of 'En-hakkōrē. In Jerome's time it was shown at Eleutheropolis; Conder identifies it with 'Ayūn Kāra, N.W. of Zorah; Van de Velde with a large spring between Tell el-Lekiyeh (4 miles N. of Beersheba) and Khuweifeh.

LITERATURE.—Conder, Tent-Work, i. 277. Bible Places, 67; Guérin, Judee, ii. 318 f., 398 ff.; Van de Velde, Memoir, 843; Moore, Judges, 346 ff.; Reuss, ATI i. 153; PEFS, 1869, 182. J. A. SELBIE.

EN-HAZOR (עֵין הַחֲזוֹר), 'spring of Hazor,' Jos 19<sup>37</sup>.—A town of Naphtali, noticed between Kedesh, Edrei, and Iron. There were three Hazors in Upper Galilee, and the site is uncertain; but the most probable place for En-hazor seems to be Hazireh, on the W. slopes of the mountains of Upper Galilee, W. of Kedesh. See SWP vol. i. sheet iii. C. R. CONDER.

ENJOIN.—To enjoin is first to 'join together' (Lat. in-jungere), as Mt 19<sup>6</sup> Wyc. (1380), 'therefore a man departe nat that thing that God enjoyngde, or knytte to gidre.' But it early came to mean to 'impose' something on some one. Generally it is a duty or penalty; but in Job 36<sup>23</sup> it is used in the rare sense of commanding or directing one's way, 'Who hath enjoined him his way?' (יָרָה). The later and mod. sense of 'command' is found in Est 9<sup>31</sup>, He 9<sup>30</sup> ('enjoined unto you'; RV 'commanded to youward'), and Philem 8 'I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee.' J. HASTINGS.

ENLARGE, ENLARGEMENT.—To 'enlarge' is to 'cause to be large' that which is narrow or confined. It also signifies 'to make larger' that which may be considered large already, as Mt 23<sup>5</sup> 'they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments' (μεγαλύνω), but the prefix en- (= Lat. in) has properly a strong causative force, as in 'enable,' 'enfeeble,' 'enrich.' Hence arises the meaning of 'set at large,' 'liberate,' as in Sidney, Arcadia (1622), 329, 'Like a Lioness lately enlarged.' This is undoubtedly the meaning of enlargement in its only occurrence Est 4<sup>14</sup> 'For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there e. and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place' (מָן, AVm 'respiration,' RV 'relief'). Cf. Act 32, Henry VIII. c. 2, § 9 (1540), 'After his enlargement and commyng out of prison.' And that 'enlarge' is used in this sense in AV is evident, as Ps 4<sup>1</sup> 'thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress' (RV 'hast set me at large'); prob. also 2 S 22<sup>37</sup> = Ps 18<sup>36</sup> 'thou hast enlarged my steps under me.' So when applied to the heart, Ps 119<sup>82</sup> (יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה), Is 60<sup>8</sup> (יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה), 2 Co 6<sup>11</sup> (πλατύνω), the sense is first of all freedom, and then the joy that flows from it (cf. 2 Co 6<sup>13</sup> πλατύνω, and 10<sup>13</sup> μεγαλύνω), the opp. being 'to be straitened,' as in La 1<sup>20</sup> (cf. Jer 4<sup>19</sup> 'I am pained at my very heart,' lit., as RVm 'the walls of my heart!'), and 2 Co 6<sup>12</sup>. J. HASTINGS.

EN-MISHPAT (עֵין מִשְׁפָּט), 'spring of judgment,' or 'decision' (by oracle), Gn 14<sup>7</sup>.—A name for Kadesh—probably Kadesh-barnea. See KADESH.

ENNATAN (Ἐννᾶν, AV Eunatan), 1 Es 8<sup>4</sup> (LXX).—See ELNATHAN.

ENOCH (עֲנוֹךְ).—1. The eldest son of Cain (Gn 4<sup>17, 18</sup>). His father is said to have built a city and called it after his son's name. Its identity is quite uncertain (cf. Dillm. and Del. ad loc., also Budde, Urgesch. 120 ff.). 2. The son of Jared, and father of Methuselah, seventh in descent from Adam in the line of Seth. His life is described by the remarkable expression, 'Enoch walked with God' (Gn 5<sup>24</sup>). Not less remarkable is the brief account given of his death. After 365 years 'he was not, for God took him.' This is understood by the writer to the Hebrews to mean, 'By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him' (He 11<sup>5</sup>). In Jewish tradition many gathered around Enoch. He was the inventor of letters, arithmetic, and astronomy, and as the first author. A book containing his visions and prophecies was said to have been preserved by Noah in the ark, and handed down through successive generations. (See Ryle in Expos. Times, iii. 185; Early Narratives of Genesis, p. 90 f.; and the next three articles.) R. M. BOD.

ENOCH IN NT.—Enoch, the son of Jared (Gn 5<sup>18ff.</sup>), is mentioned in three passages of the NT; traditional exegesis has found an allusion to him in a fourth.

1. In Lk 3<sup>37</sup> he has a place among the ancestors of our Lord.

2. In He 11<sup>5</sup> it is said that 'by faith Enoch was translated.' His faith is inferred (v.<sup>6</sup>) from the LXX word ἐπαύρησεν (Gn 5<sup>22, 24</sup>; this verb is used in ἡμεῖς the Heb. 'to walk with [before]') in Genesis u.c. 6<sup>9</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>40</sup> 48<sup>15</sup>, Ps 114<sup>9</sup>, Sir 44<sup>15</sup>, cf. Ps 25<sup>3</sup> 34<sup>14</sup>. Nothing is added in He 11<sup>5</sup> to the record of Gen. l.c. (LXX), except the phrase τοῦ μὴ ἰδεῖν θάνατον. With this in the Alexandrian Epistle to the Hebrews it is interesting to compare the allegorical interpretation of Philo de Abr. §§ 3, 4. The name 'Ἐνὼχ is explained by him as meaning (ὡς ἂν 'Ελληνες εἶποιεν) κεχαρισμένος (i.e. gratus is connected with gratus). The μετάθεσις is explained as πρὸς τὸ βελτίον μεταβολή; the οὐκ ὑπάρκετο as signifying either that after repentance the old evil life is blotted out as though it had never been, or that the good man (ὁ ἀγαθὸς) ὑποχωρεῖ καὶ μὴ ὠσιν ἀγαθῇ. Though in the original Hebrew of Sir 44<sup>15</sup> Enoch is described as 'an example (lit. sign) of knowledge' (cf. σύνεσις αὐτοῦ, Wis 4<sup>11</sup>), yet in the Greek and Old Latin (Cod. Am. 'ut det gentibus penitentiam'), as in Philo, he is represented as 'an example of repentance.' In Sir 49<sup>14</sup> (ἀνελήμφθη ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς; cf. Cod. Am. in 44<sup>15</sup> 'translatum est in paradiso') his translation is interpreted literally. Josephus (Ant. i. iii. 4) uses the phrase, 'He went unto the βίβλος (cf. βίβλος, τὸ θεῖον); hence neither is his death recorded.' For Jewish and Christian legends about Enoch, see the references in Schürer, HJP II. i. 342, II. iii. 70.

3. In Jude 14 the description ἔσθωμος ἀπὸ 'Αδάμ is taken from the Book of Enoch (60<sup>8</sup> 93<sup>8</sup>), and a passage from that book (1<sup>1-2</sup>) is quoted as a warning actually uttered by the patriarch, dealing prophetically (ἐπ' ὅφ. καὶ τοῖς) with the false teachers of the apostolic age. The text of the passage in Enoch comes to us in three forms. (a) The Akhmim fragment: ὅτι ἐρχεται σὺν τοῖς [sic] μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτοῦ ποιεῖσαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων, καὶ ἀπολέσει πάντας ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἐλέγξει (MS λενξεί) πάντας σάρκα περὶ πάντων ἔργων τῆς ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ὃν ἡτέβησαν καὶ σκληρῶν ὃν ἐλάλησαν λόγων καὶ περὶ πάντων ὃν κατελάλησαν κατ' αὐτοῦ ἀμαρτωλοὶ ἀσεβεῖς. (b) Ad Novatianum 16 (Hartel, Cyprian, iii. p. 67; Harnack, Texte u. Untersuch. xiii. 1, assigns the treatise to Sixtus II. of Rome, cf. Benson, Cyprian, p. 557 ff.): 'Sicut scriptum est: Ecce venit cum multis milibus nuntiorum suorum facere iudicium de omnibus et perdere omnes impios et arguere omnem carnem de omnibus factis impiorum quæ fuerunt impie et de omnibus verbis impiis quæ de Deo locuti sunt peccatores.' (c) The Ethiopic version (ed. Charles, p. 59): 'And lo! He comes with ten thousands of (His) holy ones to execute judgment upon them, and He will destroy the ungodly, and will convict all flesh of all that the sinners and ungodly have wrought and ungodly committed against Him.' It is clear that Jude* quotes loosely and abbreviates, but it will be noticed that (1) in ἰδοὺ Jude agrees with Novat. Eth. against Gr.; (2) in ἐλέγξει he coincides with Novat. alone, as possibly (for the tense of venit is ἔρχεται in ἡλθε. On the importance of the ἔρχεται in Novat. and its independence of Jude (contrast Westcott, Canon, p. 374), see Harnack, op. cit. p. 57, and especially Zahn, Gesch. des Neut. Kanons, ii. p. 797 ff. It may be added that Jude's ἐλέγξει from Enoch was ἐλέγξει (a) by Tertullian, De Resurr. Fem. i. 3, as ἐλέγξει Enoch; (β) by some referred to by Jerome, De Illust. 4, as condemning Jude.

4. A very common Patristic opinion, found as early as Tert. De Anima, 50; Hippol. De Antichr. 43 (cf. Bonwetsch, Texte u. Untersuch. xvi. 2, p. 48), identified 'the two witnesses' of Rev 11 with Enoch and Elijah (see the references in Speaker's Commentary, p. 651). F. H. CHASE.

ENOCH, (ETHIOPIC) BOOK OF—

I. SHORT ACCOUNT OF THE BOOK.—In Gn 5<sup>24</sup> it is said of Enoch that he walked with God. This expression was taken in later times to mean that he enjoyed superhuman privilege, by means of which he received special revelation as to the origin of evil, the relations of men and angels in the past, their future destinies, and ultimately the ultimate triumph of righteousness. It was not unnatural, therefore, that an apocalyptic literature began to circulate under his name in the centuries when such literature became current. In the Book of Enoch, translated from the Ethiopic, we have large fragments of such a literature proceeding from a variety of Pharisaic writers in Palestine, and in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch (see next art.), translated from the Slavonic, we have additional portions of this literature. The latter book was written for the most part by Hellenistic Jews in Egypt.

The Ethiopic Book of Enoch was written in the second and first centuries B.C. It was well known to the writers of NT, and to some extent influenced alike their thought and diction. Thus it is quoted as a genuine work of Enoch by Jude (14<sup>1</sup>). Phrases, and at times entire clauses, are reproduced in NT, but without acknowledgment of their source. Barnabas (Ep. iv. 3, xvi. 5) quotes it as Scripture. It was much used by the Jewish authors of the Book of the Secrets of E. and of the Book of Jubilees; in the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs its citations are treated as Scripture, and in the later apocrypha of Baruch and 4 Ezra there are many tokens of its influence. Thus during the 1st cent. of the Christian era it possessed, alike with Jew and Christian, the authority of a canonical book. In the 2nd cent. of our era it was rejected by the Jews, as were also many other Jewish Messianic writings that had been traced into Greek and well received in the Christian Church. But with the earlier Fathers and apologists of Christianity it preserved its high position till about the close of the 3rd cent. Henceforth it fell into discredit, and finally was rejected by the chief teachers of the Church. Thus the book ceased to circulate in all but the Church of Abyssinia, where it was rediscovered in 1773 by Bruce. This traveller brought home two MSS of this book, and from one of these Lawrence made the first modern translation of Enoch in 1821.

II. ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—Apocalyptic scholars

* In the text of Jude there are some important variants, the chief being these: (1) in v. 14 κ. cur. 3 sah. arm. read ἰν μωριάσιν ἁγίων ἐγγύλων (cf. Novat.); (2) in v. 15 κ. sah. for π. τοὺς ἀρεταῖς read πάντας ψυχὰς.

that of the rest of the book, but is unique in its literature.

Remaining chs. 1-36, 72-104, all critics but Ewald and Lipsius have regarded them as the work of one and the same author. But these scholars have differed much from each other on the determination of the different elements present in these chapters, and have failed to gain the assent of other scholars as to the justness of their views. In one respect they are in agreement. These chapters are of a later date; the more closely they are examined, the more clearly they exhibit conflicting characteristics. When submitted to a searching criticism they fall naturally into four distinct parts, i.e. 1-36, 72-82, 83-90, 91-104, differing from each other in authorship, system of thought, and date.

For the conclusions the reader must refer to the Introduction, pp. 65-66, 187-189, 220-221, 260-263. It will be sufficient here to give some of the reasons for differentiating 83-90 and 91-104, as an illustration of the method there pursued in the criticism of the earlier sections. (a) The Messianic kingdom in 91-104 is finite in duration, whereas in 83-90 it is eternal. (b) In the former the Messiah takes place at the close of the world, whereas in the latter it takes place at the beginning. (c) In the former there is a resurrection of the righteous only, in the latter a resurrection of apostate Jews also. (d) In the former the temple precedes the final judgment, in the latter it is subsequent to the final judgment. (e) In the former the scene of the Messianic kingdom is apparently heaven, in the latter it is earth. Now, our conclusion as to the distinctness of these two sections on the grounds just given is confirmed when we observe the forcible dislocation undergone at the hands of the final editor in order to adapt them to the chapters that precede. Former critics have remarked that 93 m. have preceded 91-12-17, because we have in 93 m. the first seven weeks of the ten into which the world's history is divided, and in 91-12-17 the account of the remaining three weeks. They failed, however, to observe that 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, were E. summons his children to receive his parting words. Then comes the short section, 91-12-17, while 91-18 form a separate section. This section underwent these derangements in the process of its incorporation into a larger work.

As our space does not admit dealing further with the actual criticism of the book, we shall confine ourselves to the statement of results, and to a summary of the writings contained in it.

Part I, consisting of chs. 1-36 (for the nature of this part see above), was written at a late date, and is the latest part of the book, as it is used by the writer in 72-82. As 83-90 was written not later than B.C. 161, 1-36 must be some years earlier; and as there is no allusion to the massacres of Antiochus in 1-36, it is the latest reasonable limit for its date. It teaches the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the righteous in the world to come, and represents Gehenna as a final punishment. The problem of the author is to justify the ways of God to men. The righteous will not always suffer for the cause of this suffering, and the sin of man is due, not to Adam, but to the lust of the angels—the watchers (98-100). Hence the watchers, their children will be destroyed (101-102), and will form the prelude to the first world-judgment, of which the Deluge will form the completion (10-12). But sin still prevails after the Deluge, through the influence of the evil spirits that go forth from the slaughtered children of the watchers and the daughters of men (16-17). These act with impunity till the final judgment. In the meantime, character finds its recompense in some measure, immediately after death (22). In the final judgment the watchers, the demons, and all classes of Isr., with one exception, will receive their final award (19-22). This judgment is the first of a series of resurrections (22). The wicked are cast into Gehenna, and the earth is cleansed from sin (16-22). The Mess. kingdom is established with Jesus as its centre (25-26), and God abides with men (27). The Gentiles become righteous and worship God (10-12). The righteous eat of the tree of life (25-26), and thereby enjoy patriarchal lives (39). As to what befalls the righteous after the second death, there is no hint in this fragmentary section.

Part II, consisting of 83-90, was written between B.C. 166-161 by a Jew in support of the Maccab movement, and mainly from the same standpoint as Daniel. On a variety of grounds we are obliged to discriminate this section from the preceding. It will be enough to mention that, whereas there is a Messiah in the latter, there is none in the former, in the latter the life of the righteous is apparently finite; in the latter the scene of the New Jerus set up by God Himself, in the former it is Jerus. and the entire earth unchanged though purified. Finally, the picture in 83-90 is developed and spiritual, while that in 1-36 is

fix. The Hasidim, the white sheep (90), are already an organized party in the Maccab. revolt. The lambs that become horned are the Maccab. family, and the great horn who is still warring while the author of the section is the Maccabee (90), who died B.C. 161. Visions, 83-84 deal with the first world-judgment, 85-90 with the entire history of the world till the final judgment. In the second vision the interest centres in that befall Isr. from the exile onwards. A byword among the nations, and the servant of the Lord, Isr. has ascended to the heavens, and the author, seventy years hence, These shepherds or angels have proved faithless to their trust, but not with impunity. An account has been taken of all their deeds and of all whom they have wickedly destroyed (89-91). Moreover, when the outlook is darkest, a righteous league will be established, and from a family belonging to it will arise the Messiah, i.e. Judas Maccabaeus (90-91). Every effort of the Gentiles to destroy him will prove vain, and God's intervention personally will be the signal for their destruction (90-91). The wicked shepherds and fallen watchers will be cast into Gehenna (91-92), and the apostates into Gehenna. Then God Himself will set up the New Jerus. Every person will be brought back to Jerus., the righteous dead raised to take part in the kingdom of the living. Finally, the Messiah will appear amongst the surviving Gentiles will be converted and His kingdom will endure for ever. It should be observed that we have here the earliest appearance of the Messiah in non-canonical literature.

Part III, consisting of 91-104, was written between B.C. 134-95. The clearly defined opposition between the righteous and their Sadducean appears so frequently in this section cannot be the breach between John Hyrcanus and the Pharisees, hence not earlier than B.C. 134, and not subsequent to B.C. 95; for it is not reasonable to suppose that the savage cruelties that won for Jannaeus the title 'slayer of the pious' could have been referred to only once, and that incidentally, in the general terms of 103-104. On the other hand, the section was written at the hands of a Jew.

Part II is very remarkable. As we have seen in this section and feel we are entering into a world of new conceptions. Previous apocalyptic writings have been the prelude to an everlasting Mess. kingdom, and not till then, in fact, do the righteous enter on their kingdom. In this kingdom no place is found for a Messiah; the righteous, who have vindicated their just cause, will dwell in the kingdom of the risen spiritual life of blessedness in a new heaven (91-92). From such a view of the future it is obvious that, for the writer, the centre of interest has passed from the material world to the spiritual, and the Mess. kingdom is no longer the goal of the hopes of the righteous. Their faith finds its satisfaction only in a life of righteousness in heaven itself. The righteous, it is true, will live on the advent of the Mess. kingdom will indeed be recompensed with all good things, but the de-soul only (103-104). A view of the future is also in the later books, the Ps-Sol and the Book of Jubilees. As for the wicked, they shall descend into the Sheol of darkness, and from thence there shall be no return (103-104). In this section Sheol appears as hell, and is the final destination of the wicked (103-104).

Part IV, consisting of 91-104, was written between B.C. 94-79 or B.C. 70-61. With some of the characteristics which distinguish these chapters from the rest of the book we have already dealt above. We are here concerned mainly with the determination of the date. 'The kings and the mighty,' so often denounced in the Similitudes, are the later Maccab. princes and their Sadducean opponents; for the blood of the righteous was not shed, as the writer complains, before B.C. 91—the later Maccab. princes and not the Hasmoneans, for the Sadducees were not allies of the latter, and Rome was not as yet known to the writer as one of the great world-powers. This last fact necessitates an earlier date than B.C. 64, when Rome interposed authoritatively in the affairs of Judaea. If the reader will turn to the list of Noachic intercalations he will find that many of them are to be found in this section. These have, as a rule, been drawn from an already existing Apoc. or Noah and adapted by their editor to their adjoining contexts in Enoch. This he does by borrowing characteristic terms, such as 'Lord of Spirits,' 'Head of Days,' 'Son of Man,' to which, either through ignorance or of set intention, he generally gives a new connotation.

In his attempt to solve the problem of the suffering of the righteous, this author has no interest save in the moral and spiritual worlds. His view, too, is strongly apocalyptic, and follows closely in the wake of Daniel. The origin of sin is traced on to the fall of man in Gen. 3:1-6. The first authors of sin were the angels (197). The wicked are kept through becoming subject to the seven leading angels astray (200). Though the watchers were forthwith confined in a deep abyss, sin still flourishes in the world, and sinners deny the name of the Lord and the angels (201). The angels are not permitted to ly there ys, and with Him the Son of Man ment upon all alike. And to this end there will be a resur. of all Isr. (51: 41), and all judgment will be committed to the Son of Man (41: 69, 70), who will judge all according to their deeds. Sin and wrong-doing will be transformed (45: 5), and the righteous will have their mansions therein (39: 41). The Elect One they will be clad in garments of and continue to grow in knowledge and d that the Messianic doctrine in this section of E., but also

(457) He sits on the throne of God (458, 479), and is called "son of God" or "God," and all find that in 1-38 and 91-104 there is no Messiah at all, while in 83-90 the Messiah is evidently human, and has no real rôle to play in the doctrine of the last things

Before we pass to Part V, it will be advantageous to observe that the varying relations in which the Maccabees stood to the Hasid or Pharisaic party, are faithfully reflected in the Books of E. i. e. Parts II, III., and IV. In Part II, i. e. 83-90, the Maccabees are the leaders of the revolt, and in Part III. they prelude to the Mess. kingd. In Part IV. the Maccabees are no longer at the head of the Hasids, but as yet they have not become their declared foes: they are the secret abettors of their Sadducean oppressors. But when we come to Part IV., i. e. the Similitudes, the Maccab. princes have ceased to disguise their enmity, and now take the lead in every act of oppression and murder committed on the Pharisees.

Part V. The Book of Celestial Physics consists of 72-78, 82-79. Here, as in Part III., the order of the chapters has been changed by the final editor; 79, which originally followed 78, of this work, has been placed after 78, and two chapters, 80-81, which are quite new, have been added, and statement have been interpolated.

The chronological system of this book, which is most perplexing, constitutes an attempt to establish an essentially Hebcalendar over against the heathen calendars in vogue around The chronological systems that were known to Pal. Jews. Thus the writer is acquainted with the signs of the zodiac, the spring and autumn equinoxes, the summer and winter solstices, and the synodic moon. He is familiar also with the Gr. eight-year cycle, and the seventy-six years' cycle of Callippus.

Part VI. The interpolations from the Book of Noah. These have been enumerated above. By means of these fragments, and of the large section of this lost book preserved in the Book of Jubilees, and of other sources, mentioned in later Heb. literature, it would be possible, to reconstruct the Book of Noah in some of its main outlines.

V. INFLUENCE ON LATER LITERATURE.—The influence of E. on Jewish literature, to exclude for the moment the NT, is seen in the Bk. of Jubilees (written about the beginning of the Christian era), the Slavonic Enoch (A.D. 1-50), the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs, the Apocalypse of Baruch, and 4 Ezra. It is important to observe that, in the last two books just enumerated, E. is not mentioned by name, although their writers laid the Enochic books not infrequently under contribution. This silence, however, was intentional. E.'s acceptance among Christians as a Messianic prophet was the ground of his rejection among the Jews; and although, prior to A.D. 40, he was the chief figure, next to Daniel, in Jewish apocalyptic, in subsequent Jewish literature his functions and achievements are assigned to others, such as Moses, Ezra, Baruch. This opposition to E. is unswervingly pursued in the Talm., and his name and works are always studiously ignored (see Charles, Apocalypse of Baruch, pp. 21-22, 101). On these facts we might found an Enochic canon. No early Jewish book which extols E. could have been written after A.D. 50, and the attribution of E.'s words and achievements in early Jewish works to some other OT hero is a sign that they were written subsequent to the Pauline preaching of Christianity.

In Patristic literature Enoch is twice cited as Scripture in the Ep. of Barnabas (4<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>). It is also quoted with approval, though not always by name, by Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Athenagoras, Tertullian, Clement Alex., Origen, Anatolius. Thenceforward it is mentioned with disapproval by Hilary, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, and finally condemned in explicit terms in the Const. Ap. vi. 16.

Far more important the preceding was its influence on N4 (a) diction and (b) doctrine.

(a) We shall here draw attention only to the indubitable instances. It is quoted directly in Jude <sup>14, 15</sup>. Phrases, clauses, or thoughts derived from it are found also in Jude <sup>4</sup>, Rev <sup>27</sup> <sup>310</sup> <sup>46</sup> <sup>610</sup> <sup>9</sup> <sup>1420</sup> <sup>203</sup>, Rom <sup>838</sup> <sup>95</sup>, Eph <sup>121</sup>, He <sup>115</sup>, Ac <sup>314</sup>, Jn <sup>522</sup>, <sup>27</sup> Lk <sup>935</sup> <sup>169</sup> <sup>2335</sup>, Mt <sup>1928</sup> <sup>2541</sup> <sup>2624</sup>.

(b) The doctrines in E. that had a share in moulding the ... NT doctrines, or formed a neces ... the development of doctrine from OT to NT, are those concerning the Messianic kingdom and the Messiah, Sheol and the Resurrection, and demonology. As we cannot here enter into a discussion of these questions, we shall confine our remarks to the doctrine of the Messiah in Enoch. First, we should observe that four titles, applied, for the first time in literature, to the personal Messiah in the Similitudes, are afterwards reproduced in NT. These are 'Christ' (or 'the Anointed One'), 'the First-born One,' 'the Elect One,' and 'the Son of Man.' The first title, found repeatedly in earlier writings, but always in reference to actual contemporary kings or priests, is now for the first time (48<sup>50</sup> 52<sup>4</sup>) applied to the Messianic king that is to come. It is here associated with supernatural attributes. In Pa-that we had here a mistake of . . . he had before him a portion of . . . unknown to later generations. That the latter assumption was the true one we are now able to see; for in the 'The Book of the Secrets of Enoch' we have an elaborate account of the creation, 24-29<sup>8</sup>, and an insistence on the unity of God, 33<sup>8</sup> 36<sup>1</sup>. Further, in the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs there are several direct references to the Bk. of Enoch. Some of them have clearly to do with the Ethiopic Enoch, but others have as clearly no connexion with it. Now, the bulk of the latter may be traced to the book with which we are at present dealing. This book, as it has been preserved only in Slavonic, it will be convenient to call 'the Slavonic Enoch' in contradistinction to the older book, which we may fitly designate 'the Ethiopic Enoch,' seeing that it has come down to us in its entirety only in that language.

This new fragment of the Enoch literature has only recently come to light through certain MSS which were found in Russia and Servia. Although the very knowledge that such a book ever existed was lost for probably 1200 years, it was nevertheless much used both by Christian and heretic in the early centuries. Thus citations appear from it, though without acknowledgment, in the Book of Adam and Eve, the . . . of Moses and Paul (A.D. 400-500), . . . Oracles, the Ascension of Isaiah, and the Ep. of Barnabas (A.D. 70-90). It is quoted by name in the apocalyptic portions of the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs (c. A.D. 1). It was referred to by Origen, and probably by Clement of Alexandria, and was used by Irenaeus. Some phrases of NT may be derived from it.

The Slavonic MSS.—There are five Slav. MSS. The first (i.e. A) belongs to the 17th cent., and contains the complete text. It was edited by Popov in 1880, and forms the basis of the text of . . . The second . . . one—was discovered by Sokolov in 1886. This also preserves the complete text. The remaining three MSS are very incomplete. The most important of these (i.e. . . .) of Belgrade.

. . . present writer, learning . . . the existence of a Slav. VS . . . proceeded by Mr. Morfill's help to make him . . . distinct recensions of this work. This . . . that it was not a Slav. VS of the Ethiopic Enoch, but of a hitherto unknown and extremely valuable . . . Mr. Morfill's tr. of the MSS A and . . . Eng. VS and ed. of this book was issued in . . . months later Bonwitsch's Das Slav. . . . which German tr. of the MSS A and . . . preceded by a short introduction, founded professedly in the main on Charles' edition. This is a serviceable work.

II. LANGUAGE AND PLACE OF WRITING.—The main part of this book was written at the first in Greek. This is clear from such statements as (1) 30<sup>18</sup> 'And I gave him a name (i.e. Adam) from the four substances: the East, the West, the North, and the South.' Adam's name is thus derived from the initial letters of the Gr. names of the four quarters, i.e. ἀνατολή, δύσις, ἀρκτος, μεσημβρία. This fanciful derivation was first elaborated in Greek, as it is impossible in the Sem. languages; but the idea that Adam was created from dust belonging to the four quarters of the earth is Jewish. (2) The writer follows the chronology of the LXX. (3) In 50<sup>4</sup> he reproduces the LXX text of Dt 32<sup>35</sup> against the Hebrew. (4) He constantly uses Sir, which was chiefly current in Egypt. But though the main part of the book was written originally in Greek, certain portions of it were based on Heb. originals. Such an hypothesis is necessary to account for the quotations from or references to it which appear in the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs. The fact that the latter work was written in Hebrew obliges us to conclude that its authors drew upon Heb. originals in their references to and quotations from the Slavonic Enoch.

The book was written in Egypt. This is deducible from the following facts:—(1) From the variety of . . . which it holds in common with . . . Hellenistic writers: thus souls were created before the foundation of the world, 23<sup>8</sup>; cf. Philo, de Somno, i. 22; Wis 8<sup>19, 20</sup>. Again, man has seven natures, 30<sup>8</sup>; cf. Philo, de Mundi Op 40. (2) The whole Messianic teaching of OT . . . in the work of this Hellenized . . . though he shows familiarity with most of its books. (3) The Phoenixes and Chalkydries of ch. 12 are natural products of the Egypt. . . (4) The syncretistic character of . . . narrative in 25-26 betrays Egypt. elements.

III. RELATION TO JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

Materials originally derived from this book are discoverable in Cedrenus and Joel (A.D. 1050-1200), though in these authors these materials are assigned to other names. Two passages of the Book of Adam and Eve in i. vi. and vii. are all but quotations from 29<sup>4</sup> and 31<sup>2</sup> of our book. Again, in the Apoc. of Moses (ed. Tisch. 1866), p. 19, we have a further development of 14<sup>2-4</sup> of our text, just as in the Apoc. of Paul, p. 64, ἀνὴρ ἰσχυρὸς καὶ παλαιός, ὡς . . . διδόνον . . . ἵς ἡ πνευματικὴ τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, is a Christian adaptation of 8<sup>8</sup> 'And in the midst (of Paradise) is the tree of life . . . on which God rests when he comes unto Paradise.' Again, the words, p. 64, ἐν τῇ βίτῃ αὐτοῦ ἐξήρχητο . . . ὕδωρ, μετρίονον ἐς τὰς ἀρκτοὺς ὁρίων, and p. 52, ποταμοὶ τέσσαρες . . . βέντες καὶ καὶ γάλα καὶ ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον, are verbal reproductions of 8<sup>9</sup> 'From its root in the garden there go forth four streams which pour honey and milk, oil and wine, and are separated in four directions.' The passage in the anonymous De Montibus Sina et Sion, i. 18, ἡ ἰσχυρία ἐκ τῆς ἐκείνης ἀπὸ τοῦ 80<sup>13</sup>, and Augu . . . eternal day (De Civ. . . .)

Still earlier we find almost a verbal reproduction of 50<sup>5</sup>-51<sup>1</sup> in the Sibylline Oracles, ii. 75. In Irenaeus' Contra Haer. v. 23. 3, the Jewish speculation of 33<sup>2</sup> is reproduced, and possibly in Origen (see Lommatsch, ed. xxi. 69). However this may be, there is no doubt as to the direct reference to 24-30, 33<sup>8</sup>, in the De Princip. i. 3. 2, as we have already shown above. In a still . . . the writer of the Ascension of Isaiah . . . acquainted with 19<sup>1</sup>, and the writer of . . . with various passages of this book. . . 18<sup>1</sup>, the thought

In NT the similarity of matter and language is sufficiently great to establish a close connexion, if not a literary dependence. With Mt 5<sup>9</sup> 'Blessed are the peacemakers,' cf. 52<sup>1</sup> 'Blessed is he who establishes peace'; with Mt 5<sup>34, 35, 37</sup> 'Swear not at all,' etc., cf. 49<sup>1</sup> 'I will not swear by a single oath, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by any other creature which God made. . . If there is no truth in man, let them swear by a word, yea, yea, or nay, nay.' Again, with Mt 7<sup>20</sup> and 25<sup>34</sup> cf. 42<sup>14</sup> and 9<sup>1</sup>; with Jn 14<sup>2</sup> cf. 61<sup>2</sup>; with Eph 4<sup>26</sup> cf. 42<sup>12</sup>; with Rev 9<sup>1</sup> and 10<sup>5-6</sup> cf. 42<sup>1</sup> and 65<sup>7</sup>.

Still earlier we find this book not only used, but quoted by name in the Test. Dan. 5, where the statement, τὸν πνευματικὸν τῆς πλάνης ἀνέγνω γὰρ ἐν βιβλῳ Ἐνὸχ τοῦ δικαίου, ὅτι ὁ ἄρχων ὡμίον ἦν ὁ Ζευταῖος, is drawn from 18<sup>3</sup> 'These are the Grigori (i.e. Ἐγγρηγοῖ) who with their prince Satanail rejected the holy Lord.' Finally, the references to Enoch in Test. Naph. 4, ἀνέγνω ἐν γραφῇ ἁγίᾳ Ἐνὸχ, ὅτι καὶ καὶ ὡμίον ἀποστήσας ἀπὸ Κυρίου, περιβιβάσκει κατὰ πᾶσαν ποταμὸν ἰδιὸν, καὶ ποιῆσιν κατὰ πᾶσαν ἀνοσίαν Σιδεῖον, καὶ ἰσχυρία ὡμίον Κυρίου σιχαλῶσαν . . . ἡμεῖς ἂν ἀναβῶμεν ἡμεῖς . . . I know the world with . . . and I will destroy all' in the Test. Benj. 9, ὡς ἔειπεν Ἐνὸχ . . . men. Test. Jud. 18 may be derived from the same source.

IV. DATE AND AUTHORSHIP.—The question of the date has to a large extent been determined already. The portions which have a Heb. background are at latest pre-Christian. This follows from the fact of their quotation in the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs. Turning to the rest of the book, the terminus a quo is determined by the fact that it frequently uses Sir, cf. 43<sup>2-4</sup> 47<sup>5</sup> 52<sup>4</sup> 61<sup>2-4</sup> etc. The Ethiopic Enoch, further, is continually presupposed in the background. Its phraseology and conceptions are reproduced, 74.<sup>5</sup> 334.<sup>9-10</sup> 35<sup>5</sup> etc. At times its views are put forward in a developed form, 81.<sup>5-6</sup> 40<sup>13</sup> 64<sup>9</sup>; and occasionally divergent conceptions are enunciated, 10<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>.

Finally, explanations are claimed to have been given by Sir. Enoch, as a matter of fact, are not to be found in his writings, but in the Ethiopic Enoch, see 40<sup>6</sup>. 6. 8. 9. It is possible that Wis was also used by our author, see 65<sup>1</sup>. Since, therefore, Sir, Eth. Enoch, and Wis (?) were used by this author, his work cannot have been earlier than B.C. 30.

The terminus ad quem must be set down as earlier than 70 A.D. For (1) the temple is still standing. (2) This book was known and used by the writers of the Ep. of Barnabas and the Ascension of Isaiah, and probably by some of the writers of NT. We may therefore with reasonable certainty assign the composition of this book in Greek to the period A.D. 1-50, to an author who is thus a contemporary of Philo, and who holds many speculations in common with him.

The author was an orthodox Hellenistic Jew who lived in Egypt. He believed in the value of sacrifices, 42<sup>o</sup> 59<sup>o</sup> 2<sup>o</sup> 66<sup>o</sup> (but he is careful to enforce enlightened views with regard to them, 45<sup>o</sup> 4<sup>o</sup> 61<sup>o</sup> 5<sup>o</sup>), in the law, 52<sup>o</sup> 8<sup>o</sup>, and in a blessed immortality, 50<sup>o</sup> 65<sup>o</sup>. 8-10, in which the righteous will wear 'the raiment of God's glory,' 22<sup>o</sup>. In questions affecting the origin of the earth, sin, death, he allows himself the most unrestricted freedom, and borrows from every quarter. Thus Platonic 30th, Egyptian 25th, and Zend 58th elements are introduced in this system. The result is highly synthetic.

V. ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS.—The book opens with a short account of Enoch as 'a very wise man' whom 'God loved and received, so that he should see the heavenly abodes, the kingdoms of the wise, great, and never-changing God' (1). In ch. 1 two angels appear to E., and bid him to make ready to ascend with them unto heaven. In ch. 2 E. admonishes his sons 'not to walk in vain glory, not to lift up his hand from God, but to walk before him, and to be obedient to his judgments,' and directs them 'not to be proud, but to be brought back to them. Then (3) E. is carried aloft through the air to the first heaven, where he sees a very great sea, greater than the earthly sea; likewise the elders and the rulers of the stars, and the treasures of the snow and ice and the dread angels that guard them, and the treasures of the clouds and of the dew and the guardian angels. Thence (7) he is carried to the second heaven, where he sees 'the prisoners suspended, reserved for, and awaiting the eternal judgment. And the angels, who together with their prince (4) had descended to E., besought E. just as in Eth. Enoch 13:1-13:20. And E. answered, 'Who am I, a mortal man, that I should pray for angels? Who knows whether I go, or what awaits me.' Next E. is carried up to the third heaven (8), and placed 'in the midst of a garden.' And he sees there 'all the trees of beautiful colours, and their fruits ripe and fragrant . . . and the tree of life . . . on which God rests when . . . Paradise,' and the four streams which go forth from . . . pouring honey and milk, oil and wine. . . . And these go down to the Paradise of Eden, between corruptibility and incorruptibility. . . . And the angels inform E. that 'this place is prepared as an eternal inheritance' for those 'who turn their eyes from unrighteousness and accomplish a righteous judgment, and give bread to the hungry, and clothe the naked, and raise the fallen, . . . and walk without blame before the face of the Lord.' E. is then taken 'to the northern region of this heaven (10), and shown 'a very terrible place' of 'savage darkness and impenetrable gloom, with 'fire on all sides, and on all sides cold and ice' He is then told that 'this place is prepared as an eternal inheritance' for those 'who . . . craft, . . . who . . . lyng, calumnies, . . . who . . . worship gods' . . . to the fourth heaven, where he is shown the courses of the sun and moon (11), and the phoenixes and the chakadri (12) 'with the feet and tails of lions and the heads of crocodiles; their appearance was of purple colour like the rainbow, their size nine hundred measures. Their wings were like those of angels, each with twelve, and they attend the chariot of the sun.' And the angels show him also the eastern and western sun (13-16), and 'an armed host serving the . . . and organs' (17). In 18 E. is taken up to the fifth heaven, where he sees the watchers who had rebelled, and whose brethren were already confined in torment in the second heaven. Then he passes to the sixth heaven (19), where are the angels who regulate all the powers of nature and the courses of the stars, and write down the deeds of men. Finally, E. is raised to the seventh heaven (20-21), where he sees and the heavenly hosts in their throne, and the seraphim singing the trisagion. And E. (22) tell down and from him his from the arbor misericordiae, the olive tree that stood in the garden, and clothed him with the 'rayment of God's glory'.

And thus E. became like one of under the instruction of Yreli, in thirty days and thirty nights about things in heaven and earth, and about

And God said, "Let there be light," and there was light. And God saw that the light was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness He called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day. And God said, "Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters." And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and God called the firmament Heaven. And God said, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear." And God did so. And God called the dry land Earth, and the gathering together of the waters He called Seas: and God saw that it was good. And God said, "Let the earth bring forth grass, and herb yielding seed, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it shall bring forth." And God did so. And God created great whales, and every living creature that creepeth, and every beast of the earth, and every beast that hath life, according to their kind, and every thing that hath life of the waters, according to their kind: and God saw that it was good. And God said, "Let the earth bring forth the living creature according to its kind," and God created the cattle of the earth according to their kind, and the creeping things of the earth according to their kind, and the beasts of the earth according to their kind. And God said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the creeping things that creep upon the earth." And God created man in his own image, after his likeness: male and female created he them. And God blessed them, saying, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living creature that creepeth upon the earth." And God said, "Behold, I have given you every herb that yieldeth seed upon the face of the earth, and every tree which hath seed-bearing fruit, I have given them unto you. And to the beasts of the earth, and to the fowl of the air, and to every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, I have given every green herb for food." And it was so. And the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord God: for in six days the Lord God made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day: wherefore the Lord God blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.

f. . . . . the world, and showed to him the two
w. . . . . less. And while Adam was in Paradise the heavens were open so that he could see the angels in heaven (31); . . . . . and God established t . . . . . of which time should be no more. And God ann . . . . . E. as is . . . . .
N. . . . .
a . . . . .
co . . . . .
an . . . . .
to . . . . .

parable dignity of goodness—'none is greater than he who fears God' (48). They are not to revile the person of man, for he who reviles man in reality reviles God; they are to make their offerings, and yet not to . . . . . it consider the motive rather from which . . . . . E. gives his books to his sons (47); inst . . . . . ear, neither by heaven nor by earth nor by any other creature which God made (49); bids them in meekness to accomplish the number of their days; to refrain from avenging themselves, and to be open-handed to those in need (50-51). A . . . . . seven beatitudes and their corresponding departed saints do not intercede for the . . . . .
close of the appointed time (55-59) E. again . . . . .
He announces to them his coming departure to the highest . . . . . to soul shall perish till the final
. . . . . of beasts will then bring charges
. . . . . them. He gives further instruction to his sons, and their duty to the needy, and warns them to accept and . . . . . people on various topics, and exhorts them to integrity. He announces the great judgment, after which 'the times shall perish, and there shall be no year, nor month, nor day, and there shall be no hours.' 'Moreover, there shall be no labour, nor sickness, nor sorrow, anxiety, nor need, nor night, nor darkness, but a great light.' He is then carried off to the highest heaven. And his sons thereupon build an altar in Achuzan and hold high festival, rejoicing and praising God (64-68).

VI. THE AUTHOR'S VIEWS ON ANTHROPOLOGY. —All the souls of men were created before the foundation of the world, 23<sup>5</sup>, and also a future place of abode in heaven or hell for every individual soul, 49<sup>2</sup> 58<sup>5</sup> 61<sup>2</sup>. Man's body was made of seven substances, 30<sup>8</sup>, and his name, as we have already seen, was given to him by God from the four quarters. Man was created originally good; free will was bestowed upon him, with the knowledge of good and evil. He was instructed in the two ways of light and darkness, and then permitted to mould his own destiny, 30<sup>15</sup>. But his connexion with the body biased his preferences in the direction of evil, and death ensued as the wages of sin, 30<sup>16</sup>. All men will be judged finally, 40<sup>2-13</sup>; the righteous will escape the last judgment, 65<sup>5</sup> 66<sup>7</sup>, and be gathered to eternal life; but hell will be the eternal abode of the wicked, 104<sup>6</sup> and there is no place of repentance after death, 42<sup>2</sup>

VII. VALUE OF THE BOOK IN ELUCIDATING CONTEMPORARY AND SUBSEQUENT THOUGHT.—Fresh evidence on the subject of the Jewish conception of time is contributed by this book. i. The seven heavens.—This Jewish conception is first found in 32<sup>d</sup>–33<sup>d</sup>. From this its origin is clear. The account in Gn of the first week of creation came in pre-Christian times to be regarded, not only as a history of the past, but as a forecast of the future history of the world so created. Thus, as the world was created in six days, its history was to last 6000; for 1000 years with God are as one day (Ps 90<sup>4</sup>, Jub. 4th, 2 P 3rd); and as God rested on the seventh day, so at the close of 6000 years there should be a rest of 1000 years, i.e. the millennium. Thereupon followed the future world of eternal bliss, designated as the eighth eternal day. ii. The seven heavens.—The detailed account of the seven heavens in this book has served to explain difficulties in OT conceptions of the heavens, and has shown beyond the reach of controversy that the sevenfold division of the heavens was accepted by St. Paul and the author of Hebrews, and probably in Rev. From this book, further, it is clear that a feature impossible in modern conceptions of heaven shows itself from time to time in pre-Christian and also in early Christian conceptions, i.e. the belief in the presence of evil, or in the possibility of its being in the heavens. For a discussion of this subject the reader should consult Expository Times (art. 'The Seven Heavens'), Nov. and Dec. 1895, and Charles, The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, pp. xxx–xlvi.

R. H. CHARLES.

ENOCH (City).—See ENOCH 1 (p. 704<sup>b</sup>).

ENOS (so RV in Lk 3<sup>38</sup>), the same as Enoch (עֲנוֹשׁ), the name of the son of Seth (Gn 4<sup>28</sup>). He was the father of Kenan; and the length of his life is stated as 905 years (Gn 5<sup>6</sup>). It is said in connexion with the mention of his birth, 'then began men to call upon the name of J<sup>h</sup>' (4<sup>28</sup>). 'Enosh' denotes 'man in his frailty and weakness.' The fact of prayer being made to J<sup>h</sup> first when Enosh was born, perhaps indicates allegorically the belief that men were then first driven by sickness, and by a sense of frailty and dependence, to cry for help to the invisible Creator. The LXX, which translates the second clause of 4<sup>28</sup> οὗτος ἡλπίσεν ἐπικαλεῖσθαι κ.τ.λ., associates Enosh himself with this step in the spiritual life of the human race (cf. parallels 4<sup>30</sup> and 10<sup>5</sup>). The advance thus made by the generation of Enosh the son of Seth is evidently intended to stand as the counterpart to the advance in another aspect of life recorded by Enoch—the parallel generation in the line of Cain (4<sup>17</sup>). It has been suggested that this mention of Enosh and of the first recourse to prayer to J<sup>h</sup> must have been derived from a source of J<sup>h</sup> tradition distinct from that which records the sacrifices of Cain and Abel, inasmuch as sacrifice would imply supplication to the Deity.

H. E. RYLE.

EN-RIMMON (עֵן רִמּוֹן 'spring of [the] pomegranate').—One of the settlements of Judahites after the return from the Exile, Neh 11<sup>29</sup>. In Jos 15<sup>32</sup> amongst the towns assigned to Judah we find 'Ain and Rimmon,' and in 19<sup>7</sup> (cf. 1 Ch 4<sup>32</sup>) amongst those assigned to Simon are 'Ain, Rimmon.' In all these instances there can be little doubt that we ought to read neither עֵן nor רִמּוֹן, but עֵין רִמּוֹן (En-rimmon). This reading is accepted by Bennett and Kittel in Joshua and Chronicles in Haupt's OT. En-rimmon is probably to be identified with the modern Umm-er-Rumāmin, about 9 miles N. of Beersheba.

LITERATURE.—Lagarde, Onom. 120, 256; Robinson, BRP iii. 233; Van de Velde, Memoir, 344; PEF Mem. iii. 392, 393.

J. A. SELBIE.

EN-ROGEL (עֵן רֹגֵל 'spring of fuller'), a spring in the immediate neighbourhood, on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>). Owing to its position close to but yet out of view of the city, Jonathan and Ahimaaz, the sons of the priests, were stationed there during the rebellion of Absalom, in order that they might secretly receive and carry news from Hushai in Jerus. to David in his camp by the Jordan (2 S 17<sup>17</sup>). At a later period of history it was the scene of a great feast given by Adonijah, the eldest son of David, presumably with a view to forcibly seizing the crown (1 K 1<sup>9</sup> 'by the stone of Zohaleth, which is beside E.'). Jos. (Ant. vii. xiv. 4) describes it as being 'without the city, in the royal gardens'; and again (Ant. ix. x. 4) speaks of a place called Eroge (clearly, as Mr. Grove has pointed out, a mistake for En-rogel), at which the earthquake consequent on the death of Uzziah dislodged a portion of the rock, so as to obstruct the roads and the royal gardens. Modern authorities are somewhat divided as to the exact site of the spring; but the bulk of the evidence is in favour of the identification of E. with 'the fountain of the Virgin.' This spring, now called 'Ain Umm ed-Deraj'—the spring of the steps, lies in the Kidron valley, close to the village of Siloam, and is, in fact, the source from which the Upper Pool of Siloam derives its supply of water; the latter flows through a rock-hewn tunnel 'dating from the time of the Kings' (Sir C. Wilson). The latter authority further considers that originally this supply of water was carried as far as the Lower Pool (Birket el-Hamra), and that it was stored there for irrigating the king's gardens. The arguments brought forward in support of this view are, briefly, as follows:—(1) The 'Fountain of the Virgin' is the only real spring near to Jerusalem. (2) Immediately fronting it, on the farther side of the valley, there is a rude flight of steps, cut out of the precipitous face of the cliff, which leads to the village of Siloam; this place is called at the present time ez-Zehweleh, and is identified by M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEFS, 1869–70, p. 253) with the stone of Zohaleth. (3) The spring must have always been well known, and so would naturally form a landmark on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin. (4) In the account of St. James' martyrdom, he is said to have been cast from the temple wall into the valley of Kidron, and finally slain by a fuller with his stick. From this it has been inferred that St. James was cast down near the spot where the fullers were working. (5) This spring is still the great resort of the women of Jerus. for washing and treating their clothes.

Others, however, identify E. with Bir Eyûb—the well of Job, or 'the well of Nehemiah' (acc. to a later tradition). Three points are urged in favour of this view: (1) that in the Arab. VS of Jos 15<sup>7</sup> E. is translated by 'Ain Eyûb'; (2) that in an early Jewish itinerary (Uri of Biel in Hottinger's Itin. p. 11) called 'the well of Joab,' as if connected with the connexion with Adonijah; and (3) that this view agrees better with the common boundary of Judah and Benjamin. But these arguments are not sufficiently weighty to counterbalance the following objections: (1) The Bir Eyûb is a well, not a spring, its waters, as a rule, being 70 to 80 ft. below the level of the ground. (2) Its situation does not suit the narrative of 2 S 17. Lying below the junction of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom, it is at once too far from the city and from the direct road over the Mt. of Olives to the Jordan; and if ez-Zehweleh is the same as Zohaleth, it would also be too far from this latter spot. (3) Its date is uncertain; but it is hardly probable that it goes back to the time of Joshua.

LITERATURE.—Besides the authorities cited above, see Bockl. Chr. Socn., Pal. 113; Robinson, B.P. 1. 331 f.; Williams, Hol. 1. 1. 189 ff.; PEF Mem. 'Jerusalem,' p. 365 ff.; Rev. Rev., Hob. Arch. 42; W. R. Smith, RS 172, 489; PEFSt. 1871, 70, 1884, 135; 1885, 20, 134, 228; 1886, 56; 1889, 45 ff.; 1890, 125. J. F. STENNING.

ENROLMENT.—See QUIRINIUS.

ENSAMPLE.—This is the tr. in AV of τύπος, 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>, Ph 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>4</sup>; and of ὑπόδειγμα, 2 P 2<sup>9</sup>; while 'example' is the tr. of τύπος, 1 Co 10<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>; of ὑπόδειγμα, Jn 13<sup>15</sup>, He 4<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>5</sup>, Ja 5<sup>10</sup>; of δείγμα, Jude<sup>7</sup>; of the vb. παράδειγμα (‘make a publick example’), Mt 1<sup>19</sup>; and of ὑπογραμμός, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>. Both forms have the same meaning, and in AV they are always synonymous with ‘pattern’ or ‘model.’ Thus in He 8<sup>5</sup> ὑπόδειγμα is tr<sup>d</sup> ‘example,’ and τύπος ‘pattern,’ after Tindale’s ‘ensample,’ and ‘patrone,’ ‘the h i i both places Wyclif has ‘saumpler,’ G. . . ‘saumpler,’ Rhem. ‘exampler.’ But the pattern may be used for imitation or avoidance. In mod. Eng. wherever ‘ensample’ is used, it has a biblical flavour, and suggests a good example. Hence RV retains ‘ensample’ in Ph 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>4</sup>, but gives ‘example’ in 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>9</sup>.

‘Ensouple’ seems to be an Eng spelling. The Lat. exemplum appears in old Fr. as ensamplum; this becomes in Eng. ‘asample,’ of which Oxf. Eng. Dict. quotes a single instance (but it may be noticed that Wyc. has the u always, ‘ensample’). Then ‘asample’ becomes ‘ensample.’ Skeat on ‘the h i i’ of Ru 4<sup>11</sup> ‘que ele . . . ut sit exemplum . . . she maye be an ensample of vertue’ . . . rejects this French spelling, and reckons ‘ensample’ only English. The earliest instance of ‘example’ that has been found is dated 1447 (though there is a various reading ‘exsample’ in the Wycliffe version of 1382 at Jude<sup>7</sup>), while ‘ensample’ is found as early as 1250. And ‘ensample’ is most common by far till it began to be superseded by small Eng. words after their Lat. originals. Tindale has ‘ensample’ in ‘the h i i’ passages given above; and it is followed by all the Eng. Vss. the Rhemish. J. HASTINGS.

EN-SHEMESH (עֶשְׁמֶשׁ), ‘sun-spring,’ Jos 15<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>7</sup>.—A spring E. of En-rogel, on the way to Jericho. It is believed to be the spring on the Jericho road, E. of Olivet. Known as the ‘apostles’ fountain’ (Ain . . . S.W.P. vol. iii. sheet xvii.; also Tristram, Land of Israel, 196; PEFSt. 1874, 70; and Dillmann on Jos 15<sup>7</sup>).

C. R. CONDER.

ENSIGN.—See BANNER.

ENSUE.—Coverdale’s tr. of Ps 34<sup>14</sup> is ‘Let him seke peace and ensue it’; and this was retained in the Bishops’ Bible, and is now read in the Pr. Bk. But AV adopted the Douay word ‘pursue.’ In 1 P 3<sup>11</sup>, however, which is a quot. of Ps 34<sup>14</sup>, AV accepted ‘ensue,’ which had come from Tindale, the Rhemish having here ‘follow.’ ‘Ensue’ is thus used with the unusual force of ‘strive after’ or ‘pursue’ (Gr. διωξάτω), as Caxton, Cato, 2b, ‘Escheve alle vyces and ensuewe vertue.’ RV gives ‘pursue.’ As intrans. vb. ‘ensue’ is found in Jth 9<sup>8</sup> ‘the things . . . which ensued after’ (so RV; Gr. ῥὰ συνέπνευα). We still use the word in dates, as ‘the ensuing year.’ J. HASTINGS.

EN-TAPPUAH (עֵין תַּפְּוּא ‘the spring of citron or apple’).—A place on the boundary of Manasseh (Jos 17<sup>7</sup>). It is mentioned between ‘Michmethath, which is before (east of) Shechem,’ and ‘the brook of Kanah.’ Michmethath is generally (but see Dillm. ad loc.) identified with Mukhna, E. of Nablus, and the brook Kanah is Wady Kanah. Conder’s identification of עֵין תַּפְּוּא with a spring, near Yasuf, in a valley to the S. of Mukhna, which drains into Wady Kanah, is accepted by most authorities. The place is probably the Tappuah (which see) of Jos 16<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>8</sup>. C. W. WILSON.

ENTREAT.—See INTREAT.

ENVY is a feeling of uneasiness or displeasure occasioned by beholding the prosperity or advantages enjoyed by others. Butler, in a note to the first of his Sermons on Human Nature, indicates it as the vice of that quality of soul of which Emulation is the corresponding virtue. The latter is that ‘desire and hope of equality with, or superiority over, others, with whom we compare ourselves,’ which not only may be free from any unworthy feeling towards them, but is obviously the very spring of human progress. The characteristic of Envy, on the other hand, is ‘to desire the attainment of this equality or superiority by the particular means of others being brought down to our own level or below it.’

The scriptural use of the term is quite in accordance with this description of it, and of its relation to the emotion of which it is a perversion. Of the three words, one in OT and two in NT, of which it appears as a translation, only one, φθόνος (with its cognate verb φθονέω), has uniformly the evil meaning. The difficult verse Ja 4<sup>5</sup> ‘Do you say, The Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy?’ is scarcely an exception. If, as seems probable, having regard to the context, the rendering of the second clause given in RVm is correct—‘That spirit which he made to dwell in us yearneth for us even unto jealous envy’—the phrase must be held as merely illustrating the intensity of the divine affection, which requires the exclusive devotion of its object, by a reference to the human passion of jealousy or envy. (See Expos. Times, viii. [1896] p. 76 f.)

The other two words, of which mention has been made, are ἔρις (noun ἔρις) in OT, and ζῆλος (verb ζηλέω) in NT; and of each of these words both meanings, the worthy and the unworthy, often appear. ἔρις, the original force of which is, apparently, burning, glowing, naturally denotes, in the first instance, intense emotion. It is used to express the indignation of Joshua (Nu 11<sup>20</sup>), the zeal of Phinehas (Nu 25<sup>13</sup>), and the jealousy of Elijah (1 K 19<sup>10, 14</sup>), as well as the envy of Rachel for her sister (Gn 30<sup>1</sup>), of his brethren for Joseph (Gn 37<sup>11</sup>), of the people for Moses (Ps 106<sup>16</sup>), or the mutual envy of Judah and Ephraim (Is 11<sup>18</sup>). In the Book of Proverbs the evil sense alone appears. Contrasted with ‘a sound heart,’ which is ‘the life of the flesh,’ Envy is ‘the rottenness of the bones’ (Pr 14<sup>30</sup>); it is more formidable than wrath or anger, for ‘who is able to stand before envy?’

The NT term is ζῆλος, in which the same sense is found. In 1 Co 14<sup>1</sup> (RV) we read ‘Desire earnestly spiritual gifts’; in Gal 4<sup>18</sup> ‘it is good to be zealously affected (RV ‘sought’) always in a good thing’; and in Rev 3<sup>19</sup> the command ‘Be zealous’ is coupled with an admonition to repent. In like manner the ‘zeal’ of Jn 2<sup>17</sup>, Ro 10<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>11, 9</sup>, Ph 3<sup>8</sup>, Col 4<sup>12</sup>, the ‘fervent mind’ of 2 Co 7<sup>7</sup>, and the ‘jealousy’ of 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>, illustrate the commendable aspect of the emotion indicated. In lists of vices, on the other hand, such as those in Ro 1<sup>29</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup>, envy has a conspicuous place. Trench, in New Testament Synonyms, points out that in the list given in Mk 7<sup>21, 22</sup> the place of φθόνος is taken by the circumlocution ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς, ‘an evil eye’ (compare Mt 20<sup>15</sup>, also 1 S 18<sup>9</sup> ‘Saul eyed David’), which reminds us of the derivation of the Lat. invidia, Eng. ‘envy,’ from invidere ‘to look closely at,’ so ‘to look maliciously.’

It may be noted that in the following passages, Job 5<sup>2</sup>, Pr 27<sup>4</sup>, Ac 7<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>46</sup> 17<sup>8</sup>, Ro 13<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co

12<sup>20</sup>, Ja 3<sup>14, 16</sup> RV substitutes 'jealousy,' or its cognates, for 'envy.'

For the difference between zēlos and phōnos see Trench, Synon. of NT, p. 83 ff., and art. ZEAL.

A. STEWART.

EPAENETUS (Ἐπαίνετος).—One of the Christians greeted by St. Paul at the end of the Ep. to the Romans (16<sup>5</sup>). He is mentioned at the beginning of the list immediately after Prisca and Aquila, is described as 'my beloved' (τὸν ἀγαπητόν μου), and as the 'first fruits (ἀπαρχή) of Asia unto Christ' (the reading Achaia of TR is clearly wrong, being derived from 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>). The name, which is Greek, is not uncommon, occurring in inscriptions both of Rome and Asia. One from the former place mentions an E. who was a native of Ephesus (CIL vi. 17171).

The mention of Prisca, Aquila, and E. forms the basis of the theory that Ro 16<sup>3-16</sup> was addressed to the Church at Ephesus; but three names—two of them belonging to persons originally resident at Rome—out of a total of more than twenty, are not sufficient evidence for it. It was natural that the Christian body in the capital should consist largely at first of foreigners; and even one hundred years later, in the time of Justin Martyr, out of a body of seven Christians condemned to death in Rome, three are foreigners (Acta Iustini, § 4).

LITERATURE.—Renan, St. Paul, p. lxx; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 301; Sanday and Headlam, Romans, p. 421.

A. C. HEADLAM.

EPAPHRAS (Ἐπαφρᾶς, a shortened form of Ἐπαφρόδιτος; see EPAPHRODITUS) was a native of Colossæ (ὁ ἐκ κολων Col 4<sup>12</sup>), and as we learn from the correct reading of Col 1<sup>7</sup> the founder of the Col. Church (καθὼς ἐμύθερε ἀπὸ Ἐπαφρᾶ, 'even as ye learned of Epaphras,' where the omission of καὶ (also) of TR makes Epaphras more than an accessory teacher). It is prob. that he was also the evangelist of the towns of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col 2<sup>1</sup>). He visited St. Paul during his first Rom. imprisonment, and brought an encouraging report of the state of the Church at Col 1<sup>10</sup>, and for his zeal would seem to have been condemned to share the apostle's imprisonment (ὁ συναϊχμαλωτὸς μου Philem<sup>23</sup>), though the reference may be to spiritual rather than physical captivity (cf. Ro 16<sup>7</sup>, Col 4<sup>10</sup>). To him alone (except once Timothy, Ph 1<sup>5</sup>) does St. Paul apply the designation he uses several times of himself, 'a bond-servant of Jesus Christ' (δοῦλος Χριστοῦ 1 Th 2<sup>10</sup> Col 4<sup>12</sup>); while the extent of his services is further proved by the description 'a faithful minister of Christ' (πιστὸς διάκονος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Col 1<sup>7</sup>).

G. MILLIGAN.

EPAPHRODITUS (Ἐπαφρόδιτος 'handsome' = Lat. 'venustus,' a common name in the Rom. period; see, e.g. Tacit. Ann. xv. 55; Suet. Domit. 14; Jos. Life, § 76), to be distinguished from Epaphras [which see], and known to us only from one or two allusions in the Ep. to the Philippians. From these we learn that he visited St. Paul during his first Roman imprisonment, bringing pecuniary aid to him from the Church at Philippi, and that instead of at once returning home he remained with the apostle in Rome, devoting himself to the ministry under his guidance (Ph 2<sup>25-30</sup> 4<sup>10-18</sup>). The strain, however, was too great for him. He lost his health, and 'was sick nigh unto death'; but the danger passed. 'God had mercy on him,' says St. Paul, 'and not on him only, but on me also, that I might not have sorrow upon sorrow' (Ph 2<sup>27</sup>). On his recovery E. was anxious to return to Philippi to quiet his friends' alarm on his behalf (Ph 2<sup>28</sup>); and this St. Paul approved, making him at the same time the bearer of the Ep. to the Philippians. St. Paul's sense of E.'s services is marked by his description of him as 'my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier,' the three words being arranged in an ascending scale to denote 'common sympathy, common work, common danger and toil and suffering' (Lightfoot on Ph 2<sup>25</sup>).

LITERATURE.—The Comm. on Ph 2<sup>25</sup>, esp. Lightfoot, p. 61 ff., 122; Ellicott, p. 60; Moule, p. 79; and Vincent, pp. xliii, 75. Also Tristram, NT L. R. S. 'Ἐπαφρᾶς'; Winer, RWB, s. 'Epaphras'; and Beza, Comment. 3rd ed. on Ph 2<sup>25</sup> and the gift from Philippi.

EPHAH (עֵפָה).—1. A son of Midian, descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25<sup>2</sup> = 1 Ch 1<sup>33</sup>), of an Arabian tribe whose name appears in Is 60<sup>9</sup> as engaged in the transport of gold and frankincense from Sheba. See also to Frd. Delitzsch (Paradies, 304), and KAT<sup>3</sup> 145 f., 613), followed by Hommel (Anc. Heb. Trad. 238 n.), 'Ephah is the name of the Keturah Arabs of the time of Sargon (see further, Dillmann on Gn 25<sup>4</sup>). 2. A concubine of Caleb, 1 Ch 2<sup>46</sup>. 3. A Judahite, son of Jahdai, 1 Ch 2<sup>47</sup>. See GENEALOGY. J. A. SELBIE.

EPHAH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

EPHAI, עֵפָי (Kerē), but Ophai, עֵפָי (Kethibh), Sept. 'Ἰωφέ, Ὀφά', described in Jer 40 (Gr. 47)<sup>8</sup> as 'the Netophatite,' whose sons were amongst the 'captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah, and were murdered along with him by Ishmael (Jer 41<sup>8</sup>). J. A. SELBIE.

EPHER (עֶפֶר).—1. The name of the second of the sons of Abraham mentioned in Gn 25<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>33</sup>, and recorded as one of the descendants of Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gn 25<sup>5</sup>). For precarious attempts to identify this Epher with 'Ofr in Arabia (Wetzstein), with Appar-u mentioned in Assurbanipal's Inscriptions (Glaser), see the references in Dillmann. 2. The name of one of the sons of Ezra, a branch of the family of Judah (1 Ch 4<sup>17</sup>). 3. The first of a group of five heads of fathers' houses belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh, who dwelt in the land between Bashan and Mt. Hermon (1 Ch 5<sup>24</sup>). H. E. RYLE.

EPHES - DAMMIM (עֶפְרַיִם דָּמִיִּם, 'Ἐφεσ-δομμεν).—The place in Judah where the Philistines were encamped at the time when David slew Goliath (1 S 17<sup>1</sup>). The same name appears in 1 Ch 11<sup>13</sup> as Pas-Dammim. The form עֶפְרַיִם דָּמִיִּם is strange and probably corrupt (see Driver, Sam. 292). W. J. BIRCHER.

EPHESIAN (Ἐφέσιος), an inhabitant of the city of Ephesus (which see), is a term used in Ac 19<sup>28</sup>, 24, 35 21<sup>29</sup>. The usage of St. Luke is more correct than that of Stephanus Byzant.; the latter gives 'Ἐφεσείας as the ethnic; but the coins and inscriptions show that in the local and universal usage 'Ἐφέσιος meant an inhabitant of the city, while 'Ἐφεσείας denoted a member of the tribe 'Ἐφεσείας, the first of the six tribes into which the Γ. τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ was divided (the other five were Ἰσραὴλ, Ἰούδας, Καρμυαῖος, Εὐδώνυμοι, Βεμβαταῖος, of which Σεβαστή was added in compliment to Augustus, the total number having previously been five). The term 'Ἐφέσιος is also applied in the Bezan and Philoxenian Syr. texts of Ac 21<sup>29</sup> to Tychicus and Trophimus, where the true reading is 'Asians' (Ἀσιανοί, men of the province Asia). Trophimus was an E. (Ac 21<sup>29</sup>); but we may fairly understand that St. Luke refrained from using that term about both Tychicus and Trophimus, on the ground that it was not strictly correct in the former. The reason can hardly be that they belonged to some other city of Asia, for the usage in this verse leads the writer to state the city where each delegate was a citizen; and we should expect that he would have mentioned Tychicus by the ethnic of his own city. Moreover, Tychicus . . . . . Ephesus.* We may, then, perhaps conclude that Tychicus, though a resident in Ephesus, did not possess the citizenship of Ephesus; and hence 'Εφέσιος, which strictly is restricted to citizens of Ephesus, could not properly be used about him. There were many families of residents who, for various reasons, were not enrolled in any of the tribes, and were therefore not entitled to be called citizens of Ephesus. The entry 'Ἀσία ἡ Ἐφεσός in a late Byzantine list of cities which had changed their names (published by Parthey, Hieroclis Synecd. et Notitiae, p. 316; Burckhardt, Hieroclis Synecd. p. 68) cannot be relied on to justify the taking of 'Ἀσιανός in 20<sup>4</sup> as a mere synonym for 'Εφέσιος: the document is not earlier than the 12th cent. (cf. the entries Κίλικα, Κολωνία, etc.), and affords no trustworthy evidence for the usage of the time of St. Luke. W. M. RAMSAY.

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO—

- I. Substance and purpose, as gathered
  - (a) From internal evidence
  - (b) From a comparison with Colossians.
- II. Authorship and literary character, as gathered from
  - (a) Internal evidence
  - (b) External tradition.
- III. Destination.
- IV. Place of Composition.
- V. Doctrinal importance.
- VI. Literature.

I. SUBSTANCE AND PURPOSE.—The creation of the authorship, date, and destination of the Epistle have been, and are still, so much disputed, that we will be well to deal first with the subject-matter and the purpose which reveals itself on a close examination of that. The Ep. might be summed up in the words of the Anglican song (Lk 21<sup>4</sup>)—

Ἰδοὺ ἐν ὑψίστοις Θεὸς καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς εἰρήνην ἐν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκίας.

Or, again, it might be described as an expression of thanksgiving that the Lord's prayer for His Church as embodied in Jn 17 was in process of fulfilment. For the writer's tone is eucharistic and his main theme is unity: he does not argue, he makes dogmatic statements; he blesses God for the great truths revealed in the Gospel; and calls upon His Church to rise to the high dignity of their calling; and, as he does so, there emerges a picture of the Church as the body predestined before the ages to unite Jew and Gentile together, which through ages yet to come has to exhibit before the universe the fulness of the Divine life, living the life of God, imitating God's character, wearing God's panoply, fighting God's battles, forgiving as God forgives, educating as God educates; and all this that it may fulfil the wider work whereby Christ is to be the centre of the universe. Two dangers seem to threaten it when the writer writes, —the danger lest it should slip back into the lower moral standard of the surrounding heathendom, and the danger of a want of unity between the Jewish and Gentile Christians. To meet these, the writer presents the ideal of a body predestined before all ages and to last to all ages, whose aim it is to make men holy and without blemish, and to unite all mankind in peace and love.

A fuller analysis will bear out these outlines.

- 1-3 DOCTRINAL
- 11-3 greeting.

(a) 1<sup>3</sup>-14, Thanksgiving to God for the blessings given to the whole Chr. Church. These blessings are represented as corresponding in spiritual form to the material blessings granted to the Jewish nation, especially as summed up in the year of Jubilee, and they are described in what may be called a hymn of three stanzas, ending with the same refrain; the three stanzas expressing the work of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. For these blessings were (1) predestined by the Father, who chose us to be sons, holy and without blemish, before the foundation of the world, for the praise of the glory of His grace (14-5).

* We regard the Bezan and Syr. reading as founded on a good tradition (cf. 2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>; Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 164); while Blass and others consider it to originate from St. Luke himself.

(2) Communicated in Christ at the right moment, conveying His glory (14-5).

(3) Sealed first to the Jews (14-5), then to the Gentiles (and Israel), by the Holy Spirit, as an earnest of the complete redemption which lies in the future—for the praise of His glory (12-13).

(b) 11<sup>5</sup>-19, Thanksgiving to God for the spiritual state of the readers, and a prayer to the Father of this glory that they may have a yet fuller knowledge of their privileges and of the power of God.

(c) 1-3, Thanksgiving to God, which

(1) As exerted upon Christ Himself, granting Him Resurrection from death (20).
Ascension to God's right hand (21).
His exaltation over the whole universe and Headship (12-13).

(2) As exerted upon the readers, whether Gentile (21-2) or Jew (23), granting them a similar threefold gift, viz. Resurrection from death (20).
Ascension to a spiritual sphere above the world (21).
The power to do good works and manifest God's grace through the coming ages (28-10).

(3) As exerted upon the whole of Humanity.
The Gentiles who formerly were alienated from God have been brought nigh by the Cross; so that both Gentile and Jew have peace with God and peace with each other: they form one city, one family, one temple, built on and prophets, and the Gentiles are (21-22).

(d) 21-19, Personal relations between the writer and his readers.

The writer, who emphasizes his authority to preach this great truth of God's choice of a universal Church intended to exhibit his richly-variegated wisdom to the universe (31-12), begs his readers not to be faint-hearted owing to the length of the journey, and once more prays for them to the Father, that they may have spiritual strength so that Christ may dwell in them in love and knowledge to understand the greatness of their fulness of the Divine life may be exhibited.

The conclusion of the Ep. ends with a doxology, emphasizing the power of God manifested in man, and the eternal duty of praise to Him both in heaven and on earth.

4-6 HORTATORY.

(1) 1<sup>10</sup>-14, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(2) 1<sup>15</sup>-22, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).
The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).
The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(3) 1<sup>23</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(4) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(5) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(6) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(7) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(8) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(9) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(10) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(11) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(12) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(13) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(14) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(15) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(16) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

(17) 1<sup>33</sup>-32, The Church as a body of members of a Society whose unity is to be maintained (41-16). (This is based on 12-13).

11 Fulness of spiritual joy and thankful praise of God—perhaps especially at the meetings for common worship (5:19-21). This is the common worship of the Church, and so forms a transition to Church. is (5:22)

to Christ (5:24).

His Church (5:25-27)

And the closeness of the union between man and wife (5:28, 29).

And God's commandment and promise (5:29).

Parents exhorted to (5:29).

Because of the anal (5:29).

Sl (5:29).

M (5:29).

(N.B.—This is no accident) or moral code for Gentile raw them nearer to the Jewish Christians by removing one of the great stumbling-blocks (Ac 15:30); but the writer takes a Christian household with all its members, and treats it as a type of the Church, in which the duties of subjection, love, obedience, forbearance, which are needed for the unity of the Church, may be first learned. Cf. 5:24, 25-27, 31, 4. 7, 8, 1 Th 3. The thought of 3:15 πᾶσα ἡ ἐκκλησία is the link between the two.

C. Addressed to the whole Church.

An exhortation to be true soldiers, to put on the armour of God, that they may realize His will and His battles (6:10, 11, cf. 1:19, 22).

De. Cf. 6:10, 11, the seriousness of the conflict (6:12). The armour, as complete (6:13), as consisting of truth and righteousness (cf. 4:24), of peace (cf. 2:15), and faith (cf. 1:13), of God's saving grace (cf. 1:13, 28), of God's word of truth (cf. 4:21, 5:26), of prayer and watchfulness (6:18-19). The choice of the weapons is partly motivated by the description of J's armour in Isaiah (59, etc.), partly by the virtues already emphasized in this Epistle, partly perhaps by the armour of the Church (cf. 6:10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100).

A. Account for the purpose of the mission of Tychicus (6:21, 22).

Final salutation, with prayer for peace, love, and faith, to those who have love for the Lord (6:23, 24).

The Ep. is thus marked by extraordinary unity of structure and interlacing of paragraphs with paragraphs, and the analysis shows that there is no trace of controversy on the surface of it; 2:11 hints at the controversial nicknames of the Jewish and Gentile struggle (οἱ λεγόμενοι ἀκροβυστία ὑπὸ τῆς λεγομένης περιτομῆς); 4:14 and perhaps 4:21 point to the danger of false teaching, but the allusions are vague. The purpose of the Epistle is the moral and spiritual fulness of the Christian life (cf. πληροῦν and πλήρωμα, 1:10, 23, 3:19, 4:10, 13, 5:18), and the closeness of the union which binds Christians to Christ and to each other: cf. ἐν Κυρίῳ or ἐν Χριστῷ (Eph 3:10 times, Col 1:11); ἐνώτης (4:13 here only); ἀγάπη and ἀγαπᾶν (19 times in Eph as compared with 16 in Ro and 1 Co); ἐρήνη (8 times in Eph, 11 in Ro, in no other Ep. oftener than 3); and the many compounds of σύν, emphasizing the 'with-ness' of Christians with Christ συνκαθίζεν (2<sup>6</sup> only), συνωμοσιεύειν (2<sup>6</sup> and Col 2:18), συνεργεῖν (2<sup>6</sup>, Col 2:12, 3:1), or with each other, συνκληρόνομος (3<sup>6</sup>, Ro 7<sup>9</sup>), συμβιβάζειν (4:16, Col 2:19), συμμετοχος (3<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> only), συμπολιτης (2:19 only), συναρμολογεῖν (2:21, 4:16 only), σύνδεσμος (4:3, Col 2:19, 3:14), συνοικοδομεῖν (2:22 only), σώσωμαι (3<sup>6</sup> only). The purpose of all this, too, lies beyond itself. The Church must be one, because a great conflict lies before it; the spiritual forces of evil are gathering, and it must be on its guard.

A comparison with Colossians will partly confirm, partly supplement this result. Whoever may be the author of this Ep., it is clear that there is a close relation between it and that. The salutations are almost identical: the structure of the Epistles is the same: the subjects are mainly the same, the need of knowledge is emphasized, and the relation of Christ to the universe and to the Church. The same moral virtues are inculcated; the laws of family life are laid down in each; the same phrases and words recur; they are both conveyed by Tychicus (cf. Holtzmann, Einführung p. 291, for exact details). But there are important differences; the personal element is strongly marked in Col (2:1-4, 4:10-17) and almost absent here; the controversial tone (Col 2:14-23) is dropped; the stress there was on Christ's relation to the universe, here on His relation to the Church; there Christ was spoken of as the πλήρωμα of God, here the Church as the πλήρωμα of Christ and of God. Again, there are new points emphasized in this Ep.; the sense of the continuity of the Church (1:10, about the ages (Eph 1:3-14), the work of the Holy Spirit (12 times in Eph, 1 in Col), the unity of the Church (2:11-22, 4:4-6), the analogy between the Church and the Church (5:22-6:9), the simile of the Church as armour (6:10-18), are all additions in this Ep., or at best are expansions of very slight references there.

The points of similarity justify us in finding below the surface allusions to the Col. controversy. That arose from teaching which either grew simply out of Jewish soil, or perhaps was influenced by extraneous Oriental speculation (cf. Lightfoot, Colossians; 'The Colossian Heresy' and Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 116-129), laying great stress on a system of elaborate rules, termed a λογισμὸς God from the material of the worship of angels.

In answer to this the Ep. to the Col. emphasized the cosmic work of Christ, and the need of truth and higher wisdom, and of faith as the means of approach to God. This controversy is now in the background; but it is justifiable to fill out the vague allusions in such passages as 1:10, 21, 22, 3:10, 15, 19, 4:10, 14, 21, 6:12, by the more detailed parallels in Col (cf. esp. Findlay in Expositor's Bible).

On the other hand, the points of dissimilarity which cover the larger part of the Ep. show that the stress of that controversy is absent here, and that other motives are prominent.

The purpose, then, is primarily to stir up the readers to a higher activity and a closer unity by reminding them of the ideal of the Church in God's eternal purposes; secondarily, to guard them against the error that was current at the time, the λογισμὸς view of the created world.

DATE.—Three possible alternatives are open to us: either the author is St. Paul, or some friend writing for him and with his knowledge, or some later writer assuming after St. Paul's death that he is justified in writing in his name. The second of these alternatives may be put aside; it is only another form of the first, as the Ep. would practically be St. Paul's and have all his authority. Now, as the third alternative is possible, we must eliminate at first from the discussion all that speaks of the exact situation in St. Paul's life; for on that alternative, that will be part of an imaginary situation. But, apart from this, we have a few indications of date and writer.

Date.—The terminus a quo is A.D. 58 or 59, the earliest date at which St. Paul could be described as having suffered a long imprisonment (3:1-3, 4<sup>1</sup>) as the champion of the Gentiles.

The terminus ad quem is more doubtful. The Church organization implied is very slight; there is a ministry, both of apostles and prophets for the first foundation of Churches (2:20, 3:5, 4:11), and of evangelists, shepherds and teachers for the building up of Churches once founded (4:11). There is stress laid on Baptism, perhaps an allusion to the profession at Baptism of faith in God, the Lord, and the Spirit (4:5-6, 5:26), perhaps also an allusion to a formula or hymn used at Baptism (5:14). There is evidence of the growth of Christian hymnody (5:14, 19, 3:20?), and apparently of its use in the Love-feasts

(cf. 5<sup>18, 19</sup> with 1 Co 10<sup>21</sup>. Tert. Apol. 39). But this evidence is indeterminate; it might all be illustrated from 1 Co (6<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>1-7, 28</sup> 14<sup>26</sup>), while the absence of mention of ἐπίσκοποι, πρεσβύτεροι, and διάκονοι is against a late date. The absence of the freer χαρίσματα of 1 Co 12 is no objection, as they were esp. characteristic of the Corinthian Church, and as, even there, St. Paul discouraged them in comparison with the more fixed ministry.

The controversies referred to are again undecisive. The attempt to see allusions to a developed 2nd cent. Gnosticism are now abandoned, for its technical words αἰώνες, πλήρωμα, γενεαί are clearly used here in a less technical sense; again, possible allusions to a false Docetism in 4<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> are too uncertain to build upon. On the doctrinal side there is nothing which may not be explained as falling within the 1st century. So with the struggle of parties within the Church. There is still a certain friction between the Jewish and Gentile Christians, and the danger is that the Gentiles may despise the Jewish Christians; they need reminding that they have been brought into a commonwealth which existed before (1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>11</sup>). Such a condition would have been possible even in the 2nd cent. (cf. Justin Martyr, Trypho, ch. 47); but it would also have been possible at any date after St. Paul's missionary work (cf. Ro 11<sup>13-24</sup>), and the language used seer: . . . that the readers belonged to the first . . . of converts, who had themselves come over from paganism to Christianity (1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>2, 12</sup> 4<sup>20</sup>).

Again, the absence of any mention of the destruction of Jerus. possibly points to a date earlier than A.D. 70, and the absence of any clear allusion to any danger of persecution by the state (though that may be included in the ἀντιπαράστασις which the Christian has to arm himself, 6<sup>1</sup>; 1<sup>1</sup>), when compared with 1 P, a strong indication of a date before A.D. 70 if St. Peter refers to the Neronian, before A.D. 80 if to the Flavian persecution. On the other hand, therefore, A.D. 70 forms the most probable limit, though a date even in the 2nd cent. would be conceivable.

The use of the letter in other Christian literature supports an early date. By A.D. 150 it was known widely by Catholics and heretics, and treated by both as Scripture; for it was included in the Lat. and Syr. versions; its destination was discussed by Marcion (see below); it was used by the Ophites, Valentinians, and Basilideans, prob. by Basilides and Valentinus themselves, perhaps even commented upon by them (Westcott, Canon, 291, 295). It was included with the title 'to the Laodiceans' in Marcion's Canon (c. 140): a canon the existence of which implies a Church Canon, to which it was placed in opposition (Sanday, BLP, 19). In the years 95-150 we have probable reminiscences of its language in Clement, cf. xxxvi. with Eph 1<sup>18</sup>, xxxviii., σῶζέσθω οὖν ὁλον τὸ σῶμα ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ καὶ ὑποτασσέσθω ἕκαστος τῷ πλήθειον αὐτοῦ, with 5<sup>21-22</sup>, xlv. with 4<sup>4-6</sup> lxiv. with 1<sup>4</sup> (?); in Ignatius, ad Eph. i. 1 with Eph 1<sup>8</sup> ff.; ix. and xv. with Eph 2<sup>1-2</sup>; xli. with 3<sup>4</sup>, Παῦλον συμμέτοισι . . . ὅς ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ μνημονεύει ὑμῶν, possibly a direct reference to the letter (Smith, DB<sup>2</sup> p. 952 n; but see Lightfoot, ad loc., and Hort, Ro and Eph., p. 113); ad Polyc. v. with 5<sup>25</sup>.

In The Two Ways—the document which underlies the Didaché (iv. 10) and Ep. Barnabas (xix.) there seems a reminiscence of Eph 6<sup>9</sup>.

In Polycarp, ad Phil. ch. i. may be compared with Eph 2<sup>6, 8, 9</sup>, and xii. with Eph 4<sup>26</sup>. In Hermas, cf. Mand. iii. 4 and x. 2-5 with 4<sup>30</sup>, and v. and xii. 5 with 4<sup>28</sup>; Similitude ix. 13 with 4<sup>4, 5</sup>.

Moreover, in nearly all these sub-apost. writings there is an advance in thought or church life. The stress on episcopacy, the development of Docetism, the elaboration of the metaphor of the Church as a temple in the Ignatian letters; the stress on the threefold ministry and the more marked use of liturgical language in Clement of Rome; above all, the fuller working out into detail of the many similes in this Ep. in the Shepherd of Hermas, all seem to imply a later date. In this latter treatise, the phrase 'giving place to the devil' is elaborately drawn out in Mand. v. and xii. 5. The conception of the Church as existing through all ages is expanded in Vis. ii. 4; of the Church as a bride without spot or wrinkle in Vis. iii. 10-13; as a building in Vis. iii. 2, Sim. ix. 9; as resting upon the apostles as foundation in Sim. ix. 15. In each case the simile is at a later stage of development.

'It is all but certain on this evidence that the Epistle was in existence by A.D. 95, quite certain that it was in existence by about 15 years later, or conceivably a little more' (Hort, p. 118). But there is possibly other evidence to be drawn from NT. The points of comparison with the Synoptic Gospels (e.g. Lk 21<sup>38</sup> with Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Mk 4<sup>11</sup> with Eph 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 12<sup>40</sup> with Eph 2<sup>20</sup>, Mt 16<sup>18</sup> with Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>), or with the Acts (2<sup>38</sup> with Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, 2<sup>38</sup> with Eph 4<sup>8</sup>, 10<sup>38</sup> with Eph 2<sup>17</sup>), do not prove literary dependence nor go beyond parallels found in the earlier Epistles. [For details cf. Holtzmann, Kritik, pp. 248-255, but his analogies are often fanciful. For possible allusions to Agrapha of our Lord in 2<sup>16, 17</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>26, 27, 36</sup> cf. Resch, Agrapha, p. 109.] There are striking similarities between the Ep. and the Fourth Gospel; e.g. the stress on χάρις, the use of πλήρωμα, the contrast between light and darkness, the continuity of the work of the Logos, the predestination of the disciples, the activities of the Holy Spirit, the purifying power of baptism and of the word. The most striking similarity in thought is with Jn 17, where almost every verse offers a parallel to this Ep.; e.g. <sup>1</sup> the stress on God's fatherhood, <sup>2</sup> the power over all flesh, <sup>3</sup> life identified with knowledge, <sup>4</sup> the pre-existent glory of Christ, <sup>5</sup> the revelation to a few, <sup>10</sup> Christ glorified in His disciples, <sup>11</sup> the prayer for unity based on God's unity, <sup>12</sup> Christ's joy fulfilled in His disciples, <sup>14</sup> the antagonism of the world, <sup>15</sup> the protection from the evil one, <sup>17</sup> sanctification by truth, <sup>21</sup> the unity of Christians as a means of promoting Christ's work, <sup>23</sup> God's love for Christians like His love for Christ, <sup>24</sup> God's love for Christ before the foundation of the world. So again between the Ep. and the Apoc. [e.g. the city with foundations, which are the twelve apostles (21<sup>14</sup>), the Church as a bride (21<sup>9</sup>), the prominence of the prophets (10<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>20</sup>)]; even more frequent are the points of contact with 1 P; e.g. 1 P 1<sup>3</sup> with Eph 1<sup>3-14</sup>, 1<sup>12</sup> with Eph 3<sup>10</sup>, 2<sup>4</sup> with Eph 2<sup>20</sup>, 2<sup>13-37</sup> with Eph 5<sup>22-6<sup>9</sup></sup>, 3<sup>19</sup> with Eph 4<sup>9</sup>, 3<sup>22</sup> with Eph 1<sup>20</sup>.

It is doubtful whether in any case the amount of similarity is sufficient to prove literary dependence. The similarity with St. John is one mainly of thought. It is possible that the language of St. John was influenced by this Ep., but it is more probable that this Ep. was written by one who had heard of that great prayer of our Lord. May not St. Paul have heard it direct from St. John's lips, possibly at Jerus., when they met to discuss the terms of unity between Jew and Gentile in the one Church; or possibly at Rome, if, as Renan suggests, St. John had been there, or even was there when St. Paul was writing? In the case of 1 Peter there is a stronger probability of literary dependence; if so, and if we assume the priority of 1 Peter (but see Weiss, Introd. i. p. 355), we should have indication that our Ep. was in existence before A.D. 70 or 80—at least it proves that the tone of thought and phraseology is such as was possible and natural before that date.

Author.—The author must have been a Jewish Christian, proud of his Jewish privileges, steeped in OT symbolism (13-14 614-18). Further, he must have been an original thinker, able to trace out a philosophy of history through the ages, able to move in the mystical sphere of heavenly places, and yet able to pass thence into the lower region of simple daily duties and of family life. Lastly, he was one who cared that his writing should appear under the name and with all the authority of St. Paul. There is, then, a prima facie probability that it was St. Paul himself; and a detailed examination will bear this out.

(a) The structure of the Ep. is clearly Pauline. The commencement with words of thanksgiving (cf. Ro 1, 1 Co 14, 2 Co 12); the great statement of doctrine as the basis for moral exhortation (cf. Ro 118-3); the moral exhortation, introduced by ὅν (cf. Ro 121, Gal 51), and passing from the general to the particular (cf. Ro 12-15); the apparent digression on family life, which is an important illustration of the whole sub-Ro 9-11, all find parallels in St. Paul.

(b) The Ep. advances on the earlier Epp. already marked out. Thus the continuity of the Christian Church with the Jewish, as a source of the body of the universe, unity of the Church is presupposed in the whole argument of 1 Co, where St. Paul is anxious to keep the customs and doctrines of the Corinthian Church; all the Churches of the Saints; the use of ἐκκλησία for the Church universe; the stress laid on the and resurrection with those of the life of each to Ro 6 and 1 Co 15; the universal sinfulness of Jew and Gentile alike as the basis of a universal love (214) is a summary of Ro 118-228. cf. Gal 21-24; the barrier between Jew and Gentile (211-22) is St. Paul's most favourite doctrine.

But it is urged that here the parts are changed: elsewhere St. Paul is the champion of the Gentile against the Jew; here he reminds Gentile Christians against Jewish exclusiveness. This is true, but the balance between the preponderance of Jew and Gentile might differ in each Church, or even at different moments in the history of one Church. St. Paul, on the one hand, on the other side, Further, this attitude on his part towards the Gentile Christians finds an exact parallel in Ro 1117-24. In the Ep. the Jew is the one who is to be converted, but the Roman Christians are an attempt to show that Jew and Gentile are united by the work of Christ; both base this on the sinfulness of Jew and Gentile alike; both emphasize the privileges of the Jews; both build up a new morality, combining in love and made possible by the gift of the Spirit, both have the extension of Christ's work beyond man to the whole creation; both emphasize the eternal plan of God for all ages, hinted at in the past and revealed in the present moment; both express the wisdom of God, and in each case the style rises into the beauty and cadence of a poem (Ro 831-39).

There are two points indeed which present a rather striking difference from the earlier Epistles. The thought of the quick return of the Lord is absent, and in its stead we have a vista of generations yet to come, through which the Church is to glorify God (321). But it is conceivable that these generations are thought of by the writer as following the Lord's return; it is with this, that the struggle which lies that and when he wrote the Ep. to the Romans, had contemplated the long period of Church history before the

Once more, the high conception of family life is at first sight inconsistent with the preference for celibacy and discouragement of marriage in 1 Co 7. But that was written in the presence of a pressing necessity: even there St. Paul recognizes that both the celibate and the married have a gift from God, and as time went on and the Lord did not return, it became necessary to build up a family life in the face of human luxury. St. Paul should organize family life as that he should organize church order, and thus he had done from the first.

(c) The style is again admittedly Pauline up to a point. There are some twenty words peculiar to St. Paul in his earlier Epp.; common to Eph with the Pastoral Epp. (cf. Holtzmann, Kritik, p. 57), there is the love of paradoxical antithesis (cf. 6-2, the par. 14), the same unacknowledged adaptation of OT language (122 213 17 427 26 51 4 6111, cf. 1 Co 310-15, 2 Co 312-18). On the other hand the sentences are less broken, rather more elaborate and complicated by parenthesises; but this applies mainly to the earlier part of the Ep., where we have great statements of doctrine rather than controversial arguments, so that it may be adequately explained as due to the fact that in which St. Paul was writing. So, too, of the phrase 'there is a large number of ἀνθρώποις (70), but no larger than in the other Epp. (for details cf. p. 289). Some of them occur in the Ep.; even most objected to are the use of ὁ διάβολος (427 611) and οἱ ἄγγελοι (39). To the first it is objected that St. Paul elsewhere uses ὁ σατανᾶς or ὁ πειράζων; but St. Mt., St. Lk., St. Jn (Gosp. and Apoc.), the writer of 1 Ti, and St. Paul himself as reported by St. Luke in the Acts (1310 2618), use both ὁ διάβολος and ὁ σατανᾶς; and the stress on unity in this Ep. makes the use of διάβολος, i.e. the slanderer, more appropriate than σατανᾶς. Possibly, too, the word means here 'any human slanderer' (Zahn, Bibl. 367). Again, the phrase 'the holy apostles' sounds like the ecclesiastical formula on its canonized founders; but the context of 964, the context of in

(d) The relation of the Ep. to that to the Col adds to the extent of this has been brought details may be seen in Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosser-briefe, cap. ii., or in Von Soden, pp. 94, 95. There is nothing exactly like the problem elsewhere in NT. The nearest of the Synoptic Gospels to each other, 2 Peter and Jude: in those cases the similarity is due partly to the use of common documents, partly to the deliberate use of the earlier writer by the later. In this case a somewhat similar theory has been propounded by Holtzmann; he holds that St. Paul himself wrote a short letter to the Col., that some later writer elaborated this into the Ep. to the Eph., and that the same writer, or another, subsequently composed our present Ep. to the Col., based upon the two preceding letters. Such a theory rests upon the fact that in some cases the Eph. seems to be on the side of Eph., in others on the side of Col. but such an argument is very precarious; it has not met with a favourable reception, and may safely be set aside as too artificial (cf. Zahn, Bibl. 959, 960, for a fuller examination of it).

St. Paul may be seen by comparing instances of similar though less marked resemblance between Ro and Gal (cf. Lightfoot, Galatians, Introd. cap. iii.), and between 1 Ti and Titus.

(e) The indications of the writer are naturally few in so general a letter. They are quite true to the character of the earlier letters. The spirit of thankfulness bursting out into his longing for their intercession (618) the sense of the advancing years, but yet was destined (cf. 1 Co 159, 1 Ti 120), combined with authority for the truth of the outcome of the battle are they the

There can, then, be little doubt that the writer is St. Paul. The alternative is a Jewish-Christian Paulinist, steeped in St. Paul's language, doctrine, and character, who has drawn out of the material of the Ep. (Von Soden), giving a slightly wider scope to his conceptions of Christ and of the Church, emphasizing the universal character of the Church as a part of God's eternal purpose, 'in the spirit of the Fourth Gospel' (Hort, p. 126). It would be a tenable view that the writer was the author of the Fourth Gospel writing in the name of St. Paul. But our alternatives are limited so narrowly as this. The witness of the early Church may be regarded as absolutely decisive. We have seen how early the evidence is of the existence of the Ep., and evidence of existence is in this case evidence of belief in the Pauline: 'The work is not anonymous (like the Gospel or the Ep. to the Hebrews); it has not merely a salutation easily separable from the Ep.; the claim to Pauline authorship is knit into the very fabric of the letter, and some of the earliest reminiscences of its language are of the parts which imply the authorship. It was, then, written by St. Paul himself.

*There are scarcely any interrogatory sentences; one only in Eph, as compared with 88 in Ro 1-11, and 4 in Ro 12-16 (Sanday and Headlam International Commentary on the Romans, the best discussion in English of the difference of style between Ro and Eph.)

iii. DESTINATION.—The readers to whom the letter was addressed were mainly Gentiles (1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>); but this does not, any more than Ro 11<sup>13</sup>, exclude the presence of some Jewish Christians. Indeed, 2<sup>13</sup> seems to require the presence of Jewish Christians as forming a minority in the Church. St. Paul is laying down a rule for Gentiles in their treatment of the Jewish Christians. Hence some commentators have treated the Ep. as a general encyclical to all Gentile converts throughout the world.

But there are personal bonds between him and them; he has had recent news of their faith and love (1<sup>15</sup>); they have heard of his imprisonment and are sad at heart about it (3<sup>13</sup>), and are anxious as to the issue of it (6<sup>21</sup>); they seem acquainted with Tychicus (6<sup>21</sup>, 22); and they are distinguished from other Christians (1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>18</sup>). There is little doubt, then, that the destination must be localized. But in 1<sup>1</sup> the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ are of very doubtful authority. They are absent in the first hand of A and B, and are marked as an interpolation in 67; but found in all other MSS. Further, Basil (c. Eunom. ii. 19) says that there was a tradition of their absence, and that he found them omitted in the old copies known to him. Again, the interpretation of τοῖς ὁσίοις as 'those who have true life,' 'those who really are,'—an interpretation which presupposes the omission of the words,—is quoted by Basil as a traditional interpretation, and is found in Origen (Cramer, Cat. ad loc.), and is repeated by Victorinus Afer, Jerome, and Hilary. Further, Tertullian, in arguing against Marcion that the Ep. was addressed to the Eph., does not allude to the salutation. It is, then, a fair inference that the words were absent from some copies in the 2nd cent., as it is a certainty that they were absent from many in the 3rd and 4th centuries.

The title πρὸς Ἐφεσίους gives us surer ground, and yet not quite sure. It is universally found in all MSS and versions, and all Church tradition has connected the Epistle with Ephesus. But Tertullian tells us that some heretics, and notably Marcion (adv. Marc. v. 11 and 17, cf. Epiphanius, Haer. 42), had a different title 'ad Laodiceños': now this may have been a mere critical conjecture by Marcion, based upon the obvious likeness of this Ep. with the Col, and the indication of Col 4<sup>16</sup> that there was a letter written to Laodicea at this time. If so, this at least implies the absence of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ from the copies: but it is equally probable that the alternative title is a real fact, and that the Ep. was originally sent to Laodicea.

Tradition then points to two Churches of Proconsular Asia, Ephesus and Laodicea, and internal evidence is consistent with this. As long as it was regarded as addressed only to Ephesus, the language of 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>21</sup> and the absence of any special ref. to the circumstances of a Church in which St. Paul had spent three years, and on which he had been on the intimate terms implied in Ac 20, was a stumbling-block; but this difficulty entirely disappears on the theory that the letter was intended for several Churches.

That Ephesus was one of these Churches is practically certain; the unanimity of Church tradition in its favour is conclusive itself; but besides this the points of similarity with the speech to the elders of Ephesus (Ac 20<sup>19</sup> ταρε νοῦροσί νη (=4<sup>2</sup>), 20<sup>32</sup> the stress on χάρις; v. 23 θεοῦ (cf. 3<sup>1</sup>), v. 21 βουλή (cf. 1<sup>11</sup>), v. 28 περιποιήσατο (cf. 1<sup>14</sup>), ποιμαίνειν (cf. ποιμένας 4<sup>11</sup>), κληρονομίαν (cf. 1<sup>14</sup>, 18)); with the Gospel of St. John and esp. with the Prologue (see above), with the letter of Ignatius to the Eph. (see above); in a less marked degree with 1 Ti (e.g. 2<sup>5-7</sup> 4<sup>4</sup> the stress on the universality of creation and redemption; 3<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> the appeal to the angels as witnessing the Christian life; 3<sup>8</sup> the treatment of the family as a type of the Church),—all strongly confirm the tradition.

It may be added that the mention of Tychicus (cf. Ac 20<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>), the ref. to the power of the spirits of evil (cf. Ac 20<sup>13-19</sup>), the stress on the unity of Baptism (cf. Ac 20<sup>1-7</sup>), all fall in with the same tradition, which terminates in themselves to prove the point.

The address to Laodicea is borne out by Col 4<sup>13-16</sup>, which witness to St. Paul's anxiety for Laodicea at this moment, and show that he was writing at the same time a general letter—not necessarily addressed to Laodicea only, but one which could be obtained from Laodicea (τῇν ἐκ Λαοδικείας), and is quite consistent with Rev 3<sup>14-22</sup>, where the Church at Laodicea is rebuked for lukewarmness.

Nor is there any reason why the destination should be limited to these two Churches. Col 4<sup>13</sup> suggests that it may also have been sent to Hierapolis, while the analogy of Rev 1-3 and 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> might lead us to infer that it was intended for all the Gentile converts of Proconsular Asia (cf. Ac 19<sup>10</sup>).

iv. PLACE OF COMPOSITION.—St. Paul was at the time a prisoner, suffering imprisonment on behalf of the Gentiles (3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>), and an imprisonment lasting long enough to have caused anxiety to his converts (3<sup>13</sup>). The place must be either Cæsarea (Ac 24<sup>27</sup>) or Rome (ib. 28<sup>30</sup>). As between these two places this Ep. gives no indication; but the points of similarity with the Pastoral Epp. (cf. Salmon, Introd. cap. xx.) indicate the later date, and the tone of imperialism (see below) suits Rome better. But owing to the great similarity with Col we may certainly use any indications of date found there; and this is linked on by the personal allusions in it to the Ep. to Philemon (Col 4<sup>9-17</sup> with Philem 22), so that indications there too may be used; again, the allusions to the imprisonment in Ph 1<sup>12a</sup> make it probable that that too was written at the same place. Some commentators would place Ph at Cæsarea, the other three at Rome, but more probably all are to be placed at Rome; for the phrase ἐν ὄλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ (Ph 1<sup>13</sup>), though applicable to Herod's prætorium at Cæsarea (Ac 23<sup>3</sup>), is equally applicable to the prætorian soldiers or the Supreme Court at Rome; the phrase οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας (Ph 4<sup>22</sup>) is more applicable to Rome; the state of feeling between Jewish and Gentile Christians as reflected in Ph 1<sup>15-20</sup> corresponds well with that implied in the Ep. to the Romans: the freedom for preaching which St. Paul enjoys, and the importance which he attaches to it (Ph 1<sup>12</sup>, Eph 6<sup>23</sup>), are more natural at Rome: the expectation of a speedy release (Philem 22) points the same way; and, although Cæsarea was nearer for a runaway slave from Colossæ, yet there were more frequent opportunities of communication with Rome, a greater chance of hiding, and an easier access there to St. Paul. Finally, the points of contact between all four Epp. and the Pastoral Epp. in phraseology, in stress on organized church and family life, and in Christology, all favour the later date. We place, then, all four Epp. at Rome. Of their relative order it is again impossible to speak with certainty: but most probably (so Lightfoot, Phil. Rom. and Eph. p. 102; but see on the other side, Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357) the Ep. to the Phil. stands by itself comparatively early in the Rom. imprisonment; for it offers more points of comparison in and doctrinal discussion with the . . . ; there is more discussion of the justification by faith, more protest against the Judaizing Christians. On the other hand, Eph Col Philem form a group by themselves, written comparatively late in the imprisonment—with fewer points of contact with the earlier group, and with more agreement with the Pastoral Epistles. They may, then, be all placed about A.D. 63 at Rome.*

By that time St. Paul had been in prison for three or four years. That imprisonment had been incurred at Jerus. just at the moment when he had taken up the alms of the Gentile Churches to the Churches of Judæa; his anxiety about his reception by the brethren there (Ro 15<sup>22</sup>) had been removed; he had been welcomed, misunderstandings had been smoothed over, he had shown his willingness to work with them (Ac 21<sup>17-26</sup>). The unity between Jewish and Gentile Christians was assured. But an outburst of Jewish fanaticism, on the false charge that he had taken a Gentile Christian, an . . . within the centre wall of partition in . . . precincts (cf. Eph 2<sup>14</sup> τὸ μεσότοιχον), had led to his arrest; he had been kept two years at Cæsarea, thence on his own appeal had been transferred to Rome; on his way he had been marvellously protected from danger of shipwreck; he had been welcomed once more by the brethren at Rome on his arrival (Ac 28<sup>15</sup>), and since he had been in prison he had had freedom to preach and wonderful success . . . Naturally, then, one of his main . . . God's overruling power, which could bring good out of apparent evil, and turn even imprisonment into the means of furthering His work (Ph 1<sup>12</sup>, Eph 3<sup>13</sup>).

Further, he was now in Rome, the great centre of the empire, which he had for many years longed to see. He would look, with the eyes of a provincial, upon the centre of the world's administration; he would see a power, small at first, confined to one Italian town, growing by steady growth till it launched itself forth on the whole world, brought all nations under its subjection, opened its reach . . . freely to all, and allowed them to enjoy its privileges, yet still requiring its prætorian soldiers ready to defend its emperor or to move out against any enemies that might attack its borders; while as ultimate source of authority stood the one man, the Emperor, the head, the ruler, the court of appeal for the oppressed, set forward more and more even as an object of worship. At the same time St. Paul would hear more of the teaching of Seneca and of the great Stoic conception of a universal city, of which all men were citizens, and in which each true citizen rose above the limitations of place and of environment, and became independent, self-centred (αὐτάρκτης), the master and not the slave of circumstances (cf. Lightfoot, Phil., 'St. Paul and Seneca').

Naturally, then, his thoughts would dwell upon the new brotherhood of the Church, 'the kingdom of Christ and of God' (Eph 5<sup>5</sup>), 'the citizenship in the heavens' (Ph 1<sup>27</sup> 3<sup>20</sup>, Eph 2<sup>19</sup>). That, too, had grown out of a small centre, and . . . for it had begun before the . . . world; that, too, had at the right moment launched itself on the world, and all divisions of race had been broken down in it; that, too, centred in its king, who had won his triumphs and given gifts to his followers (4<sup>8</sup>, cf. 2 Co 2<sup>14</sup>), who himself was the source of peace (Eph 2<sup>14</sup>), who was the head of the body; that, too, had its enemies to conquer, and therefore needed its soldiers ever prepared to fight (Eph 2<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>10-17</sup>); but its citizenship was in heav . . . the scene of battle . . . was wider, for it had once more to bring to a unity (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, 'recapitulare,' Iren adv. Hær. iii. 18; 'instaurare,' Vulg.; 'ad initium reciprocare,' Tertul. Monog. c. 5) the whole universe; as it was founded on all past history, so its rule was to embrace all future time (Eph 3<sup>2</sup>). Dead as well as living were its subjects (4<sup>9</sup> (?)).

Such thoughts might of themselves almost account for the genesis of this Ep.; but a new turn was given to them by the arrival of Epaphras from Colossæ. He brought news of the . . . of teaching there tending to degrade the . . . of Christ, to substitute the worship of angels, to take low views of the material world, to lay an undue stress upon . . . as the one method of access to Christ. . . time he brought news of the . . . Churches of Proconsular Asia; their . . . and, their love strong; but they were disheartened by the apostle's imprisonment, and, as in all Churches in Gentile cities, there was the danger lest the surrounding heathenism should draw them back, lest 'empty arguments' (κεῖνοι λόγοι, Eph 5<sup>6</sup>) should lead them to treat immorality lightly and indifferently; and, as in all mixed Churches of Jews and Gentiles, there was the danger lest racial jealousy should destroy unity. With the special danger at Colossæ, St. Paul dealt in the Ep. to the Col; then he turned to the wider condition of the Asiatic Churches, with his thoughts perhaps mainly fixed on Ephesus, his favourite abode, the centre of Gentile Christendom in that neighbourhood. No longer . . . Timothy with him (contrast Col 1<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>), but speaking only in his own name, he writes what is rather an encyclical treatise, a Cath. Ep., than a mere letter (cf. Ro and 1 P). Dropping all tone of controversy, and with only side allusions to false teaching, he tries to win them to a higher standard by a picture of the ideal Church which had been growing in his mind. He had done something of the kind to the Romans before; but that was an elaborate argument trying to convince them that all needed redemption, and that it had been brought to all by the power of Christ. This is a statement that the redemption has come, and that it has come—for here he is writing to Orientals—as part of a divine wisdom, and leading men to a fuller knowledge (ἐπιγνώσις, cf. 1 Co 1<sup>24</sup> ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ κληροῖς, 'Ioudaïois τε καὶ Ἕλλησι, Χριστὸν θεοῦ δύναμιν [the theme of Romans] καὶ θεοῦ σοφίαν [the theme of Ephesians]). He is anxious that they too (καὶ ὑμεῖς, 'you in the recesses of Provincial Asia as well as the brethren at Rome,' Hort) should know what is happening in his imprisonment, that it is bringing fresh glory to the Gentile Christians (3<sup>13</sup>); they need not be out of heart, for God is watching his fortunes with that same overruling power which has ordered all history. He it was—thanks be to Him—who eternally planned our redemption; who chose the Jews for special privileges and promises; who at the right moment revealed His Son and broke down the division between Jew and Gentile; who has now drawn both Jew and Gentile into one body; who raised Christ and made Him Head of the Church; who enabled individuals to do good works; who is now building up His Church and watching over His apostle. Therefore, you must lift up your hearts and minds; you must keep the unity which He has given; you must not be drawn back into the old impure aimless life; you must build up family life . . . and you must remember that round about you, as about the Jews of old or about the Rom. Empire now, there are enemies, spiritual enemies; you must be ready both for defence and for attack, for you have to fight God's battles, and to represent His cause and to illustrate His wisdom in the eyes of the angels. Peace, Love, and Faith: these are the graces which I ask for you.

* Von Soden, while rejecting the Pauline authorship of Eph. hesitates between Rome and Asia Minor as the place of its composition.

Such was the substance of the letter: whether St. Paul inserted any address must be uncertain. Either he inserted ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, but as Tychicus was intended to leave it at other Churches too, other names were inserted by these Churches in their own copies, or more probably a blank was left from the first that Tychicus might fill it up with the name of each Church to which he read the letter; possibly, again, several copies may have been made at Rome for the different Churches, and carried by Tychicus. It is a legacy of peace left to the Church by Paul the aged, 'das Testament des greisen Apostels' (Julicher); 'one of the divinest compositions of man' (Coleridge, Table Talk); νοημάτων μεστή ἡ ἐπιστολὴ ὑμῶν καὶ δογματῶν (Comm.); truth expressed 'sub speciei actionis' (Theod. Mops. on 12). The vehement moods of the earlier contests have subsided, many parts of the Ep. glow with a steady white heat' (Hort, p. 153). It is a letter rising at times to the level of a poem, 'the Christian's 68th Psalm' (Dr. Kay); 'ipso verborum tenore et quasi rhythmo canticum imitatur' (Bengel on 24-18); 'der ganze erste Haupttheil (1-3) hat liturgischen Charakter und erscheint in seinen Höhepunkten wie einer jener ὕμνοι durch welche nach Col 3<sup>15</sup>, Eph 5<sup>9</sup>, die Christen sich belehren sollen' (Von Soden). When St. Paul wrote this letter, he was, as at Philippi, singing hymns in prison.

v. DOCTRINAL IMPORTANCE. — The doctrines implied in the whole group of the Epp. of the Captivity are well analyzed, and their relation to that of the previous Epp. drawn out, in B. Weiss, Bibl. Theol. part iii. § iii. Those which are most prominent in this particular Ep. are—

(a) The Universal Fatherhood of God (πατήρ applied to God eight times; in Ro only four times). While the unity of God's nature is the starting-point of the whole argument (4<sup>6</sup>), yet He is represented as the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ (1<sup>3</sup>), i.e. there is within the Godhead a relationship of Father and Son, there is a giving forth of life and love (1<sup>8</sup> τὸ ἡγικημένον), there is a social bond, so that every community, whether of angels or of men, is named after and reflects the fatherhood of God (3<sup>15</sup> πατρίᾳ here only in St. Paul). He is in the widest and most absolute sense 'the Father' (2<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>20</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>); the Father of the glory manifested in men (1<sup>7</sup>); the Father of all (4<sup>6</sup>); the Father of us Christians (1<sup>2</sup>).

(b) The Pre-existence of Christ—and this not merely in relation to God, as elsewhere, but in relation to man, so that before the foundation of the world He contains within Himself ideal Humanity (14), and men have only to grow up into that which He already is (4<sup>15</sup> 16); and also in relation to the whole universe which centred originally in Him, and is re-centred in Him by the Incarnation (1<sup>10</sup> ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, 2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>15</sup> ἀπὸ ἀποκρινομένων).

(c) The Dignity of Human Nature, as redeemed within the Church, lifted above this earthly sphere into the heavenlies, showing forth the attributes of God Himself to the world, and forming a link for the whole creation (1<sup>22</sup> 2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 19 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>1</sup> 25<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>1</sup> 29<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>1</sup> 33<sup>1</sup> 34<sup>1</sup> 35<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>1</sup> 37<sup>1</sup> 38<sup>1</sup> 39<sup>1</sup> 40<sup>1</sup> 41<sup>1</sup> 42<sup>1</sup> 43<sup>1</sup> 44<sup>1</sup> 45<sup>1</sup> 46<sup>1</sup> 47<sup>1</sup> 48<sup>1</sup> 49<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>1</sup> 52<sup>1</sup> 53<sup>1</sup> 54<sup>1</sup> 55<sup>1</sup> 56<sup>1</sup> 57<sup>1</sup> 58<sup>1</sup> 59<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup> 62<sup>1</sup> 63<sup>1</sup> 64<sup>1</sup> 65<sup>1</sup> 66<sup>1</sup> 67<sup>1</sup> 68<sup>1</sup> 69<sup>1</sup> 70<sup>1</sup> 71<sup>1</sup> 72<sup>1</sup> 73<sup>1</sup> 74<sup>1</sup> 75<sup>1</sup> 76<sup>1</sup> 77<sup>1</sup> 78<sup>1</sup> 79<sup>1</sup> 80<sup>1</sup> 81<sup>1</sup> 82<sup>1</sup> 83<sup>1</sup> 84<sup>1</sup> 85<sup>1</sup> 86<sup>1</sup> 87<sup>1</sup> 88<sup>1</sup> 89<sup>1</sup> 90<sup>1</sup> 91<sup>1</sup> 92<sup>1</sup> 93<sup>1</sup> 94<sup>1</sup> 95<sup>1</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> 97<sup>1</sup> 98<sup>1</sup> 99<sup>1</sup> 100<sup>1</sup>).

(d) The Continuity of all History in the past

* Ps 68<sup>18</sup> is quoted in 4<sup>8</sup>; there are other possible reminiscences of it; e.g. cf. Ps 5 with 5<sup>19</sup>; 10 with 1<sup>18</sup>; 27 with 2<sup>22</sup>; 30 and 36 with 1<sup>9</sup>; 77 and 85 with 3<sup>21</sup> 22; 82 and 36 with 3<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>.

and in the future. Each καρπός is regarded as contributing its quota to the whole, until the whole complement of καρποί shall be complete (1<sup>10</sup> τὰ πλήρωμα τῶν καρπῶν [cf. Mk 1<sup>3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>23</sup>] and 3<sup>11</sup>).

(e) The Essential Unity of the Church, as based upon the unity of God, as an ideal already realized, yet needing to be secured (4<sup>8</sup>), and in a sense still future (4<sup>15</sup>); as practically begun by baptism (4<sup>5</sup>), and as secured by the gift of the Holy Spirit (4<sup>30</sup>), whose purpose is to fit all (4<sup>12</sup>) for the work of service (πρὸς καθαρισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων εἰς ἔργον διακονίας), to build up Church life until the complete unity is secured (4<sup>12</sup> 13).

(f) The Insistence on Wisdom and Knowledge, as an integral and necessary part of the true religious life. This truth, which St. Paul had first proclaimed in the centre of Gr. philosophy at Athens (Ac 17<sup>23</sup>, cf. Hort, Hulsean Lect. p. 62), is here more explicitly laid down in an epistle to Gentiles. The value of this insistence is all the more striking as addressed to converts who were inclined to give a purely intellectual value to knowledge. The ἐπιστήμη is the knowledge is more knowledge.

(g) The Consecration of Family Life. Family life is regulated in Col (3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>); it is dignified in 1 P (2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>) as a means whereby Christians may hope to attract heathens to the faith; but here it is lifted to a higher level still, as a type and nursery of Church life.

(h) The Picture of the Christian as a Soldier, and his life as a warfare, which finds its fullest expression here. It has had a wonderful influence both on Church history and on Christian literature, enriching the latter with so many allegories, such as the Psychomachia of Prudentius, and the Pilgrim's Progress and the Taking of Mansoul by Bunyan, and nerving many a Christian hero and martyr for his task.

vi. LITERATURE.—If we may see a literary dependence of 1 P and of the Apoc. upon our Ep., its influence has been recognized at once, and it must have been known in Rome; the reminiscences found in the writings of St. John show a knowledge of it at least in Asia Minor and Italy. There is some evidence that it was commented upon by the Gnostics in the 2nd cent. Theodoret's Expositio upon it, largely forgotten, is a much larger part is embodied in Jerome's Commentary. In the next cent. Ephraem the Syrian, Victorinus the African, Ambrosiaster, St. Chrysostom, and Theodoret of Mopsuestia, and later Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Lightfoot, and Meyer, and others, have written commentaries upon it. For later comm. see Lightfoot, Commentary on the Ep. of St. Paul, vol. i. pp. lix-lxxxix. For later comm. cf. Meyer's Comm. (Intro.), or Meyer's Comm., pp. 96-106.

St. Chrysostom remains still the best authority for his combination of exegetical, doctrinal, and spiritual power, and for sympathy with the writer's mind and character. He wants exact treatment of exegetical difficulties, and is at times fanciful; but he seizes well the whole drift of a passage; he never avoids discussing a difficulty; he has a firm hold on doctrine, and is especially strong in the spiritual application of truth, dwelling on the contrast between virtue and vice; on the strength of the will, on the beauty of the Christian character in contrast to the unnaturalness and impotence of sin. Theodore of Mopsuestia is acute as an exegete, but has less spiritual insight, e.g. he explains all the blessings spoken of in the Ep. as referring to a future life.

Of mod. comm. Macpherson (Edinr. 1892) is full and useful, but too voluminous; Elliott, Alford, Monie (Camb. Bibl.), Her. are all good. Bishop Lightfoot's notes on 1<sup>12</sup> have been published posthumously (Notes on the Ep. of St. Paul, 1895). W. Schmidt in Meyer's Comm. on NT, and Von Soden in the Handkommentar zum NT (Freiburg, 1891), are excellent in exegesis.

For the doctrinal treatment of the Ep., Dale, Lectures on Eph., and Findlay in The Expos. Bible, are equally good, though both fail to rise to the writer's conception of the Church. For devotional use, Bernardine of Piquigny, in Lat. or in Eng. (tr. by A. H. Pritchard, 1888), is most useful. The introductory questions are best dealt with by Pfleiderer, Paulinism, in pp. 162-164; Von Soden, ubi supra; and Holtmann, Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosser-briefe, Leipzig, 1882, as against the Pauline authorship on behalf of it, by Lightfoot, Bibl. Essays; Hor. Prolegomena to the Ro. and Eph. 1895; A. Robertson in Smith's DB; Weiss, Intro. to NT; Zahn, Evnt.

W. LOCK.

EPHESUS (Ἐφέσος) was the metropolis of the Roman province of Asia (wh. see), and one of the three great cities of the East Mediterranean lands (along with Antioch in Syria and Alexandria in Egypt), a rank to which geographical and historical causes conspired to raise it. It was situated within 3 miles of the sea, on the river Cayster, which was navigable as far up as the city in the Rom. period. It stood at the entrance to one of the four river valleys that extend upwards and eastwards like long narrow clefts in the high plateau forming the main mass of Asia Minor; these valleys are separated by chains of mountains, which are really prolongations, like fingers, stretching out towards the W. from the main plateau. The roads connecting the western sea, the Aegean, with the central and eastern lands, must necessarily follow the lines of these four valleys; and near the mouth of each of them stood a Gr. city, in which the importance of the valley was centred. The four valleys are those of the river Caicus with the city Pergamus, of the Hermus with Smyrna, of the Cayster with E., and of the Mæander with Miletus. The four cities played a prominent part in the early history of Christianity in Asia Minor. The shorter courses of the Caicus and Cayster make their valleys unsuited for routes of communication with the far East; and natural circumstances make the road from the Aegean to the interior of Asia Minor, to its junction with the Lycus, and thence up the Lycus by Laodicea (wh. see) towards Apamea, has been the great road of history, and was one of the chief avenues of intercourse, of commerce, and of advancement of civilization in the Roman Empire. Now the road which connects the coast with the interior as the seaport towards which the trade of that great road was attracted; for, owing to the configuration of the coast and of the valley, the line from the Lycus down the Mæander, and across the mountains by a pass only about 600 ft. high to E., is shorter by many miles than the line down the Mæander to Miletus. The superior energy and more thoroughly Gr. character of the people of Miletus, combined with their more advantageous harbour, gave them the advantage in earlier times; but under the later Gr. kings, and still more decisively under the Roman rule, E. had established itself in undisputed supremacy as the sea-end of the great eastern highway, while the cutting up of the Mæander seems to have been primarily to interfere with the excellence of the harbour of Miletus. Thus E. became the great commercial centre for the whole country within, i.e. on the Roman side of, Mt. Taurus, as Strabo mentions (p. 641, cf. pp. 540, 663).

On the great line of communication between Rome and the East in general, E. was one of the knots where many side roads met to feed the main route. From the N. and the S. coasting ships and land roads (Ac 19<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>1-17</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>23</sup>) brought travellers to the city on their way to Rome, or carried away travellers and officials who were going from Rome to other parts of the province. Thus it was a regulation that the Rom. governors under the empire must land at E.; and the system of roads was such as to make the city the most easily accessible from all quarters of Asia. Hence it was naturally marked out as the centre where St. Paul should station himself in order to affect that great province; and from thence the new religion radiated over the whole of the province (Ac 19<sup>10</sup>), partly through the fact that great numbers of the provincials came to E. for various purposes (e.g. to trade, to see the great Rom. festivals and shows, to worship the great goddess, etc.), and heard the word, and carried it back to their homes, partly through special missions on which, doubtless, St. Paul's helpers, like Timothy and others, were sent by him. Corinth was the next great knot on the way to Rome, and communication between E. and Corinth must have been very frequent. The ship that conveyed St. Paul to Jerus. from Corinth, doubtless a pilgrim ship carrying Jews to Jerus. expressly for the Passover, crossed first to E. (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>), and thence coasted round Asia Minor, and crossed, doubtless by the W. side of Cyprus, to the Syrian coast (as in Ac 21<sup>3</sup>). The same character, as a pilgrim ship, doubtless belonged to the ship by which St. Paul intended to sail from Corinth for the Passover four years later (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>); on board of such a ship Jewish fanaticism would have been specially strong, and the conspiracy which was dreaded by St. Paul's friends would have had every chance of being successful.

After St. Paul's work in Asia was ended, Timothy seems to have been stationed in E. for a time (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), with general authority, extending probably over the whole province, as is implied throughout the first Epistle; and he was summoned thence by St. Paul to join him in Rome during his second imprisonment (2 Ti 4<sup>9</sup>); and John Mark must have been in Asia, perhaps in or at least near E., at that time, as Timothy was charged (4<sup>11</sup>) to bring Mark with him to Rome. A wide acquaintance of Mark with the Asian Churches is implied in Col 4<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>13</sup>; and on each of the journeys between Rome and Asia which are implied in these passages, he must have passed through Ephesus. The rank of the Ephesian Church in the early times is attested further by its being named first in the list of churches in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>. It became the home of St. John in the latter part of the century; and a few incidents of his residence in E. are preserved by Eusebius. According to tradition, not merely Timothy and John, but also the Virgin Mary, were buried at Ephesus.*

The connexion of the Ephesian city harbour with the sea depended on the proper maintenance of the channel of the Cayster; but this was difficult, for the river, which drains a valley of fertile alluvial soil, carried much silt in its water, and deposited this toward its mouth, as the current became weak. According to Strabo (p. 641), an ill-advised engineering scheme under the Pergamian king Attalus Philadelphus (B.C. 159-138), when a breakwater was built to narrow the entrance from the river, increased the tendency to silt up the mouth of the city harbour; and in A.D. 65 measures had to be taken by the governor of Asia to improve the connexion between the harbour and the sea (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 23). Either then or at some other time, an embankment, which can still be seen as one rides down from E. to the sea (see Weber, p. 52), was built along the lower course of the river, to help the action of the stream in sweeping the silt out towards the sea. The harbour of E. was maintained, apparently, under the Rom. Empire; but in later centuries the care and energy needed for so great a task failed, the harbour became a mere lagoon, and the highway had ceased. Even in the time of St. Paul,

* As to the supposed connexion of St. Luke with E., no ancient evidence for it exists (but rather only conjectural evidence), in Ac there is nothing to show any knowledge of the city on the part of the author; the 'Tomb of St. Luke' is the creation of a mere error on the part of Mr. J. T. Wood, who mistook a rude cross, incised in later times on the marble door of an old Gr. polyandron or family tomb, for a proof of the Christian origin of the monument, imagining that the figure of a bull (a Gr. ornament) which was sculptured on it was the symbol of St. Luke, and completing his delusion by the false belief that the modern name Ayassaluk (on which see below) was derived from Ayios Loukas. Yet from his idea there has been developed a modern legend; and in recent years there has been some attempt to institute a ceremonial at this false 'tomb of St. Luke.'

it was somewhat troublesome to ascend the channel to the harbour; and ships which were trading between the N. Aegean ports and Syria, avoided E., unless the exigencies of the Cayster valley towards the East was too difficult to be a commercial route, it afforded decidedly the shorter path from E. to Pisidian Antioch and the East in general; and naturally foot-passengers, to whom precipitous descents caused no difficulty, would prefer that route to the longer but more level route by Apamea and Laodicea. The Cayster route leads over higher ground than the other, and does not descend into the low coast valley till it comes nearer E.; and this also would make it preferable in the summer. Hence St. Paul, journeying from Pisidian Antioch to E., preferred the Cayster route, and traversed the higher-lying districts (τὰ ἀνωτερά μέρη, Ac 19<sup>4</sup>);* and the statement of Ac on this point is confirmed by Col 2<sup>1</sup>, which shows that the apostle had never visited Colossae or Laodicea (which were situated on the great highway). He had doubtless entered on the same path in his second journey, καὶ ἐλθὼν εἰς Πέρβη, Λύστρα, Ἰκόνιον, καὶ ἐκταύρων εἰς Ἀσίαν, but found himself 'forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia' (Ac 16<sup>7</sup>).

The lower end of the Cayster valley is divided from the middle of the Caystrian plain) by the projection of the winding mountain ranges, for Mt. Gallesus on the N. slopes down towards the S., as if trying to reach across the valley to Mt. Mægus (the part of which overlooking E. was called Πακτύας, and forces the Cayster to wind southward, when it is coming near the sea-level. Below this narrow pass, the valley opens again to form a low marshy plain, raised very little above the sea, from which the hills spring very sharply, as Mt. Coressus, the outermost peak of Πακτύας, overhanging the site of E., extends in a long sharp ridge westward towards the sea; and the Cayster turns again sharply to the W. through this 13 miles long plain to the sea. In the open plain, about 5 miles from the sea, on the S. side of the river, stands a little hill, close on the W., above the modern railway station; this hill has always been the religious centre of the valley; below its S.W. slope stood the sacred precinct of the Asian goddess, who was identified by the Greeks with their own Artemis (see DIANA); on the hill Justinian built one of his greatest ecclesiastical foundations,† the church (whose ruins, projecting out of the hill, can still be traced) dedicated to St. John the Evangelist (ὁ ἅγιος θεολόγος, from whom the hill and the little city beside it are still called Αἰο-σολύκ or Αἰο-θολόγ, i.e. Ayo-thológ); and between the two was built a fine mosque, formerly one of the most exquisite monuments of late Arab-Pers. art, now in ruins. Justinian (founded probably by one of the Βασιλεῖς princes, who reigned and coined money with Lat. inscription ‡ at Ayo-solúk). Round this religious centre the earliest and the latest inhabitants have congregated; whereas, in opposition to the religious foundation, the Gr. colonists built the city of E., at a distance of 1 to 2 miles S.W., partly on the slope of Coressus, partly on the low ground at its foot, and partly on a low isolated hill, called Pion or Prion (about 500 ft.), which rises in the plain.

The history of E. turns, to a great extent, on the opposition between the Greeks, the party of progress and freedom and maritime enterprise, and the non-Gr. population, centred at the temple, and championed by the priesthood, the party of stagnation and ignorance and Asiatic submission. The Lydian conquest by Croesus for a time enslaved the city to the temple; the new foundation of E. by Lysimachus in B.C. 295 again redressed the balance;§ but the proximity of the temple gave it always an immense power in the city. The city owed its pre-eminence in the province in part to the temple, for the temple was the greatest and most influential in Asia, and the city boasted of the title 'warden of the temple of Artemis' νεωκόρος τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος, Ac 19<sup>35</sup>, lit. 'temple-sweeper,' in RV 'worshipper.' The title 'temple-warden' is more commonly applied to E., and to the ἡγεμὼν Asian cultus, as warden of a temple of ἡγεμὼν cultus; in the time of St. Paul, E. was warden of one such temple, and later she became warden of two temples, and finally of three temples of the imperial religion (δὲς, τριπλῆς, νεωκόρος); and when the Eph. Neocate simply is mentioned, that is the sense in which it is ordinarily to be understood.† But the ref. to the Eph. Neocate of Artemis in Ac 19<sup>35</sup> is justified by an inscription of the 2nd cent., in which E. is said to be 'doubly temple-warden of the Emperors, and warden of Artemis' (δὲς νεωκόρος τῶν Σεβαστῶν καὶ νεωκόρος τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος, Wood, Appendix Inscr. vi. 6, p. 50); and coins of the 3rd cent. have the legend Ἐφεσίων τριπλῆς νεωκόρων καὶ τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος, i.e. 'triple temple-warden (of the emperors), and (temple-warden) ‡ of Artemis.' The festivals of the goddess were thronged by pilgrims and devotees from the Cayster valley and from the whole of Asia. The crowds which attended these festivals contributed greatly to the wealth of the city; many trades were mainly dependent on the pilgrims, who required entertainment, food, amusement, victims to sacrifice, offerings to dedicate, curiosities and images for worship to carry home.§ The order of events during St. Paul's long residence in E. of 2 years and 3 months (Ac 19<sup>8, 10</sup>, called 3 years by the apostle himself, Ac 20<sup>31</sup>, in the usual ancient style of reckoning an intermediate period by the superior round number) illustrates in a striking way the relation of the priestly centre to the preaching of Christianity. At first there was no opposition: for new religions, which were often brought in from the east, had never been found prejudicial to the influence of Artemis and her priests. Then the missionaries were brought into collision with the practisers and votaries of magic; E. was one of the great centres of magical art, and a kind of magic formula, * Even under the Delian confederacy it seems clear that the Eph. contribution of 6 to 7 talents was paid only under compulsion (Head, p. 18), and the Gr. spirit was nearly dead. Lysimachus called his new city Arsinoe, after his wife, but this name lasted only a few years.

† The ἡγεμὼν cultus, i.e. in the imperial cultus is first mentioned on coins of Nero; probably the ref. is to the Augusteum, a temple built in the precinct of Artemis to Rome and Augustus by the city E. (not by the Commune Asiae, see ASIA, ASIARCH) before A.D. 6 (Wood, Appendix, i. 1); Buchner, de Neocordia, p. 33, indeed considers that the reference is to a temple of Claudius, which he supposes to have been dedicated by the Commune Asiae, on account of aid given to the city by the emperor, Malalas, p. 246, ed. Bonn; but there is no evidence that such a temple ever existed. The second imperial neocate was granted under Hadrian, and the third under Caracalla. A decree of the Senate was required to grant this distinction (as Asia was a senatorial province).

‡ The phrase τρεῖς νεωκόρος on the later coins refers to this same fact.

§ Artemis Ephesia was worshipped more widely by private persons than any other deity known to Pausanias (iv. 31. 8; cf. also Xen. Anab. v. 3. 4).

* In this sentence we speak only on the 'South Galatian' theory (Ramsey, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 931, esp. ed. 2 or later editions); those who hold the 'North Galatian' view may omit this sentence.

† It is briefly described by Procopius, De B. Justin. v. 1, as equalling in size and magnificence Justinian's first foundation in Constantinople, the Church of the Holy Apostles. Justinian built it in place of an earlier church on the same site, dedicated to St. John.

‡ Moneta quæ fit in theologia. Several of these coins were among a find made in the soil, a little to the north of the temple, by Mr. Wood. The coins had been buried about 1370.

equanimity and general philosophic interest in the preaching of St. Paul, whereas the superstitious and vulgar mob were strongly opposed to him. This state of opinion lasted till near the end of the 1st century. But the violent feelings aroused during the persecution of Domitian, combined with the realization on the part of the officials and the higher priesthood that the growing power of Christianity threatened the existing order of things, and would, if successful, sweep it away, led to a union among all the classes which were not opposed to the existing order, i.e. among all who were not Christians. We may confidently assume, also, that at first Christianity spread with great rapidity and produced a neglect of the Eph. ritual similar to that which Pliny describes as having existed in Bithynia, until the measures carried out by him in A.D. 112 caused a revival of the pagan worship (Epist. ad Trajan. 95). A similar revival of paganism in E. about the same period is attested by ancient documents, as Canon Hicks was the first to recognize clearly. A great inscription, dating A.D. 104 (Hicks, No. 481, p. 135), contains a series of decrees honouring C. Vibius Salutaris, a Rom. citizen resident in E., who had presented to the goddess and the city government a number of statues, images, and moneys, and arranging for the acceptance and use of the gifts and for the institution of a new festival and games which should unite and bind more closely together the sanctuary and the city of Artemis. From this time onwards the city began to boast more than before of its title of 'city of Artemis' (νεώκοπος Ἀρτέμιδος); and the city government also allied itself with the religion of Artemis, for under Hadrian imperial silver coins bear the type and legend of DIANA EPHESIA, showing that the vindication of the goddess was accepted as a duty by the emperor as Pontifex Maximus (for Rom. coins could not bear the effigy and title of any but a Rom. deity). This alliance of the imperial government, the city government, and the temple-hierarchy, and the superstitious mob of the city, lasted unbroken until Christianity triumphed. It is true that the text of a decree, passed by the Senate and Assembly of E. in A.D. 161, is commonly quoted 'as an involuntary confession of the decline of the Artemis-worship under the growing influence of the new faith,' and as an indication that the reaction visible in A.D. 104 had ceased. The text (Hicks, No. 482, p. 145), according to the usually accepted interpretation, states that 'the Eph. goddess, whose worship had hitherto been universally recognized, was now being dishonoured, not only in her own city (ἐν τῇ ἐαυτῆς παρτίδι ἀνιμάται), but also among Greeks and barbarians.' But, as has been urged in Classical Rev. 1893, p. 100, it is impossible to accept the idea that a decree in honour of the goddess had such an ill-omened introduction (for to ancient feeling it was profane and impious and dangerous to use such words); and probably there has been a slight error of the engraver, who wrote ἀνιμάται instead of twice, thus reversing the meaning; the true text, then, states that Artemis is honoured in her own city and everywhere (παρτίδι διατιμάται).*

The temple of Artemis at E. was one of the greatest and most famous architectural works known to the ancient world. The building which existed when St. Paul lived in E. was not the oldest temple. An earlier temple, with 12 columns dedicated by Croesus, king of Lydia, 560-539 (fragments of which are now exhibited in the Brit. Mus. containing parts of the king's dedicatory inscriptions—Hicks, p. 173, No. 518), but not finally completed until about B.C. 400, was burnt to the ground in B.C. 356, on the same night that Alexander the Great was born; and a vast temple, measuring, according to Pliny, 425 ft. by 220,* was built in its place with the help of contributions from the whole of Asia (totā Asia exstruente, Pliny, Nat. Hist. xvi. 40, 213; cf. Hicks, p. 174)—a fact which attests the veneration paid to it; and by the whole province (Ac 19<sup>27</sup>, see also Id. No. 2954, and Hicks, p. 144, No. 482, on the reading of which see above). Owing to the marshy soil on which it stood, it required much care and contrivance to lay the foundations firmly (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 95). Possibly, the impressiveness of this great temple suggested to St. Paul the allegory in 1 Co 3<sup>10-17</sup> (written from E.), and gave point to his words addressed to the Ephesians (2<sup>20-22</sup>); but it is unnecessary to suppose that on each occasion, when he refers to the ideas of foundation or building, as in 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>13-22</sup>, Ac 20<sup>32</sup>, he was thinking of this temple. The site of this temple was discovered by Mr. J. T. Wood in 1870, after many years' patient and laborious search; but, unfortunately, he has given no sufficient indications as to what remains of the building he found actually in situ, and has left no plan of the site as it was when he uncovered it. He merely gives his own restorations, and his own theories as to what the temple must have been when it was perfect; but the views of Gr. architecture was not so thorough as to make his views trustworthy; and it is hardly possible now to acquire sufficient knowledge of the facts to form a clear conception of the building. Officials called νεωκόμοι or νεωποιοί were charged 'to take care of the fabric and repairs of the temple, and to superintend any additions such as the setting up of inscriptions' (Hicks, p. 80).

There can be no doubt that the Temple of Ephesian Artemis was used as a place of deposit for treasure both by the city and by private individuals (as, e.g., by Xenophon, Anab. v. 3. 11). It strengthened the bonds that united the city and the temple. It is uncertain how the treasure deposited in the temple by the city was managed, but, as Canon Hicks says (p. 82), 'it is remarkable how little is said in the Ephesian inscriptions about any financial officers.' The temple and its precinct were inviolable: no arms might be borne within the sacred precinct (implying that in primitive times, when arms were commonly carried, the goddess provided that her worship should be a peaceful influence). The Rom. government, in A.D. 22, recognized the right of asylum that belonged to the soil of Artemis (Tacit. Ann. iii. 63); but the local limits of asylum varied widely at different periods.

The twelve disciples of the baptism of John whom St. Paul found at E. (Ac 19<sup>36</sup>) had possibly been converted by Apollos during his recent visit; though it is more probable that a small sect of Jews had emigrated to E., as a great centre of commerce and intercourse, soon after the coming of St. John. St. Paul, on his first brief visit, seems to have found the Jews in E. very well disposed towards the new teaching; and, though a rupture between him and them is recorded (Ac 19<sup>9</sup>), it is hardly described in such terms as to suggest that it was so serious as those that occurred in Corinth or Thessalonica. The existence of a Jewish colony at E. in B.C. 44 is vouched for by Jos. Ant. xiv. x. 12 (cf. xiv. x. 25, xvi. vi. 2 and 7), when Dolabella granted them religious freedom (esp. from engagements inconsistent with proper observance of the Sabbath) and exemption from military service. When Augustus afterwards confirmed the privileges of the Asian Jews, esp. guaranteeing them safe-conduct for transmission of their offerings to Jerus., he doubtless had E. prominent in his mind (Jos. Ant. xvi. vi. 2, cf. Ac 21<sup>60</sup>). Jewish inscriptions at Eph. are published, Hicks, Nos. 676, 677. Some of these Jews appear to have made a practice of visiting Jerusalem, Ac 19<sup>34-36</sup>, like Bar-jesus at Paphos, Ac 21<sup>37-38</sup>. Similar practices were engaged in by the Jewish settlers at Lycaonia (wh. see).

* In his addenda, Canon Hicks also is disposed to recognize an engraver's blunder.

* According to Mr. Wood's measurements the temple itself measured 343 ft. by 164, and the stoa or peristyle 418 ft. by 219.

ark, 1 S 5<sup>2</sup>, 2 S 6<sup>17</sup>—in Ophrah. That this was an object of idolatrous worship seems plain from the comment of the later historian (v. 27), who states that 'all Israel went a whoring after it,' and that 'it became a snare to Gideon and to his house.' The amount of gold spent upon this ephod (1700 shekels = about 75 lbs. troy, which would be worth now some £3600) points also to something more than an ornamental vestment for a priest: indeed the ephod appears to be the chief object in the sanctuary.* b. In other passages also the ephod figures as part of the regular equipment of a sanctuary. In Jg 17<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>14</sup> 17. 18. 20, Micah provides for his private shrine in Ephraim a graven and molten image (pesel and moseleḥāh),† and an ephod and teraphim; and in Hos 3<sup>4</sup> the prophet speaks of a time when Israel should be left 'without sacrifice and pillar' (without altar and pillar), and without ephod and teraphim. The juxtaposition of ephod and teraphim in these passages is noticeable. The latter were idols (Gn 31<sup>19</sup>, cf. v. 30), in the form of human form (1 S 19<sup>13-16</sup>), and were used in divination (Ezk 21<sup>21</sup> 26, Zec 10<sup>2</sup>; cf. Hab 2<sup>18</sup>); hence it is reasonable to conclude that the ephod was in some way associated with the teraphim in divination. It does not, however, follow that it was any kind of image: rather, as in the case of the teraphim, the ephod will have been a sacred object. c. In 1 S 21<sup>9</sup> [Heb. 10] the sword of Goliath was preserved at Nob as a trophy, wrapped in a mantle 'behind the ephod,' which therefore would seem to have been a fixed place by the wall, but from it. d. In the Books of Samuel, the ephod is several times mentioned as a means of ascertaining the will of J<sup>h</sup>; the verb used in connexion with it, when thus employed, is not 'put on,' but 'bring near' (עָנַן 1 S 14<sup>18</sup> LXX, ‡ 23<sup>9</sup> 30<sup>7</sup>): the priest (whose privilege it is to possess it) is said to 'carry' or 'bear' it (נָשָׂא 1 S 2<sup>28</sup> 14<sup>18</sup> LXX, §—not 'wear'); and Abiathar 'brought it down with him 'in his hand' to David' (1 S 23<sup>6</sup>). These passages seem to imply that the 'ephod' was something moved about or carried, rather than something worn as a garment. e. The derivative עָנַן—the same word which is used in connexion with the high priest's ephod in the phrase (Ex 28<sup>39</sup>) 'the band of its attachment'—is used actually of some part of the metal plating of an idol in Is 30<sup>22</sup> 'the silver overlaying (עָנַן) of thy graven images, and the gold attachment, or casing (קָשָׁה), of thy molten images.' On the strength of these passages, Wellhausen (Hist. Bibl. Theol. 1835, pp. 267, 269), writes, 'Outside the Priestly Code, ephod is the image, ephod bad the priestly garment'—the term, when used in the latter sense, being thus distinguished by the addition of 'linen' (Stade, Kautzsch, Smend, Nowack, Benzinger).

The places in which ephod bad occurs are 1 S 21<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 6<sup>14</sup>; so that the ephod bad must naturally be added, though Vathek excludes 1 S 14<sup>18</sup>, and Smend, Kittel, and Budde ('pernans') exclude 1 S 23<sup>6</sup> ('to bear the ephod before me'). It may, however, be doubted whether the connexion being so similar (esp. in the Sam. passages, though 1 S 22<sup>18</sup> is, no doubt, later) the term must not be understood throughout in the same sense.

* It is argued (e.g. by Berth. ad loc.) that the money may have been used for defraying the entire cost of establishing the sanctuary; but the expression is distinctly 'made into an ephod'; and set (or stood) is hardly applicable to a movable priestly garment.

† In reality, it may be, only a pesel: see 1830.31, and cf. Moore, Judges, p. 375 f.

‡ 'Bring hither the ephod. For he bare the ephod at that time before Israel.'

§ Read also by Klost. in 1 K 23<sup>6</sup> ('ephod' for עָנַן 'ark'). The same verb is used in 1 S 22<sup>18</sup> of the 'linen' ephod.

The explanation of the passage is, of course, not possible, but not certain. (1) The same term should be used to denote the priestly vestment and an image is not impossible. The 'ephod' was essentially a casing round the body; and hence the same word might well have denoted the casing of precious metal, which (as was usual in ancient images) was spread over a wooden core (cf. Is 40<sup>19</sup>); the derivative עָנַן appears actually to be used in this sense in Is 30<sup>22</sup> (quoted above): and a term denoting properly the decorated casing of an image, might easily have come gradually to be used for the entire figure. (2) It is true, נָשָׂא (to carry or bear) is not elsewhere used of garments, but only of shields, weapons, burdens, etc.: if, however, at the time to which Jg 17 f. and 1 S refer, the ephod worn by the principal priest at a sanctuary was in any sense a prototype of the later high priest's ephod, and had a pouch (cf. the sacred lots (cf. 1 S 14<sup>41</sup>, esp. v. 41 LXX [Urim and Thummim],—provided, at least, as seems a natural inference from what is stated on other similar occasions, and from v. 18 LXX 18. 38), the ephod may be presumed to have been used in Saul's inquiry,—and 28<sup>9</sup>), it might be fairly described as 'carried' or 'borne,' and mentioned (in Jg 17 f., Hos 3, for instance) as a prominent and essential part of the priest's dress, without which the oracle could not be consulted. It is, however, strange that the same term נָשָׂא should be used also of the linen ephods of the priests at Nob.* (3) In 1 S 21<sup>9</sup>, as also in 14<sup>18</sup> LXX, 23<sup>9</sup> 30<sup>7</sup>, the term does seem to denote something different from what it does in 22<sup>18</sup>: in 21<sup>9</sup> the 'ephod' is spoken of in terms implying that there was but one at a sanctuary (here Nob);† and 14<sup>18</sup> LXX mention one as being in the possession of the high priest at Nob;‡ whereas 85 priests, bearing the ephod, were at the same sanctuary as the one named in 21<sup>9</sup>, are said in 22<sup>18</sup> to have borne linen ephods. The single ephod of the high priest, of course, have been the more elaborate ephod of the high priest; but for those who doubt whether the high priest's dress had yet acquired the ornate character described in P, the way is open for the inference that it was an oracular image.

On the whole, we can hardly be said to possess the data for deciding this controverted question with confidence. There is, however, a decided probability that, at least in Jg 8<sup>27</sup>, the term 'ephod' is used of the gold casing of an oracular image. And if it has this meaning (in addition to that of a priestly linen vestment) in one passage, the presumption against its having the same second meaning in other passages is lessened, though, naturally, it is not proved that it has it actually.

The opinion that עָנַן denotes a plated image is also held by Ges. (for Jg 8. 17 f., Hos 3); Smend, Conj. on Jg, p. 375 only; Stade, Gesch. 104 (for Jg 8. 17, 1 S 21: with regard to the 'ephod' in which the sacred lots were kept he says, p. 471 bottom, that it is derived from the word עָנַן, or the priestly vestment); cf. (for Jg 8) Ewald, Alt. 2 288 n.: generally for these and the other passages named (sometimes with the exception of 1 S 23<sup>6</sup>) by Vathek, l.c. (except 1 S 14<sup>18</sup>), Wellh. l.c.; Reuss, Gesch. d. Heil. Schr. AT. 1, §§ 102, 130;

* Smend, Nowack, and Benzinger explain the identity of name by the conjecture that originally the body of the image was dressed in an 'ephod' of linen, which was afterwards replaced by one of precious metal, while the ephod of linen became the priest's garment, and think consistently that 'bear the linen ephod' in 1 S 22<sup>18</sup> is a survival from the time in which the expression was applied, as they consider it still is in 1 S 14<sup>18</sup> LXX, to carrying the oracular image. LXX omits 'linen' in 1 S 22<sup>18</sup>; but this does not seem to be right: as said above (No 3), the ephod of 22<sup>18</sup> appears (upon grounds independent of the word 'linen') to have denoted something different from the ephod of 14<sup>18</sup> LXX, 23<sup>9</sup> 30<sup>7</sup>.

† Whether this was the same ephod as that which was brought afterwards from Nob by Abiathar to David (23<sup>6</sup> 9 30<sup>7</sup>), is uncertain; for in 23<sup>6</sup> both MT and LXX have 'an ephod' (not 'the ephod').

ous ridge in Central Palestine, stretching N. to S. from the Great Plain to the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, occupied by West Manasseh, Ephraim, and Benjamin. It had fruitful land on both slopes, especially the western (see Moore on Jg 3<sup>27</sup>, Dillm. on Jos 16<sup>1</sup>, and G. A. Smith, HGHL 325, 338).

LITERATURE.—Moore, Judges, 152, 205, 314 ff.; Budde, Recht. u. Sam. (gassim); Kittel, Hist. of Heb. (see index).

J. MILLAR.

EPHRAIM (עֶפְרַיִם).—A town not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels, nor in any other part of the NT except Jn 11<sup>54</sup>. In that passage we are told that, in consequence of the plots formed by the rulers of the Jews after the raising of Lazarus, Jesus went from the city of Jerus. and Bethany 'into the country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there he tarried with his disciples.' The 'wilderness' (ἡ ἐρημος) apparently means the grassy mountain lands near Jerus.; and Josephus (Wars, IV. ix. 9) mentions a small fort named Ephraim in the mountain district north of Judaea, which he couples with Bethel. In 2 Ch 13<sup>19</sup> we have Ephraim (עֶפְרַיִם) instead of Ephron (עֲפְרוֹן) suggested in the Kere and RVm as the correct name of one of the towns taken by Abijah; and in this verse we again find it coupled with Bethel, if the textus receptus is adopted. Lightfoot remarks that, whether the Kere be the right reading or not, it shows that such a place existed just in the region where from St. John's account we should expect it to be. Robinson suggests that it is the same as Ophrah mentioned in 1 S 13<sup>17</sup>, and enumerated by 1 S 31<sup>1</sup> as one of the cities of Benjamin (Jos 18<sup>28</sup>).

It is a village now called et-Taiyibeh, situated on a conspicuous conical hill commanding a view over the valley of the Jordan to the Dead Sea (Robinson, i. 444). This site is a very probable one; it is 4 miles N.E. of Bethel, with which Ephraim is coupled both in 2 Ch and by Josephus; and it is about 14 miles from Jerusalem.

Ewald identifies it with the Ephraim in the neighbourhood of which Absalom's sheep farm was situated (1 S 17<sup>3</sup>); but the Ephraim there referred to is differently spelled, beginning with א, whereas Ephraim of Benjamin begins with א. If Ewald is right in accepting as genuine the words which the LXX puts in the watchman's mouth in 2 S 13<sup>34</sup>, and in interpreting them as referring to Beth-horon, this would in reality put a further difficulty in the way of the identification which he proposes; for this would indicate a site N.W. of Jerus., whereas et-Taiyibeh lies N.E. of the capital, and the neighbourhood of Bethel seems to show that Ephraim of Benjamin must have been in the same locality. Jerome describes it as being 'In tribu Juda, villa prægrandis, Ephraa nomine, contra septentrionem in vicesimo ab Ælia miliario.'

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP i. 444-447; Guérin, Juif, in. 45-47; Ewald, Alt. Eng. tr. iii. 172; Schürer, II. J. P. i. 1. 240; PEFS, 1886, p. 57; Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 49-51; Smith, HGHL 352; Driver, Sam. 233. J. H. KENNEDY.

EPHRAIM, FOREST OF (עֵר עֶפְרַיִם).—The scene of the battle between the forces of David and the followers of Absalom (2 S 18<sup>9</sup>). As 'the city' (18<sup>3</sup>) out of which David was to succour Joab, if needed, was Mahanaim (17<sup>27</sup>), the battle must have been fought on the other side of a plain from that city (18<sup>1</sup>). Though the site of Mahanaim has not been certainly determined, it must have been in Gilead (see MAHANAIM). The most probable site is Mukhanah on the eastern side of the circular plain 'El-Bukeia.' Instead of 'Εφραίμ of LXX, Luc. has Μαδβάρ (μαδβάρ). This is accepted by Klosterm., and Budde (in Haupt's OT) remarks that Mahanaim 'would be good, but is perhaps a guess.' עֵר עֶפְרַיִם is 'unquestionably wrong' and could well be dispensed with, but can hardly have been 'out of Ephraim' as has been suggested. The 'F. of E.' is not from the battle recorded Jg 12<sup>18</sup>. It is more prob. that it was from a settlement of Ephraimites on the east of Jordan, an attempt to have a lot there as well as Manasseh, for the 'F. of E.' is from the first dissatisfied with 17<sup>14-18</sup>. To this the obscure words of Jg 12<sup>4</sup> may refer. See Smith, HGHL p. 335 n.<sup>2</sup>. A. HENDERSON.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF.—See JERUSALEM.

EPHRATHAH (עֶפְרַתָּה, LXX 'Εφραθὰ, AV wrongly Ephratah) in Ps 132<sup>6</sup> is prob. not an ancient name of Bethlehem, but means the territory bordering on Judah and Benjamin, in which lay Kiriath-jearim, where the ark rested for a time, and where it is represented as being 'heard of,' found 'in the field of Jaar.' So Ges., Del., and see RVm. 2. A place near Bethel where Rachel died and was buried, Gn 35<sup>19</sup> 48<sup>7</sup> (in both of which עֶפְרַתָּה 'the same is Bethlehem' is a gloss). 3. A name of Bethlehem, Ru 4<sup>1</sup>, Mic 5<sup>2</sup>. 4. The wife of Caleb (1 Ch 2<sup>50</sup> 4<sup>4</sup>, abbrev. in 1 Ch 2<sup>19</sup> to Ephrath). See CALEB.

W. T. DAVIDSON.

EPHRATHITE (עֶפְרַתִּי).—1. A native of Bethlehem (Ru 1<sup>2</sup>). 2. An Ephraimite (Jg 12<sup>4</sup>, 1 S 1<sup>1</sup> [cf. Driver, ad loc.], and see art. SAMUEL], 1 K 11<sup>26</sup>).

EPHRON (עֲפְרוֹן).—The son of Zohar the Hittite, from whom Ab. bought the field or plot of ground over which was the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23). The purchase is described with great particularity; and the transactions between Ephron and Abraham are conducted with an elaborate courtesy characteristic of Oriental proceedings. Ephron received 400 shekels' weight of silver, which was the value of the land at that time. If we compare the value of the site with other instances (Gn 33, 1 K 16), Ephron seems to have made a good bargain.

The presence of Hittites in Palestine in the days of Abraham is noticeable. It is possible that Ephron belonged to a different group of Hittites from those who dwelt in Amor. Indeed it is probable that before either Canaanites or Arameans appeared west of the Euphrates, the Hittites had settled throughout Syria, and the Amorites in Palestine. It is also not without a special allusion to the distant past that the learned Ezekiel (16<sup>3-45</sup>) says of ancient Jerusalem, 'the Amorite was thy father and thy mother a Hittite' (McCurdy, History, Prophecy, and Monuments, vol. i. p. 196). See further under HITTITES.

H. E. RYLE.

EPHRON (עֲפְרוֹן), Jos 15<sup>9</sup>.—A mountain district, containing cities, on the border of Judah, between Nephtoth and Kiriath-jearim. The ridge W. of Bethlehem seems intended. 2. (עֶפְרָוֶן) 1 Mac 5<sup>46-52</sup>, 2 Mac 12<sup>27</sup>. A strong fortress in the W. part of Bashan between Ashteroth-karnaim and Bethshean. The site is unknown. 3. See EPHRAIM in preceding col. C. R. CONDER.

EPICUREANS (Επικουρείοι).—We read in Ac 17<sup>18</sup> that when St. Paul came to Athens 'certain of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers encountered him.' Whether he discussed their tenets with them is not related, nor what they thought of him; for we need not refer to the two sects the unfavourable criticisms, that St. Paul was a babbler and a setter forth of strange gods.

Epicurus was born B.C. 342, and spent his early life in the Ionian Islands. In 307 he domiciled himself at Athens, and soon gathered round him a group of friends and pupils who never forsook him. Their meeting-place was a small garden and villa which he owned in the suburbs, and which he afterwards bequeathed to the sect or 'thiasus.' He died in B.C. 270 of stone, the pain of which he bore with philosophic calmness.

The moral or ethical theory of Epicurus was suggested by that of his predecessor Aristippus of Cyrene, who formulated the human good or end of life as consisting in the pleasure of each moment. E. adopted pleasure as the end; but insisted that it is the pleasure of an entire life at which we must aim, and taught that this can be secured, not by indulging whims and instincts as they momentarily arise in us and solicit us, but only by reconciling them into a systematic whole, in which each will receive the amount of satisfaction which belongs to each. Before indulging any instinct, bodily or mental, we are to consider, said Epicurus, what will be the consequences to ourselves and those whose happiness or pleasure is bound up with our own. Thus the general upshot of his teaching is not unlike that of Bishop Butler; and made against him by the ancient Stoics, both as to the life and sensuality, was unjust. Howson are right when they speak (Life and Letters of St. Paul, ch. x.) 'of the quiet garden, where E. lived a life of contentment, and taught his disciples enjoyment of tranquil pleasure was the highest end of human existence.'

The Stoics also considered E. as an atheist, because he held that there is no sublime life of divine calm, as far removed from the passions and hatreds which make men unhappy as from the turmoil of the elements. The contemporaries of E., like the Greek or Italian peasantry of to-day, believed that every clap of thunder, every flash of lightning, every earthquake, was a direct act of a god, who, except in abnormal paroxysms, never acted at all. If a man was blind born, the gods were angry with him or his forefathers. If there was a drought, the gods meant to signify their displeasure with someone or other. The gods were meddling with nature and man, and not in a malign than in a loving manner. An instinctive dislike for such meddling views of Providence inclined E. to the philosophy of secondary causes, which Anaxagoras and Democritus had already broached in an earlier generation; and he elaborated a philosophy of nature according to which all phenomena, especially the thunder and lightning, in which Zeus was popularly supposed to vent his ire, were referred to the play of atoms moving about in a void space. To this regular action and interaction of atoms were to be ascribed the stars and their movements. Here Epicureanism struck at the widespread superstition of astrology, which was a deadly blow to humanity. For if a man's whole life and destiny depended on the position of the stars at his birth, he was not free to mould his own character, but was the slave of alien forces. In opposition to such a degrading and paralyzing fatalism, E. taught that man has a free will, and can make the best of himself.

A modern writer (Mr. Pater, in his work Marius the Epicurean) has shown how naturally Epicureanism, the most humane of ancient creeds, could in the 2nd cent. pass into Christianity. And indeed the two had much in common. Both were opposed to the vulgar mythology of antiquity; both ascribed to the Deity a lofty immunity and repose from every lower passion and feeling; both taught the doctrine of free will in opposition to the astrologers; both inculcated kindness and gentleness to man and beast; both frugality and contentment with moderate circumstances. And as Epicureanism, being the offspring of an age when the intense but narrowing patriotism of the ancient city-state was gone by, was capable of being practised under any form of political institutions, so the moral system of Christianity was formed in detachment from any special set of institutions, and even in defiance of many which, both before and since, have been held essential.

Many of the writings of Epicurus were found at Herculaneum. Many of these rolls have been deciphered and printed since 1793, when the task of unrolling them was first essayed. But many of them are too much charred by the hot lava which overwhelmed the city in A.D. 79 to be of much use. Still many writings of E. and of the leading members of his school, which would have been lost except for this famous cataclysm of nature, have been thus preserved to us.

F. C. CONYBEARE.

EPIPHANES.—See ANTIOCHUS IV.

EPIPHI (Επιφί, 3 Mac 6<sup>8</sup>).—See TIME.

EPISTLE.—1. IN OT.—The epistle is so spontaneous a form of literature that it may be one of the earlier applications of the art of writing (see WRITING). Letter-writing must, however, have been confined at first to the few; and official rather than private correspondence would be the prevailing type. In OT verbal messages alone appear prior to the Kingdom in Israel, the letter of David to Joab touching Uriah (2 S 11<sup>14-15</sup>) being the first recorded example. Here the message was one which could not have been sent verbally through Uriah; and a similar need for secrecy explains the use of sealed letters by Jezebel in the matter of Naboth (1 K 21<sup>8-9</sup>, cf. 2 K 10<sup>1-7</sup>, Jehu and the sons of Ahab; also 2 Ch 21<sup>12</sup>). The answer in each case was verbal; hence we infer that writing was still the rare exception even in high official matters. Other reasons for resorting to written messages were the desire to be emphatic or to be precise in the cases of Benhadad's letter to Jehoram of Israel (2 K 5<sup>7-8</sup>), and of Sennacherib's open letter to Hezekiah (2 K 19<sup>14</sup>, Is 37<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 32<sup>27</sup>); or the wish to be specially courteous, as with the letters and present sent by Merodachbaladan on the occasion of Hezekiah's recovery from illness (2 K 18<sup>34</sup>). So far letters have been chiefly those of kings. Akin to these, in formal or authoritative character, is the letter sent by Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon (Jer 29<sup>1</sup>), which also alludes to similar letters sent by certain Shemaiah, a false prophet, to Jerusalem in order to undermine Jeremiah's own position (vv<sup>25-31</sup>). From this it would seem fair to infer that the conditions of the Captivity gave a marked stimulus to the use of letters by the Hebrews as a medium for important messages. Certain it is that hereafter we find not only more frequent reference to such correspondence, but also a new and more precise terminology used to express the notion 'epistle' as a specific form of writing. Hitherto the term employed, as in 2 S, K, (=Is), and even Jer, has been quite vague and general. A letter is simply 'a book' (קִטוּב, βιβλίον, βιβλος), its precise nature being learnt only from the context. But henceforth there emerge, in Ch, Ezr, Neh, Est, certain specialized terms, the most distinctive coming from foreign tongues. Besides words for a 'writing' (כָּתוּב, 2 Ch 21<sup>12</sup> קָטוּב . . . נָחֵם, Est 3<sup>12-14</sup> 8<sup>10-11</sup> with קָטוּב hard by in either case; or מִכְתָּב, 2 Ch 21<sup>12</sup> = γράφη, as in Dt 10<sup>1</sup>), we find the strange מִכְתָּב of Assyria (ἐπίτρυς, so Frd. Delitzsch) or at least Pers. origin (2 Ch 30<sup>1-6</sup>, Ezr 5<sup>5</sup>, Neh 27<sup>9</sup> 35<sup>17-19</sup>, Est 9<sup>26-28</sup>). Cf. ἀγγαφίον, Herod. viii. 98; Xen. Cyrop. viii. 6. 9), and מִכְתָּב, a Pers. form [Ezr 4<sup>7</sup> where מִכְתָּב קָטוּב (v. 7) = אִגָּרָא (vv. 8, 11) = אִגָּרָא (v. 18)] while Artaxerxes' ἐπιστολή (rescript, v. 17) also = ἐπιστολή (v. 23). The two Latin words are rendered by ἐπιστολή in the LXX. It seems probable that familiarity with the royal posting system of the Persians (cf. ἀγγαρεύειν in Mt 5<sup>41</sup>) helped to make the letter stand out more clearly to the Jewish mind as a distinct literary type. In the post-exilic historical books the letter is often preserved, and its form is often preserved.

The Bks. of Mac, belonging to the Greek period, where ἐπιστολή occurs, sometimes with the addition of the exact date (e.g. 2 Mac 11<sup>27,33,35</sup> χαλπεῖν . . . ἐπρωσθε or ὕψαλτε). As yet, however, we have no models of private correspondence among the Hebrews; so that here, as often, we are dependent upon the light shed backwards by NT.

2. IN NT.—In view of the numbers and influence of the Diaspora, the collateral evidence of non-Heb. analogies now becomes of moment. But the letters of literary men, like Cicero or Seneca, are hardly to our purpose. It is rather to the Egypt papyri, and to the collections of epistles mostly fathered upon great Greek names during the Alexandrine age, that we must look for hints of real value.* The evidence has been well collected by G. A. Deissmann, who, in his Bibelstudien (pp. 189-252), reaches the following conclusions. A broad line is to be drawn between the letter and the epistle. The one is essentially a spontaneous product, dominated throughout by the image of the reader, his sympathies and interests, instinct also with the writer's own soul: it is virtually one half of an imaginary dialogue, the sum of the responses of the other party shaping the course of what is actually written: it is confidential in the sense that it is meant for particular readers known to the writer. The other has a general aim, addressing all and sundry whom it may concern: it is like a public speech, and looks towards publication. But publication is the very note of literature proper. Hence the letter, as private, differs from the epistle in being a 'pre-literary' type of self-expression, akin to a diary. But, like a diary, it meant ultimately for the public eye a letter may, in spite of its original use, be in fact an epistle (e.g. certain letters of Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny). The literary epistle would arise from actual experience of the posthumous value placed on a great man's letters, and might take one of two forms: (1) those written to make or enhance one's own fame; (2) those forged under some great name, either for practice, after the fashion of the schools of rhetoric, or to give weight to propaganda of some sort. But in any case it will betray care, effort after finish—in a word, art; whereas the letter proper is unstudied, a thing of nature. This being so, letters require an exegesis all their own, one which sets their contents in vital relations with author and readers. Thus only can their proper sense be ascertained.

These principles have a real bearing on NT epp., and must rank among the tests of authenticity. But certain special features of primitive Christianity modify their application; and the universal nature of the interests involved makes the line between letter and epistle a fainter one, as we see by placing 1 Th along with an epistle like Romans, or even the Letter to the Hebrews. It was, no doubt, by writing letters that St. Paul came to feel an epistle a fit medium of exposition. And it seems that he, partly in virtue of his unique missionary labours, partly as a Jew of Gr.-Rom. culture, was the creator of the NT type of epistle, itself the most characteristic blossom of the New Life in the souls of men, the most notable differentia of NT among sacred books. It is even possible that all other NT epistles owe their birth to St. Paul as pioneer. Be this as it may, the relevant data can best be grouped as (a) pre-Pauline, (b) Pauline, (c) post-Pauline.

(a) PRE-PAULINE EPISTLES.—Letters of instruction to the synagogal authorities even outside Palestine were sent by the supreme court of the mother-city as occasion arose (Ac 9<sup>2</sup> with 22<sup>3</sup>, cf. 28<sup>21</sup>). It is not without a certain sense of this that the Jerus. community, acting through the apostles and the elder brethren (Ac 15<sup>22,23</sup>, cf. 2 Mac 1<sup>1-10</sup>), addressed their Gentile brethren of the province Syria-Cilicia touching terms of communion. Common use of 'letters of introduction' is implied in 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup> (see Ac 18<sup>27</sup>, and cf. Ro 16<sup>1,2</sup> as a sample), and in a slightly different sense in 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>. No doubt, too, foreign synagogues were wont to refer doubtful points to Jerus. and thus elicit written responses. But we cannot view the letter of the Cor. Church to its spiritual father or apostle (1 Co 7<sup>1</sup>, 4<sup>14-17</sup> 9<sup>2,7,12</sup>) exactly in this light. Rather it seems a natural result of the unique relation which St. Paul's personality, at once strong and tender, caused to grow up between him and his 'children in the gospel.' This is the secret of the Pauline letters.

(b) PAULINE EPISTLES.—There was an imperative need for the single Apostle of the Gentiles to multiply his presence, as it were. This he did in part by trusted companions, but in part also by letters. Doubtless, their exact form would have been other than it is had the current models been other than they were.* But existing literary usages, whether Jewish or Gentile, gave to them no more than Rabbinism gave: 'vehicles of thought that lay . . . What his . . . it . . . and nowhere more . . . in the conventionalities of the epistolary form. Address, salutation, final benediction, all pulsate with life, and expand at his touch into clauses charged with emotion, every word of which reveals his estimate of some group of souls that were ever in his heart's prayers. One may well see in 2 Th 3<sup>17</sup> (cf. 2<sup>3</sup>) tokens that Thessalonica was not the first Church addressed by St. Paul. Yet it is equally certain that the true cause of his very first letter lay deep in the same spirit as breathes in 1 Th, the essential instinct. His letters were indeed the noble spirit, ever ready to be poured forth to nourish its spiritual offspring (1 Th 2<sup>7-8</sup>). Of a temper too ardent for the more studied forms of writing, St. Paul could yet by letter, and so on the spur of occasion, concentrate all his wealth of thought, feeling, and mature experience upon some particular religious issue, and sweep away the difficulty or danger. Such 'waiting upon Providence' was the attitude of the apostolic age, which took no thought for a future the next event of which might be the return of Jesus Messiah in heavenly power. In this sense, likewise, the occasional epistle was the typical form of its literature.

The Pauline letters have a style all their own—though style was far from the writer's thoughts. It was indeed the man. Hence their enormous value: first, as the data for his journal intime and Life all in one; and next as the immovable critical basis of historical Christianity. Just as certain of these letters articulate a unique personality, manifold yet mastered by one absorbing passion, so surely must all theories reckon with what they imply as to the Christianity. They reflect the mood of the given circle with perfect vividness of light and shade, ere it fades into the neutral tints of a set narrative. No criticism can ignore them. But neither can Christian theology. This means that they are to be read first of all as letters, and by the canons which govern such a reading. Until any reading can be put into relation to both writer and correspondents, so far as yet known, it cannot be held real and valid. We must reach the theology, if we reach it truly, through the missionary and man of God. So reached, it is full of qualification, of the flexibility that marks spirit off from letter. And, most valuable of all, a feeling for the practical reference of Christian truth—the ideal of 'being,' even more than 'knowing' or even 'doing'—can never be lacking when these writings are read as letters. To reach their very ordering contributes. For the body of the contents falls into two parts. The prophet—for herein lies their continuity with OT (cf. Jer 29)—carries the soul, on the wings of vision, to a level where the will finds its feet free to run in the ways of God, and life is seen sub specie aeternitatis, in the light of God. But then the apostle never fails to depict what this means for daily life, ere he turns the eye once more to the founts of inspiration with a doxology or Benediction. It is in such a way that the actual face-to-face nature of the Pauline letter allows certain self-revelations to be elicited by the virtual dialogue. Some of these are among our most precious hints towards a theory of biblical inspiration, which by its very recognition of human limitations stands out in contrast to the pagan notion of inspiration as uniform dictation through a divine idea which soon tainted the idea of Justin onwards (see Sanday, BL 350 ff., cf. 31 ff., 391 ff.).

* A certain proportion of the Alexandrine pseudo-epistles, being Græco-Jewish in origin have a special claim to attention.

* Renan, relying apparently on Talmudic and mediæval data, asserts that 'correspondence between synagogues already existed in Judaism; the envoy charged with such letters was even a dignitary drawn from the synagogues,' and he implies that doubtful points of doctrine or practice were thus discussed (St. Paul, 228, 229 and n<sup>2</sup>). But he gives no references. Sanday speaks more guardedly, and indeed doubts if 'the writing of doctrinal epp. would come to the first generation of Christians as a matter of course' (Bamp. Lect. 335, 344).

Finally, it may be noted, even as regards the growth of thought marked by certain Pauline epistles, that of all literary forms the letter least professes to exhaust a writer's ideas—the limit rather by the reader's conditions—or by the writer to his own past. It is, in fact, the ideal form of utterance for a spirit in which great germs are ever being quickened by the touch of practical problems.

(c) POST-PAULINE EPISTLES, in a broad sense at least, we may style the other NT epistles (for James, see Sanday, BL 344). Some of them largely partake of the 'epistle' in contrast to 'letter.' Deissmann, indeed, goes too far when he puts at least half of them into the former class in such a sense as to infer their pseudonymity (pp. 242 ff.). But we may group them as 'letters' and 'epistles' according as they were or were not meant originally for readers more or less known to the writer. Here Hebrews first claims notice; for, though not actually Pauline, it was most likely suggested by St Paul—example being that Timothy is known to its author (13:23). Its closing greetings mark it a true letter; yet its abrupt opening makes it, even more than some Pauline epistles, hover between a letter and a homily. Possibly, the writer does not feel his name weighty enough to prefix in formal fashion (cf. Ep. Barn. 1:2). On the other hand, James has a formal address, but no final greetings; which marks it an epistle proper, meant for a class, not for given circles personally known to the writer. Otherwise is it with 1 Peter (1:2, 5:12-14), which is quite on the lines of an epistle like Ro, and involves some familiarity with the readers' concrete relations. And this seems true even of 1 Jn, devoid as it is of the usual marks; for the tone of paternal affection (τεκνία) seems best to suit a Church or Churches that knew and revered the writer—probably those addressed out of full knowledge, though in a public or literary fashion, in the Bk. of Rev (2-4). 2 Jn is surely a real letter, in due form, to one such Church by the same apostle, whose cryptic use of ἡ πρεσβυτέρα and ἐκλεκτὴ κυρία is due to fear of a hostile State (v. 12). So is it with 3 Jn (v. 14), a sequel (cf. 2) sent to a private friend when access to this Church was cut off by an ambitious official. In all of the above one seems to feel personality going forth in subtle ways to reach its proper audience. This is hardly so with Jude, whose address is quite vague; still less with 2 Peter, which as it stands seems dependent on Jude. Nor need this surprise, when its author, in implying Pauline epistles, can rank it

To sum up. While we gain new insight into differences of type among NT epistles by placing them in line with other ancient epistles, yet on reflection we see afresh the strange distinctiveness of the former as a whole. It turns on the special nature both of the writer and of the reader in virtue of their common outside Judaism, religion meant neither for a low nor elevated conduct so much as for a new life. From this could spring no literature of a kind at least of all in epistolary form. But the motive for the religious letter, its native form could hardly stop short where it began, in the splendidly personal prophesyings and exhortations of St. Paul the inspired apostle. Even in him new and more settled conditions evoked a new manner; the sermon gets the upper hand, changing Christian letter into Christian epistle. Of the later, or strictly pastoral type, 1 Jn seems a true sample. Placed alongside 1 Th, it, or even 1 P, might appear marked off as Deissmann's 'artistic epistle' from the 'epistolary letter.' But, with all intervening changes, these categories cannot apply with such rigour as to be synonymous with 'Catholic' and 'Pauline' epistles respectively. Various problems remain, e.g. as to the Pauline Pastoral Epp., whose in-ter-pretation to doubt; but flexibility and nice discrimination must here be the order of the day. This is not the place to see how the NT epistles became, first literature, and then canonical literature. But it here falls to note that even the most personal Pauline letters thereby became for the Church or Churches or theological pamphlets. They were, for the most part in abstracto, their writer and reader, therefore the original sense—of the letter or no moment.

LITERATURE.—Tarrar, Messages of the Books (1884), ch. vii.; Sanday, BL 334 ff., 341; and esp. Proleg. zu den bibl. Briefen und Episteln, in G. A. Deissmann's Bücherei, 1895.

J. V. BARTLET.

EQUAL.—1. As adj. in the sense of 'impartial,' 'fair' (= Lat. aequus), Ps 17: 'Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal' (יָשָׁרִים), either the obj. of the vb. hence AV, and RV 'Let thine eyes look upon equity'; or, more probably, an adv. [=יָשָׁרִים] as Del. and RVm 'Thine eyes behold with equity'. This meaning of 'equal' is elsewhere in OT found only in Ezk (18:25, 28, 33:17, 20; Heb. יָשָׁר, lit. 'proportioned' or 'adjusted') in ref. to God's dealings. In Apoc. it is found 2 Mac 13:28 'sware to all equal conditions' (τὰ δίκαια, RV 'to acknowledge all their rights'); and in NT, Col 4: 'Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal' (τὸ δίκαιον καὶ ἰσὺν), RVm 'equality,' Lightft. 'equity,' 'fairness'. Lindale in Prol. to Genesis, says 'that Joseph brought the Egyptians into such subjection would seem unto some a very cruel deade, howbeit it was a very equal waye'; and in 'The Obedience of a Christian Man' (Works, i. 209) he says, 'it is impossible that a man should be a righteous, an egal, or an indifferent judge in his own cause—lusts and appetites so blind us.' Cf. Milton, PL x. 748—

'As my will Concurred not to my being, it were but right
And equal to reduce me to my dust.'

2. As subst. in the sense of a contemporary, one of the same generation (= Lat. contemporaneus). 14 'And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation' (συνηλικιώτης, RV 'beyond many of mine own age'). In the argt. to Samson Agonistes, Samson is 'visited by certain friends and equals of his tribe.' In Ps 55<sup>13</sup>, however, 'equal' is one of my own rank, as AVm Heb. אֲנִי וְקָרִי, a man after my valuation, i.e. esteemed as I am esteemed. So Elyot, ii. 417, 'to acquire by the executyng of iustice nat only an opinion of tyrannye amonge the people, and consequently haterede, but also malignitie amonge his equalles and superiours.'

3. As verb—(1) to 'come up to,' 'match,' Job 28<sup>17</sup>. 'The crystal cannot equal it'; 'The topaz . . . shall not equal it' (עָרָה); and (2) to 'compare,' La 2<sup>13</sup> 'What thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem? what shall I equal to thee?' (אֵיךְ אֶשְׁוֶהָ לָּהּ).

J. HASTINGS.

ER (עֵר).—1. The eldest son of Judah by his Canaanitish wife, the daughter of Shua. He was married to Tamar, who was apparently also of Canaanite origin. For wickedness, the nature of which is not described, 'J' slew him' (Gn 38<sup>7</sup>, Nu 26<sup>19</sup>). 2. A son of 'Shelah the son of Judah' (1 Ch 4<sup>21</sup>). 3. The name of 'Er the son of Jesus' appears in the genealogy of our Lord (Lk 3<sup>28</sup>) in the 7th generation before Zerubbabel, and the 15th after David.

H. E. RYLE.

ERAN (עֵרָן 'watchful').—Grandson of Ephraim, Nu 26<sup>30</sup> P. Patronymic, Eranites, ib.

ERASTUS (Ἐραστός) occurs three times as the name of a companion of St. Paul. 1. From Ac 19<sup>22</sup> we learn that during St. Paul's long stay at Ephesus he sent Timothy and E., two of those that ministered unto him (δύο τῶν διακονούντων αὐτῷ), into Macedonia. 2. In Ro 16<sup>23</sup> E. 'the treasurer (οἰκονόμος) of the city' is mentioned among those who send their salutations. His office implies that he was a man of some considerable importance. 3. In 2 Ti 4<sup>20</sup> E. is mentioned as having 'remained in Corinth.'

Whether these ref. apply to one, two, or three persons we have no means of conjecturing. It is, however, not probable that the 'treasurer of the city,' who held an office which implied residence in one locality, should have been, like the others, an itinerant companion of St. Paul.

A. C. HEADLAM.

ERECH (עֶרֶךְ) was called by the Babylonians and Assyrians Uruk (or Arku), whence Heb. מֶרֶךְ and Arab. Warka. A very ancient city, thought at first to be Edessa or Calirrhōs (Urfah) in the N.W. of Mesopotamia. It is the second in the list of the four towns of Gn 10<sup>10</sup> (Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh), comprising Nimrod's kingdom in the land of Shinar (Babylonia). Erech (or Warka) lies halfway between Hillah and Korna, on the left bank of the Euphrates, and W. of the Nile Canal. It is supposed by Fried. Delitzsch that this river must have flowed nearer to the city at the time of Gilgamesh, as the legend relates that Gilgamesh and Ea-bān washed their hands in the stream after having killed, in Erech, the divine bull sent out by the goddess Ishtar. Its orig. name was Unu, Unug, or Unuga, translated in the bilingual texts by subtu * 'seat' 'dwelling.'

*The pronunciation of the word seems, from a Greek transcription, to have been sobthu.

It was a very important city—the capital, in fact, of the mythical hero-king Gilgamesh. The ruins found on its site show the remains of elegant buildings with fluted walls, sometimes decorated with patterns formed with the circular ends of various coloured cones imbedded in mortar, bricks bearing archaic Accad. and Bab. inscriptions, etc. Remains of canals traverse the mass of hillocks (which in some parts are nearly 90 feet high) and the country around the city, showing that it must have been well drained in ancient times. Those portions of the walls of the city which can be traced seem to have been in the form of an irregular circle about 40 feet high, and show that its average circumference was about six miles. The houses of the people are supposed to have extended beyond the walls.

ER (עֵר) is indicated by the . . . on of the creation . . . is attributed to the god Merodach (RP 2nd ser. vi. 107–114). Another . . . is given in the number of names it bears i:

Besides its original appellation of Unug, it was called Illag (or Illab) (WAI v. pl. 41. 15), Namerim (ii. 50. 53; v. 41. 16), Tir-ana 'the heavenly grove' (v. 41. 16), Ara-imina 'the seven districts' (ib. 17), Gipar-imina * 'the seven enclosures' (ib. 18), Ki-ana 'the heavenly . . . ' (ib. 19)—poetical names implying that the city and its surroundings were regarded by the Babylonians as fertile and beautiful in the extreme, and very different, naturally, from the scene of desolation which now meets the traveller's eyes. The Archevites mentioned in the Bk. of Ezra, 4<sup>9</sup>, were inhabitants of the Bab. Arku or Erech, which was the seat of a celebrated school of learned men. Strabo speaks of the Orcheni (Archevites) as a sect of Chaldaean astronomers dwelling near Babylon (xxi. p. 739); Ptolemy, as a people of Arabia near the Persian Gulf (v. 19, § 2); and Pliny, as a . . . population, who banked up the . . . Euphrates and compelled them to flow into the Tigris (vi. 27, s. 31).

Two deities who had temples in the city seem to have been worshipped in E., namely, Ishtar and Nanā. The temple dedicated to Ishtar (Venus, as the evening star) was called E-ulmaš 'the house of the oracle'; the other, dedicated to Nanā (the goddess whose image was carried off by the Elamite king, Kudur-nankhundi, B.C. 2280, and only restored to its place 1635 years later by Assur-bani-pal, king of Assyria), was called E-ana 'the house of heaven,' and is now represented by the Buwariyya mound.

Among the inscribed and stamped bricks found in Erech are many of the time of the historical kings—Dungi, Ur-Ban, Gudea, Sin-gašid, Merodach-baladan I., etc. Tablets of the reigns of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadrezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus, Darius, and some of the Seleucidae, have been excavated in the site. In the ruins of the town and the country around, a large number of glazed earthenware coffins and other receptacles, used no doubt for the burial of the dead, mostly of the Parthian period, have been found, showing that part of the town and its neighbourhood must have been used as a necropolis.

LITERATURE.—Schrader, KAT 2<sup>94</sup> f.; Loftus, Chaldaea and Susiana, 162 f.; Delitzsch, Paradies, 221 f.; Smith, Chaldaean Genesis, 194; Sayce, Hub. Lect. on Rel. of Ant. B., 184 f.; HCM 102; Hommel, Anc. Heb. Triv. 1. 27, 125, 135, 177, also art. BABYLONIA, p. 224b.

I. A. PINCHES.

ERI (עֵר 'watcher').—Son of Gad, Gn 46<sup>16</sup>, Nu 26<sup>16</sup> P. Patronymic, Erites, ib.

* This apparently refers to the great tower there, in seven stages, similar to the tower of Babel. It was called E-gipar im na (H. 1.1 u. 59. 20)

ESAIAS.—The familiar AV spelling of ISAIAS in Apoc. and NT is retained by RV only in 2 Es 248.

ESAR-HADDON (אֶסַרְחַדְדִּן, Σαρχεδδόν, Ἐσαρδάν).—Esar-haddon, in Assy. Assur-akh-iddina, 'Assur seems to have been the favourite' by whom his name was changed to Assur-etil-yukin-aba, 'Assur, the hero, has established the son.' Sennacherib bequeathed to him golden bracelets, necklaces, and other valuables, 1½ manehs, 2½ shekels in weight, which were stored up in the house of a certain Amuk, and probably intended him to be his successor. In B.C. 681 Esar-haddon was at the head of the Assyrian army fighting against Erimenas of Ararat (Van), when Sennacherib was murdered by his sons Adrammelech (or rather Arad-malik) and [Nergal-]sharezer (2 K 19<sup>37</sup>, Is 37<sup>38</sup>) on the 20th of Tebet (December). For forty-two days the conspirators held the capital, but on the 2nd of Adar (January) they were compelled to fly to the Armenian king. Esar-haddon met his brothers and the army of Ararat near Malatiyeh on the 12th of Iyyar (April); the veterans of Assyria won the battle, and at the end of it saluted Esar-haddon as king. Eusebius quotes from Abydenus that the battlefield was at 'the city of the Byzantines,' which von Gutschmidt corrects into Bizana on the Cappadocian frontier. After the victory Esar-haddon returned to Nineveh, and on the 8th of Sivan (May) was crowned king.

He was an able general, and by his conciliatory policy prevented such rebellions as had troubled his father's reign. His first care was to rebuild Babylon, which Sennacherib had destroyed (in B.C. 689), and to make it the second capital of his empire. Manasseh of Judah became his vassal, and was called upon, along with the other kings of the west, including those of Cyprus, to furnish timber and stone for the palace of their Assyrian lord. The statement in 2 Ch 33<sup>11</sup>, that he was carried prisoner to Babylon after his revolt from Assyria, is explained by the fact that Babylon had become one of the residences of Esar-haddon.

The early part of Esar-haddon's reign was occupied in defending his kingdom against the hordes of Gimirra or Kimmerians, called Gomer in OT, and included by the Assyrians under the general title of Manda or 'Nomads,' who were now pouring into Western Asia. For a time the issue seemed doubtful, and a hundred days of humiliation and prayer to the gods were ordered that the empire might be protected against the Kimmerians and their allies, Kastarit of Karkassi, Mamiti-arsu the Mede, the Minni, and the people of Saparda (Sardians) and Asguza (Ashkenaz). At last Tei-pa the Kimmerian was overthrown in a decisive battle on the northern frontier of Assyria, and driven westward into Asia Minor. Then came a campaign against the Medes.

In B.C. 677 Sidon revolted, but was promptly captured and destroyed, and another city, called 'the city of Esar-haddon,' was built in place of it, and colonized with captives from Elam and Babylonia (see Ezr 4<sup>2</sup>). The following year the king of Sidon and his ally, a Cilician prince, were beheaded, and their heads sent to Nineveh. In the autumn Esar-haddon marched into the heart of Arabia, through a waterless desert, a distance of more than 600 miles, and conquered the eight kings of Bazu and Khazu (the Buz and Hazo of Gn 22<sup>21,22</sup>). In B.C. 674 he invaded Egypt, and the invasion was repeated in the February of the following year. In 672 his wife died on the 5th of Adar, and in 670 came the final attack on Egypt. The Egyptian forces were driven before the Assyrian army (from the 3rd to the 18th of Tammuz or June) all the way from the frontier to Memphis, being thrice defeated with heavy loss; while Tirhakah, their king, was wounded. On the 22nd of Tammuz, Memphis surrendered, Tirhakah and his son fled to Ethiopia, and Egypt became an Assyrian province. In B.C. 668 it revolted, and while on the march to punish it Esar-haddon fell ill, and died on the 10th of Marcheshvan (October). His empire was divided between two of his sons, Samas-sum-ukin having Babylonia, while the rest of the empire passed to an older son, Assur-bani-pal, whose suzerainty Samas-sum-ukin was called upon to acknowledge. A third son, Assur-mukin-paliya, was raised to the priesthood, while a fourth became priest of the moon-god at Harran.

ries, iv., Knudtson, 3; Meyer, Gesch. i. 47. Ragozin, Assyria, v. 448-461; Driver, Isaiah (M. A. B. C.), 220; Buxton, Side-Lights, 207-213; McCurdy, Hist., Proph., and the Mon. ii. 333-350.

A. H. SAYCE.

ESAU.—1. (עֵשָׂו), elder of Isaac's twin sons. The name ('hairy')* is said to have been suggested by his appearance at birth (Gn 25<sup>25</sup>, J). The surname Edom ('red', אֶדְוִם) chiefly to his posterity, commemorate his colour to Gn 25<sup>30</sup> (J), the incident there referred also, possibly, to his red hair. Sayce [see EDOM, p. 644<sup>b</sup>] derives the name from the red colour of the sandstone cliffs of Idumæa. The struggle between E. and Jacob, prior to birth,† foreshadowed subsequent relations between the brothers as well as their descendants (see EDOM), and was oracularly declared to signify that 'the elder shall serve the younger.' The premature tokens of manly strength were the signs of E.'s future. When he grew up, the wilder life of the chase to the quieter routine of the hunter at Beersheba. He became a man of the field, an expert hunter, and eventually chief of a tribe occupying the hilly land of Seir, whose Horite inhabitants were displaced or subdued by E., his followers, and their posterity (Gn 25<sup>37</sup> 32<sup>6</sup> 36, Dt 2<sup>12</sup>).

The main incidents of E.'s life are (1) Sale of birthright.—Hungry, faint, and feeling as if about to die, he arrives one day, on a post-hunt, at an unsuccessful hunt, at the patriarchal camp, where his brother cooking lentils, and cries, 'Let me devour some of that same red food.'‡ Jacob, taking mean advantage of E.'s condition, and aware probably of the oracle in his own favour, demands, as price of the birthright, a renunciation of his father's inheritance. The inheritance, perhaps, also, as in later times, a double portion of the patrimony (Dt 21<sup>17</sup>), and the domestic priesthood (Nu 3<sup>12</sup>). Along therewith would naturally, in the case of the chosen family, be transmitted the covenant blessing, which secured for its possessor the divine special favour, with promise of Canaan for his inheritance and the honour of conveying a blessing to all the families of the earth (Gn 12<sup>3</sup> 22<sup>17</sup>). In E.'s eyes the temporal advantages of the birthright were distant and shadowy; to spiritual privilege he was apparently insensible. 'What profit shall the birthright do to me?' he cries, and barter it away

* Ges., Kalisch, etc. Acc. to Pseudo-Jon's Targ. 'ready made,' from עָשָׂה to make, or make ready, because E. 'was born with hair of head, beard, and teeth.'

† Cf. the story of the twins Acrisius and Proetus, related by Apollodorus, De Deor. Orig. ii. 2. 1.

‡ Ps.-Jon's Targ. records a tradition that it was the day of Abraham's death.

§ So Ges. (22<sup>2</sup>) Lit. 'that red, red thing,' as if he could not wait for the proper word.

¶ The red food may have been a tempting luxury owing to 'famine in the land' (Gn 27<sup>1</sup>), assigned to the same J docu.

the Messianic idea and hope becomes an important element in eschatology; but in OT, at least in its earlier portions, the Messianic is not yet so developed as to be a constant feature in the eschatological picture, much less that it gives its whole colour to the picture. The OT gives its 'salvation belongeth unto the LORD' (Ps 3); and if the Messiah anywhere be redeemer or king of the redeemed people, he is so in virtue of the divine in him, as being in some way God in manifestation (Is 9<sup>2-7</sup>). The nomenclature, therefore, of some writers, who employ eschatological and Messianic as synonymous terms, is somewhat confusing; for, though this terminology be more and more justified as revelation advances, there are many eschatological passages even in late OT, in which there is not only no mention of the Messiah, but in which there is no reason to suppose that the idea of a personal Messiah lay as a presupposition in the background of the author's thought. The OT reveals its conceptions piecemeal. Its writers are like subordinate workmen, each absorbed in his own particular task, in polishing a corner or carving a character wreathing a pillar; it is only when the master-builder appears, with the full idea of the house in his mind, that each of the separate parts takes its place in the building. While, therefore, every Messianic passage is eschatological, there are many eschatological passages not Messianic.

Besides the OT, the OT reveals the final condition of things, the OT may take notice of the phenomena, the OT may take or the national commotions and the OT condition is ushered in; or it may go a step farther back and refer to the moral forces bringing about these manifestations and revealed in them. In OT physical nature has no meaning of its own; it is a mere medium for the transmission and manifestation of moral impulses; and the same is true in a sense of the OT, though men and nations act in accordance with all their movements are in accordance with the First and the Last (Is 41<sup>1</sup> 48<sup>1</sup>). The final condition of men and the world is therefore regarded in OT less as the perfect issue of a gradual ethical advancement in the mind of men and the nations than as the result of an interposition, or a chain of interpositions, on the part of God, though these interpositions, under whatever external forms they may be revealed, are of course all moral.

THE ESCHATOLOGY OF OT may be treated under two heads: The eschatology of the People, and the eschatology of the individual Person. As the People in their final condition have necessarily some relation to the nations, the eschatology of the People widens out in many places to be an eschatology of mankind and the world; while, on the other hand, owing to the idea prevalent in OT, particularly in the prophets, that the world was subject in relation with God is the People, the eschatology of the individual Person in distinction from the People is little developed, and some of the passages that appear to relate to it are uncertain in meaning. In other words, the eschatology of the People is the doctrine of the perfection of the kingdom of God upon the earth, while the eschatology of the individual Person is the doctrine of Immortality.

I. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE PEOPLE.—Though formally the people came into existence only at the Exodus, yet ideally it already existed in the patriarchal family from Abraham downwards (Is 41<sup>1</sup>), and some of the widest hopes and aspirations cherished by the people in later times in regard to their place in the religious history of mankind are already expressed in connexion with Abraham. But previous to the time when, by a process of divine selection, the religious destinies of mankind were entrusted to his family, some eschatological intimations were given. It is characteristic of all these early intimations that they are general both in meaning and in regard to time. The earliest of them, the promise that the seed of the woman would bruise the head of the serpent (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>), bears upon the family of mankind universally. It may not be easy to say what sense our first parents or even Israelitish readers put into these words. The fullness of meaning which we are now able to express by them, and the individual application of 'the seed of the woman' which we can make, can hardly have been suggested to them. But they would be assured that the family of mankind would have the upper hand in the struggle against the author of their calamitous transgression; and as the meaning and consequences of what had befallen them became clearer, so would their conception of what was meant by bruising the serpent's head, and how alone that could be done. Equally universalistic, though more definite in regard to the means of its accomplishment, is the promise given to Abraham, 'In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed' (Gn 12<sup>3</sup>). Such a promise could not soon be fulfilled, and there might be room for conjecture even as to the manner of fulfilment; yet the patriarch, knowing wherein his own blessedness lay, in his knowledge of God and fellowship with Him, would surmise that through his seed this true knowledge of God would reach all peoples. The sense is little altered if for 'be blessed' we render 'bless themselves,' i.e. wish for themselves the same blessings as Abraham and his seed are seen to enjoy (cf. Nu 23<sup>10</sup>). Some other passages, such as the Blessing of Noah (Gn 9<sup>25-27</sup>), are international, religious prominence being given to the family of Shem; while others, such as the Blessing of Jacob and Moses (Gn 49. Dt 33), are national, having respect to the place of the tribes in Canaan. The phrase 'the last days' (אֵלֶּיךָ יָמֵינוּ) describes the farthest future into which the eye of the seer reaches, and may have different senses. In Gn 49<sup>1</sup> it refers to the final disposition of the tribes in Canaan (though 49<sup>10</sup> may have a wider outlook; see PROPHECY); while in Is 2<sup>2</sup> it refers to the final condition of the family of mankind, when all nations shall appeal to the God of Jacob as the righteous arbiter in all international causes. Dt 32 ends with the hope of the victory of Israel over all its enemies, and in his Last Words (2 S 23) David expresses the assurance that under his family a kingdom of Righteousness will arise.

The Day of the Lord.—In the 8th century B.C. the faith of Israel was virtually complete. Amos taught that God is Righteousness; Hosea, that He is Love; Isaiah, that He is the Lord the King, who has founded His kingdom in Zion, on the throne of which shall sit for ever one of the house of David, the Prince of Peace, filled with the fullness of the Spirit of God (Is 9. 11). But besides this Messianic eschatology belonging to the second period of Isaiah's career, there is another belonging to the earliest period (chs. 2. 3), which he calls 'the Day of the Lord.' The prophet does not expressly combine the two, though they are probably to be regarded the one as the dark side and the other as the light side of the same cloud of judgment. In the earlier chapters he moves more among principles, moral necessities; in the second period (ch. 7 ff.) the actors are already on the scene who shall carry out the programme which in his first days he perceived to be inevitable. The phrase 'the Day of the Lord' is first heard in the mouths of the people (Am 5<sup>18-20</sup>). The term 'day' is much used in Arabic of a battle day, as the day of Badr, Ohod, and the like, and so in Heb. 'the day of Midian' (Is 9<sup>4</sup>), and this may be its primary meaning. The day of the Lord to the popular mind would be the day when J<sup>h</sup> their God would interpose in their behalf to deliver them. The deliverance would be primarily from external hostile oppression, but internal social miseries might also be remedied. The idea and the phrase may thus be very ancient, though they appear first in Amos. All that the phrase connotes in the mouth of the people is the sense of misery and oppression, the belief that only their God can deliver them, faith in His power, and a hope or conviction of His aid. The idea, though on what this is based, does not appear. But to the prophets of this age J<sup>h</sup> is a purely ethical Being, the moral ruler of Israel and the nations, and the sin of Israel and the world demands His intervention. Hence the first aspect of the day of the Lord is always a day of judgment. But judgment is not an end in itself; it is only in order to redemption, and behind the story of the day of the Lord there always rises clear the day of the Lord's redemption, the conception of the sin of the world which compels the intervention of the Judge differs in different prophets. In Amos it is social and civil unrighteousness; in Hosea, religious unfaithfulness; in Isaiah, insensibility to the majesty of the great King, who must interpose to bring the sense of Himself home to men's minds.

The day of the Lord is an eschatological idea; the phrase cannot be rendered 'a day of the Lord,' as if any great calamity or judgment felt to be impending might be so named; the 'day' is that of final and universal judgment. But, of course, a prophet's presentiment of its nearness might not be realized; the crisis which he saw impending and deemed the great 'day' itself, or the beginning of it, might pass over and the 'day' be deferred. But this fact should not lead us to suppose that the prophets call any crisis 'the day of the Lord.' Again, the term 'day,' if it originally meant battle day, suggests the presence of some one whom God uses as His instrument of judgment. This feature, however, is not always present in descriptions of the day. Sometimes the terrors of the day of the Lord are represented as due to His manifestation of Himself and the convulsions of nature that accompany His appearing, 'when He arises to shake terribly the earth' (Is 24<sup>21-22</sup>). But at other times, besides the supernatural gloom and terrors that surround Him when He appears, He is represented as using some fierce, distant nation as the instrument by which He executes His judgment (Is 13, Zeph). The judgment of the day of the Lord is a judgment on the known world, and the nation that executes the judgment is some wild people emerging from the dark places of the earth lying beyond the confines of the known world.* Once more, when the prophets speak of the day of the Lord they always regard it as near (Is 13<sup>6</sup>, Jl 1<sup>15-21</sup>). The coming of the 'day' itself was a settled belief, but of its time knew no man; the presentiment of its nearness was awakened in the mind of the prophet by what he saw of the moral condition of mankind or of the operations of God in the world. To one prophet the insensibility of men to the majesty of the Lord the King seems so frightful that He must interpose to cast down everything that is high, so that He alone shall be exalted in that day (Is 2. 3); to another He is so visibly operating in the convulsions of the nations that His full manifestation of Himself seems at hand (Is 13, Zeph); while to a third the severe natural calamities with which He is visiting His people seem the tokens and heralds of His final judgment (Jl 1. 2). The prophets' hearts were filled with great religious issues, with presentiments of the future of the world in God's hand. These presentiments were so vivid in their hearts that they were constantly looking for the fulfilment of them. And thus when the currents of providence, often too sluggish to their eager eyes, received a sudden quickening, when great events were moving and J<sup>h</sup> visibly interposing in the affairs of the world, they felt that He was taking to Him His great power. It was but a step or two when the kingdom would be the Lord's.

(1) In the pre-exilic prophets the day of the Lord is a judgment primarily on Israel (Am 3<sup>2</sup>), though it also embraces the nations. It is Israel's national dissolution, though the dissolution is only in order to a new reconstruction. The sinners of the people shall be destroyed, and a poor and humble people left behind (Zeph 3<sup>12</sup>, Is 2. 3, Hos 4<sup>3</sup> 218<sup>10</sup>). (2) With the Exile the judgment on Israel seemed to have been fulfilled, and the day of the Lord and at the period of the Restoration. The day of the Lord is represented as raining on the heathen world, and its issue is Israel's redemption (Is 13, Hag, Zec 1-8). And the day of the Lord is expressed in passages where the day of the Lord is not formally mentioned (Is 40 ff., Ps 93-99). (3) But after the Restoration, when Israel was again a people, and the old internal antagonisms and wrongs once more manifested themselves, prophets have to threaten it anew with the refiner's fire of the Day of the Lord (Mal 3<sup>2</sup>). Still, though in the post-exilic literature the judgment is also a sifting of Israel itself (e.g. Ps 50), it is mainly regarded as a judgment on the heathen world, and issues in Israel's redemption and the restoration of the Diaspora (Dn 7<sup>21</sup>). This idea largely pervades the later Psalms. Psalms differ from the prophets in that they do not threaten, they give back, in thanksgiving, in praise, and often in prayer, the faiths and hopes already contained in the mind of the community and long cherished. And these hopes and faiths are in the main the same. When the Psalms speak of the day of the Lord (Ps 35<sup>23</sup> etc.), and of the meekness of the Lord (Ps 37<sup>11</sup>), of the nearness of the day of the wicked (37<sup>13</sup>), of seeing God's face in righteousness (17<sup>15</sup>), of the uprightness of the righteous (49<sup>10</sup>), and of the speedily over the unrighteous (49<sup>10</sup>), and much of the same kind, they are expressing what has never before expressed, a faith as old as the prophets of the 8th cent., the certainty of a judgment of God (Is 13<sup>6</sup>, 2. 3), and of the issue behind it of a kingdom of righteousness (Is 126<sup>9</sup> 711<sup>10</sup>), and peace (Is 2<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>11</sup>), and everlasting joy (Is 9<sup>3</sup>, Hos 218<sup>10</sup>).

To follow the scripture statements regarding the Day of the Lord through the three periods just mentioned would lead to much repetition: it will be enough to state some general points connected with the Day. The Day of the Lord is the time for manifesting Himself, for displaying His character, for performing His work, His short and strange work upon the earth. 'The Lord of Hosts hath a day upon every one that is proud and lofty, and he shall be brought low . . . and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day' (Is 21<sup>2-17</sup>).

1. As it was a day of the manifestation of J<sup>h</sup>, God of Israel, in His fulness and therefore in a way to realize His purposes, which with Israel and even with the world were those of grace, it is fundamentally a day of joy to Israel, and even to the world—the Lord is king, let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of the Isles be glad thereof. Say among the nations, The Lord is King; let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad' (Ps 96). That J<sup>h</sup> should reign, and that He should come to the earth as king, must, in spite of all the terrors that might attend His coming, bring to the world a pervading gladness. For the falsehood and injustice that had cursed the earth so long would disappear, and the longing of men, who were ever in words or sighs saying, Show us the Father, would be satisfied. But it would be a day of joy above all to Israel, His people, when He should plead her cause, for the day of vengeance was in His heart and the year of His redeemed was come. Naturally, an accompaniment of the manifestation of J<sup>h</sup> was the disappearance of the idols—'On that day men shall cast their idols of silver and their idols of gold to the moles and to the bats' (Is 2<sup>20</sup>). But in the view of the prophets those gigantic oppressions, the empires of Assyria and Babylon, were but projections of their idolatry, with its cruelties and licentiousness and pride. The later prophet Daniel expresses this idea in a graphic figure when he represents the heathen monarchies under the symbol of various savage beasts, while the kingdom of God is represented under the image of a man.

* Davidson, Nah, Hab, and Zeph in 'Cambridge Bible,' p. 118; Driver, Joel and Amos in same series, p. 185.

2. To those in Israel who looked for His coming, apart from the natural terrors of it, it was unmixed joy (Hab 3). And it would have been so to all Israel had fidelity to their God been universal. But this was far from being the condition of Israel. There were many who belonged to Israel only in race. They were filled from the East, and soothsayers like the Philistines. They imitated the idolatries and practised the sins of the nations. Hence the prophets warn the people against a superficial view of the Day of the Lord, as if it would be a mere interference of J<sup>h</sup> in behalf of His people as a nation, and not a revelation of His righteous judgment—'Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord. Wherefore will ye have the day of the Lord? It is darkness and not light; as if a man did flee from a lion and a bear met him' (Am 5<sup>18</sup>). Hence the Day is first of all judgment, and only through this salvation. Sometimes one side is made prominent and sometimes another, the side of judgment (as has been said) in the pre-exile prophets, and the other side in prophets later down (e.g. Ob 15). It is around the Day as one of judgment that all the terrible pictures of gloom and the dissolution of nature are gathered (Is 2. 3. 13. 24, Hos 10<sup>8</sup>, Am 5<sup>18</sup>, Jl 2<sup>10</sup> 3, Zeph 1). These convulsions in nature which accompany the Day of the Lord may not be all to be explained in the same way, but the general view is that the universe is a human world; man is the head of creation, and creation is virtually the earth; the heavens are a mere appendage of the earth, subserving the moral life of mankind—being for signs and seasons, and days and years. Hence in man's judgment the world suffers dissolution, and in his redemption it is renewed and transfigured.

3. As has been said, the coming of the Day was an article of faith as much as our belief in the Last Day, but the presentiment of its nearness was awakened by what the prophet perceived around him: the moral condition of the world (Is 2. 3, Mic 3), God's operations among the nations of the earth (Is 13, Zeph 1), His judgments on His people (Jl 1. 2), or the beginnings of their redemption already experienced at the Restoration, which led to the hope of His full manifestation to dwell in His House when it should be prepared (Hag, Zec). Naturally, though the Day of the Lord was a crisis, and itself of brief duration, the phrase 'that day' is often used to cover the period ushered in by the day. This is the period of final perfection and blessedness. It is identical with what in other passages is the Messianic age, and with the ideal condition following the Restoration as conceived by such prophets as Deutero-Isaiah (Is 60). It is a period entirely homogeneous. There are no occurrences within it. It has characteristics, but no internal development. It is a period of light and peace and the knowledge of God, which covers the earth as the waters cover the sea. Subsequent revelation has broken up the coming of the Messiah into a coming and a coming again, and history has intercalated between the two an age full of developments and vast changes. But the prophets embrace all in one period over which there hangs a divine light. The characteristics they assign to the Messianic age or the period introduced by the Day of the Lord are in the main those characteristics which we assign to the age which the second coming shall introduce. These characteristics are those of the first coming, the natural expansion of its principles; and to the prophets the principles and their realization all seem condensed into one point.

4. The prophets are not interested in giving mere predictions of external events or conditions of the world, but in setting before the people the moral development and issues of the kingdom; and just as the Day of the Lord seems to them to issue out of the conditions of the world of their own day, so they sometimes bring down the moral issues of the kingdom upon an external condition of the world such as it was in their own time. There is perfect realizing of moral principles, but the condition of the world in its details, and the like remains unchanged. But this is not the case.

(a) A constant feature in the eschatological picture is Israel's restoration to its own land. The Lord will say to the North, Give up; and to the South, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name (Is 43<sup>6</sup>). And in this land all earthly blessings attend the people (Am 9<sup>14-15</sup>); they attain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away (Is 35<sup>10</sup> 65<sup>19</sup>). The people are also truly the people of God—'Thy people shall be all righteous'; 'In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory' (Is 45<sup>25</sup>). The people's restoration to everlasting felicity and their righteousness are but different sides of the same thing. Cast out because of their sins, they are restored because of their righteousness. Although the righteousness be one bestowed on them by God (Is 43<sup>27</sup>); and their restoration is the outer side of their justification, the token to their own heart and to the eyes of the nations that they are in truth now the people of God (Is 61<sup>9</sup> 65<sup>17-18</sup>). The question how in our day we are to interpret such prophecies is a double one. It is a question, first, of what the prophets meant. And to this question there can be but one answer—their meaning is the literal sense of their words. They spoke of the people Israel and of the land of Canaan, and predicted the restoration of the people to their land, and their everlasting abode there with their God in the midst of them. This was their view in their day of the final condition of the people. Of course, to the prophets the essential thing was the spiritual perfection and blessedness of the people given by the presence among them of their God in His fulness, but they were unable to conceive this except as reflected in an external condition of the people. The other question is how we may expect these OT prophecies to be fulfilled now that the NT dispensation is come. There is no question as to the meaning of the OT prophecies; the question is how far this meaning is now valid. The question is not one to be dogmatic on, but we should naturally say that it is to be decided by the principles of the NT dispensation. The only NT writer who seems formally to argue the question is St. Paul (Ro 9-11). Now, he argues only on the spiritual side of the Abrahamic covenant, or rather he regards the covenant as an exclusively spiritual or redemptive instrument (see art. COVENANT, last par.). Those, therefore, who, in advancing the idea of the Restoration of Israel to their own land, think themselves entitled to reason on the material side of the covenant (the promise of the land), cannot plead the apostle's authority nor his example. It may be made a question, indeed, whether his reasoning does not exclude theirs, for his view appears to be that the covenant from the moment it took effect was a purely spiritual and redemptive deed. To his mind the covenant was not the final salvation of Israel. The covenant is historical and continuous. It was planted in Abraham, and it was the church, and if the Gentiles be in it, they have been grafted in; and if some of the natural branches be meantime broken off, God is able to graft them in again; and thus He will do, 'and so all Israel shall be saved.' This is St. Paul's manner of stating the idea of Deutero-Isaiah, that the true knowledge of the true God has been given once for all to Israel, and given to be the heritage of mankind. If the OT prophecies are to be brought into the argument, the order in which they place things must be observed. That order is, first, righteousness and faith, and then restoration to Canaan. A return of Jews to Canaan while still in unbelief, however interesting a thing in itself, does not come into contact with OT prophecy.

(5) Another feature in the eschatological picture is the relation of the nations to Israel and their God. In some prophecies, especially those that are in their character, there is the idea of an attack on Israel by the nations, and a great conflict near Jerusalem or in Canaan, in which the nations are overthrown and destroyed (Ezk 38, 39, Jl 3, Zec 14, Ob v.<sup>18</sup>, Dn). But usually the nations are represented as attaching themselves to Israel, drawn either by the righteousness and humanity of the Messianic King (Ps 72), or convinced that the God of Israel is God alone (Is 2)—a conviction which they receive in various ways, as through J''s terrible revelation of Himself (Zeph 3<sup>9</sup>, Is 66<sup>18</sup>), but chiefly through the teaching of Israel, the servant of the Lord, who becomes the light of the nations, and the peoples wait on His arm (Is 42<sup>6</sup> 49<sup>6</sup> 50<sup>10</sup> 51<sup>4</sup> 60). But while already in the OT the Gentiles are fellow-heirs of salvation with Israel, the racial distinction is not obliterated. Jews and Gentiles do not amalgamate into one people or church—Israel 'inherits the Gentiles' (Is 54<sup>3</sup>), 'the kingdom is given to the people of the saints of the Most High' (Dn 7<sup>27</sup>). The nations occupy a place. There may be different shades of view in different passages. Of course, when the prophets wrote, Israel alone possessed the knowledge of the true God, and its place was that of benefactor of the nations, while theirs was that of recipients of blessing from Israel. Therefore the nations do homage to Israel, but it is to Israel as having the only true God within it—'they shall make supplication unto thee, saying, Surely God is in thee; and there is none else, no God' (Is 45<sup>14</sup> 49<sup>23</sup>, cf. 14<sup>2</sup> 60<sup>9</sup> 61<sup>6</sup>).

5. From what has been said, it can be seen what general conceptions the OT contributes to Christian Eschatology. They are such as these: (1) the manifestation or advent of God; (2) the universal judgment; (3) behind the judgment the coming of the perfect kingdom of the Lord, when all Israel shall be saved, and when the nations shall be partakers of their salvation; and (4) the finality and eternity of this condition, that which constitutes the blessedness of the saved people being the Presence of God in the midst of them—this last point... to the Christian idea of heaven. All of the people as a people. The people is immortal and its life eternal; and this life is conceived as lived in this world, though this world transfigured—a new heavens and a new earth (Is 65<sup>17</sup>). But are the individuals of the people immortal, or is their life, however blessed, yet finally closed by... probable that in most passages the prophets have in view the destinies of the people as a unity, the ultimate fate of individuals not being present to their mind. In some passages, however, the destiny of the individual is referred to, and a progress of idea may be observed, though, owing to the uncertain authorship of the passages, it may be precarious to infer at once that the more advanced are the later. In Is 65<sup>20</sup> only a very prolonged life appears promised, 'the days of a tree,' he that dieth at a hundred years shall die a child (cf. Zec 8<sup>4</sup>). But in the passage Is 24–27 death is represented as 'the Lord will swallow up death for ever' (25<sup>8</sup>); and the promise extends to the nations as well as to Israel (ver.<sup>6</sup>). The conception of a resurrection first appears in the prophets, who speak of a resuscitation of the dead nation (Hos 6, Ezk 37). In Is 26<sup>19</sup>, however, the literal resurrection of individuals is predicted. This is the complement of the Restoration of the living members of the people. And in Dn 12 a resurrection both of the just and unjust is prophesied, though it remains somewhat uncertain whether the resurrection be universal, or be only of those who, in the preceding troublous times, had been specially prominent, whether on the side of righteousness or of evil.

II. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE INDIVIDUAL PERSON.
—One of the strands of the OT is the little place which the individual has, and his tendency to lose himself in larger wholes, such as the tribe or the nation. When in earlier times the individual approached death, he felt that he had received the blessing of life from God and had enjoyed it in His communion; his sojourn with God had come to an end, he was old and full of days, and he acquiesced in death, however strange his acquiescence may seem to us. He consoled himself with the thought that he did not all die—'The memory of the righteous is blessed' (cf. Is 56<sup>4</sup>). He lived, too, in his children and in his people. He saw the good of Israel; his spirit lived, and the work of his hands was established. The great subject was the people, the nation; J' had established His covenant with the nation, and the individual was blessed in the blessing and fortune of the whole. And he was content to have poured his little stream of life and service into the tide of national life, and in some degree to have swelled it. This was particularly the case, so far as can be judged, in earlier times. But when the nation came to an end with the Captivity, when national life and religion no more existed, the individual rose to his own proper place and rights, and felt his own worth and responsibility. Though the nation had fallen the individual remained, and J' and religion remained, though religion remained only in the heart of the individual. The religious unit, formerly the people, now became more and more the single person, and the truths regarding duty and responsibility, and the hopes of the future, enunciated by the prophets in regard to the people, were appropriated by the individual to himself.

In regard to the Eschatology of the individual person there are two things which require to be carefully distinguished. There are, first, certain ideas regarding death and the state of the dead lying in the popular mind, though cherished by all classes, the righteous as well as others, alike. These ideas are common to Israel with some other Shemitic peoples. They have in themselves no moral

But some of them, such as the idea of a person, though he died, was not extinguished, but still subsisted as a person, however shadowy the state of subsistence was; and the other idea, that the dead person, though subsisting, was in death cut off from the living, whether men or God, formed points to which the aspirations of the pious might attach themselves, whether in the way of development, as of the first idea, or protest as against the second idea. And, secondly, there are the aspirations, intuitions, or inferences of the pious mind itself. It is only these that can properly be called OT teaching. Such aspirations and intuitions may be either intellectual or emotional, that is, virtually, either ethical or religious, even of the religious is ethical.

The first idea is the moral one: God and man are moral beings, their relation is moral; the universe is a moral constitution, the stage where God displays His righteousness, and where man sees God's face in righteousness. Righteousness must win, and righteousness is eternal (Is 51<sup>6</sup>). This is the idea that underlies the Book of Job and such Psalms as 37, 49, and 73. There are thus three things to look at: (1) Death and the state of the dead; (2) Life; and (3) the Reconciliation of Death and Life.

(1) By death OT means what we mean when we use the word. It is the phenomenon which we observe. Now, all parts of OT indicate the view that at death the person is not annihilated; he continues to subsist in Sheol, the place of the dead, though in a shadowy and feeble form occasioned by the withdrawal of the spirit of life. In this condition of subsistence, which is not life but death, in Sheol, the common abode of all dead persons, there is no distinction in destiny between the righteous and the ungodly. OT does not name those in Sheol either souls or spirits, they are persons. It is possible that they were conceived as retaining a shadowy flickering outline of their former personality; for in Is 14 they sit on thrones, from which they rise up and speak. Subsistence in Sheol is a feeble, nerveless condition of life on earth. These conceptions, as has been said, are not properly scripture teaching, only the popular notions from which its teaching starts. Illustrations of them are such passages as these among others, Ps 6, 30, Is 14, 38, Job 3, 10. Thus, to start with, OT is not materialistic, death is not the extinction of the formerly living person. Neither is it philosophic, regarding the body as the prison-house of the soul, released from which it can spread its wings and soar unfettered into regions of pure and perfect life. Nor is it, to begin with at least, Christian in the sense that the spirit attains to perfection at death.

(2) As by death so by life OT means what we mean by it. It starts from the idea, not of the soul, but of the person. Life is what we so call when we see it, the subsistence of the complete personality in the unity of its parts, body and soul. An essential part of man's being is the body; and life is life in the body, such as it is before the analysis which we call death, and corresponds therefore to the Christian synthesis called the resurrection life. Hence Job, when the idea of a second life first dawns upon him, can conceive it only as a renewal of the natural life: 'If a man die, shall he live again?' (ch. 14). But as life was due to the communication by God of the spirit of life, and death to the withdrawal of it, these operations came under the moral law, and life meant moral life in the favour of God (Ezk 33)—'in the way of righteousness is life'; 'righteousness delivereth from death.' OT scriptures occupy themselves chiefly with the condition of man on this side of death, and they teach that whatever principles are involved in the relations of men to God they come always to light in this life; death does not change these relations; on the contrary, by its manner or circumstances it reveals them (Ps 37, 73).

(3) Now, this side of life naturally came into collision with the fact of death. And OT doctrine of immortality, when death is had in view, consists of the efforts made by the faith of pious men to gain for the idea of life just referred to the victory over the fact of death. These efforts are of two kinds: one consists of an appeal against the fact of death, a protest against mortality, or not dying, a protest against the interruption of the living man here with God, being interrupted, or a lofty assurance that it cannot be interrupted. It is quite possible that the idea of this may have been referred to the circumstances, when death might be actually the end, but the language used, the demand made, the content of life, the lofty assurance of faith that the relation of the person to God cannot be interrupted, rise to the expression of principles, and are by no means merely the expression of an assurance that God would save from death on this particular occasion. This is the meaning of Ps 16, 'I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. Thou wilt not leave my soul over to Sheol; thou wilt not let thine holy one see the pit.' What the speaker is assured of is deliverance from death. But his assurance has an absoluteness in it. It expresses principles. In his ecstasy of life in God he feels life to be eternal. The tie between him and J<sup>h</sup> is indissoluble. With our more reflecting habits of thought this ecstasy of faith is hard to conceive. To us the fact of death is so inevitable that we cannot imagine any one resisting it. We accept the fact, and rest on what lies beyond. But the resistance of the pious Hebrew was due just to his not knowing what lay beyond and was but a mode of making a protest against which we now know to lie beyond.

The other line of thought was somewhat different; it was not so much a protest against dying, as a protest that dying was not the end; it was a denial that death was to the saint of God that which the popular mind regarded it to be—a separation from God and descent into Sheol. The fellowship with God had in life, and which was life, would remain unbroken in death. This amounted to the faith that the godly soul would overleap Sheol and pass to God. This appears to be the faith expressed in Ps 49 and 73, and in a certain sense in Job 19.

Before these poetical passages, which are obscure, are briefly looked at, something must be said of Sheol and the state of the dead; though, as has been said, OT statements about Sheol chiefly reflect the popular sentiments, and have little positive value. It might be surmised from the strong expressions used many times of death in the OT that in death existence absolutely came to an end. Thus Ps 146<sup>4</sup> 'his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish'; Ps 39<sup>5</sup> 'O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.' And perhaps most strongly, of all Job 14<sup>7</sup>, 'for a tree hath hope, if it be cut down, it will sprout again; but man lieth down, and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep' (cf. 7<sup>21</sup>). But these are only the strong expressions of despondency and regret over a life mournfully soon ended, and that never returns to be lived on this earth again. The conception of Sheol is sufficient answer to the apparent doctrine which they teach. The word Sheol (שְׁאוֹל, twice written שְׁאוֹל, and usually fem., as nouns of place mostly are), is of uncertain derivation. Its root has been supposed to be a softened form of another root (שָׁוַע, represented by שָׁוַע the hollow hand, Is 40<sup>12</sup>) signifying perhaps 'to be hollow,' in which case it would have the same meaning as our word 'hell' (Germ. Hölle); and the name 'pit' with which it is interchanged in OT (δύσπυκος in NT) might seem to favour this derivation. A corresponding Assyrian Suālu (Fried. Del., Jeremias) is denied by Jensen. Sheol is the opposite of the upper sphere of light and life; it is 'deep Sheol' (Ps 86<sup>3</sup> 63<sup>9</sup>), the region of darkness, 'a land of darkness as darkness itself, without any order, and where the light is as darkness' (Job 10<sup>22</sup>). There is no strict correspondence sought for Sheol; it is in great contrast with the imagination, deep down under the earth or under the waters (Job 26<sup>5</sup>). It is not to be identified with the grave, though the grave be often regarded as the mouth of it; and it is sometimes represented as a vast burying-place (Is 14<sup>9</sup>, Ezk 32<sup>21</sup>). Sheol is the place of departed spirits; the generations of one's forefathers; and he who dies is gathered unto his fathers; the tribal divisions of one's race are there, and the dead is gathered unto his peoples, and if his descendants have died before him, they are there and he goes down to them, as Jacob to his son, and David to his child (Gn 37<sup>35</sup> 42<sup>38</sup>, 2 S 12<sup>23</sup>).

(1) The state of those in Sheol.—As death consists in the withdrawal by God of the spirit of life, the source of energy and vital power, the personalities in Sheol are feeble and flaccid. They are shades (שְׁאוֹל Job 26<sup>5</sup>, Is 14<sup>9</sup>). Their abode is called 'silence' (Ps 94<sup>7</sup>); it is 'the land of forgetfulness' (Ps 88<sup>12</sup>); 'the living know that they must die, the dead know not anything' (Ec 9<sup>5</sup>); 'his sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, and he perceiveth it not of them' (Job 14<sup>21</sup>). But other passages represent the existence of the dead in Sheol as a dreamy reflection of life on earth, in which self-consciousness and ability to recognize others still remain—'Art thou become weak as we; art thou become like unto us?' is the language addressed by the Shades to the prince of Babylon when he descends among them.

(2) There is no distinction of good and evil in Sheol.—All must go into Sheol, and all alike are there (Job 3<sup>17</sup>). Sheol itself is no place of punishment nor of reward (Ec 9<sup>5</sup>), neither is it divided into compartments having this meaning: 'To-morrow,' said Samuel to the king whom God had rejected, 'to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me' (1 S 28<sup>19</sup>). The idea of a deeper or darker Sheol in any penal sense cannot be verified. 'The farthest recesses of the pit' into which the prince of Babylon is thrust in death forms a mere antithesis to the 'farthest recesses of the North,' the abode of the gods, where he aspired to seat himself when alive (Is 14<sup>15</sup>). If the 'prison' referred to Is 24<sup>22</sup> be Sheol, incarceration in Sheol, i.e. death, is regarded as the penal issue of the judgment. And the state of the dead being a reflection of life on earth, any dishonour done to one on earth, such as being deprived of sepulture, may still cleave to him when he descends into the Underworld (Is 14, Ezk 32). The language of Is 66<sup>24</sup> 'their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched,' refers to the bodies of the ungodly, which are cast out upon earth, an abhorring to all flesh, and not to the ungodly themselves in Sheol. (3) All connexion with the world of the living is broken off.—The dead can neither return to earth, nor does he know anything of the events passing there (Job 7<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>12</sup>, Ec 9<sup>5</sup>). Yet with the strong belief in the existence of the persons in Sheol, there was naturally a popular superstition that they could be reached. This belief gave rise to the necromancy practised among the Hebrews, as among most peoples, though it is proscribed in the law and ridiculed by the prophets (Is 8<sup>19</sup>). The practice probably did not repose on any general idea that the dead must have a wider knowledge than the living, that 'there must be wisdom in death,' but on the idea that great persons, still to be in death that which they had been in life. This appears to have been the idea of Saul in seeking unto Samuel. There is no record of any one answering from the dead except Samuel. The question whether any connexion was thought to exist between the person in Sheol and his body can hardly be answered. No such connexion existed as to interfere with the passage of the person into Sheol, whatever befell the body. The want of burial was in itself dishonouring, and the dishonour continued to cleave to the person among the dead, but it did not, as among some nations, prevent his descent to the world of the dead. There are some passages which seem to speak of a sympathetic rapport still existing between the body and the person in Sheol, but they hardly go further than to say that the body, though thrown off, was still part of the man, and not mere common unrelated dust. (4) The main point is that the relation between the dead person and God is cut off. This is what gave death its significance to the religious mind. Fellowship with God ceases—'In death there is no remembrance of thee; in Sheol who shall give thee thanks?' 'For Sheol cannot praise thee; they that go down to the pit cannot hope for thy truth' (Is 38<sup>18</sup>).

The passages relating to the eschatology of the individual person are mostly poetical, and they are in some points obscure. They are such passages as Ps 16. 17. 22. 37. 49. 73, and many fragments of others, and Job. Now, with regard to these passages several things must be said: first, they are all late, later at all events than the prophetic faith of the 8th cent. This faith—belief in the coming manifestation of God, in the judgment, and in the eternal rest of the people in God's perfect kingdom—was the faith of the writers. Again, all the passages repose upon an acknowledged distinction among men, the distinction of the righteous and the ungodly. This distinction is visible, men are called to be related to God. But the problem arose from the fact that men's destinies in the world were not seen to correspond to this distinction: in a moral world morality was not to be ignored in the government of the righteous; the consciousness was not acknowledged. No doubt, the pious mind sometimes composed itself by a deeper analysis of that wherein true prosperity or felicity lay—the portion falling to it, even God Himself, was a profounder good than all earthly possessions (Ps 17. 53). Nevertheless, the problem remained and demanded solution. The solution was always an eschatological one, and was just the distinction between the righteous and the ungodly truly realizing itself. In other words, immortality or eternal life is the corollary of religion, as Christ, summing up the whole OT teaching, said, God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; it might even be said to be the corollary of morality—if the universe be a moral world there is everlasting life. The general position of OT saints, with their faith in the advent of God to judge, was very similar to that of the early Christians, who looked for the speedy coming of Christ. This coming would change the world and the Church, but the Church would pass living into perfect blessedness; and, of course, individuals would share the change—'We shall not all die, but we shall all be changed.' Now, this was very like the feeling of OT saints. The individual would share the transition of the community, the Day of the Lord would break, and the living would enter into fullness of life without tasting death. True individualism is little seen in OT. It is real to this extent: the individual realized keenly his own personal life, and longed earnestly to share for himself in the blessings upon which the community would enter when God would come to abide for ever among them. He knew that he, the living man, should see with his people the glory of the Lord revealed, and enter with his people into life. It was, perhaps, only the prospect of death, or reflection on it, that rounded off individualism and revealed its energies. The life of the community was perennial, but with death before him the individual could not share this life, and he sought to forecast his own personal destiny.

Thus there may be two classes of passages: (1) passages which, though spoken perhaps by individuals, express the hope of the living people, and refer to that great change which the Day of the Lord shall introduce, and which the individual, as part of the people, shall experience without tasting death; and (2) passages where the individual contemplates his own death, and expresses the assurance that he will not, like the ungodly, fall into Sheol, but see life. Ps 37 belongs to the first class, and possibly Ps 73, though the phrase 'take me' might, as in Ps 49, refer to escaping Sheol at death. Ps 49 has two peculiarities: first, its opening verses imply that its teaching on immortality is no more an aspiration, but a firm conviction; and secondly, it seems to start from the assumption that death is universal. If this be the case, the words, 'God will redeem my soul from Sheol,' must refer to the Psalmist's hope in death. This interpretation may certainly be supported by reference to the parable of Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, which shows that the idea of a blessedness of the spirit at death had been reached before the time of our Lord. It is enough here to state some general principles and give a classification of passages; for details the commentaries must be consulted.* The prophets and saints of the OT were not without this assurance. The reason that the kind of assurance which they were interested in—the assurance that appears, the idea that any human person should become extinguished or be annihilated never occurred to them. They did not lay stress in a reflective way on man's instinctive hopes of immortality; they may be observed giving the expression. So far as they reasoned, their assurance was based on the moral idea—Righteousness is eternal. So far as they experienced and felt, their assurance was immediate religion is reciprocal, the consciousness of God is God's giving Himself in the consciousness.

It has always been felt strange that the Pentateuch, which gives the constitution of the people of God, should be silent on death and immortality, or only refer to the popular idea of Sheol. In explanation it may be said that the earliest part of the Pent. is anterior to the prophets of the 8th cent., while the later portions are the reflection of the prophetic teaching. Deut. reposes on Isaiah and the prophets of the Assyrian age, and the Priests' Code on Ezekiel. The constitution which they furnish for Israel is the embodiment of the prophetic conceptions. But the conceptions of the prophets are ideal, their pictures of the true Israel are pictures of Israel of the future, Israel of the perfect and final state; in other words, of Israel in what may be called its condition of immortality. The legislation seeks to impose this ideal on Israel of the present. Of necessity, when applied to the conditions of the actual Israel, the ideal was imperfectly realized, and was anew projected into the future.

* See particularly the Anhang to Studer's Das Buch Hiob, Bremen, 1881.

LITERATURE.—Von Orelli, Prinzipien der Theologie, 1846, and Die Lehre vom Tode, 1848; von Israel's Reichsherrlichkeit in seiner Theol. vols. iv. v. The older literature of the doctrine of immortality, see Doctrines of Immortality, New York, 1871. Besides the B. G. T. useful works are: Oehler, Vet. Test. Sententia de rebus post mortem futuris, 1846; Perowne (Bp.), Immortality (Hulsean Lecture), 1860; Schultz, Christ. Lehre v. d. Unsterblichkeit, 1861; V. d. V., Lehre nach dem Tode, 1868, and relative section from Handbuch des christl. Theolog. Systems, 1870; Lehrbuch des christl. Theolog. Systems, 1871; Lehrbuch des christl. Theolog. Systems, 1872; A. B. Davidson, Modern Religion and OT Immortality, Expositor, May 1895; especially Salmond, The Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 3rd ed., 1897.
A. B. DAVIDSON.

ESCHATOLOGY OF THE APOCRYPHAL AND APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.—We shall treat

this subject under four heads. 1. The authorities for Jewish Eschatology, B.C. 200-A.D. 80. 2. Some of the conceptions which gave birth to and controlled the evolution of later Jewish Eschatology. 3. Its historical development. 4. Its systematic exposition.

I. THE AUTHORITIES.

2nd cent. B.C.—Sirach.

33 Ethiopic Enoch 1-36.

“ Daniel.

” Ethiopic Enoch 83-90 ; 91-104.

“T

Sibylline Oracles — Pro-
cemium and 3<sup>97-818</sup>.

Testaments of the XII
Patriarchs—Apocalyptic
Sections. Between B.C.
140 and A.D. 30.

.. Judith.

1st cent. B.C.—Ethiopic Enoch 37-70.

1 Maccabees.

” Psalms of Solomon.

2 Maccabees.

1st cent. A.D.—Book of Jubilees.

Assumption of Moses.

Philos.

Slavonic Enoch.

Book of Wisdom.

4 Maccabees.

|                      |   |  |
|----------------------|---|--|
| Apocalypse of Baruch | } | Composite works writtenbetween 100 B.C. andA.D. 70.Part of the Book ofBaruch may belong tothe 2nd cent. B.C. |
| Book of Baruch       |   |  |
| 4 Ezra               |   |  |
| Ascension of Isaiah  |   |  |

Josephus.

The above authorities vary indefinitely in the degree of light they shed on the evolution of eschatological thought among the Jews. Thus very little help in this direction is to be derived from Sirach, the Book of Baruch, Judith, and 1 Maccabees. It is, in fact, to the predominantly apocalyptic writings that we are first entirely beholden for the materials of which we are in quest. These not only supply the missing links which unite in orderly development the thought of OT to that of NT, but also in not a few cases are the only documentary authorities for views and doctrines which in later times established themselves securely in Christianity or Judaism.

II. SOME OF THE CONCEPTIONS WHICH GAVE BIRTH TO AND CONTROLLED THE EVOLUTION OF

LATER JEWISH ESCHATOLOGY.—These conceptions were already at work in OT, but were applied only sporadically, and in a partially developed form. In the later period they gradually attain to their full rights.

1. The enlarged conception of God as the Creator and Moral Governor of all the world, and its consequences.—When once this idea is fully comprehended, the OT conception of Sheol can no longer logically exist. And yet these two conflicting conceptions did exist side by side for several centuries. So long as J<sup>n</sup> was conceived simply as the tribal God of Israel, and as one among other gods, whose sole concern was the moral well-being and prosperity of His people on earth, then Sheol was naturally conceived as beyond the sphere of His dominion, and so preserved its ancient non-moral character. It is not, indeed, till almost the Maccabæan period that the former conception has transformed the latter, and the abode of the shades has become a place of moral retribution.

Another consequence of this enlarged conception of God was an enlarged judgment. Since God was the Creator and Ruler of all men, the idea of a final and world judgment, in which the destinies of all should be decided, naturally arose. It must be conceded, however, that in Judaism this idea was, so far as the Gentiles went, always of the most one-sided and inequitable character. In their case, judgment, as a rule, meant simply condemnation. At best they were spared only to become subject to Israel.

2. The conception of the individual, and his growing claims.—The doctrine of individual retribution was evolved in OT.* It is the direct antithesis of the earlier view of the solidarity of the family, tribe, or nation. The latter doctrine, which identified the responsibilities of the individual with his family or nation, naturally led to strange consequences. Ezekiel (esp. in ch. 18) was the first to attack this doctrine in its entirety, and to replace it by an equally exaggerated and false individualism. As the consequences of sin were still confined to this life, the difficulties of this conception soon came to light. According to it every misfortune is a divine punishment, and every piece of prosperity a special instance of God's favour. The anomalies arising from such a view are discussed in Job and Ecclesiastes, and its untenableness demonstrated no less certainly than that of the doctrine it was intended to supersede. As long as the consequences of man's action were regarded as limited to this life, these antinomies were incapable of solution, and God's dealings with His righteous servants incapable of justification. But notwithstanding the bankruptcy of both these theories, or rather in consequence of it, the faith and religious thought of Israel were set free to attempt a truer and profounder solution of the problem. On the one hand, the faithful servant of J<sup>n</sup> in due time came to be assured that neither here nor hereafter could he be separated from the love and presence of God; and that for him the ancient Sheol would stretch out its arms in vain. On the other, the religious thinker of Israel was equally assured that since God's righteousness did not attain to its full consequence here, it must do so elsewhere; and thus the doctrine of retribution was carried into the after-life, and a personal blessed existence, whether of limited or endless duration, whether as a member of the Messianic kingdom or a direct participant in a blessed immortality, became a postulate of religious thought. In due course the moralization of the old conception of Sheol was effected, not indeed in OT times, but in the subsequent centuries, as we find in Apocalyptic literature.

3. The growing transcendence of the Messianic conceptions.—In OT the hopes of Israel were in the main confined to this world and to the well-being of the nation. Thus they looked for the destruction of their national foes, for the purification of their people, and the establishment of an earthly kingdom of limited or endless duration. The scene of this kingdom was to be the earth purged from all violence and sin. But in the later period the gulf between the present and future begins to widen, and this process goes on till the last resemblances vanish, and the present appears a moral chaos under the rule of Satan and his angels, and the future is conceived as an unending kingdom of blessedness under the immediate sway of God or the Messiah.

III. THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF JEWISH ESCHATOLOGY.—(A) 2nd cent. B.C.

Sirach.—The eschatology of this book belongs to the OT. Hades is the place of the shades and the region of death (9<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>12</sup> 16 21<sup>10</sup> 41<sup>4</sup> 48<sup>5</sup>). There is no delight there (14<sup>16</sup>), no praise of God (17<sup>27-28</sup>), man is plunged in an eternal sleep (46<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>11</sup> 30<sup>17</sup> 38<sup>23</sup>). Retribution does not follow a man into the after-life (41<sup>4</sup>), but his sins are visited upon him in remembrance of his name, and in the after-life of his children after him (11<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>24-25</sup> 40<sup>15</sup> 41<sup>5-8</sup>). As regards the future of the nation, the writer looks forward to the Messianic kingdom of which Elijah is to be the forerunner (48<sup>10</sup>), when Israel will be delivered from evil (50<sup>23-24</sup>), the scattered tribes restored (33<sup>13a</sup>, AV 36<sup>11</sup>), the heathen nations duly punished (32<sup>22-24</sup>, AV 35<sup>18-19</sup>). He expects also the eternal duration of Israel (37<sup>25</sup>), and likewise of David's line (47<sup>11</sup>).

Ethiopic Enoch* 1-36.—This represents the earliest, and most primitive, view of the 'last things' in the literature of the 2nd cent. B.C. According to this writer, retribution inevitably dogs the heels of sin. Thus punishment has already befallen sinful angels and men (10<sup>4-10-12</sup>) in the first world-judgment (10<sup>3-5</sup>). But the final judgment is yet to come. Meanwhile all who die enter one of the four divisions of Sheol, where they have a foretaste of their ultimate bliss or woe (22). In due course the final judgment comes, ushered in by the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked (with the exception of one class of the latter, 22<sup>12-13</sup>). The resurrection seems to be limited to Israel and its progenitors. The fallen angels, demons, and men then receive their final award (10<sup>12</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 19). The former are plunged into a bliss of fire—Tartarus (10<sup>18</sup> 14), while the wicked are cast into Gehenna, and their punishment is described for the first time (27<sup>2-4</sup>). Then the eternal Messianic kingdom is established, with Jerusalem and Palestine for its centre (25<sup>5</sup>). God makes His abode with man (25<sup>5</sup>)—there is no Messiah. All the Gentiles become righteous and worship God (16<sup>23</sup>). The righteous eat of the tree of life, and enjoy patriarchal lives (5<sup>9</sup> 25<sup>6</sup>) and every material blessing (5<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>15-16</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>), begetting each 1000 children (10<sup>17</sup>). There is no hint as to what becomes of the righteous after the second death.

Observe that (1) justice is done to the claims of the righteous nation by the establishment of an eternal Messianic kingdom; (2) and likewise to those of the righteous individual by his resurrection to a long life in this kingdom; also (3) that Sheol has undergone transformation, and become an intermediate place of moral retribution for the righteous and the wicked for the first time in literature; (4) Gehenna appears as the final place of punishment for apostate Jews, and Tartarus for the fallen angels; and (5) that the final judgment precedes the Messianic kingdom, and is limited to Israel.

* Cf. Gn 12<sup>23-24</sup>, Ex 32<sup>33</sup>, Nu 16<sup>22</sup>, Dt 7<sup>10</sup> 24<sup>16</sup> etc.

* For some treatment of the critical and exegetical questions of this work, the readers should consult the article on this book.

Daniel.—The eschatology of this book in some respects marks an advance on that of the writer just quoted. When the need of the 'saints of the Most High' is greatest (7<sup>21-22</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>, in the persecution under Antiochus), the Ancient of Days will intervene, and His throne of judgment will be set up (7<sup>9</sup>), and the kingdoms of the world will be overthrown (7<sup>11-12</sup>), and supreme and everlasting dominion given to His saints (7<sup>14-22</sup> 27); and these will 'break in pieces and consume' (2<sup>4</sup>) all the kingdoms of the world, and all 'peoples, nations, and languages shall serve' them (7<sup>14</sup>); their 'dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away' (7<sup>14</sup>). And the righteous who 'sleep in a land of dust' shall awake, 'to share in the eternal life and blessedness of this kingdom (12<sup>1-3</sup>).

Observe that (1) the Messianic kingdom is no Messiah—is established not only through the personal intervention of God, but also through the active efforts of His saints. The latter feature reappears frequently in the later Apocalypses as the 'period of the sword.' (2) The resurrection is a resurrection of the body, and embraces all Israel. (3) The scene of the kingdom is the earth; for 'all peoples, nations, and languages' are its subjects (7<sup>14</sup>). (4) The context does not decide whether the risen body will possess its natural appetites, as in Eth. En. 1-36, but seems to favour this idea. (5) 'Eternal life' (12<sup>2</sup>), or rather 'æonian life' (12<sup>3</sup>), is nothing more than a very long life, as in Eth. En. 1-36. (6) Nothing is said as to the future abode of the Gentiles.

Ethiopic Enoch 83-90 (B.C. 166-161).—The writer of this book has advanced considerably beyond the naive and sensuous views presented in Eth. En. 1-36. His views are more spiritual, and closely allied to the Daniel Apocalypse, which was written a few years earlier. His eschatology is developed at greater length than that of Daniel. Like Daniel, he regards every people under heaven as being under the control of a guardian angel. But this view is peculiarly applied in this author. The undue severities that have befallen Israel are not from God's hand, but are the doing of the 70 shepherds (i.e. angels) into whose care God had committed Israel (89<sup>5</sup>). But these angels have not wronged Israel with impunity; for judgment is at hand. When their oppression is sore, a righteous league will be formed (i.e. the Hasidim, 90<sup>6</sup>), and in it there will be a family from which will come forth Judas the Maccabee (90<sup>3-16</sup>), who will war victoriously against all the enemies of Israel. While the struggle is still raging, God will appear in person, and the earth will swallow the adversaries of the righteous (90<sup>18</sup>). The wicked shepherds and the fallen watchers will then be cast into an abyss of fire (i.e. Tartarus, 90<sup>20-22</sup>), and the apostates into Gehenna (90<sup>23</sup>). Then God Himself will set up the New Jerusalem (90<sup>23-29</sup>), and the surviving Gentiles will be converted and serve Israel (90<sup>30</sup>), and the dispersion will be brought back, and the righteous Israelites will be raised to take part in the kingdom (90<sup>33</sup>). When all is accomplished, the Messiah will appear (90<sup>37</sup>), and all will be transformed into his likeness.

Observe (1) the growing consciousness of the evils and imperfections of the present world. Thus even Israel for a time is ruled by wicked angels. This dualism manifests itself also in the picture of the future kingdom. Then its centre is not the earthly Jerusalem, but the New Jerusalem, brought down from heaven obviously on the ground of the unfitness of the former. Yet the writers of Eth. En. 1-36 and Daniel were not conscious of this unfitness. (2) As against the two preceding books, Eth. En. 1-36 and Daniel, this book teaches the resurrection of the righteous only. (3) We have here the earliest reference to the Messiah in Apocalyptic literature. But he has no real part to play in the kingdom, and his introduction seems due merely to literary reminiscence.

Ethiopic Enoch 91-104 (B.C. 134-94).—As we pass from the views of the three preceding books to those of the present, we feel conscious we are entering into a world of new views. In the former books the resurrection and the final judgment were the prelude to an everlasting Messianic kingdom, but in this these great events are relegated to its close. The author acknowledges that the wicked are seemingly sinning with impunity; but this is not so: their evil deeds are recorded every day (104<sup>7</sup>), and for these they will suffer endless retribution in Sheol (99<sup>11</sup>); and from this hell of darkness and of flame, into which their souls enter on death, they will never be raised (104<sup>7-8</sup>). In the eighth week, moreover, the kingdom will be set up, and the righteous will slay the wicked with the sword (91<sup>12</sup> 95<sup>7</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> etc.). At the close of this kingdom in the tenth week the final judgment will be held, and the former heaven and earth will be destroyed, and a new heaven created (91<sup>14-18</sup>). Then the righteous dead, who have hitherto been guarded by angels (100<sup>5</sup>), will be raised (91<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>3</sup>), but not in the body, but as spirits only (103<sup>3-4</sup>), and they shall joy as the angels (104<sup>4</sup>), and become companions of the heavenly hosts (104<sup>5</sup>), and shine as the stars for ever (104<sup>2</sup>).

Observe that (1) the dualism we have noticed above has already led to its logical results. (2) Thus the Messianic kingdom is apparently for the first time in literature conceived of as temporary. (3) Sheol has for the first time become the equivalent of hell (yet see Eth. En. 22<sup>15</sup>). (4) The resurrection is for the first time regarded as of the spirit only. (5) Even the heavens need to be created anew.

Tobit.—The eschatology of this book, like that of Sirach, belongs to the OT. The same view of the after-life prevails (4<sup>10</sup>). It entertains, like the OT, high hopes for the nation. Thus Jerusalem and the temple will be rebuilt with gold and precious stones, the scattered tribes restored, and the heathen, who worship their idols, will worship the God of Israel (14<sup>4-6</sup>).

Sibylline Oracles, Procemium and 397-613.—This book contains many details concerning the last times; but as it belongs to Hellenistic Judaism, it is only of secondary interest in this study of Jewish Palestinian eschatology. It contains, however, a vivid account of the Messianic kingdom. Very soon the people of the Mighty God will grow strong (314-195), and God will send the Messiah from the East, who will put an end to evil war, slaying some and fulfilling the promises in behalf of others, and he will be guided in all things by God. And the temple will be resplendent with glory, and the earth teem with fruitfulness (352-653). Then the nations will muster their forces and attack Palestine (360-688); but God will destroy them, and their judgment will be accompanied by fearful portents (367-697). But Israel will dwell safely under the divine protection (371-731). The rest of the cities and the islands will be converted, and unite with Israel in praising God (371-731). The blessings of the Messianic age are recounted (374-754; cf. also 387-389, 619-623). And the kings of the earth will be at peace with one another (375-759).

* This is the natural translation of מִשְׁכָּל־הַמָּוֶת. For Sheol in this sense compare Job 17<sup>18</sup>. Sheol here seems to preserve its OT sense as a place of semi-conscious existence where moral retribution is unknown. Only by waking from this condition can man enter on the retribution that is his due.

And God will establish a universal kingdom over all mankind, with Jerusalem as centre (37<sup>67-71</sup>), and the prophets of God will lay down the sword and become judges and kings of the earth (37<sup>81-782</sup>), and men will bring offerings to the temple from all parts of the earth (37<sup>72-773</sup>).

Testaments of the XII Patriarchs.—Until a critical edition of this composite work is published, it is dangerous to quote it as an authority. While it contains many sections that appear to be as early as B.C. 140, the body of the work seems to have been written about the beginning of the Christian era. There are, moreover, numerous Christian interpolations. Till a critical edition of the text and contents is published, it is best not to cite it as evidence on the present subject. Its evidence, though valuable, is in no respect extraordinary, or unvouched for elsewhere.

Judith.—The eschatological theme of the heathen (16<sup>17</sup>).

(B) 1st cent. B.C.

Ethiopic Enoch 37-70 (B.C. 94-64).—These chapters form the well-known 'Similitudes,' the most important element in the Book of Enoch. The writer's eschatological views are as follows:—In the latter days, sinners will flourish in the world; sinners will deny the name of the Lord of Spirits (38<sup>2</sup> 41<sup>2</sup>) and of His Anointed (48<sup>10</sup>); and the kings and the mighty will oppress the elect of the children of God (82<sup>14</sup>). But suddenly the Head of Days will appear, and with Him the Son of Man (46<sup>2</sup> 3 4 48<sup>2</sup>), to execute universal judgment. And all Israel will be raised from the dead (51<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup>), and all judgment will be committed to the Son of Man (41<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>2</sup>), who will possess universal dominion (62<sup>8</sup>) and sit on the throne of God (47<sup>3</sup> 51<sup>3</sup>). And he will judge all the angels, unfallen and fallen (61<sup>8</sup> 55<sup>4</sup>), and the righteous and the sinners amongst men (62<sup>2</sup> 3), and the kings and the mighty (62<sup>2-11</sup> 63<sup>1-4</sup> 11). And the fallen angels will be cast into a fiery furnace (54<sup>4</sup>), and the kings and the mighty will be tortured in Gehenna by the angels of punishment (53<sup>3-5</sup> 54<sup>1-2</sup>), and the remaining sinners and godless will be driven from off the face of the earth (38<sup>2</sup> 41<sup>2</sup> 45<sup>6</sup>); the Son of Man will slay them by the word of his mouth (62<sup>2</sup>). And heaven and earth will be transformed (45<sup>4</sup> 5), and the righteous will have their mansions therein (39<sup>6</sup> 41<sup>2</sup>). And the Elect One will dwell amongst them (45<sup>4</sup>). And they will be clad in garments of life (62<sup>15</sup> 16), and become angels in heaven (51<sup>4</sup>), and grow in knowledge and righteousness (58<sup>3</sup>).

Observe that (1) the Messianic kingdom is here of everlasting duration, but its scene is no longer the present earth, as in the literature of the preceding century, but a transformed heaven and earth. Thus in the process of evolution Messianic thought has become more transcendent. (2) The Messiah for the first time in Jewish literature is represented as a supernatural being and as the Judge of men and angels. (3) The hopes of a Messiah, which in the 2nd cent. B.C. were practically dead, have, owing partly to the circumstances of the time, risen to a new and vigorous life. See the review of the Pss. of Solomon, below. (4) Several Messianic titles appear in this book for the first time in literature: 'Christ' (48<sup>10</sup> 52<sup>4</sup>), 'the Righteous One' (38<sup>2</sup> 53<sup>6</sup>), 'the Elect One' (40<sup>5</sup> 45<sup>3</sup> 4), 'the Son of Man' (46<sup>2</sup> 3 4 48<sup>2</sup> etc.). (5) All questions affecting the future destinies of the Gentiles are ignored, if we regard 50 as an interpolation; but if it belongs to the context, the writer teaches that when the kings and the mighty and the sinners are destroyed, the remaining Gentiles will be saved if they repent and forsake their idols. God will have mercy on them, but give them no honour or glory.

1 Maccabees.—This book is entirely wanting in eschatological teaching, if we except the writer's expectation of a prophet in 4<sup>46</sup> 14<sup>41</sup>.

Psalms of Solomon (B.C. 70-40).—Like the Similitudes, this book is of Pharisaic authorship. They proclaim in common a vigorous Messianic hope, but on very divergent lines. In the preceding century this hope was practically non-existent. So long as Judas and Simon were chiefs of the nation, the need of a Messiah was hardly felt. But in the first half of the next century it was very different. Subject to ruthless oppression, the righteous were in sore need of help. As their princes were the leaders in this oppression, they were forced to look for divine aid. Thus the bold and original thinker to whom we owe the Similitudes conceived the Messiah as the supernatural Son of Man, who should enjoy universal dominion and execute judgment.

study of O.L., revived, as in the Psalms of Solomon, the Messiah, sprung from David (17<sup>23</sup>). As the hopes of the Messiah, sprung from David (17<sup>23</sup>), and in all the Pss. that precede there is not even the remotest hint of such a hope, it is reasonable to infer a difference of authorship. There is, however, for the same inference, but we cannot draw it from them here. In recounting, therefore, the eschatology of Ps.-Sol., we shall first deal with Pss 17. 18.

Pss 17. 18. The Messiah—specifically so called in 17<sup>30</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>—is to spring from the lineage of David (17<sup>23</sup>), to be a righteous king (17<sup>30</sup>), pure from sin (17<sup>31</sup>). He will gather the dispersed tribes together (17<sup>28</sup> 30), and purify them (17<sup>28</sup> 30), and will suffer no Gentile to sojourn amongst them (17<sup>31</sup>), nor any that lodge in their midst, nor any that know their secret (17<sup>29</sup> 30); and all the people will be holy (17<sup>30</sup>), even sons of God (17<sup>30</sup>). But as for the ungodly nations, he will destroy them with the word of his mouth (17<sup>37</sup>, cf. 17<sup>38</sup>), for his weapons will not be carnal; nor will he trust in horse or rider or bow, or in silver or gold (17<sup>37</sup>), but he will overthrow sinners by the might of his word (17<sup>42</sup>). And the remaining Gentiles will become subject to him (17<sup>31</sup> 32); and he will have mercy on all the nations that come before him in fear (17<sup>38</sup>), and they will come from the ends of the world to see his glory (17<sup>39</sup>), and bring her sons as gifts to Zion (17<sup>44</sup>). And the Messiah will not faint all his days (17<sup>42</sup>).

Observe that (1) the Messiah is, however highly endowed, a man and nothing more. (2) It follows that his kingdom can only be of temporary duration. (3) It falls in with both these observations, that there is not a hint of the righteous rising from the dead to share in it. This conclusion is confirmed by the beatitude of 17<sup>30</sup>, 'Blessed are they that shall be born in those days to behold the blessing of Israel which God shall bring to pass in the gathering together of the tribes.' Thus only the surviving righteous share in this temporary earthly kingdom. (4) The Gentiles are still mercifully treated. Such as have not been hostile to Israel will become subject.

Pss 1-16. The bulk of these Pss are silent as to the future. They are all silent as to the Messiah. On the other hand, they paint in glowing colours the restoration of the tribes (8<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>2-3</sup>). A Messianic kingdom was therefore probably expected—at all events a period of prosperity, when God's help is promised (7<sup>9</sup>). But beyond prophesying vengeance on the hostile nations and the sinners, the psalmists do not dwell on this period. The real recompense of the righteous is not, in their thoughts, bound up with this earthly kingdom. The righteous rise not to any kingdom of temporal prosperity, but to eternal life (3<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>), they inherit life in gladness (14<sup>7</sup>), and live in the righteousness of their God (15<sup>15</sup>). There seems to be no resurrection of the body. As for the wicked, on the other hand, 'their inheritance is Hades (here=hell) and darkness and destruction' (14<sup>6</sup>), destruction and darkness (15<sup>11</sup>), and into their heritage in Hades they enter immediately on dying (16<sup>2</sup>), and their iniquities pursue them thither (15<sup>11</sup>). Thus the eschatology of Pss 1-16 agrees in nearly every point with that of Eth. En. 91-104, and so calls for no further comment here.

2 Maccabees.—There is no direct reference to a Messianic kingdom in this book, though it might be possible to reason back to it from the expectation of the restoration of the tribes (2<sup>18</sup>). There is certainly no hint of a Messiah. On the other hand, however, the doctrine of retribution, present and future, plays a rôle. Present retribution follows sin. In the case of Israel and of the Gentiles, but in the case of Israel it is punitive, whereas in that of the Gentiles it is vindictive (6<sup>13-15</sup>). Though God punish His people, He does not withdraw His mercy from them (6<sup>13-16</sup> 14<sup>16</sup>). In order to show the certainty of retribution in this life, the writer rewrites history, and makes individual sinners suffer the penalties which he thinks, in strict justice, they ought to have suffered: thus compare the final earthly destinies of the heathen (7<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>) and Nicanor (10<sup>13</sup>); and of the Pharisees, Jews, Jason (5<sup>7-10</sup>), and Menelaus (13<sup>9</sup>). Even the martyrs confess their sufferings to be due to sin (7<sup>18</sup> 32<sup>33</sup>). Immediate retribution is a token of God's goodness (6<sup>13</sup>). But our present concern is mainly with retribution beyond the grave. The righteous and the wicked of Israel enter after death the intermediate state (Hades), where they have a foretaste of their final doom (6<sup>26</sup>), which takes effect after the resurrection. There is to be a resurrection of the righteous (7<sup>11</sup> 14<sup>23</sup> 29<sup>38</sup>), possibly even of all Jews (12<sup>34-44</sup>). The resurrection is to be clearly that of the body (7<sup>11</sup>). Apparently, it is to accompany the final judgment. Of the heathen there will be no resurrection when they die they enter at once on their eternal doom (7<sup>14</sup>). There appears to be no blessed future for any of the Gentiles.

(C) 1st cent. A.D.

Book of Jubilees.—Like many of the books just reviewed, the Book of Jubilees makes no mention of a Messianic king. It sketches, however, in vigorous terms, the woes that are to be the prelude of the Messianic kingdom, the attacks of the heathen powers, and then the gradual introduction of the kingdom effected through devotion to and observance of the law. Thus the Messianic woes are described in 23<sup>18</sup> 29<sup>22</sup> 'Calamity follows on calamity, and wound on wound, and tribulation on tribulation, and evil tidings on evil tidings, and illness on illness, and all evil judgments such as these, one with another, illness and overthrow, and snow and frost and ice, and fever, and chills, and torpor, famine, and death, and sword, and captivity, and all kinds of calamities and pains. 19. And they will strive one with another, the young with the old, and the old with the young, the poor with the rich, and the lowly with the great, and the beggar with the prince, on account of the law and the covenant; for they have forgotten His commandment, and the covenant and the feasts, and the months, and the Sabbaths, and the jubilees, and all judgments. 22. And a great punishment will befall the deeds of this generation from the Lord; and he will give them over to the sword and to judgment and to captivity, and to be plundered and devoured.'

And thereupon will ensue the invasion of Palestine by the Gentiles (23<sup>23</sup> 24). 'And he will wake up against them the sinners of the Gentiles, who will show them no mercy or grace, and who respect the person of none, neither old nor young, nor any one, for they are wicked and powerful, so that they are more wicked than all the children of men. And they will use violence against Israel and transgression against Jacob, and much blood will be shed upon the earth, and there will be none to gather it and none to bury. 24. In those days they will cry aloud, and call and pray that they may be saved from the hand of the sinful Gentiles; but none will be saved.'

Then Israel will repent (23<sup>28</sup>). 'And in those days the children will begin to study the laws, and to seek the commandments, and to return to the path: . . . ' (23<sup>26</sup> 27-30). '16. And in that . . . will convict their fathers and their elders of sin and unrighteousness, and the words of the commandments which they have forsaken, which they perpetrate, and concerning their forsaking the covenant which the Lord made between them and Him, that they should observe and do all His commandments and His ordinances and all His laws, without departing either to the right hand or the left. 27. And the days of the children of men will begin to grow many, and increase from generation to generation and day to day, till their days draw near to one thousand years, and to a greater number of years than (before) were their days. 28. And there will be no old man nor one that is not satisfied with his days, for all will be (as) children and youths. 29. And all their days they will complete in peace and in joy, and they will live, and there will be no Satan nor any evil destroyer; for all their days will be days of blessing and healing. 30. And at that time the Lord will heal His servants, and they will rise up and see great peace and drive out His adversary, and the righteous will see and be thankful, and rejoice with joy for ever and ever, and will see all their judgments and all their curses on their enemies.' Finally, when the . . . their spirits will enter into a blessed . . . (23<sup>31</sup>). 'And their bones will rest in the earth and their spirits will have much joy, and they will know that it is the Lord who executes judgment and shows mercy to hundreds and thousands of all that love Him.'

Observe that (1) apparently there is no resurrection of the dead, and that the soul enters at death on its final destiny. (2) Sheol has thus become hell (24<sup>31</sup>). 'For though he ascend unto heaven, thence will he be brought down; and whithersoever he flee on earth, thence will he be dragged forth; and though he hide himself among the nations, even from thence will he be brought out; and though he descend into Sheol, there also shall his condemnation be great, and there also he will have no peace.'

Assumption of Moses (A.D. 7-29).—This book is closely allied to that of Jubilees in many respects. Thus the preparation for the advent of the Theocratic or Messianic kingdom will be a period of repentance (1<sup>18</sup>). 1750 years after the death of Moses, God will intervene on behalf of Israel (10<sup>12</sup>), and the ten tribes will be brought back from the captivity.* During this kingdom Israel will destroy her natural enemies (10<sup>6</sup>), and finally be exalted to heaven (10<sup>9</sup>), whence she shall see her enemies in Gehenna (10<sup>10</sup>).

Observe that (1) there is no Messiah. Indeed the author in 10 appears to be really inimical to this expectation: 'The eternal God alone . . . will punish the Gentiles.' (2) There appears to be no resurrection of the body, but of the spirit only after the final judgment, similarly as in Eth. En. 91-104, Pss of Solomon, and Jubilees. (3) Gehenna, which originally was the specific place of punishment for apostate Jews, has now become the final abode of the wicked generally.

* See Charles' Assumption of Moses, pp. 59, 60.

Philo (B.C. 25–A.D. 50).—We shall touch only on the main points of Philonic eschatology. Philo looked forward to the return of the tribes from captivity, to the establishment of a Messianic kingdom of temporal peace, and even to a Messiah. The loci on this subject are De Excerptat. § 8–9, and De Præm. et Pæn. § 15–20. The inclusion of the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom in Philo's eschatology, though really foreign to his teaching, is due as to the prevalence of Hellenistic Judaism. Apparently, he did not look forward to a general and final judgment. All entered after death into their final abode. The punishment of the wicked was for everlasting (De Cherub. § 1); even wicked Jews were committed to Tartarus (De Excerptat. § 6). As matter was incurably evil, there could of course be no resurrection of the body. Our present life in the body is death (De Leg. Alleg. § 1).

Slavonic Enoch* (A.D. 1–50).—As the earth was created in six days, its history, according to this book, will be accomplished in 6000 years; and as the six days of creation were followed by one of rest, so the 6000 years of the world's history will be followed by a rest of 1000 years—the millennium or Messianic kingdom. Then time will pass into eternity (32<sup>2</sup>–33<sup>2</sup>). In this Messianic kingdom there is no Messiah. At the close of this kingdom the final judgment is held, variously called 'the day of judgment' (39<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>3</sup>), 'the great day of the Lord' (18<sup>3</sup>), 'the great judgment' (52<sup>3</sup> 58<sup>3</sup> 65<sup>3</sup> 66<sup>7</sup>), 'the day of the great judgment' (50<sup>4</sup>), 'the eternal judgment' (71<sup>1</sup>), 'the great judgment' (60<sup>4</sup>), 'the terrible judgment' (48<sup>1</sup>), 'the immeasurable judgment' (46<sup>1</sup>). But prior to the final judgment the souls of the departed are in intermediate places. Thus the rebellious angels are confined to the second heaven, awaiting in torment the eternal judgment (71<sup>3</sup>). The fallen angels are kept in duration under the earth, being hurled down from heaven, has the air as his habitation (29<sup>4</sup>–5). There is no definite account of the intermediate place for men's souls. The writer declares, however, that places have been prepared for every human soul (49<sup>2</sup> 58<sup>3</sup>). From the latter context these appear to constitute the intermediate place for human souls. In 32<sup>1</sup> Adam is sent back to this receptacle of souls on his death, and is transferred from it to paradise in the third heaven after the great judgment (42<sup>5</sup>). Even the souls of beasts are preserved till the final judgment, in order to testify against the ill-usage of man (58<sup>3</sup>–8). On the conclusion of the final judgment the righteous enter paradise as their final abode (8. 9. 42<sup>3</sup> 61<sup>3</sup>). The wicked are cast into hell in the third heaven, where their torment will be for everlasting (10. 40<sup>3</sup> 41<sup>2</sup> 42<sup>1</sup>–2 61<sup>3</sup>). There is apparently no resurrection of the are clothed with the garments of glory, cf. Eth. En. 62<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>–4. The seventh heaven is the final abode of Enoch (55<sup>2</sup> 67<sup>2</sup>), but this is an exceptional privilege.

Observe that (1) we have here the first mention of the millennium. (2) There is no resurrection of the body; but at the final judgment the souls of the departed which have in the interval been in the intermediate place, are now clothed with God's glory and admitted to paradise.

Book of Wisdom.—In this Alexandrian work there is no Messiah, but there is an expectation of the Messianic or Theocratic kingdom, where the righteous will judge the nations and have dominion (37<sup>8</sup>). There will be no resurrection of the body; for the soul is the proper self: the body is a mere burden taken up by the pre-existent soul, but in due season laid down again. Accordingly, there is only an immortality of the soul. The immortality of the righteous soul and its future blessedness are set forth in terms remarkable at once for their beauty and vigour (31<sup>4</sup> 42<sup>2</sup> 7. 10 15<sup>3</sup>). As for the wicked, they will be punished with death (12<sup>1</sup> 18. 22<sup>4</sup>); they will be bereft of hope (31<sup>1</sup> 18. 51<sup>4</sup>); the time for repentance is past (5<sup>3</sup>); they will be utterly destroyed (4<sup>3</sup>), yet not annihilated; for they will be subject to pain (4<sup>3</sup>); and be aware of the blessedness of the righteous (51<sup>3</sup>–2).

Observe that the righteous in Israel are to judge the nations. This seems to be a later development of the idea of the sword frequently mentioned in Isaiah (cf. Dn 2<sup>44</sup>; Eth. En. 91<sup>12</sup> etc.). The judgment of the saints has become a forensic one, as that of the Messiah (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>).

4 Maccabees.—This book is a philosophical treatise on the supremacy of the reason. The writer adopts, so far as possible, the tenets of Stoicism. He teaches the eternal existence of all souls, good and bad, but no resurrection of the body: the good will enjoy eternal blessedness in heaven (9<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>); but the wicked will be tormented in fire for ever (9<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>).

Apocalypse of Baruch* (A.D. 50–80).—Of this composite work the six or more independent constituents may be ranged in three classes when treated from the standpoint of their eschatology. Thus the Messiah Apocalypses A<sup>1</sup> A<sup>2</sup> A<sup>3</sup>, i.e. 27–30<sup>1</sup> 36–40 53–74, form the first class. i. This differs from the remaining part of the book in being written prior to A.D. 70 and in teaching the doctrine of a personal Messiah. The rôle of the Messiah in A<sup>1</sup> is entirely a passive one, whereas in A<sup>2</sup> and A<sup>3</sup> he is a warrior who slays the enemies of Israel with his own hand. In all three Apocalypses the Messiah's reign is of temporary duration. In A<sup>1</sup> he will stand for ever until the world of corruption is at an end (40<sup>3</sup>); in A<sup>2</sup> his reign is described as 'the consummation of that which is corruptible, and the beginning of that which is incorruptible' (74<sup>2</sup>). In A<sup>2</sup> and A<sup>3</sup> the kingdom is inaugurated with the judgment of the sword (39<sup>1</sup>–40<sup>1</sup> 72<sup>1</sup>). The Gentiles that had ruled or oppressed Israel should be destroyed, but those that had not done so should be spared, in order to be subject to Israel (72<sup>3</sup>–6). The final judgment and the resurrection follow on the close of these kingdoms. Of the two remaining classes, the second consists of B<sup>1</sup>, and the third of B<sup>2</sup> and B<sup>3</sup>, written after A.D. 70.

ii. In B<sup>1</sup>, i.e. 1–9<sup>1</sup> 43–44<sup>7</sup> 45–46<sup>5</sup> 77–82. 84. 86–87, the writer looks forward to the rebuilding of Jerusalem (6<sup>3</sup>), the restoration of the exiles (77<sup>1</sup> 78<sup>7</sup>), the Messianic kingdom, but no Messiah (1<sup>5</sup> 46<sup>5</sup> 77<sup>12</sup>). There is no consideration shown for the Gentiles (82<sup>2</sup>–7).

iii. In B<sup>2</sup>, i.e. 13–25. 30<sup>2</sup>–35. 41–42. 44<sup>3</sup>–15 47–52. 75–76. 83, the writer has relinquished all hope as to the present corruptible world, and fixes his regards wholly on the incorruptible world that is to be. The world will be renewed (32<sup>2</sup>), and in this renewal, from being transitory and verging to its close (48<sup>30</sup> 85<sup>10</sup>), it will become undying (51<sup>3</sup>) and everlasting (48<sup>30</sup>); from being a world of darkness (40<sup>3</sup> 74<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>15</sup> etc.), it will become a world of light (74<sup>2</sup> 51<sup>3</sup>). The teaching as to the resurrection proceeds on parallel lines. Thus in answer to the question, 'Wilt thou perchance change these things (i.e. man's material body) which have been in the world, as also the world?' (49<sup>3</sup>), it is shown in 50 that the dead will be raised with their bodies, exactly in the same form in which they had been committed to the earth, with a view to their recognition by those who knew them. When this is completed, the bodies of the righteous will be transformed, with a view to a spiritual existence of unending duration and glory (51<sup>1-3, 7-9</sup>); and they will be made like unto the angels and equal to the stars, and changed from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory (51<sup>10</sup>). They will surpass the angels in excellency (51<sup>12</sup>). In B<sup>3</sup>, i.e. 85, there is the same despair of a national restoration as in B<sup>2</sup>, and only spiritual blessedness is looked for in the world of incorruption (85<sup>4, 5</sup>).

* For further details see Morfill and Charles' editio princeps of this book; also the art. Enoch (Bk. of Secrets of).

* For a fuller treatment of the questions touched upon here see Charles' Apocalypse of Baruch.

Observe that (1) in B<sup>2</sup> Sheol is the intermediate abode of the souls of the departed prior to the final judgment (23<sup>5</sup> 48<sup>16</sup> 52<sup>2</sup>, cf. 56<sup>9</sup>). This intermediate place is one involving certain degrees of happiness or torment. For the wicked it is an abode of pain (30<sup>5</sup> 36<sup>11</sup>), but not to be compared with their torments after the final judgment. As for the righteous, these are preserved in certain 'chambers' or 'treasuries' which are in Sheol (4 Ezr 4<sup>4</sup>), where they enjoy rest and peace and are guarded by angels (Eth. En. 100<sup>7</sup>, 4 Ezr 7<sup>55</sup>). From thence they issue forth at the final judgment to receive their everlasting reward (30<sup>1</sup>). (2) From the account of the resurrection in 49<sup>3</sup>-51, it is clear that the Pauline teaching in 1 Co 15<sup>35-50</sup> is in some respects a developed and more spiritual expression of ideas already current in Judaism.

Book of Baruch.—In this composite work there is little that demands our attention. 1-3<sup>8</sup> is undoubtedly derived from a Hebrew original, and possibly part of 3<sup>9</sup>-5. It is composed of at least three independent writings. As to their dates, nothing satisfactory has been yet arrived at. It is noteworthy that in 2<sup>17</sup> Hades still possesses its OT connotation. The restoration of Jerusalem is looked for (4<sup>19-35</sup>) and the return of the exiles (4<sup>38-5</sup>).

4 Ezra.—We shall adopt provisionally some of the critical results attained by Kabisch on this book. Of the five independent writings which he discovers in it, two were written prior to A.D. 70, and three subsequently. The two former he dates respectively as an Ezra Apocalypse and a Vision. (a) The Ezra Apocalypse consists of chapters 4<sup>32</sup>-5<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>-11<sup>1</sup>, and is largely eschatological. The signs of the last times are recounted at great length (5<sup>1-12</sup> 6<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>1-8, 6</sup>), the destruction of Rome (5<sup>8</sup>), and the advent of the Messiah, the Son of God (5<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>). Certain saints will accompany the Messiah (7<sup>28</sup>), and all the faithful who have survived the troubles that preceded the kingdom will rejoice together with the Messiah for 400 years.* Then the Messiah and all men will die (7<sup>29</sup>), and in the course of seven days the world will return into its primeval silence, even as in seven days it was created (7<sup>30</sup>). Then the next world will awake and the corruptible will perish (7<sup>31</sup>), and all mankind will be raised from the dead (7<sup>32</sup>) and appear at the last judgment (7<sup>33</sup>). Then Paradise (=final abode of the righteous) and Gehenna will be revealed. And the judgment will last seven years (7<sup>43</sup>).

Observe that besides the general resurrection in 7<sup>31, 32</sup> there seems to be a preliminary resurrection of some special saints to the Messianic kingdom in 7<sup>28</sup>, but this is doubtful.

(b) A Son-of-Man Vision.—This writing consists of chapter 13, and was probably composed before A.D. 70. Many signs will precede the advent of the Messiah (13<sup>32</sup>), who will appear in the clouds of heaven (13<sup>33, 32</sup>); and the nations will assemble from the four winds of heaven to attack him (13<sup>35, 34</sup>), but the Messiah will destroy them, not with spear or weapon of war (13<sup>39, 38</sup>), but 'by the law, which is like fire' (13<sup>38, 39</sup>). And he will restore the ten tribes (13<sup>40, 47</sup>), and preserve the residue of God's people that are in Palestine (13<sup>48</sup>).

We shall now set forth the eschatological expectations which appear in the remaining three constituents of this work, which were composed between A.D. 70 and 100. The Vision, i.e. 10<sup>60</sup>-12<sup>35</sup>. Here the coming of the Messiah is predicted, through the house of David who will judge its people and destroy them (12<sup>38</sup>). He will save the residue of God's people in Palestine, and he will fill them with joy to the end, even the day of judgment (12<sup>34</sup>). (d) A Son-of-Man Vision. The Messiah is to be born till the times are ended (14<sup>9</sup>). These times are twelve. Of these, ten and a half have already elapsed (14<sup>11</sup>). There seems to be no Messianic kingdom.

(e) The Vision of Salathiel, i.e. 3<sup>1-31</sup> 4<sup>1-51</sup> 5<sup>13</sup>-6<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>40-43</sup> 14<sup>28-33</sup>. The world is nearly at an end (4<sup>44-50</sup>). As it was created, so it will be judged by God alone (5<sup>58</sup> 6<sup>6</sup>). Very few will be saved (7<sup>47-51</sup> 8<sup>2, 3</sup>). Judgment and all things relating to it were prepared before the creation of the world and of man (7<sup>70</sup>). The day of judgment will arrive when the number of the righteous is completed (4<sup>38</sup>); for the sins of earth will not retard it (4<sup>39-42</sup>). In the meantime retribution sets in immediately after death (7<sup>69, 75, 80, 85, 85</sup> 14<sup>38</sup>). On dying, the souls of the righteous will be allowed seven days to see what will befall them (7<sup>100, 101</sup>); they will be guarded by angels in the 'chambers' (7<sup>75, 85, 85, 121</sup>). They will have the joy of rest in seven ways (7<sup>91-98</sup>). These chambers form their intermediate abode: after the final judgment glory and life await them (7<sup>95, 97</sup>). But the souls of the wicked will not enter into the 'chambers,' but roam to and fro in torment in seven ways (7<sup>80-87, 93</sup>). After the final judgment they will be tormented more (7<sup>84</sup>). Intercession, though permissible, will not be allowed on the day of judgment (7<sup>102-105</sup>). All things will then be finally determined (7<sup>113-115</sup>). With the final judgment this world closes and the next begins. There will be a new creation (7<sup>73</sup>). With its establishment the righteous enter on their final reward. They shall be bright as stars (7<sup>97</sup>); and, beyond them (7<sup>123</sup>), they shall shine as the sun and be immortal (7<sup>97</sup>). Paradise will be their final abode (7<sup>1-3</sup>).

Josephus (A.D. 37-101).—Josephus' interpretation of Messianic prophecy as pointing to Vespasian (BJ vi. v. 4) must be set down to the exigencies of his position with regard to the Romans. For it is clear from Ant. iv. vi. 5 that he looked forward to a Messianic era. As the troubles predicted by Daniel had befallen Israel, so likewise would the prosperity (Ant. x. xi. 7). Apparently, he believed in an intermediate state for the righteous. Thus in Ant. xviii. i. 3 it is said that 'souls have an abode under the earth (ὑπὸ τῆς γῆς) 14 καὶ ἔδου there will be rewards and punishments, accordingly as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but the former will have power to revive and live again.' Here the wicked enter at once into everlasting punishment. Sheol is here hell. But the righteous rise from the intermediate place of happiness and enter into other bodies, probably spiritual bodies (BJ ii. viii. 14). Such was the Platonist doctrine according to Josephus. The Egyptians believed that a blessed immortality awaited the souls of the righteous (BJ ii. viii. 11), but that those of the wicked were destined to a dark, cold region, full of undying torment.

* This number has been fixed as follows. According to Gn 15<sup>13</sup> Israel was to dwell in Egypt 400 years. Now in Ps 90 the writer prays: 'Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil.' From the combination of these two passages it was inferred that the Messianic kingdom would last 400 years, as a set off against the period of oppression in Egypt.

The above account of Pharisaic belief which we derive from Josephus may be regarded as fairly trustworthy; but that which he gives in BJ III. viii. 5 is misleading in a high degree. There he describes the soul as a 'particle of Divinity' (θεοῦ μοῖρα) which has taken up its abode in a mortal body. After death the souls of the righteous 'receive as their lot the most holy place in heaven, from whence, in the revolution of ages, they are again sent into pure bodies.' For the souls of suicides the darkest place in Hades is reserved.

IV. SYSTEMATIC EXPOSITION OF JEWISH ESCHATOLOGY (B.C. 200-A.D. 100).—In the preceding section we have given a survey of eschatological ideas in the order of their historical attestation, and consequently in the order of their intellectual evolution. By this method we have made it possible for the reader to see the various conceptions, such as Sheol, Gehenna, Messiah, Resurrection, in their actual organic relations and historical environment. In this section, however, we shall isolate several of these conceptions, and deal briefly with the various forms they assumed from B.C. 200 to A.D. 100 in Jewish circles. These conceptions are: the Last Woes, the Messiah, the Messianic Kingdom, the Return of the Messiah, the Resurrection, Judgment, Sheol or Hades, Gehenna, Paradise, Heaven.

The Last Woes.—It will be sufficient for our present purpose to mention the passages where these woes prelude the Messianic kingdom are recounted. These are: Dn 12<sup>1</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>7-70</sup>, 2 Mac 5<sup>2-3</sup>, Jubilees 23<sup>12-13, 22</sup>, Apoc. Bar 27. 43<sup>28-41</sup> 70<sup>2-3</sup>, 4 Ezr 5<sup>1-13</sup> 6<sup>18-28</sup> 9<sup>1-12</sup> 13<sup>28-31</sup>. For further information the reader should consult Drummond, The Jewish Messiah, in loc.; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 154-156; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. ii. 509 sqq. 550-549.

The Messiah.—On this subject will be treated under the general art. MESSIAH, we shall sketch here only its leading phases.

i. The Messiah—conceived merely as a passive though supreme member of the Messianic kingdom. He is so represented in Eth. En. 83-90, where his appearance is largely otiose, and due probably to literary reminiscence. He rules over a transfigured Israel, with the Heavenly Jerusalem set up as the centre of his kingdom, and his reign is apparently for ever. In the 1st cent. of the Christian era this conception reappears twice in Apoc. Bar 27-30<sup>1</sup> where his rule is of temporary duration, and in 4 Ezr 7<sup>28</sup> (i.e. in the Ezra Apoc. See p. 747*), where he dies after a reign of 400 years. In the second and third cases the Messiah appears after the Messianic woes and judgment; in the third, simultaneously with the first resurrection.

ii. The Messiah—conceived as an active warrior, who slays his enemies with his own hand. This conception is attested in the Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>652-660</sup>, which belongs to the 2nd cent. B.C.; in the Pss. of Sol 17<sup>1-2</sup>, where the Messiah is to be of Davidic descent—but this book belongs properly to the next division; in Apoc. Bar 36-40; also in another independent writing in the same book, 53-74; 4 Ezr 10<sup>60-125</sup>. In the last the Messiah is of Davidic origin. In all these books save the first (?) the Messianic kingdom is of temporary duration.

iii. The Messiah—conceived more loftily as one who slays his enemies by the word of his mouth, and rules by virtue of his justice, faith, and holiness (cf. Ps.-Sol 17<sup>27, 31, 37, 39, 41</sup>). A similar conception is found in 4 Ezr 13. In both writings his reign is probably of temporary duration.

iv. The Messiah—conceived as supernatural, as eternal Ruler and Judge of mankind (Eth. En.

37-70). This conception of the Messiah is logically in some measure a development of that in the third division, and yet it is chronologically antecedent to it. It is the most sublime conception of the Messiah to be found in all Jewish literature outside the Canon. For further details see above, p. 744<sup>a</sup>.

The Messianic Kingdom.—Three views in the main prevailed amongst the Jews as to this kingdom. i. It was to be of eternal duration. ii. It was to be of temporary duration. iii. There was to be no Messianic kingdom.

i. The Messianic kingdom was to be of eternal duration.

(a) On earth as it is (Eth. En. 1-36, Dn, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>768-783</sup> (?)).

(b) On a transformed earth and in heaven (Eth. En. 37-70). As the Messianic kingdom is here eternal, it is preceded in Palestinian literature by the resurrection and the final judgment.

ii. The Messianic kingdom was to be of temporary duration on earth (Eth. En. 91-104, Ps.-Sol 17. 18, 2 Mac, Jubilees, Slav. En., Assumption of Moses, Book of Wisdom, Apoc. Bar—parts A<sup>1</sup> A<sup>2</sup> A<sup>3</sup> B<sup>1</sup>,—4 Ezr—all parts but Salathiel Apoc.).

When the Messianic kingdom is of temporary duration, there appears to be no transformation of the earth. The resurrection and final judgment take place at its close. The resurrection is all but universally a resurrection of the righteous only. Hence in many of these books the wicked are held to enter at once into their final abode. Thus Hades in these cases becomes Hell.

iii. No Messianic kingdom expected [4 Mac (?), Apoc. Bar (B<sup>2</sup>), 4 Ezr, Salathiel Apoc.].

In these books man does not enter till after the last judgment on his final award. After death he meets with a foretaste of his final lot in Hades or Sheol.

The Return from the Dead.—The promise that God would turn the captivity of Israel is found in the O.T.; also in Sir 33<sup>1</sup> (AV 36), Eth. En. 57<sup>1, 2</sup> 90<sup>38</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 2<sup>170-173</sup>, Bar 27<sup>28-35</sup> 43<sup>37</sup> 57<sup>5-7</sup>, Ps.-Sol 11, 2 Mac 2<sup>12</sup>, Apoc. Bar 77<sup>6</sup> 78<sup>7</sup> (cf. 84<sup>2, 8, 10</sup>), 4 Ezr 13<sup>12, 39-47</sup>, Targ. Jon. on Jer 33<sup>13</sup>, and Shemoneh Esreh: 'Lift up a banner to gather our dispersed, and assemble us from the four ends of the earth.' Yet Rabbi Akiba (Sanh. 10<sup>3</sup>), in the 2nd cent. A.D., denied this return.

The Resurrection.—The resurrection is very variously conceived. The earliest attested view in the 2nd cent. B.C. is that of (a) the resurrection of all Israel (Dn 12<sup>1-3</sup>). About the same period the doctrine of (b) the resurrection of the righteous only is taught in Eth. En. 83-90. In the close of the same century another writer looks forward, not to a resurrection of the body, but to (c) a blessed immortality of the soul or spirit after the final judgment (Eth. En. 91-104). These views hold the field throughout the next century, and it is not till the 1st cent. of the Christian era that they are in some measure displaced by others. These latter, which are developments of the former, are: (d) a blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous after death. This is one side of the larger doctrine of an immediate and final retribution after death affecting only the soul or spirit; (e) a general resurrection of all mankind preceding the final judgment.

(a) The resurrection of all Israel [Eth. En. 1-36 (see 22), Dn 12<sup>1-3</sup>, Eth. En. 37-70 (see 51, etc.), 2 Mac 7<sup>11-14</sup> etc. 12<sup>43, 44</sup>, Apoc. Bar (B<sup>2</sup>) (see 24. 302-5 50. 51)].

In 2 Mac 12<sup>43-45</sup> the possibility of a moral change taking place in Sheol seems to be implied.

(b) The resurrection of the righteous only [Eth. En. 83-90 (see 90<sup>38</sup>)].

In this book the righteous have no concern in the last judgment, and do not rise till it is over.

(c) A blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous after the final judgment. (En. 91-104 (see 103<sup>3</sup> 4 91<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>3</sup> 104<sup>2</sup> . . . . . of Moses (see 10<sup>9</sup>), Slav. En. (?), Eth. En. 108 (?)).

(d) A blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous after death [Jubilees (see 23), Philo, ; (see 31-4 4<sup>2</sup> 7. 10 etc.), 4 Mac (see 5<sup>37</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>17</sup> etc.)], Essene doctrine according to Josephus, BJ II. viii. 11.

Observe the expression in 4 Mac 13<sup>17</sup> θανάτῳ ἡμῶν Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ὑποδέξονται (cf. Lk 16<sup>22</sup>).

(e) Resurrection of all mankind [Apoc. Bar 30<sup>2-5</sup> 50-51, 4 Ezr (Ezra Apoc. See 7<sup>32-37</sup>), Test. XII. Patr., Benj. 10].

The doctrine of the last judgment is variously conceived, either as taking effect from day to day, or at great crises in national history, or as retribution which is universal and final. The last may take place either at the beginning or the close of the Messianic kingdom. In Apocalyptic literature little attention is paid to the last division. A most emphatic presentation of the doctrine of retribution in this life pervades 2 Mac and Jubilees. We shall here, however, confine our attention to judgment as connected with the consummation of the world. Now, in the last times there were generally two stages in this judgment. The former was executed by human agents,—the saints of Israel or these led by the Messiah,—and may be designated as the judgment by the sword, or, better, the Messianic judgment; the latter was administered by God or, in one instance only, by the Messiah, and constitutes in reality the final judgment.

(a) The Messianic Judgment.—This judgment (i.) may be realistically conceived as involving the destruction of the wicked by the personal prowess of the Messiah or the saints; or (ii.) it may be forensically conceived: the word of the Messiah or of the saints judges or destroys the wicked. The latter form of judgment is obviously a development of the former, but the two are not always kept apart.

i. The Messianic judgment realistically conceived:

(a) Executed by the Messiah (Ps.-Sol 17. 18 (?), Apoc. Bar 39. 40. 72. 73, 4 Ezr 12<sup>33-34</sup>).

(β) Executed by the saints (Dn 2<sup>4</sup>, Eth. En. 90<sup>19</sup> 91<sup>12</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> 98<sup>12</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>781</sup>, Jubilees, Assumption of Moses 10<sup>9</sup>).

ii. The Messianic judgment forensically conceived:

(a) Executed by the Messiah (Ps.-Sol 17. 18, 4 Ezr 13<sup>28-29-50</sup>).

(β) Executed by the saints (Book of Wisdom 3<sup>8</sup>, cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>).

(b) The Final Judgment.—This judgment is always administered by God save in Eth. En. 37-70, where it is committed to the Messiah, the Son of Man. This judgment takes place either at the beginning of the Messianic kingdom or, where this kingdom is of temporary duration, at its close; or, where no such kingdom is expected, simply at the end of this world (see section above on The Messianic Kingdom, p. 748<sup>b</sup>).

As to Sheol, Gehenna, Paradise, Heaven, see the separate articles.

LITERATURE.—The Jewish eschatology of our period has been greatly neglected in the past. This has been due partly to the ignorance of Christian scholars, and partly to the deliberate ignoring by Jewish scholars of the chief sources of information on this subject, i.e. the Apocalyptic books. To Lücke, Hilgenfeld, and Drummond belongs, in large measure, the merit of emphasizing the importance of this literature. Drummond's work, The Jewish Messiah, is a splendid contribution to our knowledge of Jewish thought, though much of it is no longer abreast of our knowledge of this subject. Schwally's Das Leben nach dem Tode is very stimulating on this period, though frequently misleading. The reader may consult also Salmon's Christian Doctrine of Immortality, and Stanton's The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, where they deal with our subject.

Abundant information, and copious references to authorities will be found in 126-187. Marti also (Geschichte der Israelitischen Religion, pp. 270-310) is well worth consulting.

The present writer hopes to edit, towards the close of next year (1898), a critical work on Jewish Eschatology from the earliest OT times down to A.D. 100. R. H. CHARLES.

ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

—The eschatology of the NT attaches itself in the first instance to that of the OT. The Heb. Scriptures do not contain anything like a definite or complete doctrine of the things of the end. They are the records, however, of an important contribution to the faith in a future life, and that contribution was an ever-enlarging one. It had its reason in the two fundamental articles of Israel's faith—the doctrine of one God: a living, personal, righteous, gracious God, who made Himself known to His people and entered into fellowship with them; and the doctrine of Man as a creature different from and in end from other creatures, the image of God's image, made for communion with God, and for life in that communion. These great truths, which meant more and more, and which were the basis of conceptions of Death and of the life to come, which Israel had in common with the Babylonians and other nations, led by steps of gradual advance to a clearer, more determinate, and more moral conception of existence beyond the grave. The experiences and intuitions of saints, the visions and forecasts and inferences of faith, seen in the political books, combined with thoughts and words of sublime suggestion occasionally found in the historical books, and with the more definite teaching of the prophets, to further this development of belief and the march towards a definite doctrine. So the popular ideas of a dark Sheol with a chill attenuated existence in its sunless depths gave way to higher views; the thought of the lot of the individual disentangled itself from that of the destiny of the community; the belief in a moral order with judicial awards following men into the other world took shape and became increasingly distinct; and at last the faith and the teaching of the OT rose to the great hope of a resurrection to life. This eschatology of the OT, which grew from less to more in the course of Israel's history, remained nevertheless incomplete at its highest, and pointed to something beyond itself. The eschatology of the NT became its heir, passing beyond its limits and carrying its principles to their issues.

But the eschatology of the NT attaches itself also, though in another way, to the popular faith of the Jews of its time, and to certain developments of thought and belief which had taken place in the period following that which produced the last of the OT books. These developments were considerable. We gather what they were from the literature of Judaism which has descended to us, the Apoc. of the OT, to some extent the Rabbinical books, and most particularly the pseudopigraphic and apocalyptic writings. This literature furnishes the key to much in the NT doctrine of the Last Things. It shows in what way the OT faith was retained and enlarged in harmony with its essential principles; in what way also it was materialized and subjected to changes which were not consistent with its true spirit; in what directions belief became more positive; and in what respects it became fanciful, grotesque; how certain OT terms and ideas were modified in sense and application, and in what measure new terms and ideas were introduced. The eschatology of the NT bears the impress of these things. It cannot be understood apart from them. From much that emerged in this intervening period it stands aloof. Other things in this development, which were consistent with the principles of the OT revelation, are reflected in it, purified of the gross, exaggerated, and unspiritual elements which mixed themselves with them.

The eschatology of the NT is not given in systematic form, neither is it expressed in the precise and measured language of prophecy or theology. It appears as a collection of ideas which are common to the NT books, but which are presented in different aspects and connexions by the several writers. It is given in occasional form, in Christ's words, the discourses in the Bk. of Acts, the records of evangelists, the Epistles of apostles, on the promptings of circumstances which from time to time called forth declarations in speech or in writing on the matters of the end. It is not given in the terms of the schools nor with a view to speculative interests, but always for the purposes of life and practice, and in the language of the people. It makes free use of the figurative, parabolic, imaginative phraseology in which the Eastern mind naturally expresses itself. It never claims to give an exhaustive disclosure or a constructive account of the Last Things. The message of the NT also being distinctively a message of hope, the eschatology is occupied mainly with the issues of the kingdom of God and the destiny of the righteous. It says less of the graver issues of the future of the unrighteous.

The eschatology of the NT being conveyed in this occasional and discontinuous form, we may best understand it by following out the great ideas as they appear first in one and then in another of the main groups of writings. The fundamental question is that of Christ's own mind on the subject. It will be convenient, therefore, to deal with the eschatology first as it appears in Christ's own words reported in the Gospels, and then as it is found in the teaching of the several divisions of the NT writings. It will thus be seen whether or how far the NT has a consistent doctrine of the Last Things.

I. CHRIST'S ESCHATOLOGY.—There are questions of criticism to which regard must be had in studying the eschatology of the NT. In the case of our Lord's teaching there is the debated question of what is primitive and what is secondary in the records of His words, with the various tests proposed for distinguishing between the one and the other. It is impossible to enter at length into these things here. It is enough to say that the substance of Christ's teaching will be found to be the same whichever of the leading theories of the construction of the Gospels is followed. Its main points belong to the large stream of narrative and discourse which is common to the first three Gospels, and in which the most primitive tradition is probably preserved. There is also the question of the relation in which the report of Christ's words given in the Fourth Gospel stands to that contained in the Synoptists. Of this it must suffice to say that the difference in the form is a reason for taking the two accounts separately; from which, however, it does not follow that there is an essential difference between them.

In the Synoptic Gospels the eschatology centres in the great idea of the KINGDOM OF GOD (which see). Christ's whole disclosure of the Future has its point of issue in this doctrine of the Divine kingdom and its consummation. In this His teaching connects itself with the large ideas of the OT, carrying them further and fulfilling them.

As the OT, too, in its conceptions of the future knew nothing of the philosophy of the subject and furnished no reasoned statement, but followed the logic of experience and the heart, giving no dogma of immortality, but the expression of a living fellowship with God which involved the continuance of life; so Christ's teaching lies apart from all theoretic questions, all speculative discussions, all that is of curious interest, and deals with practical relations and broad moral issues. It offers no proof of the reality of a future existence, but it speaks of life as man's inheritance, and folds the course of the Divine kingdom which had been the object of OT faith and the centre of OT hope. It presents that kingdom as a thing of the actual present, brought to men in and by the Teacher Himself, but also as a thing of the future which looks through all historical fulfilments to a completion in the future,—a thing, too, of gradual, unobtrusive growth, yet destined to be finally established by a great conclusive event. Christ's whole teaching on the subject of the Last Things, as regards the Church, the world, and the individual, is connected with this lofty OT idea of a new order in which God shall be confessed to be Sovereign, and has regard to it in its primary deliverances.

Among these deliverances a large place is given to the Return of His own Return. In the OT the coming of the Divine kingdom was to be brought about by a descent of God to earth, and in the NT it was further connected with the coming of the Son of Man, the agent of J<sup>n</sup> in the fulfilment of His purpose. So Christ connects the completion of the kingdom with a decisive occurrence, the great event of His own Parousia (Mt 24<sup>27-39</sup>). The time of this new interposition is not declared, it is not known even to the Son (Mt 24<sup>36</sup> RV, Mk 13<sup>32</sup> RV). But it is to come when the times are ripe for it, and there are prelusive tokens of it. This event of His coming is the burden of the great eschatological discourse in Mt 24-25, in which there are problems both for criticism and for interpretation. In that discourse two distinct occurrences, the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, seem to be spoken of as coincident and as near. This is in accordance with the nature of biblical prophecy: as it is seen in the OT, which brings together in prophetic perspective or 'timeless sequence' events which were widely separated in actual occurrence (Is 8, 9, Zeph, etc.). It does not require for its explanation the affirmation of mistake on Christ's part (Strauss, Renan, Keim, Weizsäcker, S. Davidson, etc.), the supposition of misunderstanding or misreporting on the part of the evangelists (Baur, Colani, De Wette, Holtzmann, etc.), the limitation of the whole declaration to the single catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem and the Jewish state (J. S. Russell, etc.), the theory of a double coming, or the hypothesis either of a Jewish (Weizsäcker) or of a Jewish-Christian (Colani, Keim, Pfleiderer, Wendt, Weissenbach, Vischer, etc.) apocalypticism in the discourse. Nor is this form of eschatology confined to this particular section of the Synoptic Gospels. Sayings of similar import are given elsewhere (Mk 13<sup>30</sup>, Lk 21<sup>32</sup>, Mt 24<sup>28</sup>; cf. also Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26-27</sup>). In these Gospels, too, the Return appears to be an objective event, the expression given to it being such as goes beyond any figurative description simply of the final victory of principles or the supersession of old forms of religion. In the Fourth Gospel the case is somewhat different. It is the coming of the Spirit that chiefly appears there, and that in such measure as to suggest to many that only a dynamical coming is in view (Neander, Godet, etc.). Yet a distinction is observed between the coming of the Spirit and Christ's coming, and there are passages in which the idea seems to be the same as that of the Synoptic records (14<sup>5</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup>). The first point, therefore, in Christ's teaching on the subject of the future is the announcement of the objective event of His own Return. But His declarations on this Parousia know nothing of the minute and fantastic inventions of Jewish theology, as seen in the Book of Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, the Sibylline Oracles, and similar products of Jewish thought, with their elaborate machinery of signs and portents and mystic numbers, their extravagant chronologies, their grotesque descriptions of the literal re-settlement of the Jews in their own land, their many eccentricities and ineptitudes. They know as little of those Chilastic conceptions of the future, those curious calculations of the duration of Messiah's kingdom, those puerile ideas of the erection of a new Jerusalem on the ruins of the old, which took hold of the Jewish mind before Christian times, and, entering into Christian thought, gave shape to the doctrine of a millennial reign of Christ on earth which was to end in a great apostasy and to herald the consummation.

With this doctrine of the second advent is associated the doctrine of a Final Judgment. This judgment is presented as the object of the coming, and it occupies a place of like prominence in the teaching. It is expressed in various of the OT books, and attains its greatest length in the eschatology of the First Gospel.

As to the content of the doctrine of the Final Judgment, it is a judgment at the end of the world, a judgment of universal scope (Mt 13<sup>30-42</sup>, 47-50 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup> etc.), and a judgment in which Christ, the Son of Man, is Himself to be the Judge (Mt 25<sup>31</sup> etc.). In the Fourth Gospel the judgment appears for the most part under another aspect. In that Gospel the emphasis is laid upon a judgment which is present and subjective, fulfilling itself in a probation of character and a self-verdict which proceed now (3<sup>17</sup>, 18 12<sup>47</sup>, 48). But this subjective judgment of the present in life and conscience is not inconsistent with an objective judgment of the future. And the latter is not strange to the Fourth Gospel. The Johannine phrase 'the last day' (12<sup>35</sup>) points to it, and it is contained in such words as those in 5<sup>27</sup>, 28 (cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>, in which Johannine writing the judgment is connected, as in the Synoptists, with Christ's coming). The doctrine of a final judgment so declared by Christ stands in intimate relation to certain leading ideas of the OT, completing these and giving them certainty. The Heb. Scriptures, penetrated through and through by the idea of a Divine Retribution, have a large doctrine of judgment, a judgment for Israel, more frequently a judgment for the nations or a world-judgment. But for the most part it is a world-judgment, which has its scene in this world, a triumph of the kingdom of God in the form of an overthrow of its living adversaries on earth. And in this J<sup>n</sup> Himself is the Judge. In certain passages (Is 9, 11, Mic 5, Jer 23, 31 31 36, Ezk 31, 3 7 9-11) the triumph of the kingdom of God is connected with the advent of a great Davidic King, and Messiah appears as the agent of J<sup>n</sup>. But in the OT the final arbitrament of men's lives is not committed to the Messiah or the ideal King, as in Christ's teaching it is given to the Son of Man. Further, while the foundations of the doctrine of a final universal and individual judgment are laid in the OT ideas of the righteousness of God, His covenant relations with Israel, and His sovereignty over the nations, the conception of a judgment after death does not take a definite form till near the close of the OT. Even when the idea of an individual judgment at the end of things appears, the subjects of the judgment seem to be limited to those of Israel. Christ's doctrine has also its relations to the ideas of the non-canonical literature. In the representative books of Judaism the doctrine of a judgment bulked largely, and is taught with much novel and peculiar detail. It has also different forms. In certain books (e.g. the Book of Enoch 90<sup>18</sup>, 19, the Assumption of Moses 3, 4, etc.) the OT idea of a destruction of living enemies of J<sup>n</sup>'s kingdom here on earth survives. In many cases, though not in all, the Messiah is the agent of God in this judgment; and the judgment is placed usually at the beginning of His reign, but sometimes (where a limited duration is ascribed to that reign) at its close. In other books, however, and especially in the Book of Enoch, this passes over into the idea of a final judgment, in the forensic sense, occurring after death, extending to all men and to angels as well. In these books, too, God is the Judge and Messiah His instrument. Only in the later section of the Book of Enoch does the Messiah appear in any certain and definite form as the Judge at the last day. Christ's doctrine of a universal, individual judgment at the end of things, in which judgment God is the Arbitrer of human destinies, carried the OT conception to its proper issue, while it gave a new certainty, consistency, and spirituality to the doctrine which had arisen in Judaism in the last of the Jewish prophets.

In conjunction with these doctrines of the Parousia and the Final Judgment, the doctrine of a Resurrection has an important place in Christ's teaching. The doctrine of a resurrection of the dead is implied in the doctrine of a final universal judgment at the end of things. It lies also in the great principles of OT. The Psalmists and the Prophets have their visions of a limitation of the power of death, a destruction of death, a deliverance from Sheol, a life superior to death; and, in the progress of the prophetic teaching, the faith in a resurrection of the dead rises gradually into distinctness. It appears first as a belief in the re-animation of the dead nation, and at last in Isaiah (26<sup>19</sup>) and Daniel as a belief in the return of deceased individuals to life. In the final utterance of OT on the subject (Dn 12<sup>2</sup>) this enlargement of the belief has to have its occasion in the question of the fate of departed members of Israel. Here is reward for the faithful among these, whether there is penalty for the unfaithful. But OT does not seem to go beyond the case of Israel. It carries with the announcement that Israel's dead, true and false, shall come forth from the dust of earth to receive the awards of their truth or falsehood. In the period between this and the Christian era the belief passed through various fortunes. It did not become the universal faith of the Jewish people. In some of the non-canonical books the old idea of Sheol continues (Sir 17<sup>27</sup>, 28 41<sup>4</sup>, Bar 2<sup>7</sup>). In some the hope appears to be that of an incorporeal immortality (Wis 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>1-4</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, 14 15<sup>3</sup>, 4 Mac 14<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>4</sup>). But in others the belief in a resurrection is seen in more or less definite form (Enoch 91<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>3</sup>, Ps.-Sol 3<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>9</sup> etc., most distinctly and most frequently in 2 Mac, e.g. 7<sup>9</sup>, 14 23; cf. also Sibyll. Oracles 1<sup>40</sup> 274, 275 4<sup>228</sup> 229, Apoc. Bar 30<sup>1-5</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>6</sup>, 2 Es 7<sup>82</sup>). Rejected by the Sadducees, it became the belief of the Pharisees and the majority of the Jewish people. It had become, too, a belief in the resurrection of the unjust as well as the just, although in certain cases the limited belief in a rising only of the righteous seems to have persisted (Ps.-Sol 3<sup>18</sup> 14<sup>3</sup> etc.). Opinion varied to some extent as to the object of the resurrection, whether it was for judgment or for participation in the glories of Messiah's time, whether it was to be before Messiah's era or at its close (cf. on the one hand Enoch 51, on the other Apoc. Bar and 2 Es). The doctrine, then, which had its roots in the great principles of the OT touching life, the nature of man, and his relation to God; which in the OT had grown gradually in magnitude and in definiteness; which also in Judaism had undergone changes in part natural and consistent, in part forced and inharmonious, forms an integral part of Christ's eschatological teaching. It is given in discourses which belong to the triple tradition in the Synoptic records (Mt 22<sup>23-33</sup>, Mk 12<sup>18-27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27-36</sup>). It is implied in utterances reflecting current Jewish opinion (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28-30</sup>). It is affirmed where it is not affirmed in terms (e.g. in Mt 24. 25). It is stated in its essential relations to the great principles of the OT, and is relieved of the extravagance, the crudities, and the literalities with which it had become associated in Jewish speculation and Jewish popular teaching. It is the doctrine of a real bodily resurrection, far removed from Hellenic or Essene ideas of a bare immortality of soul, affirming in harmony with the OT view of man's relation to God (Mt 22<sup>31, 32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26, 27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37, 38</sup>) a continuance of life for man in his entire self. In this the Synoptic records and the Fourth Gospel agree. In the latter, it is true, the fact of the resurrection is presented mainly in its spiritual aspects and its immediate relations. Some of Christ's largest words on the subject go beyond the idea of the resurrection at the last day (11<sup>23-26</sup>); and others, if they stood alone, might perhaps be taken as strong descriptions of a spiritual renovation only (5<sup>28, 29</sup>). But in the Johannine record there are also words too definite to admit of being limited to the expression of a purely spiritual resurrection (5<sup>28, 29</sup>). Christ's doctrine, further, is the doctrine of a universal resurrection. Certain passages in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>, Mk 13<sup>37</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36, 37</sup>, Mt 24<sup>31</sup>, Lk 14<sup>14</sup>), indeed, have been supposed to imply that Christ taught only a resurrection of the righteous. But there are others with a different implication (Mt 5<sup>28, 30</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>). The 'resurrection of the just' (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>) suggests its own antithesis. The Fourth Gospel, too, declares a 'resurrection unto condemnation' as well as a 'resurrection unto life,' and in speaking of the re-awakening of the dead uses terms too large for the limited view. This resurrection, which extends to just and unjust, is further referred to the last day. In Christ's own words there is no statement of a separation of the resurrection of the unrighteous from that of the righteous as if they were events belonging to different times.

In contrast with the fulness and explicitness of Christ's declarations on the Parousia, the Judgment, and the Resurrection, is the reserve of His teaching on the subject of the Intermediate State. This is the more remarkable in view of the position given to that topic in the theology and the popular thought of the Jews of the time. The OT idea of Sheol, originally that of an underworld forming the final abode of men, in course of time passed through changes which are indicated to some extent in the canonical books themselves, but which took larger effect at a later period, and are known to us from the non-canonical literature. These changes followed different directions, and various ideas of Sheol continued to prevail. In part the old conception survived, with some modification (e.g. Sir 17<sup>28-30</sup> 41<sup>1-4</sup>, Bar 2<sup>7</sup>, To 3<sup>8, 10</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>60</sup> 14<sup>30</sup>); in part the term came to denote a place of relative retribution (Wis 31<sup>10</sup> 51<sup>1-14</sup> 61<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Mac 7<sup>9, 11, 14, 29</sup> 12<sup>23-25</sup> etc.). Most particularly in the Apocalyptic books it is found to have assumed the sense of an intermediate state with relative rewards and penalties (Enoch 10<sup>22</sup> 22. 100<sup>5</sup> 103<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jubilees 5<sup>243</sup> 7<sup>248</sup> 22<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>27, 34</sup>, 2 Es 7<sup>75, 80</sup>, Apoc. Bar 52<sup>1-3</sup>). Jewish thought seems thus to have occupied itself largely with the idea of the period between death and judgment, and with the conditions and the possibilities of an intermediate state. Of all this there is little or no recognition in Christ's words. He uses, it is true, the word Hades, the Greek equivalent to the Heb. Sheol, thrice. But in two of these cases the application is obviously metaphorical (Mt 11<sup>23</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>); and in the third (Lk 16<sup>26</sup>) the term forms part of the imagery of a parable intended to teach the broad moral lesson that a selfish life, the retribution of a selfish life, and changes its conditions in the next life. The same parable He uses the term Abraham's bosom (Lk 16<sup>26</sup>), but in a connexion that does not suggest a definite doctrinal intention. He also uses the term Paradise, a term with which various and uncertain ideas had been associated in Jewish thought. But He uses it only once (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>), and in a large and general sense, as a word of hope and comfort; in which sense also He uses the word sleep,—not to inculcate the doctrine of an intermediate state as a space of unconsciousness, or as a place for the detention, the recompense, or the purification of souls. Some of His words appear to point to a definite intermediate entrance of the just into the Father's house and the Father's glory (Jn 14<sup>2, 3</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>). But in general His attitude to the question of the condition between death and judgment is one of reserve, and His words are only approaching to a doctrine of the Intermediate State.

It is otherwise with the question of what follows the resurrection and the judgment. The eschatology of NT as it is given by Christ Himself has a pronounced doctrine of the Moral Issues of life. It speaks largely and distinctly of final reward for the good, and final penalty for the evil. These are expressed by a great variety of suggestive terms. The recompense of the righteous is described as an inheritance, entrance into the kingdom, treasure in heaven, an existence like the angelic, a place prepared, the Father's house, the joy of the Lord, life, eternal life, and the like; and there is no intimation that the reward is capable of change, that the condition is a terminable one. The retribution of the wicked is described as death, outer darkness, weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, the undying worm, the quenchless fire, exclusion from the kingdom, eternal punishment, and the like. Different measures of reward and of penalty are intimated, according to different degrees of merit and demerit (Lk 12<sup>58</sup>). In Christ's own words there is no certain declaration of the terminableness of the penalty of the finally impenitent, no indication either of an intermediate purgatorial process or of an ultimate universal restoration. In the Synoptic Gospels, and in the groundwork of their narrative, the term Gehenna, Hell, is applied to the future condition of the lost (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 18<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>35, 36</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43, 45, 47</sup>, Lk 12<sup>9</sup>). This term, though in the later Judaism it had at times the sense of an intermediate condition, whether as a temporary purgatory or as a place of punishment, appears to have been in the earlier Judaism and in our Lord's time a term for the retributive state after judgment (cf. e.g. Enoch 27<sup>2, 3</sup> 90<sup>24-26</sup> etc., which are probably its first occurrences in this sense; cf. also 2 Es 6<sup>1-4</sup> 7<sup>36</sup>). The question whether Christ teaches the permanence of the penal condition resulting from the judgment is variously answered. Certain of His sayings are taken to point to a terminable penalty. These, however, are few in number, and appear either to be irrelevant (e.g. Lk 12<sup>47, 48</sup>, where the question is, not the duration of the judicial awards, but their adjustment to different degrees of wrong), or to suggest the possibility of remission (e.g. Mt 5<sup>25, 26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>58, 59</sup>, where the question seems to be that of a liability that cannot be remitted and a justice that is inexorable; Mt 12<sup>32, 33</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>, where the terms appear to be exclusive terms, expressing the irremediableness of the condition, the fact that there can be no forgiveness at any period for the sin in question). It is urged, too, but on grounds open to challenge, that the distinctive terms 'eternal' (αἰώνιος) and 'punishment' (κόλασις) may have in this connexion other than their usual and obvious applications. But, on the other hand, the finality of destiny appears to be expressed unmistakably and in many different forms—in the words with which at the close of the great eschatological discourse the moral issues of life are summed up (Mt 25<sup>45</sup>), in such contrasts as that between the 'kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world' and 'the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels' (Mt 25<sup>41</sup>); in the statements of the issues of God's kingdom and of man's life given in the parables (e.g. Mt 13<sup>24-30, 37-43</sup>); in the figures of 'the unquenchable fire' (Mk 9<sup>43</sup>), the 'worm' that 'dieth not' (Mk 9<sup>48</sup>), the salting with fire (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), and the like; in the many other terms of solemn moment by which the final lot of the wicked is described, as 'eternal punishment' from Christ (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>), 'eternal fire' (Lk 16<sup>24</sup>), the loss of the soul or the life (Mk 8<sup>36</sup>), dying in one's sins (Jn 8<sup>21, 24</sup>), perishing (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), being judged already (Jn 3<sup>18</sup>), its being good never to have been born (Mt 26<sup>24</sup>, Mk 14<sup>21</sup>), etc. These sayings are to be understood in the light of the beliefs which prevailed among the Jews on the nature and the duration of the retribution of the wicked. These are by no means easy to determine, as they varied at different periods and in different schools. Yet the general condition of opinion in our Lord's time and in the immediately preceding period can be stated with some confidence. The Jewish books relevant to the question contain little to bear out any large belief in the final restoration of all. They often use terms—death, perdition, destruction, and the like, which might be taken to point to annihilation as the final lot of the wicked, if interpreted apart from the old popular ideas of Sheol (e.g. Ps. Sol 3<sup>13, 9</sup>, 12<sup>8</sup>, 13<sup>10</sup>, 15<sup>12</sup>; cf. 2 Es 7<sup>30</sup>, 8<sup>22-23</sup>, Apoc. Bar 30). But in many cases the language is definitely expressive of the finality of the punishment (e.g. Jth 16<sup>17</sup>, 4 Mac 9<sup>8, 9</sup>, Enoch 5<sup>5, 6</sup>, 10<sup>11-14</sup>, 12<sup>8-9</sup>, 22<sup>11</sup>, 27<sup>2, 3</sup> etc.). The schools of Hillel and Shammai, too, seem both to have taught, though in different ways, the immediate sealing of certain classes of sinners to Gehenna, or their punishment there to 'ages of ages.' It would appear, therefore, that in Christ's time, with certain variations and exceptions, the belief was general in an enduring punishment of the wicked in the other world for the absolutely final sinners—Gentiles, guilty and apostate Jews. Christ's eschatology is one of grace. His doctrine is a revelation of life. But it throws into strong relief the responsibilities of the present existence, the certainty of the retribution of sin, the finality of an eternal sin (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>) with an eternal punishment.

II. THE APOSTOLIC ESCHATOLOGY.

In this title we include the eschatological ideas and truths delivered in the various groups of NT writings outside the evangelical records of Christ's own words. Taking each writer separately, we have to ascertain what contribution he makes to the eschatological system, in what relation it stands to Christ's doctrine, in what sense it is in harmony with that, in what degree it is supplementary. There are questions of literary criticism connected with not a few of the writings, questions both of genuineness and of integrity. Into these it is not necessary to enter here. In increasing measure these writings are being lifted above the uncertainties of criticism. It is enough for our present purpose to take them as representatives of different types of NT doctrine, earlier and later. Their ideas exhibit certain characteristic differences in form in the different groups. They bear the impress of the beliefs, conditions, and ways of speech that were current among the Jews of the time. They have obvious points of contact with the ideas of the OT. They stand in a special relation of dependence and agreement, to Christ's doctrine. The Epistle of James, a notable product of primitive Jewish Christianity, says comparatively little on the things of the end. It speaks most definitely of the Parousia, of that as an event nigh at hand, and as having judgment associated with it (5<sup>8</sup>). It speaks also of a Kingdom that is promised (2<sup>5</sup>); of a Judge who 'standeth at the door' (5<sup>9</sup>); of a judgment that will be according to character and responsibility (2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>); of recompenses for the tried and proved (1<sup>12</sup>), and retributions for the oppressive rich (5<sup>1-4, 7</sup>); of a penalty which appears to be eternal (5<sup>20</sup>).

In the Epistle of Jude Christ's Return is the great event of the future (v. 24); the reward of the good is 'eternal life' (v. 21); the truth of the final judgment (vv. 7-14) is asserted; the doom of the evil is described as the 'blackness of darkness,' a doom 'reserved for ever' (v. 13). A peculiar feature of the eschatology also in 2 Peter, in the eschatology of 1 Peter, is the place given to the judgment of fallen angels—a subject on which the Jewish imagination ran riot (see especially the Book of Enoch 6-10, 21; cf. also Jubilees 5, Apoc. Bar 56<sup>10-13</sup>). Here their doom is described, free from the extravagances which meet us in the Apocalyptic books, as that of being 'kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day' (RV v. 6).

The writings bearing Peter's name, together with the discourse ascribed to that apostle in the Bk. of Acts, represent a distinct type of eschatological teaching or doctrinal statement generally. The Second Epistle, the genuineness of which has been so largely questioned, exhibits an affinity in many things with the Epistle of Jude. It has the same conception of the coming of Christ as the conclusive event of the future (1<sup>15</sup> 24). It speaks in much the same terms of the judgment, and of the doom of evil men (2<sup>1, 2, 3, 4, 5</sup>). It designates the recompense of the good as an 'eternal kingdom' (1<sup>11</sup>), as Jude designates it 'eternal life.' It has the same exceptional doctrine of the punishment of fallen angels, applying the unusual term Tartarus to the intermediate place of their detention, and describing them as committed to 'pits of darkness in reserve unto judgment' (24). But it also makes its own peculiar contribution to the eschatology of the canonical writings in a remarkable paragraph, the most detailed of its kind in NT, on the end of the world (3<sup>8-13</sup>). It teaches that Christ's Parousia is to bring the whole present system of things to its conclusion, and the world itself to its consummation. With the great event of His coming, 'the heavens and the earth shall be dissolved; the present world and its inhabitants are to give place to 'fresh heavens and a fresh earth'; and a reconstructed world is to come forth as the abode of righteousness and the scene of the perfected kingdom of God. In this 2 P attaches itself to OT conceptions of a world-conflagration (Ps 50<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>, Is 66<sup>15</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Dn 7<sup>9</sup> 10), and a dissolution of the present system, effected by fire, in connexion with Jesus' judgment and the day of His recompense (Ps 102<sup>26</sup> 27, Job 14<sup>12</sup>, Is 34<sup>4</sup> 66<sup>22</sup>).

First Peter, which is an epistle of hope, looks at all things in the light of the future. It has a large eschatology, the central point of which is Christ's 'Apocalypse,' His revelation or appearing (1<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>). The dominant notes are the 'last time,' the 'end of all things,' the judgment (1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, 17). In the judgment God Himself is Judge (1<sup>7</sup>); Christ also appears to be Judge (4<sup>5</sup>). The judgment is universal, alike of quick and of dead (4<sup>5</sup>). It begins with the house of God now, and it has its fate reserved for the 'last time' (1<sup>7</sup> 1<sup>2</sup>, 13). The judgment of the world is only incidentally mentioned (2<sup>2</sup> 1<sup>2</sup>). In various terms, as an 'inheritance,' 'honour,' 'life,' a 'crown of glory,' etc. (1<sup>4</sup> 7 5<sup>4</sup>). The question of greatest interest in the eschatology of this Epistle, however, is its relation to the 'larger hope.' This turns upon the interpretation given to the two famous passages touching the preaching to 'the spirits in prison' (3<sup>18-22</sup>), and the preaching of the gospel to 'the dead' (4<sup>5</sup>). In connexion with these the application which Peter makes of Ps 16 in his Pentecostal discourse (Ac 2<sup>31</sup>) is also brought into view. The terms in which Peter speaks here of Christ, 'neither was he left in Hades, nor did his flesh see corruption,' have been taken to point to a visit of Christ to the under-world, and a consequent activity of His grace there. It is with Christ's resurrection, however, that Peter is specially concerned in that discourse, and the words do not go beyond the broad statement that Christ at His death passed into the world of the departed like other men, but passed thither only to rise again. The two passages in the Epistle itself are of a different nature, and rank among the chief cruciae interpretum in NT. The former passage has been expounded in the interest of many different theories—those of the liberation of saints of OT times; Christ's penal endurance of God's wrath; the purgatorial detention and purification of souls; Christ's descent to Hades for the purpose of a judicial manifestation of Himself, for a fresh proclamation of the gospel there, for the provision of a continuous ministry of grace there, for the prolongation of opportunities of repentance and offers of forgiveness to the departed, and the like. The latter passage has also been very differently interpreted. On the basis of both, the eschatology of this Epistle has been understood by many to favour the 'larger hope,' and to suggest that this life is not in every case the theatre of human fates, if not to teach the doctrine of the existence of a ministry of grace in the world of the departed with untold possibilities of after-death repentance and salvation. For the details of the interpretation and for its history the commentaries must be consulted. It must be enough here to say that, while the view in question has been largely adopted, it has not commended itself to all scholars of authority. The exegesis of these passages has still many uncertainties, and waits yet for its key; while the passages themselves stand entirely alone in NT. (See especially Güder, Die Lehre von der Erscheinung Christi unter den Todten; König, Die Lehre von Christi Hellenfahrt; Dietelmaier, Historia dogmatis de Descensu Christi ad Inferos litteraria; Hofmann, Schrifttheorie; Usteri, Hinabgefahren zur Hölle; Schweitzer, Die Hölle; Spitta, Christi Predigt; Bruston, La Descente du Christ aux Enfers.) The further question has been raised whether Peter's eschatology does not contain the doctrine of a Universal Restoration. In his discourse to the people in Solomon's porch (Ac 3<sup>19-21</sup>) he is reported to have spoken of a restoration or restitution of all things. This has been sometimes supposed to intimate the final restoration of all men. But the words have their key in the passage of Malachi

(4<sup>5</sup> 6) to which they refer, and in Christ's application of that passage (Mt 17<sup>9-13</sup>). So the restoration of which Peter speaks concerns not the moral renewal of Israel, as some explain it, or the renovation of the world, as others think. It is in any case a restoration, not of persons, but of conditions. Peter's eschatology, therefore, is in general concord with that which has so far been recognized in NT. The points in which it has been supposed to be different yet remain doubtful.

The writings associated with John's name have a distinct and peculiar character in their doctrine of the end as in all things else. There is a marked difference, too, between the Apocalypse and the Epistles. The former is an eschatological writing, following the order of the Jewish Apocalyptic. In the latter eschatological truths also appear, but in a subordinate place. The Epistles of John, with their ideal teaching, find the future in the present. As in the version of Christ's teaching which is given in the Fourth Gospel, their great conception is life, and that as opposed to death and perdition. As in the one, so, too, in the other, this life is in the first instance a present thing (1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>, 13). But it is also a thing of the future (1 Jn 2<sup>25</sup>), and it is an eternal life, life after the divine order, life with the ethical quality of real, perfect life. But it is none the less a life that looks to a future—to a manifestation yet to be made of what the children of God shall be (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). In these Epistles the eschatological relations are not lost in the ideal. They speak of the 'last hour' (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>); of an 'antichrist' that 'cometh' as well as of antichrists that already are (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>, 19, 22 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Jn 7); of a future 'full reward' (2 Jn 8); of a vision of Christ and a conformity to Him which are not of the present (1 Jn 3<sup>2-3</sup>); of a manifestation of Christ yet to be made, of His expected Parousia (1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup>). The use of the term Parousia, which elsewhere, and especially in the Pauline writings, has a very definite sense, indicates that, while to John Christ's Return was in one sense a spiritual advent, a present act of grace, it was in another sense an objective future. While in John's writings, too, the Resurrection and the Judgment are for the most part spiritual processes and present conditions, they are also events of the future associated, as they are elsewhere, with the Parousia. That it is so with regard to the former is implied in what is said of the judgment and the manifestation of the children of God. That it is so with the judgment itself appears especially in 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>.

In the Apocalypse of St. John we have a large and impressive eschatology, in which Christian truth appears in the garb of Jewish ideas and Jewish terms. This book is beyond all others the book of the future. That future is near, and it is filled with the figure of the returning Christ. Its whole doctrine of the end has its centre in the event of the Parousia, and that doctrine is conveyed in a form which bears the stamp both of the visions of OT prophets (especially Ezekiel, Zechariah, and Daniel) and the symbolism of the Jewish Apocalyptic books. The Parousia appears occasionally as a spiritual advent taking effect in history (2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>20</sup>), but usually as the objective return which belongs to the end of things. It is regarded as near (2<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 22<sup>12</sup>, 23); it is to be an event of glory, and to have judgment for its object (1<sup>7</sup>). The Judge is God Himself (20<sup>12</sup>); but Christ also appears as Judge (1<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>16</sup> 17 22<sup>12</sup>). Like the non-canonical books of the same class, it speaks much of the signs of the end, and of the prelusive events, but avoids the trivialities and the gross imaginings the fanciful and long-drawn-out calculations, which are characteristic of the ordinary Jewish Apocalyptic (e.g. Enoch 10<sup>12</sup> 91<sup>12-17</sup> 93, Assump. Moses 10<sup>28</sup>, Sibyll.

Or. 4<sup>7</sup>, 2 Es 14<sup>11-12</sup> etc.). At times it seems to combine different ideas which prevailed in Judaism of the things of the end. In one paragraph (20<sup>1-10</sup>), of difficult interpretation, it appears to follow a view of the final events which differs from the general doctrine of the NT, but is given in certain of the Jewish books—the idea of a millennial reign of Christ on earth, to be followed first by a final burst of Satanic power, and then by Christ's judicial advent. The paragraph, which will not fit a purely figurative interpretation, represents the Day of the Lord as consisting of two divisions, with a double resurrection and a double judgment—a first resurrection, which is only of the saints, and more particularly the martyred saints, and a second, which is for 'the rest of the dead'; a first judgment taking effect in the overthrow of Satan, and a second, which is in forensic form, and for all classes of the dead. The book is also understood to express two views of the lot of the righteous dead: one in which they are presented as having immediate entrance into heaven (13<sup>9</sup>), another in which they are presented as in the underworld, in consciousness and rest, waiting for their complete reward (6<sup>9-11</sup>). In the latter case, however, the martyrs alone are in view, and in both cases the language is that of the imagination. The Apocalypse, however, has a pronounced doctrine of the final awards. The reward of the righteous is conveyed in a varied imagery of the OT order—'hidden manna,' a 'new name,' the 'crown of life,' 'right to the tree of life,' the place of a 'pillar' in the temple, a reign with Christ, a position before the throne, entrance into the city, the vision of God's face, the heirship of all things (27. 13. 17 31<sup>2</sup>. 21 7<sup>15</sup> 21<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>. 14). The penalty of the unrighteous is described as 'great tribulation,' being 'without,' killing with death, burning with fire (22<sup>23</sup>. 23 18<sup>8</sup>. 9 22<sup>15</sup>); but above all by two terms, 'the second death' (21<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>6-14</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>) and 'the lake of fire' (19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>), which are peculiar to this book among the NT writings, but which occur in one form or other in the Rabbinical and Apocalyptic literature (e.g. Enoch 18<sup>11</sup> 21<sup>7-10</sup> 90<sup>42</sup>). In this book they appear to denote a lasting retribution. Further, the Apoc. expresses the doctrine of a perfected world as well as that of a perfected society. It has the vision of a new heaven and a new earth (21<sup>1-6</sup>) as well as that of a perfected city of God (21<sup>1-22</sup>).

In the Epistle to the Hebrews, where we have a series of ideas and forms of expression in general affinity with the Pauline type of doctrine, and not less with the older apostolic type, eschatology is not the prominent subject. Even the 'rest' and 'the world to come' are not presented primarily as of the future. Yet the things of the end make a considerable element of the thought of the Epistle. The doctrines of 'resurrection of the dead' and 'eternal judgment' are dealt with as things that should be well understood (6<sup>14</sup>). The day of Christ's coming is in the writer's eye; it is a day that draws nigh, and with it the judgment is connected (3<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>). In the judgment it is God Himself, not the Son, that is Judge and He is 'Judge of all' (12<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>30-31</sup>). The Epistle also has a definite doctrine of final awards. The recompense of the righteous is the 'heaven' into which the Forerunner and High Priest has passed, an 'eternal inheritance,' an 'enduring substance,' a 'better country,' a 'city prepared,' a 'kingdom which cannot be moved' (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>19</sup>. 20 9<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>. 36 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>). The retribution of the unrighteous is 'judgment,' 'fierceness of fire,' 'perdition' (10<sup>27</sup>. 28).

In the Pauline Epistles, together with the discourses attributed to St. Paul in the Book of Acts, we find a remarkable eschatology, larger, more developed, and in some points, especially in the doctrine of the resurrection, having more of the aspect of reasoned statement. Even this eschatology, however, is not given in anything like orderly or systematic form, but incidentally as occasion arose from time to time in the discharge of St. Paul's ministry. Nor is it the fundamental doctrine of the Pauline writings. The questions of its precise nature and measure, its consistency, and its relations to what is found elsewhere in Scripture, have been made dependent on questions regarding the authenticity and integrity of the Epistles and the growth of St. Paul's ideas. In its main elements, however, it is unaffected by these questions. Its essential points would remain the same had we only the four primary Epistles accepted by Baur. They appear in all the four distinct groups into which the Pauline writings fall. They do not appear in the same proportions and relations, or under precisely the same aspects, in the several groups. But the differences which have to be recognized do not amount to inconsistency. They do not imply any essential change of view, and do not appear to go beyond what finds its explanation in differences of circumstance, occasion, and circle of readers.

As in other sections of NT, the doctrine of the things of the end is closely related in the Pauline writings to that of the kingdom of God, an idea which recurs in all the four groups of Epistles. This 'kingdom,' though sometimes described as a present kingdom (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, cf. 1 Co 4<sup>20</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>), is usually a kingdom of the future, and the idea of its consummation is the centre of the Pauline eschatology. A foremost place is given in this eschatology to the doctrine of Christ's coming, which event is described under a variety of terms—His 'day,' His 'revelation,' His 'Parousia,' etc. (1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>. 8 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>2-23</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>. 8. 9, Ph 1<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>1-8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup> etc.). This Parousia is regarded as an objective event. The passages in which this 'coming' is declared are not confined to any one section of the writings; and when compared with each other they do not suggest a change in St. Paul's mind from a less to a more definite idea in the earlier Epistles to a more definite and later. The doctrines of the Resurrection, the Final Awards, and the Final Awards also appear in the same form in the Pauline writings, and in the several groups of Epistles, as elsewhere in the NT. The Resurrection is the largest exposition in the primary Epistles, but it is given also in others, and it is a real bodily resurrection, a return of the complete man to life (Ro 4<sup>17</sup>, 8<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 15, 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>1-5</sup>, Ph 3<sup>11</sup>. 21). The judgment is the judgment of God (Ro 2<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>, cf. 3<sup>19</sup>), of Christ (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), of God through Christ (Ro 2<sup>13</sup>); a future, final judgment (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>); a righteous judgment, discovering the secrets of all hearts, giving to every man according to his works (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>); a universal judgment, for both quick and dead (Ac 17<sup>31</sup>, cf. Ro 14<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). The issues of that judgment are declared with remarkable frequency and variety of statement; they are described as 'eternal' (aiōnos), which term in the Pauline Epistles is essentially, and in most applications, one of duration (cf. e.g. Ro 16<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup> etc.). The lot of the unrighteous has a subordinate place, but is expressed as 'wrath,' 'the wrath to come,' 'death,' 'punishment,' 'destruction,' 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Ro 2<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>21</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>). The lot of the righteous is a salvation 'with eternal glory,' a 'prize,' a 'crown,' an 'inheritance,' a 'manifestation,' a 'reign,' a 'life' with Christ, 'eternal life,' 'the life which is life indeed' (Ro 2<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>. 21 6<sup>8</sup>. 23, 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Gal 5<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>8</sup>, Ph 3<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>. 16, 2 Ti 2<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup> etc.).

The Pauline eschatology has elements which are, in some sense, peculiar to itself. Among these are the doctrines of the Rapture of the Saints (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>) and the Man of Sin (2 Th 2<sup>3-10</sup>). Of these the former has a certain affinity with one of the apocalyptic visions (Rev 11<sup>11-12</sup>), as well as with Christ's word regarding the 'gathering of the elect' (Mt 24<sup>31</sup>), and the narratives of the ascension, especially those by Luke (Mk 16<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, Ac 1<sup>9-10</sup>). The latter takes its form from Daniel's predictions (9<sup>27</sup> 11<sup>35-37</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>), and is in affinity with Christ's eschatological discourse (Mt 24<sup>24</sup>), and John's declaration on Antichrist (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>).

There are also things in the Pauline eschatology on the interpretation and relations of which opinion has been divided. It is thought by some to depart from the general view of the NT, and to join the Apocalypse (20<sup>1-10</sup>) in teaching the intervention of a millennial period between two distinct resurrections. But this idea, which is otherwise alien to St. Paul's writings, rests upon the particular interpretation of a single passage (1 Co 15<sup>20-23</sup>), in which the immediate question is not one of succession or chronological order, and in which nothing is said of any other resurrection than that of those who are Christ's. The Pauline Epistles have also been supposed to contain a definite doctrine of the intermediate state, with activities of grace in it. The doctrine of a purgatory, or some provision for the purgation of souls in the other world, has been ascribed to the great paragraph in 1 Co 3<sup>12-18</sup>, in which, however, the 'day' in question is that of the judgment, and the action referred to is that of testing, not purifying. The doctrine of a middle state, with a descent of Christ implying the extension of grace and opportunity, is supposed to be contained, in particular, in certain passages of the greater Epistles. One of these is the section in Romans (10<sup>5-10</sup>) in which use is made of Dt 30<sup>11-14</sup>. But the main idea there is the accessibility of the Divine commandment, the nearness and attainability of the inheritance of God, and the words say nothing of the state of Christ, nothing of the world of the dead, beyond the fact that Christ entered it and was raised from it. Another is the passage in Ephesians (4<sup>7-10</sup>) in which the subject of the descent with, and the 68th Psalm is introduced in that connexion. It speaks of a descent of Christ, by which some understand the descent from heaven in the incarnation, and others the descent from earth to Hades. But even on the latter interpretation the paragraph says nothing of any work of Christ, or any possibilities for the dead in Hades. Of greater interest is the question whether the Pauline eschatology contains the doctrine of a universal restoration. The answer turns mainly on certain passages of large suggestion in the Epistles of the Captivity, together with one or two in the earlier Epistles. The comparison between Adam and Christ in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup> is cited in this interest. The universal resurrection there, however, does not mean that all shall be made certain of blessedness. The point is either, as some take it, that all who are Christ's shall be raised (the 'all' being limited by the nature of the case); or, as others think, that, as in Adam all are made subject to physical death, so in Christ all shall be raised out of it. The statement in the same chapter (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>) on the subduing of all things, and the consummation in which God shall be 'all in all,' is also supposed to imply Paul's hope of a final restoration of all. But the subjects to be subdued are not sinful men, but 'all rule and all authority and power'—all powers opposed to God; and the end expressed by the 'all in all' is a condition of things in which the world in all its parts will answer to God's will, or in which the will of God will be recognized as the sole authority. The declaration of the universal adoration that is to be paid to the exalted Christ (Ph 2<sup>10-11</sup>) is also cited as a distinct witness to the same; in which, however, there is probably nothing beyond the broad statement of a homage wide as universal nature, or an acknowledgment of sovereignty made by three great classes of living beings—those which are most definite and those which are most indefinite—one in Ephesians (1<sup>9-10</sup>) which speaks of a 'reconciliation' of all things in Christ, and the one in Colossians (1<sup>20</sup>) which speaks of a 'reconciliation' of all things. In these the terms are large enough to include all created things, and go beyond the case of universal man, or even the whole animate creation. They are passages which express the cosmic effects of Christ's work, and appear best interpreted as declarations of the Divine purpose to bring back all things to their pristine condition of harmony, through Christ as the centre of unity and bond of reconciliation.

The Pauline eschatology has its point of culmination in its doctrine of the resurrection. That doctrine is a consistent as well as a lofty one. It does not limit itself to a resurrection of the just, but has its place also for that of the unjust. Neither does it regard the resurrection of the just and that of the unjust as two successive acts, separated by a millennial period, the passage (1 Co 15<sup>20-28</sup>) chiefly relied on for that being insufficient to sustain it. Nor does it seem to predicate the provision of an interim body, as some have argued on the basis of a single paragraph (2 Co 5<sup>1-8</sup>), for the existence between death and the resurrection. Nor, again, does it entangle itself with questions regarding the how of the resurrection, the nature of the risen body, or the conditions of the future life, but contents itself with the simplest analogies drawn from nature and from Christ's own case. It affirms for man a real and complete resurrection of being, not an incorporeal immortality like that to which Greek thought looked, but a permanent life in the entire nature. It connects its doctrine of the resurrection with other cardinal Pauline doctrines—the indwelling of the Spirit, the inward presence of Christ, the mystical union. It links it further with the doctrine of a renovated earth and a ransomed creation (Ro 8<sup>19-23</sup>).

The eschatology of the NT, therefore, is in its broad outlines a consistent though not a systematized doctrine. In the different sections of NT, and with all differences in detail, the eschatology turns on the great truths of the Parousia, the bodily resurrection, the universal, righteous judgment, the final awards of recompense and penalty. It is in essential harmony with the faith and teaching of the OT, and requires for its explanation no theories of derivation from ethnic thought. The distinctive points in the Pauline eschatology are in affinity with Hebrew faith, not, as some argue (Pfleiderer, etc.), with Greek thought. The same is even more obviously the case with the eschatology of the NT writings outside the Pauline circle. Essene or Alexandrian (Philonic) ideas are not in place as sources of Christ's teaching on the things of the end. Even the doctrine of the resurrection as it is given in the NT cannot be said to be dependent, in the sense affirmed by some (L. H. Mill, etc.), on the Zoroastrian theology. It is possible that in some of its affirmations the NT eschatology has been influenced to a certain extent in its form by external modes of thought. In all that is of its substance it is in relation to Hebrew faith, and has its point of issue in the principles and ideas of the Old Testament.

LITERATURE.—The various books on NT Theology, the Biblical Theology of NT, the Teaching of Christ and the Apostles, by Baur, Neander, Reuss, Lechler, Schmid, Oosterzee, Mayer, Wendt, Holtzmann, etc.; the various Times and Jewish beliefs: Colani, Heils; Schurer, Hist. of Palestine; New Test. Times; Weber, Jud. Theologie; Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology; S. Davidson, Doctrine of Last Things; Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality; Pusey, What is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment? White, Life in Christ; Petavel-Oliff, Problem of Kabisch, Eschatologie des Paulus; Russell, Riemann, Lehre von der Apocatastasis. S. D. F. SALMOND.

ESCHEW.—In the older versions 'eschew' is common, and is used in two senses. — 1. To 'escape,' as Pr 11<sup>15</sup> Wyc. 'He that escheweth snaris, schal be sikur'; cf. Knox, Hist. p. 70, 'If they will not convert themselves from their wicked error, there shall hastily come upon them the wrath of God, which they shall not eschew.' Of this meaning AV has retained no example.

2. To 'turn away from,' as Pr 17<sup>16</sup> Wyc. 'He that eschewith to lerne, schal falle in to yuels.' Of this AV preserves three examples in OT, Job 11<sup>8-9</sup>, all in the phrase 'to fear God and e. evil' (Heb. יָרָא אֱלֹהִים וְעָלָה); and one in NT, 1 P 3<sup>11</sup> 'Let him eschew evil, and do good' (Gr. ἐκκλίνω). Cf. Is 7<sup>16</sup> Cov. 'But or euer that childe come to knowledge, to eschue the enel and chose the good.' RV prefers 'turn away from' in 1 P. Amer. RV in Job also. Eschew came into the Eng. lang. from the Old High Ger. sciuhen (through the Fr. eschever), whence came also 'shy,' adj. and verb.

J. HASTINGS.

ESDRAELON.—This is the Gr. name of the city of Jezreel. Heb. name Jezreel—יֶזְרְעֵל. Gr. name Jezreel. E. edge, gave its name to the city of Jezreel. Palestine. It is variously given, e.g. Jth 3<sup>9</sup> Ἰσδραὴλ (B Ἰσδραήλ); 7<sup>3</sup> A Ἰσδραήλ (B Ἰσδραήλ); 4<sup>8</sup> B Ἰσραήλ, A Ἰσραήλ. The name by which it is now known among the natives is Merj Ibn-Amr 'Meadow of the son of Amr.'

At one time the mountain range must have stretched unbroken from the uplands of Samaria, behind Jenin, to those of Galilee, which run N. into the Lebanon. Now it is as if a gigantic mass had been torn from the bosom of the range, leaving the rough protuberances of Gilboa, Little Hermon, and Tabor, along the edge of the Jordan Valley, and thrust violently towards the sea, in a N.W. direction. This mass forms the wooded bulk of Carmel, which, rising to a height of over 1800 feet, terminates in a bold promontory, reaching the S. end of the Bay of Acre. The dominating floor of this great gap among the hills forms the 'valley' or plain of Esdraelon. The name by which it is mentioned 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup>, Zec 12<sup>4</sup>, אֶרֶץ חֶסְרוֹן, 'an opening,' from חָסַר 'to split' or 'cleave asunder,' as distinguished from אֶרֶץ חֲסוֹן 'a depression' or 'deepening,' applied to its offshoot, the vale of Jezreel, suits the conditions admirably. The word still persists in El-Beká, the great hollow between the Lebanons; and in its dim. form, El-Bakei'a, a village with a tract of fertile land around it, enclosed by ridges, high in the mountains of Naphtali. So the plain of E. is shut in by hills on every side. It may be described generally as triangular in form. It is bounded by irregular lines, drawn from the foot of Carmel, along the N. edge of the low hills which join Carmel to the Samaritan mountains, to Jenin; from Jenin to the base of Mt. Tabor; and thence under the Nazareth hills, back again to Carmel. The S. boundary is the longest, extending some 20 miles; the other two are nearly equal, being each about 15 miles in length. From Jenin a little bay runs east into the bosom of Gilboa, but finds no outlet. Between Gilboa and Little Hermon a broad and easy descent passes down as far as Beisán, and then, with a sudden leap, plunges to the level of the Jordan Valley. This is properly the vale of Jezreel. Between Little Hermon and Tabor another offshoot of the plain makes its way down to the Ghor, throwing off a spur to the N.E. of Tabor. Westward the plain narrows to a gorge between the lower hills of Galilee and Carmel, through which the Kishon forces a passage to the sea, and thence to the sea. We have one continuous plain from the sea-shore of the Jordan Valley. There is the plain of Acre, leading up to the gorge at the E. end of Carmel; the great central plain spreading N. and S., and leading to the base of Gilboa and Little Hermon, the general elevation of which is about 200 ft. above sea-level; then the vale of Jezreel, which, in the 12 miles from Zer'in to Beisán, sinks about 600 ft., before falling steeply into the Jordan Valley.

For the most part, the plain consists of deep, rich, loamy soil. After the removal of the crops, where it is cultivated, the autumnal suns burn the surface almost to brick; and when the rains come, it sucks them in like a sponge. The soil becomes a nearly impenetrable mass, very dangerous to cross; disaster not seldom befalling those who travel even by the most frequented and thoroughly beaten tracks. Its fertility has always been remarkable, ever rewarding the toils of the husbandmen. You may pass over many acres where the man on horseback can just see over the tall stalks of grain. Where left to itself, the rank luxuriance it produces is proof enough of what it might do in skilful hands. Of trees, in the plain there are few, but on its borders, esp. at Jenin, there are clumps of olives and other fruit trees, the stately palm waving high over all. The low hills that run down towards Carmel from the N. are thickly covered by oak trees, and are known among the natives as 'the forest.'

The only stream of importance in the plain is the Kishon, visible, for the most part, only from its own steep banks. Rising at Jenin, it pursues its crooked course, justifying its name 'the tortuous,' along a deep muddy bed, gathering contributions from other parts of the plain, and carrying on to Carmel, to the sea. The stream, at Jenin, where, creating the gardens, they gave rise to the ancient name En-Gannim; at Jezreel, where, in close proximity, are three springs, the principal being Ain Jalúd, just under the northern cliff of Gilboa, identified with the well of Harod. The stream which these three supply flows eastward to Jordan. At Lejján, the ancient Megiddo, there are also copious springs, sufficient to form considerable marshes to the N., besides turning several mills, and serving largely for irrigation.

The plain owed its importance chiefly to its central position, and to the great highways that lay athwart it. The main gateways of entrance were five in number. (1) That coming down from the N. between Tabor and the Nazareth hills, passing by the fortress on the mountain. (2) That coming up the vale of Jezreel, commanded by this city. (3) The approach from the S. by Jenin. (4) That up Wady Arub into the plain by the old stronghold of Megiddo, now Lejján. (5) That through the pass under Carmel, from the plain of Acre, dominated by Harodeth—Harith—on the N., and by Jokneam of Carmel on the edge of the plain. By one or other of these portals the merchant caravans and the armies of contending powers had to enter, and find exit, on their passage N., S., E., or W. These strongholds, together with Bethshean—Beisán, Shunem—Sólām, Nain, on the N.W. shoulder of Little Hermon, Daberath—Deburiyeh, on the W. slope of Tabor, and Chesul-loth—Isaël, under the Nazareth hills, were the chief cities around the plain. At no time have towns of any importance been built on the plain itself.

E. formed the main part of the 'lot' of Issachar (Jos 19<sup>17-22</sup>). This tribe seems to have reverted at once to the old nomadic life, 'dwelling in tents' (Dt 33<sup>18</sup>), and the fatness of the land becoming a snare to them, they were ignobly content to secure its enjoyment by stooping as servants 'under task-work' (Gn 49<sup>14</sup>). The 'men who had understanding of the times,' of the children of Issachar, who came to David at Hebron (1 Ch 12<sup>32</sup>), were probably astrologers, and skilled in the arts of divination, so popular from of old among the children of the wilds. This goes to show how closely the inhabitants of the plain were identified with their Bedawi neighbours. In the same chapter, v. 40, we have an indication of the character of its ancient produce. The men of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali 'brought bread on asses, and on camels, and on mules, and on oxen, victual of meal, cakes of figs, and clusters of raisins, and wine, and oil, and oxen, and sheep in abundance.'

Four battles, famous in Israel's history, were fought in this plain. On the banks of Kishon Sisera was overthrown, 'the stars in their courses' contributing to his defeat (Jg 5<sup>20</sup>). In the hollow between Gilboa and Little Hermon, the swarms of 'the children of the East' perished in the midnight alarm, before Gideon and his brave 300 (Jg 7). Saul and Jonathan, driven back by the victorious Philistines, retired to the heights, and were slain on the 'high places' of Gilboa (1 S 31). Josiah's disastrous mistake, in attempting to arrest the progress of Pharaoh-necho in the valley of Megiddo, was paid for with his life. Wounded in the battle, he was carried to Jerus. dead (2 K 23<sup>30</sup>) or dying (2 Ch 35<sup>20-27</sup>). Imperishable memories of Elijah's encounter with the prophets of Baal cling to its western border. Up from the way of the Jordan came Jehu, driving furiously, to the slaughter of Ahab's house, and across the plain fled Ahaziah, to perish by Megiddo. The army of Holofernes spread out from the hills above Jenin to Cysamon—Tell Kaimin (Jth 7<sup>3</sup>). During the long period of the Jewish wars, the plain often resounded with the tramp of armies and the noise of battle. In the vision of the Jewish-Christian seer (Rev 16<sup>14, 16</sup>), the most fitting place whither 'the kings of the whole world shall be gathered together unto the war of the great day of God, the Almighty,' is the level reaches, so often drenched in blood, which take their name from 'the place which is called in the Heb. tongue Har-Magedon.'

Open of old to the eastern tribesmen, who kept the peasants in constant fear, the Romans inaugurated a period of security, and the people made progress in the arts of civilization. But with the fall of the eastern empire, the Arab hordes rushed back, and restored the ancient conditions. In recent years the Turks have established more effectual control over the nomads; and the peasants, delivered from the rapacity of the Arab, have been handed over to the tender mercies of certain Greek capitalists in Beirut. We may doubt if their burdens have thus been lightened.

LITERATURE.—G. A. Smith, HGIL 331-410; Baedeker, Pal 3 229; Furrer in Schenkels Bibl. iii. 302; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 179 f.; Porter, Great Cities of Bashan, 245 f.; PEFS, 1872, 1891; 1873, 3 ff., 46, 60; 1875, 40, 1879, 13; Conder, Tent-Work, 58 ff.; Moore, Judges, 197 f.; Schurer, HJP i. 11. 89.

W. EWING.

ESDRAS, FIRST BOOK OF.—TITLE.—The titles of the books that deal with the history of Ezra are confusing. In the Sept. this book is entitled Esdras A, Esdras B embracing the canonical books of Ezra and Nehemiah. In the Vulg., however, Jerome had used the words Esdras I. and II. for the canonical books; Esdras A therefore became Esdras III., Esdras IV. being the designation of the other and later Apocryphal book. In the sixth article of the Book of Common Prayer, and in all the early Eng. Bibles, the four books are numbered as in the Vulgate. The Geneva Bible (1560) was the first to adopt our present classification, which keeps the Heb. names Ezra and Nehemiah for the canonical, and gives the Latin names Esdras I. and Esdras II. to the Apocryphal books.

Esdras I. appears as the heading of Esdras A in Cod. A of the LXX, which also has Esdras B; the subscriptions in both books give the ordinary names.

Yet another name for our book appears in the subscription to the Old Latin, 'Explicit Esdras de templi restitutione,' which aptly describes the contents of the book. To avoid confusion, 'The Greek Esdras' has been suggested as a suitable title.

CONTENTS.—Except for one original section (3<sup>1-5</sup>), the book is made up wholly from materials that exist in canonical books. It is a repetition of the history of the rebuilding of the temple. The first chapter corresponds to the last two of 2 Ch, the last to a portion of Neh 8; the intervening chapters parallel to Ezra, and contains the Apocryphal book, with one transposition and one interpolation.

The following scheme gives the canonical parallels, and shows the confusion of the book. (The Apocryphal book is the Camb. LXX.)

Es 1=2 Ch 35, 36. Great passover of Josiah; his defeat at Megiddo; the Jewish reigns and the Apocryphal book. Delivery of the sacred vessels to Jerusalem. The rebuilding of the temple in Samaria to Artaxerxes. The work hindered through the court of Darius. The third year of Darius. Lists of those returning with Zerubbabel. Tabernacles celebrated; the work hindered through the enemies' to the temple. Darius. Letter of the Persian governors to Darius, and his favourable rescript. The abuse of mixed marriages. Reading of the law by Ezra.

The history goes directly backwards: first Artaxerxes (2<sup>15-25</sup>), then Darius (3-5<sup>6</sup>), lastly Cyrus (5<sup>7-70</sup>), instead of Cyrus, Darius, Artaxerxes. After expressly stating that it was Darius who gave permission to Zerubbabel to return, the writer in 5<sup>7</sup> clearly refers this return to the time of Cyrus.

The book is incomplete. It breaks off in the middle of a sentence, καὶ ἐπεὶ οὕτως ἐποίησεν Neh 8<sup>18</sup>. It is continued till the end of the book; described in Neh 8, but goes further; this is suggested by Jos. Ant. XI. v. 5, who describes that feast, using an Esdras word; and at this point, having hitherto used his authority, passes on to the Book of Neh. The Latin versions add a clause completing the broken sentence of the Greek. There is no indication that the book ever began at an earlier point in the history than it does now.

RECEPTION AND USE OF THE BOOK.—The first witness to the existence of Es A is Josephus, who uses it in place of the canonical book not only in his description of the Return (Ant. XI. i. v.), but also in his account of Josiah (Ant. X. iv. 5 ff.). He agrees with Es in shifting the first opposition to the work, and the letter to the Persian king, from its place in the canonical Ezr, altering Artaxerxes to Cambyses to correct the chronological error; he introduces the story of the three pages; with Es he passes directly from the end of Ezr to Neh 8; and he borrows a good deal of the language of our book. His preference for it was probably due to its more elegant Gr. style, and a desire not to omit the interesting matter contained in it. He occasionally supplements his authority by information derived apparently from the Heb. Ezr; the indications of his knowledge of the Gr. Es B are too slight to warrant the supposition that he made any use of that book (but see XI. i. 3, § 15, ψυκτῆρες; XI. v. 2, § 136). His narrative is worthless as history, since in trying to remove the inaccuracies of his original he has only introduced greater confusion himself.

Our book is . . . Christian Fathers, both Gr. and . . . Alex. Strom. i. 392, Potter (Εστράδης Ζωροάστρης), Orig. Hom. in Josuam, § 10, Comm. in Johann. vi. 1; Eusebius, Comm. in Ps. 78, § 19; Athanasius, Orat. cont. Arianos, ii. 20. Tertullian, De Cor. Mil. 3, perhaps refers to . . .

truth, and strong above all things' (ὑπερπαντα). (The patristic references are collected in the book . . .)

to translate the 'dreams' of 3 and 4 Esdras. His words are (Præf. in Ezram), 'Tertius annus est quod semper scribitur atque rescribitur, ut Esdræ librum et . . . moveat . . . tertius et . . . Nehemiæque sermones in unum volumen coarctantur; et quæ non habentur apud . . . sunt, procul abicienda.' . . . touched by him, and the book is absent from the older MSS of the Vulg. (e.g. Cod. Amiatinus).

It was probably owing to the influence of this estimate of Jerome, that the Tridentine Fathers in 1546 excluded 1 Es from the Canon. 1 and 2 Es, with the Prayer of Manasses, are the only books admitted as apocryphal into the Romish Bibles, the rest of our Apoc. being declared canonical by the Council of Trent. In modern editions of the Vulg. they form an Appendix, being placed after the NT, with a prefatory note stating that they are placed 'hoc in loco extra scilicet seriem canonicorum librorum . . . ne prorsus interirent, quippe qui a nonnullis sanctis Patribus citantur, et in aliquibus Bibliis tam manuscriptis quam impressis reperiuntur.' In the Eng. Bible our book stands first in the Apocrypha.

RELATION TO THE CANONICAL EZRA.—On this question, the most interesting which arises in connexion with the book, the most opposite opinions have been held. The various theories resolve themselves into three.

1. It is regarded as a mere compilation from the Gr. of the LXX (2 Ch and Es B). Those books, according to this theory, have been worked over and modified for the sake of Greek readers, to whom the Hebraic style of the LXX version rendered it unintelligible. Such is the view of Keil, Schürer (in Herzog, Encycl. i. 496, 'nach der Septuaginta übersetzung bearbeitet,' and HJP ii. iii. 177 ff. Eng. tr.), and Bissell (in Lange's OT Comm.). In favour of this view it is urged (i.) that our book often agrees literally with the LXX in the Gr. use of certain rare and unfamiliar words; (ii.) that the LXX is often followed in its deviations from the Heb. text; and (iii.) that in the case of deviations from both Heb. and LXX, the readings of Es A are more easily referred to the latter than to the former. The best instances of (i.) are Es A 8<sup>88</sup> ὁ κοφίσις τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν = Es B 9<sup>43</sup> ἐκούφισας ἡμῶν τὰς ἀνομίας, RV 'punished us less than our iniquities deserve'; Es A 9<sup>51</sup> = Es B 18<sup>10</sup> φάγεται λιπάσματα. For (ii.) may be quoted Es A 1<sup>10</sup> καὶ οὕτω τὸ πρῶτον = 2 Ch 35<sup>12</sup> καὶ οὕτως εἰς τὸ πρῶτον, against Heb. 'and so they did with the oxen.' The two Heb. words קָרָן ('oxen') and בֹּקֶר ('morn-ing') are indistinguishable without the vowel points; the agreement need not prove the use of one version by the other. More striking is Es A 1<sup>11</sup> μετ' εὐωδίας καὶ ἀπῆνεγκαν, compared with 2 Ch 35<sup>13</sup> καὶ εὐωδῶθη καὶ ἔδραμον. This looks like a confusion of εὐωδέω and εὐωδῶ; the Heb. וְעָרְבָה בָּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל 'and in pans.' But here Es renders בָּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל correctly by ἀπῆνεγκαν, which ἔδραμον fails to do, thus showing independent knowledge of the Hebrew. Compare also Es A 1<sup>28</sup> πολεμεῖν αὐτὸν ἐπεχέλει, and 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup> ἀλλ' ἡ πολεμεῖν αὐτὸν ἐκράταισθαι, with the Heb. 'disguised himself that he might fight with him.'

A comparison of the two books, however, renders it impossible to maintain the view any longer, that Es A is compiled solely from the Gr. of the other books. There are numerous passages where Es preserves the Heb. more closely than the LXX, or points to a different word in the Heb. original. An examination of all the passages given by Bissell (p. 69) in support of the opposite opinion will show that there is not one where Es does not preserve some touch in the Heb. which is missed in the LXX Ezr, which cannot therefore have been the only authority possessed by our author in those parts which agree with the canonical book. It still remains possible that Es A is a mere recension of the canonical books by the help of the Heb.; but the Gr. of the two books is of such a different character as to make it improbable that this is the true view of the relation between them.

2. It is regarded as a working over of an earlier Gr. translation of Ch, Ezr, and Neh, but a translation quite distinct from the LXX. This view is held by Ewald (Hist. of Isr. v. 126–128, Eng. tr.). He first gives the alternative that the writer 'was either a translator of the books of Ch, or else found them already translated, and worked up the tr.,' and then decides in favour of the latter view (p. 128 n.). 'He found the work of the chronicler tolerably freely translated from the original. This tr. was different from that of the LXX, and no doubt much older.'

This theory admits an independent tr. of the Heb. as the basis of the book, but denies that the compiler was himself the translator; it presupposes a lost Gr. version of Ch, Ezr, Neh. It gives a satisfactory explanation of the coincidences in tr. and deviation from the Heb. in Es A and Es B, if we suppose that both are to some extent dependent on a lost Gr. original. We should then have in the two books a parallel case to the two Gr. versions of Dn, the LXX very paraphrastic, Theod. fairly literal, both being dependent on an earlier version (Smith, Dict. Christ. Biog. art. 'Theodotion').

3. It is held to be a direct and independent tr. from the Heb., and from a text in some instances superior to the Massoretic; Es B was entirely unknown to the writer. This view is held by Michaelis, Trendelenburg (in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek der bibl. litt. 1787), Pohlmann (in Tübingen Quartalschrift, 1859, p. 257), Herzfeld, Fritzsche, and others. It is simpler than the last, but fails to account for the coincidences in the two books. The question whether (2) or (3) is the true view depends also on the date which, on linguistic and other grounds, we are led to assign to the work. It cannot be said to have been yet decided which is right, but (2) appears to satisfy all the requirements of the problem, while (3) does not.

The two translations are of an essentially no clear traces of Hebraisms (Fritzsche adduces 4<sup>29</sup> τὰ δίκαια ποιεῖ ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἀδικῶν = πρὸς πᾶσι πᾶσι), and the παρανομία ἀνεῖν καὶ ἀφεῖν in 4<sup>32</sup> points to a Gr. original. The compiler seems to have been acquainted with traditions of Persian history. The account of Darius and Apame the daughter of Bartacus (4<sup>29</sup>, Jos. gives his name as Παβέ(α)κος, so the Latin . . . is perhaps derived from some book of Persian court stories.* The presence of Zerubbabel at the court of Darius is, of course, an anachronism: it was Cyrus who despatched him to Jerusalem. It is noticeable that in 5<sup>1</sup>, acc. to the most natural construction, it is Joachim the son of Zerubbabel who spake wise words before Darius. In 4<sup>53</sup> the speaker is merely called ὁ νεανίσκος (a name hardly suitable to Z.), and at his first introduction in 4<sup>13</sup> the third speaker is identified in a parenthesis only ὁ πρῶτος . . . ὁ τρίτος ἐστὶν Ζοροβαβέλ, which is certainly a later addition. This has led to the conjecture that Joachim was the hero of the story, and that there were two expeditions—one in the time of Cyrus led by Zerubbabel, one under Darius led by Joachim (Fritzsche and Reuss). But no Joachim is mentioned among the sons of Z. in 1 Ch 3<sup>19</sup>. These inconsistencies certainly show the composite nature of the book. It would appear that an earlier Pers. story was adopted by the Jews of Alexandria and became attached to Zerubbabel; the speakers in the original story were Persian courtiers (3<sup>4</sup> οἱ σωματοφύλακες). The second of the theses maintained by the third speaker—the superiority of the truth—may also be a Jewish addition to the original, though the eulogy of truth would not be out of place in a Persian story, since the Persians were taught from boyhood 'to ride, to use the bow, and to speak the truth' (Hdt. i. 136).

The story is told in what perhaps was thought a more plausible way in Josephus (Ant. xi. iii. 2). There Darius, unable to sleep, proposes a reward to that one of his three pages who shall best prove his thesis: to the first he gives the thesis, that 'wine is the strongest'; to the second, 'the third is the strongest'; to the third, 'whether women are stronger than men or men stronger than they?'. The speeches are given in the third day. In Es the king makes no promise of reward, but the pages suggest it, and while he sleeps they each write the subject which he means to maintain, and put it under the king's pillow for him to find in the morning. The speeches before the Pers. monarch are not unlike the answers of the 72 translators at the court of Ptolemy (2 Es 1<sup>1</sup>), described in the letter of Aristeas. The third speech (4<sup>43</sup>), and the feasting 'with music and gladness' (4<sup>63</sup>), may be illustrated from that work. But there is hardly sufficient ground for saying, with Ewald, that 'the book of Aristeas must have been already known to the author.' The story in Es is a composition of the same class, and probably of the same time as the Aristeas letter.

It should be noted that in the third speech there is an allusion to Gn 2<sup>24</sup> (Es 4<sup>29</sup> ἀνδρὶς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ πατέρα ἐγκαταλείπει . . . καὶ πρὸς τὴν ἰδίαν γυναῖκα κολλᾷται).

OBJECT OF THE BOOK.—The body of the book appears, as has been shown, to be the earliest version of the work of the Chronicler. It was written to render Gr.-speaking Jews acquainted with the favour which through the Divine Providence was once shown to their nation by foreign monarchs. The original section (3-4) is perhaps the nucleus of the whole, round which the rest is grouped. One object of the compiler was to give currency to this story, from whatever source, Persian or Jewish, he had derived it. He may also have had an ulterior object in view. The exaggerated accounts of the munificence of Cyrus and Darius lead us to suppose that he aimed at

* The name Apame is Oriental, though not found till the Macedonian period. No such person occurs among the wives of Darius I. The first of the name was the wife of Seleucus Nikator, Alexander's general, and daughter of Artabazus (Strabo). Does this last name give the explanation of the name Bartacus or Παβέ(α)κος?

the Jews 'the favour of a Ptolemaic or power' (Ewald).

TIME AND PLACE OF COMPOSITION.—The extreme limits between which the book must be placed are given on the one hand by the date of the composition of the Heb. books of Ezr and Neh, which is fixed as late as B.C. 300 (Ryle, Cann. Bible, Introd. xxvi), on the other by the date of Josephus, A.D. 100. Within these rather wide limits it is difficult to define the time more accurately with any certainty. As Fritzsche remarks, the writer has kept his own personality in the background and nowhere left any traces of his own time (Einleitung, p. 9). Still there remain a few indications to be mentioned. The similarity to Aristeas, as we have seen, shows nothing more than that the Zerubbabel story is of the same character and probably the same time as that book (circa B.C. 150).

1. But Ewald notes further (Abhand. über d. Sibyll. Buch. p. 36) that this story was known and referred to by the writer of the oldest of the Sibylline books. Now, this book (iii. of the Sibylline Oracles) is definitely fixed to the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (B.C. 181-146). In it is an allusion to Persian kings helping forward the rebuilding of the temple in consequence of a dream: iii. 293-4, Ἀδὲρς γὰρ δόσει Θεὸς ἐννυχὸν ἄγρον δνειρον, καὶ τότε δὴ ναὺς πάλιν ἔσεται, ὡς πάρος ἦν περ. This, in Ewald's opinion, is suggested by Es 3-4. But in Es 4<sup>43-45</sup> there is no mention of a dream, but only a vow, which influenced Darius. Still, as the dream is not alluded to elsewhere, it is not unlikely that the Sibyllist had some older form of story before him, from which our Esdras also borrowed.

2. The book has, further, some parallels with the LXX version of Dn and Est. The opening of Es 3 seems to be imitated from the opening of Est 1<sup>1-3</sup>: the phrases ἐποίησεν δοχὴν, ἐν τῇ ᾗ μέχρη Αἰθιοπίας, and 'the hundred and seventy satrapies,' are common to both. Cf. also Es 3<sup>9</sup> οἱ τρεῖς μεγιστάνες τῆς Περσίδος with Est 1<sup>4</sup> LXX, Dn 6<sup>2</sup>. (The Heb. of Est as also Ezr 7<sup>4</sup> name seven Persian councillors.)

Between Es and Dn LXX are these the most striking is a clause which they have in common in the account of the treasures which Nebuchadnezzar recovered from Jerus. (Es 2<sup>9</sup>=Dn 1<sup>2</sup> LXX, καὶ ἀπηρεύσατο αὐτὰ ἐν τῷ εἰδωλίῳ αὐτοῦ). In this place since ἀπηρεύσασθαι is an Esdras word, occurring three times in this connexion in Es and nowhere else in Dn, and since εἰδωλίον renders the Heb. of Ezr (עֵדוּלִית) but not of Dn (עֵדוּלִית), Theod. ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ θησαυροῦ θεοῦ αὐτοῦ), it would seem that the obligation is on the side of the Dn translator.

But, in view of the other parallels between the books, another explanation is more probable, that the translations are the work of one and the same hand. In one place the same Aramaic phrase, 'And his house shall be made a dunghill,' is mistranslated in the same way (Es 6<sup>31</sup> καὶ τὰ οἰκία αὐτοῦ ἔσονται βασιλικὰ, Dn 2<sup>5</sup> καὶ ἀναλυσθήσεται οἰκία αὐτοῦ καὶ ὑπόδοχοντα εἰς τὸ βασιλικόν). It may be noted that both books are written in an idiomatic Gr. style foreign to most books of the LXX; both are very free translations; both have interpolations of a similar character (the three pages in Es, the three children in Dn); the original Heb. of both books has Aramaic sections in the same places. If this theory be true, the two Gr. books of Es and the two versions of Dn are very close.*

* The theory has already been suggested by Dr. Gwynn (Dict. Christ. Biog., s.v. Theodotion, p. 977); cf. Dn 2<sup>11</sup> ἡ δόξα αὐτοῦ (Es 6<sup>31</sup> τὸ εἶδος); δογματίζων (Dn 2<sup>14</sup>, Es 3<sup>9</sup>); Dn 3<sup>1</sup>, Es 3<sup>2</sup> οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς παριόντες (Dn 3<sup>1</sup>, Es 6<sup>31</sup> [A] only); use of ἕκαστος c. inf. ἕκαστος τῶ

3. Gruetz (Gesch. der Juden, 1863, p. 445) points to the use of ὑπατοι in 3<sup>4</sup>, and says that the Roman consulate is known to the writer. This would indicate a time later than the first interference of the Romans in the East, i.e. later than B.C. 200.

4. On the other hand, the term Κολή Συρία which so frequently occurs is used in the sense which it bore during the Gr. period, meaning all S. Syria except Phœnicia. Before the coming of the Romans to Palestine (c. B.C. 63, the date of Pompey's taking of Jerus.) this name had acquired a new significance, being restricted to the country E. of the Jordan (G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 538). The way in which this phrase is used appears, therefore, to afford certain proof that the book is at least as old as the first half of the last century before the Christian era.

Whether it goes back to the 2nd cent. B.C. is more uncertain.

5. That such is the case is the opinion of Herzfeld (Ges. d. Volk. Isr. 1863, vol. ii. p. 73), who dates it before the Maccabean wars, on the ground that after that date, when the books of Ezr and Neh had become canonical (Kyle, Cam. Bible, Ezr. and Neh. lvi), a translator would not have been bold enough to excerpt and rearrange materials from those books.

6. This view is also supported by Lupton, who regards it as edited at the time (B.C. 170) when Onias, having fled from the persecution in Pal. under Antiochus Epiphanes, petitioned for leave from Ptolemy Philometor to build a temple for the Alexandrian Jews at Heliopolis on the site of a ruined Egypt. temple of Bubastis. At that time 'a work which described the rebuilding of the temple, and the beneficence of foreign kings to the work, and which also introduced the story of Josiah, slain in an invasion of Syria by the Egyptians, would have a special interest.' The account of the building of the Egypt. temple (δμοιον τῷ ἐν Ἱερουσόλυμοις, μικρότερον δὲ καὶ πενιχρότερον) is given in Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 1; the reader is referred to the interesting remarks of Lupton (Speaker's Comm., Apoc. vol. i. 11-14). This is, of course, no more than conjectural, and it is unsafe to base any argument upon it; if the theory about the relation to the LXX Dn be correct, the date given is rather too early. The limits within which the book may be placed may be taken to be B.C. 170-100. Most editors, however, assign it to the 1st cent. B.C. (De Wette, Ewald, Fritzsche).

As to the place where the compiler lived, the character of the translation seems to show that it was written for Alexandrian Jews rather than for natives of Palestine, for whom the original Hebrew of the Chronicler would suffice. One slight allusion in 4<sup>23</sup> to 'sailing upon the sea and upon the rivers' for the purpose of 'robbing and stealing' is thought to point to Egypt. Certain small peculiarities of the language also indicate Alexandria as the place of writing: οἱ φλοὶ τοῦ βασιλέως (8<sup>28</sup>) takes the place of Es B οἱ σύμβουλοι (οἱ πρῶτοι φλοὶ were the third in the scale of courtiers at the Alexandrian court): in 2<sup>18</sup> ἀν φάινεται σοὶ is inserted. The phrase ἐὰν φαίνεται ('if it seem good') occurs in Aristeas (in Merx' Archiv. i. 1870, p. 19), and repeatedly in Egyptian papyri.

Fritzsche, on the other hand, concludes that the writer was a Palestinian from his knowledge of sites in Jerusalem, referring to 5<sup>40</sup> εἰς τὸ εὐρύχωρον τοῦ πρῶτου πυλῶνος τοῦ πρὸς τῇ ἀνατολῇ (= Es B εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ). Cf. also 9<sup>38</sup> ἐπὶ τὸ εὐρύχωρον τοῦ πρὸς ἀποδοῦναι (Dn 3<sup>15</sup>, Es 8<sup>25</sup>); καῖναι = 'to burn' (Dn 3<sup>28</sup>, Es 4<sup>22</sup>); ἐκρημῖν (Dn 4<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>20</sup>, Es 1<sup>13</sup>); ὑποστῆναι (Dn 5<sup>7</sup>, Es 3<sup>10</sup> only); Dn 6<sup>1</sup>, Es 3<sup>1</sup>; use of ὑποστῆναι (Sus 5<sup>14</sup>, Es 8<sup>17</sup>). The parallels are chiefly in the first six chapters of Dn.

ἀνατολὰς ἱεροῦ πυλῶνος (= Neh 8<sup>1</sup> εἰς τὸ πλάτος τὸ ἐμπροσθεν πύλης τοῦ ὕδατος).

MSS AND TEXT.—Es A exists in two out of the three oldest MSS of the LXX, viz. Cod. Vaticanus (B) and Cod. Alexandrinus (A). It is not found in either of the portions of the Sinaitic MS (κ) discovered by Tischendorf (Cod. Friderico-Augustanus and Cod. Sinaiticus Petropolitanus); but this is perhaps due only to the fact that that MS is incomplete, and, except for some few fragments of the Pent. and a portion of 1 Ch, contains in its present form no part of the OT earlier than Es B 9, after which it is fairly complete. There has been a curious error in connexion with the Esdras books; 13 chapters of 1 Ch having been inserted in the middle of Es B. (A. contains one leaf with 1 Ch 9<sup>27</sup>-11<sup>22</sup>; Cod. F.-A. has four more leaves headed Es B, but in reality containing 1 Ch 11<sup>22</sup>-19<sup>17</sup>; but in the fourth column of the verso of the fourth leaf we suddenly pass in the middle of a line with no break from Ch (καὶ ἐπολέμουν αὐτὸν) to Es B 9<sup>9</sup> (κς ὁ θς ἡμῶν καὶ ἐκλινεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ἐλεος). A note at the bottom of that leaf in a later hand calls attention to the seven superfluous leaves that are 'not of Esdras' (τὸ τέλος τῶν ἐπτά φύλλον τῶ περισσῶν κ μὴ ὄντων τοῦ ἐσδρα). Of these seven leaves we now possess five; and reckoning back we find that the MS must have begun about 1 Ch 6<sup>50</sup> (list of sons of Aaron). This error, whereby fragments of 1 Ch have been interpolated into the middle of Es B, is probably due to a mistake in binding in the copy from which the MS was made (Westcott, Bible in the Church, p. 307, Append. B); a less probable explanation is given by Lupton (Intro. p. 1). The presence of the title Es B is not sufficient by itself to prove, as Lupton supposes, that Es A ever stood in Cod. κ; since the same MS contains only the first and fourth books of Maccabees with the headings μακκ. α', μακκ. δ', and the two intervening books entirely never found a place in the MS.

The problem is presented by the relation of the text of A to that of B in this book. The text of A is always the smoother and more correct. The text of B is always the rougher and more corrupt. These corrections may be attributed to an 'Alexandrian' revision of the text, removing grammatical solecisms and harsh phrases; such are 1<sup>33</sup> ἡννουν (B ἡννουν), 1<sup>38</sup> ἀπεκατέστησαν αὐτὸν (B αὐτὸν ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ), 1<sup>51</sup> τὰ καὶ (B τὰ καὶ), 3<sup>9</sup> ἐν κρίσει (B ἐν κρίσει), 3<sup>10</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>11</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>12</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>13</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>14</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>15</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>16</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>17</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>18</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>19</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>20</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>21</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>22</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>23</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>24</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>25</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>26</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>27</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>28</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>29</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>30</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>31</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>32</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>33</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>34</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>35</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>36</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>37</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>38</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>39</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>40</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>41</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>42</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>43</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>44</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>45</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>46</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>47</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>48</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>49</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>50</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>51</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>52</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>53</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>54</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>55</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>56</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>57</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>58</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>59</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>60</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>61</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>62</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>63</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>64</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>65</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>66</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>67</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>68</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>69</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>70</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>71</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>72</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>73</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>74</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>75</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>76</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>77</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>78</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>79</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>80</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>81</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>82</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>83</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>84</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>85</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>86</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>87</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>88</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>89</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>90</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>91</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>92</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>93</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>94</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>95</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>96</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>97</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>98</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>99</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>100</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>101</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>102</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>103</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>104</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>105</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>106</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>107</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>108</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>109</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>110</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>111</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>112</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>113</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>114</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>115</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>116</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>117</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>118</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>119</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>120</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>121</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>122</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>123</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>124</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>125</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>126</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>127</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>128</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>129</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>130</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>131</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>132</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>133</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>134</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>135</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>136</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>137</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>138</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>139</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>140</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>141</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>142</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>143</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>144</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>145</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>146</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>147</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>148</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>149</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>150</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>151</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>152</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>153</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>154</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>155</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>156</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>157</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>158</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>159</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>160</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>161</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>162</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>163</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>164</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>165</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>166</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>167</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>168</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>169</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>170</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>171</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>172</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>173</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>174</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>175</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>176</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>177</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>178</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>179</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>180</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>181</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>182</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>183</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>184</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>185</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>186</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>187</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>188</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>189</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>190</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>191</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>192</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>193</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>194</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>195</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>196</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>197</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>198</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>199</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>200</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>201</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>202</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>203</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>204</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>205</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>206</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>207</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>208</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>209</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>210</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>211</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>212</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>213</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>214</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>215</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>216</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>217</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>218</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>219</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>220</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>221</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>222</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>223</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>224</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>225</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>226</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>227</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>228</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>229</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>230</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>231</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>232</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>233</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>234</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>235</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>236</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>237</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>238</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>239</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>240</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>241</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>242</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>243</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>244</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>245</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>246</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>247</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>248</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>249</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>250</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>251</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>252</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>253</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>254</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>255</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>256</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>257</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>258</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>259</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>260</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>261</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>262</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>263</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>264</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>265</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>266</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>267</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>268</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>269</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>270</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>271</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>272</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>273</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>274</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>275</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>276</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>277</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>278</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>279</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>280</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>281</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>282</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>283</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>284</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>285</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>286</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>287</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>288</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>289</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>290</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>291</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>292</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>293</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>294</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>295</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>296</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>297</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>298</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>299</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>300</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>301</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>302</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>303</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>304</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>305</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>306</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>307</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>308</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>309</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>310</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>311</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>312</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>313</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>314</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>315</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>316</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>317</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>318</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>319</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>320</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>321</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>322</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>323</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>324</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>325</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>326</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>327</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>328</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>329</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>330</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>331</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>332</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>333</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>334</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>335</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>336</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκρημῖν), 3<sup>337</sup> ἐκρημῖν (B ἐκ καταγράφει, καὶ ἐν ἐνέκλειστον, καὶ τ.λ. αὐτὸν τὸν 533 (ὁ 533) a line through confusion, perhaps, of ἡ 533: ἡ 533 (533), xl. v. 3 διερρηξεν τὴν ἐνέκλειστον (Es 533 διερρηξεν, B ἡ 533); xl. v. 4 ἡ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ (Es 91 ἡ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ, B ἡ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ).

These instances form a strong argument for the early existence if not the originality of the A text. The chief passage where Jos. appears to favour B is Es 533 (B καὶ ἡ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ καὶ τοῦ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ; A καὶ ἡ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ; Jos. xl. iv. 1 τοῦ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ καὶ τοῦ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ καὶ τοῦ 533 τοῦ ἑλαιοῦ).

On the MSS generally see Fritzsche, Einleitung, § 8.

Of VSS, Sabatier prints two Lat. versions, one of which he calls the Vulg., and a 'versio altera' ('ex MS Colbertino annorum circiter 800'). In reality they appear to be two distinct VSS of the O.L. Jerome left the O.L. untouched, and the Lat. now given in the Appendix to the Vulg. is not his work. A third Lat. version of Es A 3-4 (abbreviated) and of a few verses elsewhere in the book is given in Lagarde (Septuaginta Studien, ii. 1892) from a MS in the cathedral of Lucca written about 570. The book did not exist in the Peshitta Syriac, but is found in the Syro-Hexaplar of Paul of Tella (A.D. 616); the Syriac is given in Walton's Polyglot, 1657. There is a free rendering of the book in the Armenian version.

LITERATURE.—Fritzsche, Exeget. Handb. z. d. Apokr. i. (Leipzig, 1851), Introd. and Comm.; Fritzsche, Libri Apoc. Vet. Test. (Leipzig, 1871), a crit. ed. of the text; Zoedler, Die Apokryphen des Alten Testaments (Leipzig, 1871), i. 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

ESDRAS, SECOND BOOK OF.—TITLE.—The title which this book bears in the English Apocrypha is derived from the opening words of ch. i., 'the second book of the prophet Esdras'; but it is more commonly known by the name which is given it in most Latin MSS, 'The fourth book of Esdras.' The variation in the titles of the books of Esdras is due to two causes—(1) The adoption of the Latin name Esdras in the Vulg. for the canonical Ezr and Neh; (2) the composite nature of this book, the first two and the last two being later additions to the original. The most frequent arrangement in the MSS is 1 Es=Ezr-Neh; 2 Es=2 Es i. 2; 3 Es=1 Es; 4 Es=2 Es 3-14; 5 Es=2 Es 15. 16. The central portion of the book bears every number from one to four. The original Greek had probably no number attached to it. Two suggestions have been made for the original title—(1) Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης, adopted by Hilgenfeld in his restoration of the Greek, and based on a quotation of Clem. Alex. from Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης, and of Ambrose from 'propheta Ezra' (Mess. Jud. 18). The title would then be parallel to ὁ λευὶς attached to 1 Es in Cod. A. (2) Ἀποκάλυψις Ἐσδρα, suggested by Dr. Westcott, and found in a catalogue of the 60 books, canonical and apocryphal, made in Asia (Westcott, Canon, 559). The title is far the most suitable to the contents of the book, but has already become appropriated to a later and inferior Greek Apocalypse published by Tischendorf (Apocal. Apocrypha, 1866).

ORIGINAL LANGUAGE AND VERSIONS.—The original language of 2 Es was undoubtedly Greek; two quotations from the Greek exist, Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 16. 100 (= 2 Es 5<sup>30</sup>), and Apost. Constitut. viii. 7 (= 2 Es 8<sup>29</sup>). Otherwise we possess the book only in versions. The Latin version abounds in Grecisms, such as the use of the comparative with the genit. ('horum maiora,' 'omnium maior,' etc.), the genit. abs. (10<sup>9</sup>), the prepositions ad and pro with the inf. (7<sup>185</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>), de and ex followed by the gent., the double negative ('nihil nemini,' 'nunquam nemo'), redundant prepositions after verbs ('timere a,' 15<sup>3</sup>; 'multiplicare super,' 9<sup>16</sup>). The theory of a Heb. original, of which the Greek was a tr<sup>a</sup>, has now been given up; one Hebraism, which, however, had become naturalized in Greek, is of constant occurrence, namely, the use of the participle with a finite tense of the same verb (e.g. excedens excessit, 4<sup>2</sup>; proficiens profectus sum, 4<sup>13</sup>).

The popularity which this book has enjoyed is shown by the number of versions that have been made of it. For many years the text of the Latin depended on a few MSS, Codex Sangermanensis (S, A.D. 822), Cod. Turicensis (T, 13th cent.), Cod. Dresdensis (D, 15th cent.), which presented a text from which it was clear that a considerable section was missing between vv. 35 and 36 of the 7th chapter.

The other versions contained 70 additions in this place. In 1865 Prof. Gildemeister discovered that this 'missing fragment' had once been contained in Cod. S, from which a leaf had been purposely cut out in early times; and drew the certain and important conclusion that all MSS of 4 Es which do not contain the 'missing fragment' are ultimately derived from Cod. S. The 'missing fragment' of this missing fragment was made by R. L. Bensly, who in 1874 found a MS of the 9th cent. in the Bibliothèque Municipale of Amiens containing the entire Latin text; he thus had the unique distinction of adding a chapter to the 'missing fragment' for hitherto the verses in the Oriental MSS had not been universally considered genuine.

An account of the MS and its discovery, with a full commentary on the new passage, was published by him in the following year (The Missing Fragment of the Fourth Book of Ezra, Camb. 1875). It subsequently appeared that he had been anticipated in the discovery, for a transcript of the lost passage, made in 1826 from a Spanish MS, was found among the papers of Prof. Palmer: this was not published till 1877 (Journ. of Philology, vol. vii. 264). The excision of 7<sup>35-105</sup> was probably made for dogmatic reasons. The verses contain a description of the intermediate state of souls, and an emphatic denial of the efficacy of intercessions for the dead (v. 105), a point which called forth a severe reproof from Jerome ('Tu... proponis mihi librum apocryphum, qui sub nomine Esdræ a te et similibus tuis legitur: ubi scriptum est, quod post mortem nullus pro aliis audeat deprecari: quem ego librum nunquam legi,' Cont. Vigilant. c. 7), and this estimate not improbably accounts for the disappearance of the section from Cod. S. The number of known MSS which give a complete text of 2 Es has now been increased, through the discoveries of M. Berger, to five. A complete text of the book, based on four of these MSS and Cod. S, has at length been edited from Bensly's papers, with an introd. by Dr. James (see Texts and Studies, iii. 2, Camb. 1895); while the missing fragment has been restored to its place in the English Bible in the Revision of the Apocrypha. The Latin MSS fall into two groups: (1) those which preserve a French text. S (Sangermanensis) once in the Abbey of St. Germain des Prés, now in the Bibl. Nat. Paris, 11504-5, Fonds Latin, dated A.D. 822, the oldest extant MS, and the parent of numerous later MSS, and A (Ambianensis), Amiens, Bibl. Comm. 10, cent. ix., containing a text very similar to but independent of S, and agreeing with the quotations of Gildas the Briton in his Epistle (6th cent.); (2) a Spanish text, perhaps traceable to Pseudo-Jerome (Texts and Studies, xxxvi.), represented by three MSS. C (Complutensis), now at Madrid, cent. ix., from which Prof. Palmer signation of Rome; and the Herodian dynasty, if that is referred to, lasted on through the first century of our era. He also draws an argument from the description of the twelve ages of the world, of which ten and a half are past (14th), taken in connexion with 10th (Solomon built the temple in the year of the world 3000), from which he calculates about B.C. 30 as the date (Mess. Jud. 104); but the description of the world-ages is too uncertain (the Syr. omits the verses) to base any inference upon it. Another view is that the early date is that a Jew, writing of the death of Christ, would not have introduced a prophecy of the death of the Messiah (7th) which would have been employed against him by Christians. No inference can be drawn from the signs of the end (5th, 6th, 9th) as applicable rather to the portents that preceded the battle of Actium than to those in the time of Vespasian. On the other hand, the allusion to the fall of the walls of Jerus. (11th) 'eorum qui te non nocuerunt' was true of Titus, but not of the capture of the city by Pompey in B.C. 63.

But the question of the date really depends upon the interpretation given to the Eagle Vision. The details given about the reign of the several wings show that historic facts are here alluded to; the interpretation which follows the vision is perhaps insecure, and does not help much as to the date of it. The vision describes the reign of 12 'feathered wings,' 8 subordinate wings, and 3 heads—in all, of 23 kings; the attempt to take the wings in pairs, each pair representing a single king, their number being so reduced to 10 (Volkmar), is opposed to the interpretation given to Esdras (12th 'regnabunt xii reges, unus post unum,' 12th 'exsurgent octo reges'). The following points are to be borne in mind in the interpretation (Schürer, HJP III. ii. 100). (1) The author writes during the reign of the third head, in which the Messiah is to appear; the subsequent reign of the two last subordinate wings is not history, but prophecy. (2) The second wing reigns more than twice as long as any of the rest (11th). (3) Several wings do not get so far as to reign, and represent pretenders only. (4) The wings and heads all belong to one and the same kingdom. (5) The first head dies a natural death (12th); the second is murdered by the third, who also is to die by the sword (11th 12th). Three main explanations are proposed—(i.) The wings represent Rome under the kings and the republic, and the 3 heads are Sulla, Pompey, and Cæsar; the date of the work is shortly after Cæsar's death (Laurence, Van der Vlis, Lucke). This view has no probability. Early Roman history would have no interest to a Jew, and there is great difficulty in adapting the 8 minor wings to the period before Sulla. (ii.) Hilgner (1866) holds that the wings represent the Greek empire, the heads the Ptolemies (Jud. Apokalyptik, 217 ff.), or, according to his later theory, that of the Seleucids (Mess. Jud. liv ff.): in either case the three heads are Cæsar, Antony, and Octavian, and the book was written directly after Antony's death in B.C. 30, thirty years after the capture of Jerus. by Pompey (cf. 2 Es 3rd 'in the thirtieth year'). It is true that in 2 Es 11th the eagle is compared to the fourth beast of Daniel (7th=the Greek empire); but the fourth kingdom was often referred to the Romans. The chief objections to this view are—(1) The heads and the wings must all refer to a single kingdom, not to a combination of Roman and Greek rulers; (2) the rule of the second in the dynasty, whether Ptolemy I. Lagi or Seleucus I. Nikator, was not more than twice the length of any succeeding reign; (3) Cæsar was assassinated, and did not die in his bed, as the first head is said to have done.

(iii.) It is now the generally accredited view, and it has most arguments in its favour, that the book should be dated in the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96). So Gfrörer, Dillmann, Volkmar, Ewald, Schürer, and others. The eagle represents Imperial Rome, the line of the emperors beginning with J. Cæsar. The second wing is certainly to be identified with Augustus, who, reckoning from his first consulate, held rule for 56 years (B.C. 43-A.D. 14), i.e. more than twice the time of any of his successors. The three heads with equal probability are referred to the Flavian emperors: Vespasian died on his bed in torment (Suet. Vesp. 24; 2 Es 12th); Titus was commonly believed to have been murdered by Domitian. The difficulty lies in supplying the twenty rulers to precede Vespasian. The following proposals are made—(1) Gfrörer takes the twelve greater wings to be the first nine emperors, Cæsar to Vitellius, with three usurpers, Vindex, Nymphidius, and Piso Licinianus: the eight lesser wings are petty kings and leaders in Pal. (Herod the Great, Agrippa I., Eleazar, John of Gischala, Simon Bar Giora, John the Idumæan, Agrippa II., and Berenice: the last two attached themselves to Rome in the war). (2) Schürer agrees as to the twelve, but regards six of the lesser wings (the last two being matter of prophecy) as Roman generals who laid claim to the empire in the years of disorder, A.D. 68-70. (3) Wieseler takes the eight subordinate wings to mean the Herodian dynasty, vassals of Rome (Antipater, Herod I. and his three sons, Archelaus, Antipas, Philip, Agrippa I. and II., and Berenice). (4) Ewald, who is followed by Drummond (Jewish Messiah, 107), takes the twelve wings to be the twelve emperors up to Domitian: the eight little wings are the eight lesser emperors; these who reigned less than ten years (the last two included, for whom a short reign was anticipated), and the three heads are the Flavian princes, reckoned a third time under a different aspect. The double and triple repetition of the same names is unsatisfactory; Schürer's view (2) appears on the whole the most free from objection.

The simpler theory, on the other hand, of Gutschmid and Le Hir (Études Bibliques, i. 184 ff.), that twenty-three actual emperors are intended, the three heads being Sept. Severus, Caracalla, and Geta, is shown to be wrong by the fact that the book was quoted by Clem. Alex. at an earlier date than these emperors, and can be maintained only by supposing an interpolation, of which there is no sign in the Eagle Vision.

In considering the date, reference should be made to a companion volume to 2 Esdras, which curiously reproduces the language and visions of that book, namely, the Apocalypse of Baruch, first pub. in 1866 by Ceriani from a Syr. MS at Milan (Mon. sacra et prof., tom. i. fasc. ii., and tom. v. fasc. ii.; also in Fritzsche, Libri Apoc. I.T. 654). It also is a product of the Jewish apocalyptic called forth by the events of A.D. 70, but written before the final destruction of Jerus. in 133, which is not foreseen (Apoc. Bar 32; Jerus. is to be rebuilt, and then again destroyed [A.D. 70] for a time, and then rebuilt for ever). The similarities in tone and language with 2 Es are so striking that Ewald ascribed it to the same author. The general belief now held is that Baruch is the later, and has used Es, because, e.g., Bar corrects the crude notions of Es about original sin (cf. Es 7th 'O tu quid fecisti Adam' si enim tu peccasti non est factum solius tuus casus sed et nostrum,' with Bar 54, 'Non est ergo Adam causa nisi animæ suæ tantum; nos vero unusquisque fuit animæ suæ Adam'); and whereas Ezra complains that Jerus. should at least have been punished by the hands of God (5<sup>30</sup>), Bar accordingly represents it as destroyed by four angels before the entry of the Chaldean army (6-8). Some of the parallels are the division of each book into seven scenes, separated in most cases by intervals of seven days of fasting: the division of time into twelve parts (Bar 27=Es 14<sup>11</sup>): the legend of Behemoth and Leviathan (Bar 29=Es 6<sup>40</sup>): the prayer of Baruch (48, cf. the Confessio Esdræ 8<sup>20</sup>): the imprecation of Adam's transgression, prefaced in the same words, 'quid fecisti Adam?' (Bar 48=Es 7<sup>118</sup>): the vision of a cloud ascending from the sea (Bar 53, cf. Es 13): the permanence of the law though the teachers depart (Bar 77, cf. Es 9<sup>7</sup>): the interest in the lost tribes, to whom Baruch sends a letter of consolation (78-86, cf. Es 13<sup>40</sup>), besides frequent minute resemblances of language.

The writing is a characteristically Jewish work in its apocalyptic form, its knowledge of Jewish traditions (Behemoth, etc.), its interest in the ten tribes, and its deep concern in the fate of Jerusalem. There is no ground for supposing that the author was a Jewish Christian: there is a marked contrast between the Christian interpolations (1-2, 15-16, and the insertion of the name Jesus in 7<sup>28</sup>) and the remainder of the book. The place of writing is given as Rome (Ewald) or Alexandria (Hilgenfeld, lxii, and most edd.), from which the added chapters certainly emanate; this would account for the earliest quotation being found in Clem. Alex. On the other hand, the fall of Jerus. would be more impressive to a Palestinian Jew than to an Alexandrian; and the geography (if Ardat is rightly explained by Rendel Harris) points the same way.

The date of the concluding chs. (15, 16) is placed about A.D. 208 by most critics. 15<sup>10-12</sup> refers to the troubles of Alexandria under Gallienus (260-268), when two-thirds of the population were destroyed by a plague following upon a famine (Eus. HE vii. 21. 22). 15<sup>28-33</sup> refers to the conquests of the Sassanidæ ('Carmonii insaniētes'), esp. Sapor I. (240-273), who overran Syria but was repulsed by Odenathus and Zenobia ('dracones Arabum'), the founders of Palmyra: they, in turn, were defeated by Aurelianus. 33 describes the murder of Odenathus at Emesa (266) by his cousin Mæonius. 34 ff. are referred to the invasion of Asia Minor by Goths and Scythians from the N. of the Euxine: Gallienus marched against them, but was recalled by the revolt of Aureolus (38 'portio alia ab occidente'). 46 'Asia conquisita in specie Babylonis' alludes to the association of Odenathus in the empire, A.D. 264 (Hilgenfeld, Mess. Jud. 208).

The chapters were written apparently as an appendix to 3-14, and were never current in a separate form.

Chs. 1, 2 are not fixed so definitely, but are probably earlier than the close. They are a compilation from various sources, and perhaps a fragment of a larger work: they show some relation to an Apocalypse of Zephaniah (T. and S. lxxix).

RECEPTION.—The early quotations from the book are collected by Dr. James (T. and S. xxviii-xliii). The Ep. of Barnabas 12<sup>1</sup> (ἐπεὶ ἐξέλον αἷμα σφάξῃ) is thought to refer to 2 Es 5<sup>7</sup>, and the Rest of the Words of Baruch (A.D. 136), ch. 9, has similar words; the last scene of that book, where a stone takes the form of Jeremiah and speaks to the people, may be an amplification of 'lapis dabit vocem suam' of 2 Es. But the first express quotation is Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 16. 100, who regards it as the work of 'the prophet' Ezra. It is made use of in an Hippolytan fragment περὶ τοῦ παντός, and quoted in the Greek in the Apost. Constit. viii. 7. The supposed references in Tert. (de præscr. hæret. 3), Cyprian, and Commodian (3rd cent., Carm. Apol. 943, on the lost tribes) are doubtful. But it is quoted very frequently by Ambrose (de bono Mortis, 10-12, and elsewhere), who regards it as prophetic: in his time chs. 15, 16 were already current in the Latin version, and probably attached to 3-14. In Spain it was known to Priscillian and Vigilantius; and in Britain to Gildas, who quotes 15, 16 (Brit. lib., 36-40). The legend of the restoration of the books of Scripture (2 Es 14) is widespread, and may be derived from tradition apart from 2 Es (Iren. iii. 21. 2; Tert. de cult. fem. 1. 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 22. 149). Jerome is alone unfavourable to it (adv. Vigilantius, 6, Pref. in vers. libr. Ezræ, quoted in last art.). It was perhaps owing to his estimate that the book was excluded from the Canon by the Council of Trent: it now with 1 Es forms an appendix to the Vulg. after the NT. The liturgical use of the book shows its popularity: the words of 2<sup>34, 35</sup> are employed in the 'Missa pro defunctis' of the Breviary ad Usus Sarum, and the word Requiem is derived from this (1 Es 2<sup>34, 37</sup> was used by the English as an Introit on Whit Tuesday. Otherwise no use is made of it in the services of the Church.

LITERATURE.—A full list of the wide lit. on the subject is given in S. P. O. T. P. ii. iii. 93-114. The best critical edd. of the text are those of Camb. T. and S. vol. iii. 2, ed. Bently and James, 1895, and the Minor Fragment of the Fourth Book of Ezra 1875. The versions are collected in Hilgenfeld's Textus Sacrorum (Lips. 1869). Eng. com. on the text, B. et al. Textus Sacrorum (Lips. 1869). Apoc. Ezra, Strom. i. 22. 149, and Adv. Vigilantius, 6, Pref. in vers. libr. Ezræ, quoted in last art.

ESDRIS ('Εσδρίς).—Mentioned only 2 Mac 12<sup>38</sup>. The text is probably corrupt. AV has Gorgias, and this is likely enough to be correct.

ESEK (עֶזֶק), 'contention,' Gn 26<sup>20</sup>.—A well dug by Isaac, in the region near Rehoboth and Gerar. The site is unknown.

ESEREBIAS ('Ερεβεβίας, AV Esebrias), 1 Es 8<sup>64</sup>. See SHEREBIAS.

ESHAN (עֶשָׂן), Jos 15<sup>52</sup>.—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, noticed with Arab and Dumah. The site is doubtful.

ESHBAAŁ.—See ISHBOSHETH.

ESHBAN (עֶשְׂבָן).—An Edomite chief (Gn 36<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>4</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESHCOL (עֶשְׂכֹל).—The brother of Mamre and Aner, the Amorite confederates of Abraham, who assisted the patriarch in his pursuit and defeat of Chedorlaomer's forces (Gn 14<sup>13, 24</sup>). He lived in the neighbourhood of Hebron (Gn 13<sup>18</sup>); and possibly gave his name to the valley of Eshcol, that lay a little to the N. of Hebron (Nu 13<sup>28</sup>).

It is noteworthy that Josephus, in recording the event described in Gn 14<sup>13-24</sup>, mentions Eshcol first. 'The first of them was called Eshcol, the second Enner, and the third Mambres' (Ant. i. x. 2). In the Heb. of Gn 14<sup>24</sup> they are mentioned in the order Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre. But in the LXX the order is 'Εσχῶλ, Αἰνάρ, Μάμβρη; and this order is found also in Philo (De Migrat. Abrah. § 30, i. 461).

H. E. RYLE.

ESHCOL (עֶשְׂכֹל), Nu 13<sup>23, 24</sup>, Dt 1<sup>34</sup>.—A wady, with vineyards and pomegranates, apparently near Hebron. E. is usually rendered 'bunch of grapes.' The name has not been recovered, since the Ain

Keshkaleh at Hebron has no connexion with the Hebrew.

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP i. 114; Tristram, Land of Israel, 388, 393; Conder, Tent-Work, 237; Bible Places, 89; Besant, Thirty Years' Work in the Holy Land, 70, 84.

C. R. CONDER.

ESHEK (עֶשֶׂק).—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8<sup>39</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESHTAOL (עֶשְׂתָּאֹל Jos 15<sup>33</sup> 19<sup>41</sup>, Jg 13<sup>25</sup> 16<sup>31</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>. s. 11).—A town in the S. of Judah, afterwards to Zorah, now Sura'a, which is beside 'Ain Shems, where the Wady es-Sur is joined by valleys from the N. and S. and a great basin formed, fertile and well-watered, just beneath the hill country of Judaea. Eshua', close to Sura'. says he heard in the n. was called Eshua' or Eshthua', which, if confirmed, might be held decisive; but the degeneration of Eshtaol into Eshua is not impossible. Between Zorah and E. was the 'camp of Dan'; and there (Jg 13<sup>25</sup>) Samson's achievements began, and there he was buried (16<sup>31</sup>). (See Smith's Hist. Geog. p. 218.) The Eshtaolites (lit. 'Eshtaolite') were, according to 1 Ch 2<sup>53</sup>, descended from the families of Kiriath-jearim, etc., who are there described as Calebites. The narratives of Jos 15<sup>33</sup> and 19<sup>41</sup> suggest how mingling of the tribes of Judah and of Dan might arise, perhaps leading to the Danite migration from Zorah and Eshtaol.

LITERATURE.—PEFS, 1874, 17; Conder, Pal'estine, 49; Smith, HGHL, 213; Guérin, Judée, ii. 12 ff.; SWT. Memoirs, iii. 25.

A. HENDERSON.

ESHTEMOA (עֶשְׂתֵּמוֹא), named in Jos 15<sup>50</sup> (where it is called Eshtemoh, עֶשְׂתֵּמוֹה) among towns of Judah. It was made afterwards a Levitical city (21<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>57</sup>). During David's wanderings in S. Judah its inhabitants were on his side (1 S 30<sup>23</sup>). It is said in 1 Ch 4<sup>17</sup> to have been inhabited by the descendants of Ishbah; and Eshtemoh, its founder, is called (4<sup>19</sup>) a Maacathite, which would naturally suggest that he came from the small kingdom of Maacah (wh. see). It may have been here 'the Maacathite' among his heroes joined David (2 S 23<sup>34</sup>). The site was recovered by Robinson some 8 miles S. of Hebron. It is now Es-Semda'a, a considerable village (BR ii. p. 204), and full of ancient remains (PEF Memoirs, iii. 403, 412).

A. HENDERSON.

ESHTEMOH.—See ESHTEMOA.

ESHTON (עֶשְׁתֹּן, perhaps 'uxorious').—A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>11-12</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESLI (עֶסְלִי, perhaps 'J' hath reserved').—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3<sup>25</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESPOUSAL, ESPOUSE.—To espouse (fr. Lat. sponsus, ptep. of spondere, to betroth, through Old Fr. sposuer) meant either to betroth or to marry. Thus Camden, Rem. (1637) 414, 'Two Lovel who being espoused, dyed both before they were married'; but Shaks. Rich. III. iv. v. 8—

'I have espoused thee, and thou art mine' consented,

So also 'espousal' is used in both senses, and Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) thinks marriage is the primary sense. In AV 'espouse' occurs 2 S 3<sup>14</sup> 'Deliver me my wife Michal, which I espoused to me' (RV, 'whom I betrothed to me,' Heb. מִיכָל, which always means 'betroth'); Mt 1<sup>19</sup>, Lk 1<sup>27</sup>, all of the Virgin Mary (RV 'betrothed'; Gr. μητροτεύω, always 'to ask or engage in marriage'); 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup> 'I have espoused you to one husband' (ἡμωσάμην, lit. 'joined you unto,' and here the ref. seems to be to marriage, not betrothal, 'I have given you in marriage,' though the betrothal, which was also carried out by the bridegroom's friend, may be meant). Espousal is found Ca 3<sup>11</sup> 'in the day of his espousals' (בְּיוֹם הַחֻּמֵּי, 'on the day of his marriage,' and Jer 2<sup>2</sup> 'the love of thine espousals,' as Cheyne, 'thy bridal'; but it is probable that AV (following older VSS. t) used these words indiscriminately, or at least with a less clear distinction than now obtains between betrothal and marriage. For the solemnity of betrothal in Italy (= England) in Shakespeare's day, see Twelfth Night, iv. iii. 26: it enables Olivia to speak of Sebastian as 'husband' (v. 146). It was not less solemn and binding in Israel. See MARRIAGE.

J. HASTINGS.

ESPY.—The verb to 'espy' occurs only six times in AV, Gn 42<sup>27</sup>, Jos 14<sup>7</sup>, Jer 48<sup>19</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>6</sup>, To 11<sup>6</sup>, 1 Mac 5<sup>38</sup>, while the mod. form to 'spy' is found eighteen times, and RV turns 'espy' of Jos 14<sup>7</sup> into 'spy.' The word is apparently of Teutonic origin (Old High Ger. spehon), though it is connected with Lat. specere, to look, Gr. σκέπτομαι, and entered Eng. through the Old Fr. espier.

1. The most common and the oldest meaning is to inspect (secretly) a place, as Nu 21<sup>1</sup> 'I am sent to spy out Jaazer,' when the Heb. is רָא, except Nu 13<sup>16, 17</sup> (חָשַׁד), and the Eng. is always 'spy (Jos 14<sup>7</sup> AV 'espy') out,' except Jos 21<sup>1</sup> 'to spy secretly' (סְתַלְתָּ), RV 'as spies secretly', and Ezk 20<sup>6</sup> 'a land that I had espied for them' (לְרַאֲתָם). Once the ref. is not to land but to liberty, Gal 2<sup>4</sup> 'false brethren . . . who came in privily to spy out our liberty' (Tindale's trn.; Wyc. 'to aspie oure freedom,' Gr. κατασκοπῆσαι). 2. But we also find the sense of keep watch, as Jer 48<sup>19</sup> 'O, inhabitant of Aroer, stand by the way, and espy' (שָׁמַר). 3. More freq. is the idea of suddenly perceiving anything, as Gn 42<sup>27</sup> 'And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money'; so Ex 21<sup>1</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>18</sup> (all רָא 'see'). 4. Finally, simply to discover or perceive, as 2 K 23<sup>24</sup> 'All the abomination that were hid in the land of Judah . . . did Josiah put away' (רָא). Cf. Barlowe, Dialogue (Lunn's ed. p. 73), 'Woulde God they were as prest to remoue ye balk out of their owne eyes, as they be prompte to aspye a lytle mote in other mens.'

The subst. is always plu. 'spies,' except Sir 11<sup>30</sup> 'spy.' The Heb. is generally שְׂרִיטִים (Gn 42<sup>27</sup> u. 14. 16. 30. 31. 34, Jos 6<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 26<sup>4</sup>, 2 S 15<sup>10</sup>); also שְׂרִיטִים (Jg 1<sup>24</sup>, RV 'watchers'), or שְׂרִיטִים (Nu 21<sup>1</sup>, RV 'Atharim' as place-name, wh. see). The Gr. words are κατασκοπος (Sir 11<sup>30</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>28</sup>, He 11<sup>31</sup>), the usual LXX tr. of mēraggēlim; and ἐγκάθροτος (Lk 20<sup>20</sup>, lit. 'sent down into,' and so, as Plummer, 'suborned to lie in wait.' The word is not found elsewhere in NT).

J. HASTINGS.

ESSENES.—In regard to the origin and nature of this sect very various views have been held. It is therefore best to confine oneself to stating succinctly what is known about them from ancient authors.

Our earliest witness is Philo of Alexandria, who, having visited Jerusalem in his youth, may have come into personal contact with them. In his treatise Quod Omnis Probatus Liber, which is one of * Tindale, in his tr. published in 1525-26, rendered the Gr. μετρώμενος (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>) by 'married,' and in this he is followed by Coverdale. In the ed. of 1534, however, he altered it to 'betrothed.' In 2 S 3<sup>14</sup> Cov. has 'married,' and so have the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles. In the NT our translators were probably influenced by the Rhemish Version, which in Mt 1<sup>19</sup> has 'spoused,' or by Udall's tr. of Erasmus' Paraphrase (1546) which has 'espouse.'

his earlier works, written probably before A.D. 20, he describes them as follows:—

They were a sect of Jews and lived in Syria Palestine, over 4000 in number, and called Esseni, because of their sanctity; for Essene signifies in the same word as Temple. Worshipers of God, who did not marry, and were of a most reverent mind, and abstinent in food, and lived in villages and avoided cities, in order to escape the contagion of evils and vice. They pursued agriculture and other peaceful arts; but accounted not gold or silver, nor owned mines. No maker of warlike weapons, no huckster or trader by land or sea, was to be found among them. Least of all were any slaves found among them; for they saw in slavery a violation of the law of nature, which made all men free brethren, one of the other.

Abstract philosophy and logic they eschewed, except so far as it could subserve their training and practice. Naturally, however, they only studied so far as it related to that which was of God, and made and watches over all things. Moral philosophy or ethics was their chief preoccupation, and their conduct was regulated by their national (Jewish) laws. These laws they espoused on the seventh day, which they held holy, leaving off all work upon it and meeting in their synagogues, as these places of resort were called. Then they sat down in ranks, one of their ones above the younger. Then one took and read the Bible, while the rest listened attentively; and another, who was very learned in the Bible, would expound whatever was obscure in the lesson read, explaining most things in their time-honoured fashion by means of symbols. They were taught piety, holiness, justice, the art of regulating home and family life, of what is really good and bad and of what is to be avoided, what to pursue,—in short, love of God, of virtue, and of man.

And such teaching bore fruit. Their life-long purity, their avoiding of oaths or falsehood, their recognition of a good providence alone, showed their love of God. Their love of virtue revealed itself in their indifference to money, worldly position, and pleasure. Their love of man in their kindness, their equality, their fellowship passing all words. For no one had his private house, but shared his dwelling with all; and, living as they did in colonies (kibbutzim), they threw open their doors to any of their sect who came their way. They had a storehouse, common expenditure, common raiments, common food eaten in Syria or common meals. This was made possible by their practice of not marrying, for they each earned day by day into a common fund, out of which also the sick were supported when they could not work. The aged among them were objects of reverence and honour, and treated by the rest as parents by real children.

The most cruel and deceitful tyrants, says Philo, that had been the scourge of their country, had yet been moved to admiration of their quiet but invincible freedom, of their common meals, of their consummate fellowship.

Perhaps in these last words Philo refers to Herod the Great, whose subsequent rise to greatness was foretold to him as a child by an E. named Manamus (Menahem), and who in consequence befriended and honoured the sect (Josephus, Ant. xv. x. 5).

Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica has preserved a fragment of Philo's 'Apology for the Jews,' which repeats much of the information given by Philo, but also supplements it.

Our lawgiver, he says, trains into fellowship and communion thousands of his disciples, who for their saintliness (hagioteta) are called Essenes. They inhabit many cities of Judæa, as well as many villages and populous tracts. Their tenets are espoused by them of free choice, and not as a matter of race.

There are no children or youths among them, but only full-grown men, or men already in the decline of life. They have no private property, but put all they have into a common fund, and live as members of a thiasos or philosophic colony, having common meals. They are very industrious, and work hard from early sunrise to sunset, as tillers of the soil, or herdsmen, or bee-farmers, or as craftsmen. Whatever they so earn they hand over to the elected steward (ταμις χειρονομίας), who at once buys victuals for the common repast.

No Essene, adds Philo in this account, marries, but all practise continence. For women are selfish and jealous, and apt to pervert men's characters by ceaseless chicanery and wiles. While, if they have children, they are puffed up and bold in spirit; driving their husbands to actions which are a bar to any fellowship with other men.

The next writer who describes the Essenes is Pliny the elder († A.D. 79), in his Natural History, bk. v. ch. 17. 'The Hæssenes,' he says, 'live on the W. side away from the shores (of the Dead Sea), out of reach of their baneful influences. A solitary race, and strange above all others in the entire world. They live without women, renouncing all sexual love. They eschew money, and live among the palm-trees. Yet the number of their fellows (convenarum) is kept up and day by day renewed; for there flock to them from afar many who, wearied of battling with the rough sea of life, drift into their system' (ad mores). 'Thus for thousands of ages (strange to tell) the race is perpetuated, and yet no one is born in it. So does the contrition felt by others for their past life enrich this set of men. Below them lay Engadi, a town once second only to Jerus. in its fertility and groves of olive. Now 'tis but one more tomb. Next to it is a fort on a rock, and, like the former, not far from the Dead Sea. And here ends our account of Judæa.'

There are two passages in Josephus in which the E. are described at length, and many minor references. The following is an epitome of his information:—

Josephus calls them Esseni in BJ ii. viii. 2, Ant. xiii. v. 9, x. 6, etc., and with Philo, Essæi in Ant. xv. x. 4. They arose along with the sects of Pharisees (Ant. xiii. v. 9) and Saddurites (Ant. xiii. v. 10). They were a sect of Jews, who lived in Syria Palestine, over 4000 in number, and called Esseni, because of their sanctity; for Essene signifies in the same word as Temple. Worshipers of God, who did not marry, and were of a most reverent mind, and abstinent in food, and lived in villages and avoided cities, in order to escape the contagion of evils and vice.

They pursued agriculture and other peaceful arts; but accounted not gold or silver, nor owned mines. No maker of warlike weapons, no huckster or trader by land or sea, was to be found among them. Least of all were any slaves found among them; for they saw in slavery a violation of the law of nature, which made all men free brethren, one of the other.

Abstract philosophy and logic they eschewed, except so far as it could subserve their training and practice. Naturally, however, they only studied so far as it related to that which was of God, and made and watches over all things. Moral philosophy or ethics was their chief preoccupation, and their conduct was regulated by their national (Jewish) laws. These laws they espoused on the seventh day, which they held holy, leaving off all work upon it and meeting in their synagogues, as these places of resort were called. Then they sat down in ranks, one of their ones above the younger. Then one took and read the Bible, while the rest listened attentively; and another, who was very learned in the Bible, would expound whatever was obscure in the lesson read, explaining most things in their time-honoured fashion by means of symbols. They were taught piety, holiness, justice, the art of regulating home and family life, of what is really good and bad and of what is to be avoided, what to pursue,—in short, love of God, of virtue, and of man.

And such teaching bore fruit. Their life-long purity, their avoiding of oaths or falsehood, their recognition of a good providence alone, showed their love of God. Their love of virtue revealed itself in their indifference to money, worldly position, and pleasure. Their love of man in their kindness, their equality, their fellowship passing all words. For no one had his private house, but shared his dwelling with all; and, living as they did in colonies (kibbutzim), they threw open their doors to any of their sect who came their way. They had a storehouse, common expenditure, common raiments, common food eaten in Syria or common meals. This was made possible by their practice of not marrying, for they each earned day by day into a common fund, out of which also the sick were supported when they could not work. The aged among them were objects of reverence and honour, and treated by the rest as parents by real children.

The most cruel and deceitful tyrants, says Philo, that had been the scourge of their country, had yet been moved to admiration of their quiet but invincible freedom, of their common meals, of their consummate fellowship. Perhaps in these last words Philo refers to Herod the Great, whose subsequent rise to greatness was foretold to him as a child by an E. named Manamus (Menahem), and who in consequence befriended and honoured the sect (Josephus, Ant. xv. x. 5).

Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica has preserved a fragment of Philo's 'Apology for the Jews,' which repeats much of the information given by Philo, but also supplements it.

Our lawgiver, he says, trains into fellowship and communion thousands of his disciples, who for their saintliness (hagioteta) are called Essenes. They inhabit many cities of Judæa, as well as many villages and populous tracts. Their tenets are espoused by them of free choice, and not as a matter of race.

There are no children or youths among them, but only full-grown men, or men already in the decline of life. They have no private property, but put all they have into a common fund, and live as members of a thiasos or philosophic colony, having common meals. They are very industrious, and work hard from early sunrise to sunset, as tillers of the soil, or herdsmen, or bee-farmers, or as craftsmen. Whatever they so earn they hand over to the elected steward (ταμις χειρονομίας), who at once buys victuals for the common repast.

No Essene, adds Philo in this account, marries, but all practise continence. For women are selfish and jealous, and apt to pervert men's characters by ceaseless chicanery and wiles. While, if they have children, they are puffed up and bold in spirit; driving their husbands to actions which are a bar to any fellowship with other men.

The next writer who describes the Essenes is Pliny the elder († A.D. 79), in his Natural History, bk. v. ch. 17. 'The Hæssenes,' he says, 'live on the W. side away from the shores (of the Dead Sea), out of reach of their baneful influences. A solitary race, and strange above all others in the entire world. They live without women, renounc* χειρονομία of τῶν κοινῶν ἐπιτακτικῶν.

Him that bestoweth life. After which they lay aside their white garments as holy, and betake themselves to their labours again till the evening. Then they return home to supper after the same manner; and if there be any strangers there, they sit down with them. Nor is there ever any clamour or disturbance to pollute their house; but they give every one leave to speak in their turn. Which silence thus kept in their house appears to outsiders like som . . . same is due to their unswervi . . . their food and drink is measured . . .

Like Philo, Josephus is full of praise for their moral qualities, and lauds their self-restraint in anger, their . . . their peace-making, their truthfulness, which made all oaths to them a mere superfluity.

The mode of joining the sect was this. The intending member remained outside the order one year, following, however, the same discipline, and invested with its symbols, namely a spud wherewith to hide his excrement out of sight of God, the girdle and white raiment. After the lapse of a year, if he had once, he was allowed to join more partake of a purer quality of the waters of purification, though not yet to live entirely with them. Two years of moral probation must yet be passed before he was chosen a member of their band (ἐκκλησία). And then before he touched the common food he took tremendous oaths to them: first to reverence the Deity, next to observe justice towards men, to hate the wicked and assist the just. To be loyal ever to all men, but in especial to those in authority, because none hath authority except by God's help. He swore also, if he should ever be in authority, not to abuse the same, nor outshine those subject to him in his garments or in any other finery; to love truth and repel falsehood; to keep his hands clean from theft and his soul from unholy gain; to conceal nothing from members of the sect, nor reveal aught to others, even at peril of his life. Moreover, he swore to communicate to none the dogmas of the sect, otherwise than as he received them himself, to abstain from brigandage, and to preserve with like care the books of their sect and the names of the angels.

Jos. gives many indications that the E. were very strict Jews (BJ II. viii. 9). They revered the name of the lawgiver next after God, and punished with death one that blasphemed against Moses. Above all other Jews they observed the Sabbath, not only not cooking on that day, and avoiding the lighting of a fire, but forbearing also to move a vessel, or even evacuate. In the Jewish war many died under torture at the hands of the Romans rather than blaspheme the lawgiver or eat unclean food. Many details supplied by Josephus prove how much importance they attached to ceremonial purity. We have seen how they bathed before each meal, and wore linen garments; linen, of course, being prescribed because it was a vegetable substance, and not made of dead animal refuse, as would be a leathern or woollen tunic. That the waters of purification in their purer quality were denied to novices, proves that the water of the bath was ceremonially cleansed, and probably exorcised. By immersion in it they were themselves rendered καθαροί or pure before they sat down to meat, by contrast with the εὐεργετοί, or persons of any other persuasion (BJ II. viii. 10). They were distinguished acc. to their purity and seniority into four grades; and a senior member was polluted by the very touch of a junior member, and had to wash after being so touched, as if he had been jostled by Gentiles. So an Indian Brahman is polluted by the touch and even sight of a low-caste native. They did not anoint themselves with oil, regarding it as a defilement; prob. because they could not easily get oil prepared by members of their own caste. Josephus elsewhere assures us that no Jew would anoint himself except with Jewish oil.

The same pursuit of ceremonial purity is to be noticed in regard to their meals. Their food and viands were specially prepared by their priests (Ant. XVIII. i. 5); just as in a Hindoo prison the cook must be a Brahman, because any lower-caste man may eat what a higher-caste man has cooked, but not vice versa. In each city a special officer (κηδεμών) was appointed to supply travelling E. with their ceremonially pure garments and food. Lastly, an E. expelled for his sins by a court of 100 members from the brotherhood was still so held by its oaths and customs that he could not eat of food provided by others, and in consequence starved to death. To the same concern for ceremonial purity must prob. be ascribed their attitude of reserve towards the temple sacrifices. 'They send offerings (ἀναθήματα) to the temple and perform sacrifices with superiority of purificatory rites,* which they claim to practise (Ant. XVIII. i. 5). And being for this reason excluded from the common court of the temple, they perform their sacrifices by themselves.† These words are obscure, and barely reconcilable with Philo's statement that the E. did not sacrifice animals (Philo, ii. 45 = Quod am. prob. lib. § 12). The offerings sent, according to Jos., need not of course have been blood-offerings; and as to the nature of the sacrifices (θυσίας) which they performed by themselves, i.e. without the help of the temple priests, Jos. tells us nothing; but we should certainly connect it with a practice, which he elsewhere attests, viz. that they *elect*ed their own priests for the making of their own food and eatables. This much is clear, that the ordinary lustrations of the temple were not good enough for an E., and were incompatible with his notions of ceremonial purity. Presumably, they were excluded from the temple court for thus flouting the usual lustrations. Unable to enter it, they sent offerings, but did not go themselves. At the same time 'they performed their sacrifices by themselves.' There seems to be some connexion between this statement and Philo's that they offered up the sacrifice of a devout and reverent mind. They could not possibly have offered up animal sacrifices save in the temple and in the ordinary way; and Josephus' own statement elsewhere, that their mode of life was Pythagorean, is in favour of Philo's declaration that they did not sacrifice animals. It is natural to suppose that they regarded their common meals as of the nature of a sacrifice, just as Christians regard the eucharistic elements. Only thus can we explain the fact that they *elect*ed priests to prepare those meals; for a priest implies a sacrifice to be offered.

Their abstention from marriage must also be set down to their desire for a levitical purity. For acc. to the Mosaic law sexual relations involved a defilement of the person, and the uncleanness lasted until the even (Lv 15<sup>18</sup>).

Notwithstanding their attachment to the Mosaic law and striving after levitical purity, there were certainly many non-Jewish elements in their religious practices and beliefs. Thus they adored the sun, and prayed to him to rise. In Appian and other writers we find the phrase, 'the god rose,' or 'the god set,' used instead of 'the sun rose,' or 'the sun set'; and Philo regarded the sun and stars as holy and divine natures.

The Essene beliefs about the soul and a future life were also non-Jewish. They believed that they received their souls back after death (BJ II. viii. 11), and so very cheerfully died for the faith. 'The body is corruptible, they taught; and the matter of which it is composed is not lasting. But souls are immortal, and last for ever, and, proceeding out of the most subtle ether, are entangled in bodies as in prison-cells, being drawn down by some natural yearning. But when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh, as being now released from a long bondage, they rejoice and mount upwards. And in agreement with the opinions of the Greeks they declare that there lies away across the ocean a habitation for the good souls, in a region that is oppressed neither with storms of rain or snow, nor with intense heat; a region ever refreshed by the gentle breathing of a breeze blowing from the ocean. But they allot to bad souls a dark and tempestuous den full of never-ceasing punishments.'

* τὰς θυσίας ἐκτελεῖσθαι διαφορεστέναι ἀγγέλων, ὡς νομίζουσιν.
† ἐφ' αὐτὰς.

The Essenes had hereditary prayers to the sun, as well as the usual Jewish sacred books; they had purificatory rites of different sorts or degrees, and utterances of the prophets. By diligent study of these, some of them learned and professed to read the future. And their predictions, says Jos., were rarely belied; indeed he gives several instances up and down his history of the fulfilment of their prophecies (BJ II. viii. 12). They also had compositions of the ancients from which they chose out whatever benefited soul and body; and they inquired after such roots and peculiar stones as would ward off their distempers. The regular books and dogmas of the sect, as we have seen, they took oath to carefully keep, as also the names of the angels. These names, of course, were powerful weapons against evil demons, with a belief in which they must, like other Jews of the age, have been imbued. The stones and roots were the ordinary magic remedies against diseases.

This is the sum of what Jos. has to say about the Essenes. Hippolytus in the 9th Book of his Refutation of Heresies, § 18-28, substantially copies out Josephus' account in the BJ II. ch. 8, here and there adding Christian touches in a way which proves that he was not loth to assimilate them to Christians. Yet some of the information which he adds is not of this sort, but serves to intensify their Jewish complexion. Such are the statements that on the Sabbath some Essenes would not so much as leave their beds (§ 25); that some were so scrupulous that they would not carry a coin, declaring it wrong to carry or look at or make an image (§ 26, cf. Mt 22<sup>20</sup>); that no one of them would enter a city over the gate of which stood a statue (§ 26); that others of them, if they heard any one talking about God and His law, would waylay him when alone, and threaten to slay him unless he were circumcised, and slay him actually if he did not submit; for which reason, says Hippolytus, they got the name of Zealots and at others would call no one Lord (Κύριον) but only God, submitting to torment and death rather than do so. It is difficult to believe that Hippolytus had no authority for these statements; which indeed might seem to be taken from Jos., since they are embedded in his long citation of that author. If so, they have been removed from all the MSS of Josephus. The same account of Jos. was excerpted by Porphyry in the 3rd cent. in his book on Abstinence from Meats, and later by Eusebius in his De Prep. Evang. The account given by Epiphanius of the E. is late, confused, and of little value. It is clear that, if the E. were cultivators and did not prevent some of their number from occupying important posts in the court and camp; for we hear of one Simon* the interpreter of Archelaus' dream (Ant. XVII. xiii. 3), and of John the strategus, and of Menahem the friend of Herod. Nor did their gospel of peace and their prejudice against arms, as reported by Philo, prevent them from taking part in the final struggle against the Romans. Jos., moreover, implies that they were constantly moving about from city to city; and we can only suppose that the object of this travelling was to preach their tenets and secure recruits. We should like to know if the sect was not mainly recruited from Greek-speaking Jews, but on this point Jos. tells us nothing. In his autobiog. (Vita, 10) he implies that as a youth he had tried the discipline of this sect, as also of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and this inner acquaintance with them entitles his account to our entire credit; but just because he and his countrymen knew the sect so well, he omits to inform us about so essential a point as in what language their books were written, and what tongue, whether Greek or Aramaic, they usually spoke among themselves.

Some writers, impressed with the fact that Jesus constantly inveighed against the Pharisees and Sadducees, but never against the members of the third of the three great Jewish sects, who yet must have everywhere confronted Him, have inferred that He and John the Baptist, His precursor, were Essenes. The silence of the Gospels about the E. is certainly remarkable; and there are many striking traits in common between the E. and the earliest Christians. These are the following:—

1. The community of goods and voluntary poverty. 2. The art of prophecy, the earliest Church, as we know from Acts and from the Didache, there was a regular order of prophets.
3. The teaching about the future life, and about a hell. These traits are found among the Pharisees; nor is the latter's statement that the resurrection of the flesh, though the picture of the Islands of the Blest, was well enough to the Refrigerium, the teaching of future punishment, we also find it in Philo.
4. Abstention from marriage. This was equally a counsel of perfection in the early Church, but was there held to be right in view of the impending second advent and end of the world (1 Co 7<sup>25ff</sup>).
5. Obedience to established authorities. 6. Internal government. The officers of the E. community were variously termed ἀποδιδόντες τὸν προσέβουον 'receivers of the revenue,' ἐπιμεληταί 'curators,' ἀντιλήψεις 'relieving officers,' ταμίαι 'stewards' (in Philo). These officers were, like the bishops of the early Church, elected by show of hands (χειροτονήσιντες), acc. to the testimony of Hippolytus (lib. ix. § 25), the regular 2nd cent. equivalent.
7. The common meals, with which we may compare the picture of the early Church in Acts. But whereas the Essenes abstained from all animal food, the Christians were chiefly actuated, it would seem, by charitable and communistic reasons. Their love-feast, however, also had from an early date, if not from the very first, a sacramental character and conclusion, and required, like the Essene common meal, the presence of a priest both to prepare it and to give thanks before and after it to God 'the Giver of Life.' 8. The Essene priests (ἐπίσκοποι) were elected to preside at the common meal, and make the food eaten thereat. Since the E. community had plainly a sacramental character, the function of their priests, as of Christian ones, was simply to prepare and preside over a sacramental meal, to which none were admitted save those rendered pure by previous baptism. 9. General organization. (a) Obedience to the Essene officers. The brethren in their deportment and as a schoolmaster were all brethren, but the elder members were revered by the juniors as if they were their parents. (b) The entire body or class of Essenes (γένος as Jos. calls it) is a diakos, an ἐπίσκοπος, a ταμίης. The two former were generic names for any body of co-religionists, and Christian congregations among the Gentiles were so described. (c) The travelling precepts of the E. were so described. (d) The travelling precepts of the E. were so described. (e) They were to wear their cloaks and shoes right and left, and they were quite worn out. Hippolytus paraphrases this by saying that no E. owned two cloaks or two pairs of shoes (Hipp. l.c. § 20). (f) The four grades of E. resembled the steps of the ladder. Such a distinction, however, of grades of members was common to the earliest Church. (g) The E. was also reproduced in the Church. (h) The E. were not converts to Christianity, but had superior ones of their own. (i) However, the Christian baptism was conferred once and for all, the Essene baptism was repeated. The Essene affection of a pure and ascetic life, the E. had from the earliest times. From the E. was evolved the catechumen from the Eucharist. And just as the priest among the E. was elected to make the food eaten in their syssitia, so the priest in the Gr. Church, even to this day, himself prepares and bakes the bread for the Eucharist. (j) Hippolytus says that the Essenes elected priests were to be content with the hereditary names of John and

More analogies between the Essenes and the earliest Christians could no doubt be discerned. But it is a fatal objection to any real identification, that the Essenes were ultra-Jewish in the observance of the Sabbath, and, if we may credit Hippolytus, in their insistence on the circumcision of converts. The most we can say is that the * οὐδὲν μὲν ὅλως ἐκτετακμένοι, ἵνα δὲ τοὺς ληστὰς ἐνοχλοῖ.

* Σίμων ἀνὴρ γένος Ἑρραῖος.

Christians copied many features of their organization and activity from the Essenes.

The different sources on which our knowledge of the E. depends requires further sifting, but has generally received. Of course there have been attempts to prove the Philonian sources to be not reliable, but they are based on mere ignorance. There are occasional verbal resemblances* between the accounts of Philo and Jos. which indicate that Jos., besides his own personal experience of the sect, used either Philo or else a document previously used by Philo. The accounts of the two writers, however, do not always agree. Thus Philo says that all the E. were full-grown men, or verging on old age; but Jos. avers that they recruited their sect by adopting other people's children while they were still supple and plastic to receive their teachings (BJ II. viii. 2). Yet in the same context Jos. speaks of those who desired to become members of the sect,† and also of their period of probation, in words suitable only to the view that these recruits were adult men. We may perhaps infer that the sect was recruited in both ways. Pliny's statement that the men from all quarters joined it when they repented of their lives, and left the world, agrees well enough with Philo's statement; and, if we translate penitentia as 'repentance' rather than mere ennuis, offers a striking parallel to John the Baptist's preaching: Repent of your sins and be baptized, because the kingdom of God is at hand. There is reason to suspect some close affinity between John, who came fasting, and the E.; the more so as John's sphere of activity in the valley of Jordan lay close to the Essene settlement on the shores of the Dead Sea.

The recluse Bannus, with whom Jos. as a young man spent three years as a disciple, resembled the Essenes. For he lived in the desert, in a cell made of the bark of trees, and lived, on fasting he found growing about, washing himself often day and night with cold water by way of purification. However, Josephus' context rather implies that he was not one. An almost certain reference to the E. is contained in an eloquent passage of Philo's, from the same treatise in which his longer description of the sect is preserved.

Even in our own day, he writes, there are still men whose only guide is God; men who live by the true reason of nature, not only themselves free, but filling their neighbours with a spirit of freedom. They are not very numerous indeed. But that is not strange. For the high life is ever rare; and these men have turned away from the vulgar herd to devote themselves to a contemplation of the things of God. They pray, if it were possible, that they might be often seen by God, but, if they cannot, owing to the distance, and wrongs which surges up in cities, they flee away, lest they too be swept off their feet by the force of its current. And we, he continues, if we had a true zeal for improvement, would have to visit them to their places of retirement, and, having ascertained what they would beseech them to come to us and tame our life, grown too fierce and wild, preaching instead of war and slavery and untold ills, their gospel of peace and freedom, and all the fulness of other blessings.

The Therapeutæ of Alexandria, of whom Philo has left so striking a description in his tract De Vita Contemplativa, in many ways resembled the Pal. Essenes; but were, as was natural in an Egypt. sect, more addicted to contemplation. Here is not the place for a detailed comparison between them and the E.; nor is it possible to review the numerous theories which have been framed with regard to the origin of the E. It, however, deserves to be remarked that acc. to the evidence of Jos.

they arose just at the time when the friendship between Lacedæmon and Jerus. was at its highest. Areus the king of Sparta had written as early as B.C. 309-300 to Onias the high priest in these terms. 'It is found in writing that the Spartans and the Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham' (1 Mac 12<sup>21</sup>). And in B.C. 144 Jonathan the high priest, in renewing the relations of his country with Lacedæmon, reminded the Spartans of this old friendship based on ancient kinship. . . . that the E. sect was partly an outcome of this contact with the Peloponnese—an attempt to imitate on Jewish soil, and in a religious and moral sense only, the Syssitia and organization of the Lycurgean polity? That most of the Jews mentioned in Jos. as belonging to the Maccabæan period have Greek second names is good evidence of the wide diffusion in Pal. at that time of the Gr. language. And the very information proffered by Jos., that the E. were Jews by race, almost implies in its context that in language they were something else. So Philo assures us that the holy places in which the E. met on the Sabbath were called συναγωγαί, synagogues. Unless they spoke Greek, why should this term rather than the usual one σαββατεῖον* have been used? . . . Friedlander (Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Christenthums, Wien, 1894) has remarked that the very circumstance of Jos. having used, if not Philo's account, at least a Gr. description of the sect already used by Philo, is some indication that they were a Gr. sect of Jews. Their Pythagorean régime, their belief in the pre-existence of the soul, their view of its nature and incarnation, all point the same way. The statement also of Philo, not repeated by Jos., that they philosophized most things in the Bible allegorically or in a symbolic way with old-fashioned zeal,† is an almost certain proof of their Hellenism. And Philo's own allegorization of the passage Dt 23 ff. is, as Friedlander has seen (p. 118), an allusion to the Essene probation and discipline (Philo, Legis Alleg. i. 117).

Again, Philo, when he states that the E. were taught the art of regulating home and state, and a knowledge of what things are really good and bad and indifferent, how to choose what is right and avoid the opposite courses, seems to imply a familiarity on their part with Greek, especially with Stoic, moral philosophy, inconceivable among Jews who spoke Aramaic only. But here we must be cautious, for Philo would naturally describe any sect in terms of his own Gr. culture. That he twice over described this Pal. sect, yet apparently left unnoticed the purely Jewish schools of Pal., is in any case significant, and suggests that they had a Gr. culture which interested him, and led him to couple them, as he does, with the Alexandrine Therapeutæ.

Jos. equally implies that they were more or less Hellenized. Would he have conspired with Philo to misrepresent them? Nothing is more improvable.

The conclusion, then, is probable that they owed their origin to the introduction and diffusion of Greek culture in the early part of the 2nd cent. B.C. They were in some respects very strict Jews, and even fanatical observers of the Mosaic Law; but in others, notably in their election of their own priests,‡ and in the thereby implied supersession of the Levite hereditary priesthood, and in * *Ἐν Ἀντ. XVIII. i. 5: τῶν τεσσάρων ἀνδρῶν ὑπὲρ τετρακισχίλιον τὸν ἀριθμὸν ὄντων. Cf. Philo, II. 11: τῶν δὲ ὑπὲρ τετρακισχίλιον. It is not likely that the two numbers were the same at the very time. . . . 70. Again Jos. writes (BJ II. viii. 4). τοῖς αἰετῶν ἀνακρίνανται τὰ παρ' αὐτοῖς. Cf. Philo, II. 11: αἰετῶν καὶ τοῖς ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ ἀκριβοῦνται τῶν ἰουδαίων. † τοῖς δὲ ζήλοισιν τὴν αἰσιν.*

* Jos. uses σαββατεῖον (Ant. XVI. vi. 2). It is found in a very early Græco-Jewish papyrus, edited by Mr. B. P. Grenfell, of Oxford.

† τὰ γὰρ πλείστα διὰ συμβόλων ἀρχαιοτέρῳ ζήλωσι παρ' αὐτοῖς ἐπισκοπεῖται.

‡ Ant. XVIII. i. 5: ἀποδείκναι τὸν προῶτον χειροτονούντας . . . ἱερεῖς δὲ ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος αἰῶνος ἐκ τῶν βραμμάτων. If the Essenes discarded sacrifices, they had no need for priests of the old kind.

their repudiation of animal sacrifices, they were a new departure in Judaism, and very closely akin to Jesus and His disciples.

The literal, relating to the Essenes is so vast as to defy detailed reference. The student may be advised to study for himself the very limited documentary sources relating to them, and then to draw his own conclusions.* F. C. CONYBEARE.

ESTATE.—In AV (1611 and mod. edd.) 'estate' occurs 19 times, 'state' 14 times, without difference of meaning; thus Col 4<sup>7</sup> 'All my state (τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ πᾶντα) shall Tychicus declare unto you,' but v.<sup>8</sup> 'that he might know your estate' (τὰ κατὰ πρὸς ὑμῶν); and again, Ph 2<sup>12, 20</sup> 'your state' (τὰ κατὰ πρὸς ὑμῶν). Cf. Melvill, Diary, 289, 'We fand him in a miserable estate'; Calderwood, History, 144, 'I, Mr. Andrew Melville . . . most earnestly hath prayed at all times, and specially in the fore-said Sermon, for the preservation and prosperous estate of his Majesty.' The meaning is either 'condition' as in those examples, or 'position' as Ps 136<sup>23</sup> 'Who remembered us in our low estate' (נָחֵם), Ec 1<sup>18</sup> 'I am come to great estate' (גָּדָלָהּ). Cf. T. Elyot, The Governour (Croft's ed. i. 26), 'a man of the base estate of the communalitie'; Calderwood, History, 149, 'They declare how some of low estate, borne to no heritage . . . have creeped in favour with the King.' But in Dn 11<sup>20, 21, 38</sup> the meaning seems to be 'high rank,' 'dignity,' as 11<sup>7</sup> 'Out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate.' The Heb. is כֶּן, which means 'place' (as RV here) or 'office' (as RVm), and the favourite translation before AV was 'in his stead' (Cov. Gen. Bish.); once, however, the word is translated 'state' (Pr 23<sup>2</sup>, AV and RV). Akin to this meaning is Mk 6<sup>21</sup> 'Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee' (τοῖς πρώτοις, RV 'the chief men'), where, however, the word is used of the men to whom the dignity belongs. Cf. Fuller, Ch. Hist v. iii. 28, 'Item, that God never gave grace or knowledge of Holy Scripture to any great estate or rich man.' See also Ac 22<sup>8</sup> 'The high priest doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders,' Gr. πρῶτοι καὶ ἅπαντες οἱ ἄρχιερεῖς, lit. 'all the presbytery,' i.e. the ἱερεῖς (see). Compare Communion Office in Pr. Bk. 1549, 'the whole estate of Christ's Church militant here in earth,' changed in 1552 into 'state.' In Ezk 36<sup>11</sup> 'I will settle you after your old estates,' the plu. is used simply because the ref. is to more than one person; so Pref. to AV 1611, 'support fit for their estates.' J. HASTINGS.

ESTEEM, ESTIMATION.—'Esteem' and 'estimate' both come from Lat. estimare, the latter directly, the former through Old Fr. estimer. The meaning of estimare is to assign a value, appraise, rate; and that is the meaning of 'estimate' (Heb. מָדַד) in Lv 27<sup>14, 15</sup>, its only occurrences in EV. 'Estimation' occurs 20 times in the same chapter; elsewhere Lv 5<sup>16, 18, 26</sup>, Nu 18<sup>16</sup>, and * Schürer (HJP n. ii. 188 ff.) has a full record of the literature. The important names are Frankel, 'Die Essäer,' in Zeitschr. für die religiösen Interessen des Judenthums, 1846, 441-461; and 'Die Essäer nach thalmud. Quellen,' in Monatschr. für Gesch. u. Wissensch. des Judenth. 1853, 30-40, 61-73; Jost, Gesch. des Judenthums u. seiner Secten, 1857, i. 207-214; Herzfeld, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. (2nd ed. 1855), i. 308 ff., 388 ff., 509 ff.; Lightfoot in Colossians and Philemon, 32-98, 349-410; same in Dissertations, 323-471; Lucius, Der Essänismus, 1881; Hilgenfeld, Ketzergesch. des Urchristenthums, 1884, 87-149. Schürer may be supplemented by adding: Ginsburg in Smith and Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog. 1880; Ohle, 'Die Essäer,' in JPTs (1888) xiv; also 'Die Pseudophilonischen Essäer und die Therapeuten,' in Beiträge zur Kirchengesch. 1883; Thomson, Books which influenced our Lord, 1889, 75-122; Morrison, Jesus under Roman Rule, 1890, 325-347; Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, 1891, 415-421, 416-449; Cohn in JQR, 1892, 38-42; Friedländer, Zur Entstehungsgesch. des Christenthums, 1894, 98-142; Conybeare, Philo about the Contemplative Life, 1893, 278 ff.—EDITOR.

always in the same sense as 'estimate,' that is, valuation, price (Heb. מָדַד). Only once is 'estimation' found in the mod. sense of 'high value,' 'repute,' Wis 8<sup>10</sup> 'For her sake I shall have estimation among the multitude, and honour with the elders, though I be young' (δόξα, RV 'glory').

Cranmer (Works, i. 14) says, 'But to mine estimation, as much as I could view the ground, there was not slain upon both parties two thousand men.' This meaning of 'estimation' is not found in AV, but it is the almost invariable sense in which 'esteem' is used, that is, to esteem is to have an opinion (good or bad), reckon, as in He 10<sup>28</sup> Rhem. 'esteemed the blood of the testament polluted,' where AV and most VSS have 'counted'; and as Knox, Hist. 312, 'he shall be esteemed and holden a seditious person.' Thus Ro 14<sup>8</sup> 'One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike' (both κρίνει). Then the kind of judgment is expressed by an adverb, 'highly,' 'lightly,' or the like.

Sometimes 'esteem' might appear to be used, like 'estimation,' in the mod. sense of 'think highly of.' But this impression is probably due to the context or the presence of some adverb. Thus Wis 12<sup>7</sup> 'that land which thou esteemest above all other' (ἡ . . . τιμωτάτη γῆ, RV 'is most precious'); Sir 40<sup>22</sup> 'Gold and silver make the foot stand sure; but counsel is esteemed above them both' (ἐυδοκουμεῖται); Job 23<sup>12</sup> 'I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food' (מִנְיָהּ, RV 'I have treasured up'), 36<sup>19</sup> 'Will he esteem thy riches?' (מְחַיֵּה). And in particular, Is 53<sup>3</sup> 'He was despised, and we esteemed him not,' is generally taken in the sense of 'highly value'; but the l.c.b. verb (עָשָׂה) is very rare in that sense, and is used in the next verse in its familiar sense of 'reckon'—'we did esteem him stricken.' Cf. Ridley, A Brevé Declaration, 1535 (Moule's ed. p. 101), 'eateth and drynketh his owne damnacion, because he esteemeth not the Lordes body; that is, he reuerenceth not the Lordes bodi with the honour that is due unto him,' where the paraphrase contains more than the translation.

J. HASTINGS.

ESTHER (אֶסְתֵּר, 'Esther', Pers. stāra, 'star'), originally named Hadassah (הַדַּסָּה, 'myrtle').—A Jewess who has given her name to a book of the OT, in which she holds a prominent place. Sprung from a family of the tribe of Benjamin, she spent her life in the Captivity in Persia, where she was brought up in humble circumstances as the . . . her cousin Mordecai (Est 2<sup>5ff.</sup>). On the Pers. queen Vashti for refusing to come at the command of her husband Ahasuerus (Xerxes, B.C. 485-465), 'to show the peoples and the princes her beauty,' on an occasion of high festivity at the court of Susa (1<sup>10ff.</sup>), E. was selected to fill the vacant place of honour, as the fairest of many beautiful maidens . . . fore the king (2<sup>5ff.</sup>). Shortly after her . . . a great disaster threatened her countrymen. The grand vizier, 'Haman the Agagite,' enraged at the refusal of Mordecai to do obeisance to him, accused the whole nation of the Jews to the king as a disloyal and unprofitable people, and undertook to pay 10,000 talents of silver into the treasury as the proceeds of pillaging them. An edict was thereupon issued for the extermination of all Jewish families throughout the empire, and for the confiscation of their property, on a certain day, which Haman had previously determined by lot (ch. 3). In this crisis, moved by the tears of her fellow-countrymen, and incited by Mordecai, who urged her to rise to the great opportunity set before her for the deliverance of her nation, E. (after a fast of three days on the part of the whole Jewish community) resolved to venture uninvited, at the risk of her life, into the presence of Ahasuerus, in order to intercede with him for her people (ch. 4). A gracious reception was accorded to her by the king, who sat on the golden sceptre, and agreed to dine with her in her apartments on two consecutive days (ch. 5). On the night preceding the second banquet (at which E. intended to make known her request) it happened by a singular coincidence that there was read to the king, to while away some sleepless hours, a portion of the national archives, which recorded a valuable service rendered by Mordecai in the detection of a plot against the king's life on the part of two of his chamberlains. For this service Mordecai had never been rewarded; and when Haman, elated with the high honour shown him by the queen (who had invited him to the banquet provided for the king), appeared at the banquet the following morning in order to ask permission to be promoted to a position of honour, he was met with the question from the royal lips, 'What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour?' Imagining, in his overweening pride, that it must be him, of that was meant, he suggested a triumphal procession, in which one of the chief nobles should act the part of attendant. To his surprise and mortification he found himself called upon to serve in a menial capacity in the triumph of his Jewish adversary (ch. 6). This, as his wife divined, was only the prelude to his downfall, which came to pass next day at the second banquet, when the king, learning for the first time the nationality of the queen, and the distressing position in which the edict had placed her, ordered that Haman should be seized, and hanged forthwith on a lofty gallows which (as the king was at that moment informed by one of his courtiers) had been erected by Haman for the execution of Mordecai (ch. 7). The latter was at the same time raised to the vacant post of honour, and through his influence, and that of E., a second edict was issued and circulated, granting to the Jews the same powers, in the way of self-defence, as had been conferred in the previous edict on their enemies for the purpose of attack,—a direct revocation of the former edict being impossible according to the laws of the Medes and Persians. In consequence of these proceedings a dread of the Jews fell upon all peoples, many proselytes being gained—convinced, apparently, by the logic of events (ch. 8): and when the fatal day arrived, the conflict issued in a great slaughter of their enemies and a decisive victory for the Jews, who, however, waived their right of plunder. To commemorate their great deliverance, the joyful Feast of Purim (which see) was instituted by E. and Mordecai as an annual observance for the whole nation.

How far E. is to be regarded as a historical personage, depends on the historicity of the Book of Est (see below), her name not being mentioned in any other book of the OT, nor anywhere else in pre-Alex. literature. The only queen of Xerxes mentioned by Herodotus (vii. 61, 82, 114; ix. 108–112; cf. Ctesias, 20) is Amestris, a cruel and superstitious woman, whom some (Scaliger, Pfeiffer, Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Bunsen, Shickard, etc.) would identify with Esther. But Amestris was a daughter of a Pers. general connected with the royal family, and the chronology and circumstances of her reign cannot be reconciled with the biblical account either of E. or of Vashti. Xerxes (like his predecessors) may have had more wives than one, but, according to Pers. custom, they must have been taken from some of the great families connected with the throne, or from some other royal house; and the most tenable hypothesis seems to be that E. (as well as Vashti) was merely the chief favourite of the seraglio, gaining a remarkable influence over the foolish and capricious monarch, and using that influence at a critical moment for the benefit of her Jewish compatriots. While there are some things recorded of E. that offend our Christian feeling,—in particular her vindictive treatment of the bodies of Haman's sons (9<sup>7</sup>), and her request for an extension of time to the Jews at Susa for the slaughter of their enemies (9<sup>13</sup>),—yet she had to the spirit of the age in which she lived, and to the passions that had been excited by Haman's inhuman malignity. On the other hand, her devotion to the cause of her oppressed nationality ('I will go in unto the king; and if I perish, I perish'), her bearing towards her enemies, and the sudden rise in her fortunes, explain the honour in which her memory has been held by her countrymen.

J. A. McClymont.

ESTHER, BOOK OF.—I. CANONICITY.—Est is one of the latest of the Hagiographa or Kethubim, the third and latest accretion of the OT Canon. It may have been among 'the other books of the Fathers' which the Gr. translator of Sir (B.C. 132) mentions (in his Prologue) along with the 'Law and the Prophets' as well known to his grandfather, the author of that book (c. B.C. 180); but this seems unlikely, in view of the fact that neither Esther nor Mordecai is mentioned in the πατέρων ὕμνος towards the close of the book. The earliest undoubted reference to E. is in Jos. (c. Ap. i. 8), who includes it among the 22 books long held sacred (δικαίως θεῖα πεπιστευμένα), as is evident from the terminus ad quem which he assigns to the history (μέχρι τῆς Ἀρταξέρξου Περσῶν βασιλείας ἀρχῆς), Artaxerxes being, in Josephus as in the Sept., erroneously identified with Ahasuerus. The secular and foreign character of the book* gave rise among the Jews of the 1st and 2nd cent. of the Christian era to questionings as to its right to a place in the Canon. In the Jerus. Talm. (Meg. 70. 4) there is a statement that 85 elders, including more than 30 prophets, had scruples about the recognition of the Feast of Purim (at which the Book of Est was publicly read) because there was no sanction for it in the law of Moses; and elsewhere (Bab. Meg. 7a) we find traces of various difficulties felt by Rabbis as to the full inspiration of the book. It appears certain, however, that it formed an integral part of the Jewish Canon when the Temple was destroyed, if not formally, closed at the close of the 1st cent. and Jamnia in the 1st cent. A.D., as the same books that are in our OT are implied (numerically) in ch. 14 of 2 Es, which was written in end of 1st cent., and are embodied in the Mishna, committed to writing by R. Judah I. about A.D. 200. Breathing a spirit of intense patriotism, the book soon became popular with the Jews, and its annual reading in the synagogue was accompanied with lively tokens of sympathy on the part of the congregation, while the reader pronounced the names of Haman's 10 sons in one breath to indicate that they all expired at the same moment, the names being written by the scribes in large letters in 3 perpendicular lines of 3, 3, 4 to signify that the 10 men were hung on 3 parallel cords. Although the last of the 5 Megilloth or Rolls which were read at 5 different feasts,† it came to be known as the Roll (Megillah) par excellence, and we may judge of the honour in which it was held from a saying of Maimonides (Chaprov. Intr. xx. § 6), that in the days of the Messiah the only Scriptures left would be the Law and the Roll. The excessive love which the Jews

* The name of God is never mentioned in it, but the king of Persia 157 times, and his kingdom 26 times; while the nearest approach to any recognition of religion is to be found in the fasting of 416, and possibly also in the confidence expressed in 414.

† The order is different in the Eng. Bible, as also in the Sept and Vulg., where Est closes the historical books.

have ever shown for this book (of which Ewald has said that in passing to it from the other books of the OT 'we fall, as it were, from heaven to earth') illustrates their complete surrender to the spirit of the age in which it was produced. It was an age that had fallen out of sympathy with the teaching of the prophets, and was unprepared for the spiritual conception of the gospel,—when national pride and a certain faith in their own fortunes as a people, with a disposition to make the most of their heathen masters by the use of such worldly wisdom as they possessed, seem to have formed the chief characteristics of those who still claimed to be God's people.

In the Christian Church the book has naturally been less esteemed. It is one of the few books of the OT that are not quoted in the NT (nor in Philo). It has no place in the Canon of Melito of Sardis, who had made careful inquiry among the Jews of Syria regarding the books of the OT; of Theodore of Mopsuestia (followed by the Nestorians); of Athanasius, who put it in the second rank among the ἀναγινωσκόμενα; of Amphilochius, who mentions that 'some add the Book of Esther'; of Gregory of Naz., and others. Junilius in the 6th cent. mentions that there were grave doubts on the subject in his day; while Luther, after referring to 2 Mac, says Fischerius, 'I have so little favour for this book and the Book of Est that I wish they did not exist; they are too Judaizing, and contain many heathenish improprieties.' In some of these cases, however, it may have been the corrupt Sept. transl. that caused suspicion, while in others it is possible that Est may be included under the name of Ezra or some other book. Est is recognized as canonical by Origen, Cyril of Jerus., Jerome (who puts it last in the list), Augustine, and others. We may also reckon it an indirect testimony to the authority of the book in the beginning of the Christian era, that, according to 2 Mac (15<sup>24</sup>), 'Mordecai's day' (ἡμέρα Μορδαχίου) was observed in the Feast of Purim, was observed in the . . . . . The fact that it has a place (in an enlarged form) in the Sept., with an epilogue stating that the tr. was brought (to Alexandria) by one Dositheus in the 4th year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, is regarded by some as a proof that the book existed in its Gr. form as early as B.C. 178, in the reign of Ptolemy VI. (Philometor), who was friendly to the Jews. But there were two later kings of that name, and one earlier (B.C. 204–81), whose wives were called Cleopatra; and the inference is doubtful, even admitting the authority of the statement in question (Richm. Prot.; Prot.-sche, Handb. z. d. Apoc. i.). While the Heb. text is good, there are large interpolations in the Sept., of which there are two different texts, A and B, the latter, according to Lagarde, Field, etc., being an improved recension of the 3rd cent. These interpolations contradict the Heb. in several particulars,* and betray their later Gr. origin by representing Haman as a Macedonian who sought to transfer the sovereignty from the Persians to the Macedonians (16<sup>10-15</sup>), and by other inconsistencies and anachronisms,† and were, no doubt, the work of successive Hellenistic writers desirous to give a religious character to the book,‡ and to supplement other apparent defects.§ In the Vulg. these additions are all put by Jerome at the end of the book, beginning with a portion that takes up the narrative where the Heb. ends—with notes to show where the other additions occur in the Sept.

* Cf. 2<sup>21</sup> and Ad. Est 11<sup>27</sup>, 6<sup>2</sup> and 12<sup>18</sup>, 31<sup>1</sup> and 12<sup>18</sup>, 91<sup>2</sup> and 151<sup>3</sup>.
† For example, 'month Adar' 16<sup>10</sup>, 'chosen people' 16<sup>12</sup>, 'Hades' 13<sup>7</sup>, 'I am thy brother' 15<sup>1</sup>, 'Aman's table,' 'drink-offerings' 141<sup>7</sup>.

‡ Ad. Est 10<sup>8</sup>, 10<sup>11</sup>, 11<sup>12</sup>, 13<sup>13</sup>, 111<sup>10</sup>, 13<sup>18</sup>, 14<sup>2</sup>, 9<sup>15</sup>, 15<sup>18</sup>, 16<sup>14</sup>, 16.

§ For example, by giving the terms of the royal edicts, which are not at all Oriental in style, 131<sup>7</sup> 16.

In the RV Eng. Apoc. (where they are similarly combined under the name of 'The Rest of the Chapters of the Bk. of Esther') these explanations are given in the margin.

Owing to the influence of the Sept. and Vulg. (in the Syr. . . . . were often read in church, and common with other Apoc. books . . . . . Councils, from that . . . . . in 1546. They are composed of the following . . . . . twofold references showing where they stand . . . . . the Rest of Est re. . . . . and detection of . . . . . exciting Haman's wrath . . . . .

and Est (after 4; 138-141<sup>9</sup>). . . . . (3) . . . . . Est's first intercession with the king (in . . . . . (5) Terms of the king's writ, authorizing the Jews to defend themselves (after 318 16). (6) Mordecai's devout interpretation of his dream in the light of events, and his permanent institution of the Feast of Purim, followed by epilogue regarding the Gr. tr. (End; 104-13 113). In Josephus we can trace other additions to the story not found in the Sept., which shows the popularity of the subject, and the tendency to embroider the Heb. narrative with Alex. inventions. Similar embellishments are to be found in the 'first' and 'second' Chaldean Targums or commentaries, independent of the Gr. additions, which only found their way into . . . . . through the medium of the n-Gorion (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche . . . . .

II. HISTORICITY.—On this subject the most diverse opinions have been held. Many old and a few modern writers* maintain the narrative to be . . . . . historical. But an increasing number † hold it to be more or less a . . . . . while some ‡ regard it as a . . . . . having no appreciable basis of fact to rest on.

The following are the principal arguments for the historical character of the book. (1) The narrative claims to be historical, referring more than once to 'the chronicles' of Persia as containing a record of the events in question (10<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>23</sup> 61); and its admission to the Pal. Canon, notwithstanding the absence of any allusion to the Holy Land or to Jewish ordinances, is so far a confirmation of its claim. (2) The Feast of Purim, with which it was so closely connected as to be known among Alex. writers as 'the Epistle of Purim,' and which, in the time of Jos. (Ant. xi. vi. 13) was observed by Jews in all parts of the world, is a standing memorial of the remarkable episode in Jewish history which the book records. (3) Its lifelike representation of Pers. manners and customs, especially in connexion with the palace at Susa (1<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>), is borne out by the results of modern travel and research (Rawlinson's Anc. Monarchies, iv. pp. 269–287; Morier, Fergusson, Loftus, Dieulafoy), and finds support in Herodotus and other ancient writers. (4) The conduct of Ahasuerus is in harmony with the vain, capricious, passionate character of Xerxes (the identical nature of the two names was the first result obtained from the deciphering of the cuneiform inscriptions by . . . . . as depicted by heathen writers (Herod. vii. ix.; Æsch. Pers. 467 ff.; Juv. x. 174–187); and this may account for some things in the narrative that would otherwise seem almost incredible. (5) It appears from

* Kille, Vindiciae Est.; Havernick, Bibl. Hist., Bann. 1720; De Fide Lab. Est.; Weite, Einleitung; H. L. . . . .; Harvey, Smith's DB.; Nickes, De Est. Lib.; C. . . . .; K. . . . .; Rawlinson, Speakers' . . . . .; Com.; J. G. . . . .; Phil. Chret., and L. . . . .; J. W. H. . . . . of Est; and, in the . . . . ., Lang's Com.; and Or. iii. 1<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>11</sup>, art. 'Esther.'

† Eichhorn, Einleitung; De Wette, Einleitung; Bloch, Th. Einleitung; Winer, Bibl. RWB.; Dillmann in Schena's Bibl. Lex., art. 'Purim'; Ewald, Gesch. Isr.; Stahelin, I. . . . .; Bertheau, Exeg. Handb.; Oettli, S. und Z. Kg. Kom.; Davidson, Introduction; Hitzig, Gesch. Isr.; Herzfeld, Gesch. Isr.; Stanley, Jewish Ch.; Driver, LOT 449 ff.; Cheyne, Enc. Brit., art. 'Esther'; König, Einleitung.

‡ Semler, Appar. VT.; Bertholdt, Einleitung; Kuenen, Relig. Isr., and Onderz. 21. 551 ff. (Hist. Crit. vol 1); Nöldeke, Alttest. Lit.; Reuss, Gesch. AT, Zunz, ZDNG 1873, Grätz, MGWJ, 1886; Bloch, 'Hel. Bestandth. im B. . . . .', Jud. Lit. BL, 1877; Cornill, Einleit.; Bertholet, Die Schrift der Isr.

Herod. vii. 8 that Xerxes held a great council of war in the third year of his reign before setting out for Greece, and that he returned to Susa in the spring of his seventh year,—which, according to the dates assigned to the great feast and the accession of a successor to Vashti (1st 2nd). (6) Although the narrative is minute and circumstantial, containing many names (of courtiers, princes, 1st 2nd 3rd 4th 5th 6th 7th 8th 9th 10th 11th 12th 13th 14th 15th 16th 17th 18th 19th 20th 21st 22nd 23rd 24th 25th 26th 27th 28th 29th 30th 31st 32nd 33rd 34th 35th 36th 37th 38th 39th 40th 41st 42nd 43rd 44th 45th 46th 47th 48th 49th 50th 51st 52nd 53rd 54th 55th 56th 57th 58th 59th 60th 61st 62nd 63rd 64th 65th 66th 67th 68th 69th 70th 71st 72nd 73rd 74th 75th 76th 77th 78th 79th 80th 81st 82nd 83rd 84th 85th 86th 87th 88th 89th 90th 91st 92nd 93rd 94th 95th 96th 97th 98th 99th 100th 101st 102nd 103rd 104th 105th 106th 107th 108th 109th 110th 111st 112nd 113rd 114th 115th 116th 117th 118th 119th 120th 121st 122nd 123rd 124th 125th 126th 127th 128th 129th 130th 131st 132nd 133rd 134th 135th 136th 137th 138th 139th 140th 141st 142nd 143rd 144th 145th 146th 147th 148th 149th 150th 151st 152nd 153rd 154th 155th 156th 157th 158th 159th 160th 161st 162nd 163rd 164th 165th 166th 167th 168th 169th 170th 171st 172nd 173rd 174th 175th 176th 177th 178th 179th 180th 181st 182nd 183rd 184th 185th 186th 187th 188th 189th 190th 191st 192nd 193rd 194th 195th 196th 197th 198th 199th 200th 201st 202nd 203rd 204th 205th 206th 207th 208th 209th 210th 211st 212nd 213rd 214th 215th 216th 217th 218th 219th 220th 221st 222nd 223rd 224th 225th 226th 227th 228th 229th 230th 231st 232nd 233rd 234th 235th 236th 237th 238th 239th 240th 241st 242nd 243rd 244th 245th 246th 247th 248th 249th 250th 251st 252nd 253rd 254th 255th 256th 257th 258th 259th 260th 261st 262nd 263rd 264th 265th 266th 267th 268th 269th 270th 271st 272nd 273rd 274th 275th 276th 277th 278th 279th 280th 281st 282nd 283rd 284th 285th 286th 287th 288th 289th 290th 291st 292nd 293rd 294th 295th 296th 297th 298th 299th 300th 301st 302nd 303rd 304th 305th 306th 307th 308th 309th 310th 311st 312nd 313rd 314th 315th 316th 317th 318th 319th 320th 321st 322nd 323rd 324th 325th 326th 327th 328th 329th 330th 331st 332nd 333rd 334th 335th 336th 337th 338th 339th 340th 341st 342nd 343rd 344th 345th 346th 347th 348th 349th 350th 351st 352nd 353rd 354th 355th 356th 357th 358th 359th 360th 361st 362nd 363rd 364th 365th 366th 367th 368th 369th 370th 371st 372nd 373rd 374th 375th 376th 377th 378th 379th 380th 381st 382nd 383rd 384th 385th 386th 387th 388th 389th 390th 391st 392nd 393rd 394th 395th 396th 397th 398th 399th 400th 401st 402nd 403rd 404th 405th 406th 407th 408th 409th 410th 411st 412nd 413rd 414th 415th 416th 417th 418th 419th 420th 421st 422nd 423rd 424th 425th 426th 427th 428th 429th 430th 431st 432nd 433rd 434th 435th 436th 437th 438th 439th 440th 441st 442nd 443rd 444th 445th 446th 447th 448th 449th 450th 451st 452nd 453rd 454th 455th 456th 457th 458th 459th 460th 461st 462nd 463rd 464th 465th 466th 467th 468th 469th 470th 471st 472nd 473rd 474th 475th 476th 477th 478th 479th 480th 481st 482nd 483rd 484th 485th 486th 487th 488th 489th 490th 491st 492nd 493rd 494th 495th 496th 497th 498th 499th 500th 501st 502nd 503rd 504th 505th 506th 507th 508th 509th 510th 511st 512nd 513rd 514th 515th 516th 517th 518th 519th 520th 521st 522nd 523rd 524th 525th 526th 527th 528th 529th 530th 531st 532nd 533rd 534th 535th 536th 537th 538th 539th 540th 541st 542nd 543rd 544th 545th 546th 547th 548th 549th 550th 551st 552nd 553rd 554th 555th 556th 557th 558th 559th 560th 561st 562nd 563rd 564th 565th 566th 567th 568th 569th 570th 571st 572nd 573rd 574th 575th 576th 577th 578th 579th 580th 581st 582nd 583rd 584th 585th 586th 587th 588th 589th 590th 591st 592nd 593rd 594th 595th 596th 597th 598th 599th 600th 601st 602nd 603rd 604th 605th 606th 607th 608th 609th 610th 611st 612nd 613rd 614th 615th 616th 617th 618th 619th 620th 621st 622nd 623rd 624th 625th 626th 627th 628th 629th 630th 631st 632nd 633rd 634th 635th 636th 637th 638th 639th 640th 641st 642nd 643rd 644th 645th 646th 647th 648th 649th 650th 651st 652nd 653rd 654th 655th 656th 657th 658th 659th 660th 661st 662nd 663rd 664th 665th 666th 667th 668th 669th 670th 671st 672nd 673rd 674th 675th 676th 677th 678th 679th 680th 681st 682nd 683rd 684th 685th 686th 687th 688th 689th 690th 691st 692nd 693rd 694th 695th 696th 697th 698th 699th 700th 701st 702nd 703rd 704th 705th 706th 707th 708th 709th 710th 711st 712nd 713rd 714th 715th 716th 717th 718th 719th 720th 721st 722nd 723rd 724th 725th 726th 727th 728th 729th 730th 731st 732nd 733rd 734th 735th 736th 737th 738th 739th 740th 741st 742nd 743rd 744th 745th 746th 747th 748th 749th 750th 751st 752nd 753rd 754th 755th 756th 757th 758th 759th 760th 761st 762nd 763rd 764th 765th 766th 767th 768th 769th 770th 771st 772nd 773rd 774th 775th 776th 777th 778th 779th 780th 781st 782nd 783rd 784th 785th 786th 787th 788th 789th 790th 791st 792nd 793rd 794th 795th 796th 797th 798th 799th 800th 801st 802nd 803rd 804th 805th 806th 807th 808th 809th 810th 811st 812nd 813rd 814th 815th 816th 817th 818th 819th 820th 821st 822nd 823rd 824th 825th 826th 827th 828th 829th 830th 831st 832nd 833rd 834th 835th 836th 837th 838th 839th 840th 841st 842nd 843rd 844th 845th 846th 847th 848th 849th 850th 851st 852nd 853rd 854th 855th 856th 857th 858th 859th 860th 861st 862nd 863rd 864th 865th 866th 867th 868th 869th 870th 871st 872nd 873rd 874th 875th 876th 877th 878th 879th 880th 881st 882nd 883rd 884th 885th 886th 887th 888th 889th 890th 891st 892nd 893rd 894th 895th 896th 897th 898th 899th 900th 901st 902nd 903rd 904th 905th 906th 907th 908th 909th 910th 911st 912nd 913rd 914th 915th 916th 917th 918th 919th 920th 921st 922nd 923rd 924th 925th 926th 927th 928th 929th 930th 931st 932nd 933rd 934th 935th 936th 937th 938th 939th 940th 941st 942nd 943rd 944th 945th 946th 947th 948th 949th 950th 951st 952nd 953rd 954th 955th 956th 957th 958th 959th 960th 961st 962nd 963rd 964th 965th 966th 967th 968th 969th 970th 971st 972nd 973rd 974th 975th 976th 977th 978th 979th 980th 981st 982nd 983rd 984th 985th 986th 987th 988th 989th 990th 991st 992nd 993rd 994th 995th 996th 997th 998th 999th 1000th

On the other hand, the following are the chief objections that have been taken to the historicity of the book. (1) The story bears on the face of it the appearance of a historical romance, a number of its features being in themselves extremely improbable, e.g. the six months' feast, involving such prolonged absence of the governors from their duties in the provinces; the summons of Vashti before the assembled people and princes, and the subsequent decree, suggested by 'the wise men,' that every man should bear rule in his own house, which would have been the publication of Ahasuerus' folly; the long interval before the choice of Vashti's successor; the decree for the wholesale massacre of the Jews (not excepting those in Judaea, and numbering probably two millions) on account of the obstinacy of a single Jew; the publication of this decree eleven months before the time for its execution; the issue of a subsequent decree virtually annulling civil war; the immense slaughter of the Persians notwithstanding their superiority in numbers, and the wonderful preservation of Jewish lives, as well as the absence of revenge on the part of the Persians; the institution by Mordecai and E. of a feast that would perpetuate the disgrace of the sovereign in the eyes of his subjects, and embitter the relation between Jew and Persian (but cf. the annual commemoration of the massacre of the Magians, Herod. iii. 79—with which Niebuhr was disposed to connect the story). Add to this that the series of coincidences and contrasts culminating in the overthrow of Haman 'the Agagite' (1 S 15—but Oppert connects this name with Agaz, a tribe of Media mentioned in the inscriptions of Sargon) and the exaltation of Mordecai of the tribe of Benjamin, is too perfect to have been drawn from real life. (2) The manifest aim of the writer is to encourage and glorify the Jews; and the whole narrative, which is marked by exaggeration and innuendo, is artfully designed to serve that purpose (2nd 15. 17. 22 32. 15 41st 6th 10. 11. 13 7th 8th 9th 10th 11th 12th 13th 14th 15th 16th 17th 18th 19th 20th 21st 22nd 23rd 24th 25th 26th 27th 28th 29th 30th 31st 32nd 33rd 34th 35th 36th 37th 38th 39th 40th 41st 42nd 43rd 44th 45th 46th 47th 48th 49th 50th 51st 52nd 53rd 54th 55th 56th 57th 58th 59th 60th 61st 62nd 63rd 64th 65th 66th 67th 68th 69th 70th 71st 72nd 73rd 74th 75th 76th 77th 78th 79th 80 well as the introduction of Purim) to the Parthian ascendancy after B.C. 238, and in the description of the Jews in 3<sup>8</sup> he finds evidence that it was written subsequently to the colonizing activity of Seleucus Nicator. Other critics, Gratz, Bloch, etc., give it a still later date, tracing it to the time of the Maccabean revolt (B.C. 167). Bloch regards it as an attempt to justify the Jewish party at the Gr. court, who thought they could best promote the interests of their country by conciliating the heathen power; but with this it is difficult to reconcile Mordecai's attitude towards Haman, or the laughter of Pers. women and children and its common occasion. Gratz assigns the book to an adherent of the Maccabean party, and, with the ingenuity of a special pleader, presents a great array of arguments to prove that Ahasuerus represents Antiochus (with some intentional vagueness as to the identity of Ah. himself), and that the book was intended to appeal to those who, like the deputies to Tyre (2 Mac 4<sup>18-20</sup>), were disposed to resist the king's attempt to force them into idolatry, although they had very little religion of their own,—hinting at the influences which they might bring to bear upon the king, and at a possible turn in the wheel of fortune,—much as the Bk. of Dn was meant, a year or two later, to tell upon the more devout (Hasidim), who still believed in the possibility of direct divine interpositions. Kuenen and Cornill find in it an echo of the same struggle (cf. 3<sup>8</sup> and 1 Mac 14<sup>34-35</sup>) after it was over (B.C. 135), when religious heroism had given place to animosity and pride. Similarly, Zunz believes it to have been an Eastern reflex (c. B.C. 130) of the Maccabean enthusiasm, and lays stress on the lateness and servility of the language, as well as on the want of any recognition of the Jewish community as a whole, Mordecai and Esther being the only Jews who are credited with any influence. But the language, though late, is very far from exhibiting the stage represented by the Mishna;* and as regards the supposed Maccabean origin for the story, it must be remembered that even under the Pers. rule (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22) there had been times when the Jews suffered persecution for their attachment to their faith. That the book was written by a Persian Jew may fairly be inferred from its tone and structure, notwithstanding Gratz' denial that the use of Heb. for literary purposes was possible outside of Palestine, except during the Bab. Captivity. It is vain, however, to attempt to determine the authorship more particularly. The references to Mordecai's writing in 9<sup>20-22</sup> have given rise to the idea that he may have been the author; but the peculiarities of the passage, both in language and contents, stamp it as an interpolation or intrusion (vv. 20-22-23-24), perhaps borrowed from the book of Purim (v. 22). Moreover, some of the allusions to Mordecai (e.g. 9<sup>34</sup>) preclude the idea of his being the writer. All that can be said with confidence is that it was written by a Jew connected with Persia, and full of the nationalist feeling of his time, the absence of religious philosophy being due partly to the decline in the spiritual life of the nation, occasioned by centuries of exposure to heathen influences, leading to reserve in the expression of religious sentiment, partly to the secular character of the Feast of Purim associated with it, which rested on no divine authority, and was marked by a gay conviviality, varied with an occasional outburst of passion that was not favourable to religious solemnity. See further under PURIM.

* At the same time it must be admitted that, even after the Mishna style was formed, books in imitation of the classical style were written, otherwise Ec would have to be placed long after Sirach.

LITERATURE.—LOT 449 ff.; Cheyne, art. 'Esther' in Encyclopædia of OT Criticism, 359 ff.; Kuenen, Handbook of OT Criticism, 1891, p. 168; Lagarde, Revue de l'Ét. Hébr., p. 241 ff.; Ju. and Est., 169 ff.; Cornill, Esther, p. 308; Rylands, Esther, p. 444 ff.; Tode, Neh. u. Est., 2nd ed. (in Strack and Zöckler's Agg. Kom. 1889, p. 227 ff.); Reuss, AT vii. 193 ff. See also references in footnotes above. J. A. McClymont.

ESTHER (Apocryphal).—See preceding article.

ESYELUS (Ἑσύλος, B<sup>2</sup> ἡ σόδοδος, AV Syelus) 1 Es 1<sup>8</sup>=Jehiel.—One of the rulers of the temple in Josiah's time (2 Ch 35<sup>9</sup>).

ETAM (עֵתָם, possibly 'place of birds of prey,' from עָרַב 'bird of prey').—It is uncertain whether there may not have been two places so called in Judah. The town Etam (1 Ch 43<sup>32</sup>) was in Simeon, near Rimmon. It may be the place fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11<sup>9</sup>), though there noticed with Bethlehem and Tekoa. The Rock Etam (Jg 15<sup>5-11</sup>) was Samson's refuge, and had in it a peculiar 'fissure' (קִרְעָה) or 'cavern' (AV 'top'). In the Talm. an Etam near Bethlehem is noticed (see Neubauer, Geog. Talm. s.v.). These may represent three distinct sites. 1. Etam of Simeon is very clearly the ruin 'Atán near Rimmon of Simeon, on the hills N.W. of Beersheba. SWP vol. iii. sheet xxiv. 2. Etam near Bethlehem is represented by the present 'Am 'Atán, at the so-called Pools of Solomon (Rom. reservoirs connected with Pilate's aqueduct to Jerus.), the traditional site of the 'sealed fountain' (Ca 4<sup>12</sup>), identified by the Rabbis with Nephtoah. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. 3. The Rock Etam is an undefined site, but may have been near Samson's home at Zorah. There is a remarkable rocky hill to the E., on which the village Beit 'Atáb now stands, under which is a curious cavern in the rock. The change of B for M is not uncommon (cf. TIMNAH), and this is a possible site for Samson's refuge. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

LITERATURE.—Besides the above, see Encyclopædia of OT Criticism, 359 ff.; Kuenen, Handbook of OT Criticism, 1891, p. 168; Lagarde, Revue de l'Ét. Hébr., p. 241 ff.; Ju. and Est., 169 ff.; Cornill, Esther, p. 308; Rylands, Esther, p. 444 ff.; Tode, Neh. u. Est., 2nd ed. (in Strack and Zöckler's Agg. Kom. 1889, p. 227 ff.); Reuss, AT vii. 193 ff. See also references in footnotes above. J. A. McClymont.

C. R. CONDER.

ETHAM (עֵתָם, LXX Ὀθῆμα, Ex 13<sup>20</sup>; Βουθάν, Nu 33<sup>7</sup>). The Coptic has ερεθου, Ex 13<sup>20</sup> W. L. G. and εβουθα [Wilkins], εβουθαν [Sah. Ciasca]. LXX and Cop. omit Etham in Nu 33<sup>2</sup>.—The station at which the Israelites arrived after leaving Succoth. It is described (Ex 13<sup>20</sup>, Nu 33<sup>6</sup>) as being 'on the edge of the wilderness.' This wilderness (called W. of Etham, Nu 33<sup>8</sup>, and W. of Shur, Ex 15<sup>22</sup>) was traversed by the Israelites after crossing the sea. It must therefore be east of the Isthmus of Suez, and Etham would be on its W. edge. If on leaving Egypt the Israelites went along Wady Tumilat [see EXODUS (ROUTE OF), § i.], they would make for the broad tract of dry ground to the N. of Lake Timsah, and the position of Etham would be where their route crossed the Egyp. frontier, i.e. in the neighbourhood of the modern Ismailia. Naville places Etham here, but explains the word as designating the land of Atuma, which is mentioned in the papyrus Anastasi vi. The land of Atuma there mentioned is generally supposed to be the land of Edom. See PIHAHIROTH and the Literature under EXODUS (ROUTE OF), § ii. [Brugsch's 'Exodus and the Egyptian Monuments' may be read in English in vol. ii. of the translation (1879) of his Egypt under the Pharaohs, or in New Ed. (1891, in one vol.) p. 318 ff.]. A. T. CHAPMAN.

ETHAN (יֶתָנָי).—1. 'THE EZRAHITE' of 1 K 4<sup>2</sup> and Ps 89 (title). In the first of these passages he is mentioned along with other contemporaries (?) of Solomon, who were all surpassed in wisdom by the Jewish monarch. In 1 Ch 2<sup>25</sup> he is said to have been a Judean of the family of Zerah, which is prob. another form of Ezrah (hence the Ezrahite). Instead of 'the Ezrahite' it is proposed to render עֲרָאִי of 1 K 4<sup>31</sup> 'the native,' i.e. the Israelite, in opposition to some of the other wise men named, who were foreigners (Cheyne, Job and Solomon, p. 131). The title of Ps 89 to E. occasioned one of the Midrash Rabbinical exegesis. עֲרָאִי was connected with עֵרָא (the east), then 'the man from the east' of Is 41<sup>2</sup> was interpreted of Abraham, and Ethan the Ezrahite was identified with the patriarch, who thus became the author of the psalm (Driver, LOT p. xxxiii, n.). 2. An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6<sup>24</sup>). In v. 21 he is called Joah. 3. The eponymous ancestor of a guild of temple-singers (mentioned along with Heman and Asaph in 1 Ch 6<sup>24</sup> 15<sup>17,19</sup> etc.). His genealogy is traced by the Chronicler back to Merari, one of the sons of Levi. He is generally identified with Jeduthun. (See JEDUTHUN.) J. A. SELBIE.

ETHANIM (עֲתָנִים, 'Adameis B, 'Aθavetu A, Ethanīm, 1 K 8<sup>2</sup>). See TIME.

ETHANUS, one of the 'swift scribes' who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14<sup>24</sup>). The name occurs in the MSS variously as Ecanus, Echanus, Elkana, etc.

ETHBAAL (עֲתָבָאֵל 'with Baal,' i.e. enjoying his favour and protection; 'Ἐθεβαάλ B, 'Iaβaal A, 'Ἐθβαάλ Luc.).—King of the Sidonians, and father of Jezebel wife of Ahab king of Israel (1 K 16<sup>31</sup>).

According to Jos., Ittobaal ('Ἰτθόβαλος, Elthobalos, i.e. עֲתָבָאֵל 'Baal is with him,' a form of the name preferred by Thenius, Stade, etc.) was king of the Tyrians and Sidonians (Ant. VIII. xiii. 1), and is stated by Menander of Ephesus to have been a priest of Astarte who attained to the throne by the murder of the usurper Phellex (C. Ap. i. 18). This identification with the Ethbaal of K is allowed by moderns. The Taylor cylinder, col. ii. 48, mentions a later king of Sidon of the same name; Assy. Tuba'lu (Schrader, COT, on Gn 10<sup>15</sup>).

C. F. BURNEY.

ETHER (אֶתֶר, Jos 15<sup>42</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>).—A town of Judah noticed with Libnah, apparently near the plain of Philistia, given to Simeon, and near Rimmon. The site is unknown.

ETHICS.—The treatment of this subject is involved in a certain amount of difficulty, from the fact that while the ethical character of the whole Jewish dispensation is strongly and unmistakably marked, there is no ethical system, strictly so called, in the Bible at all. The ethical ideas, like the metaphysical ideas, underlie the histories, the prophecies, the legislation, and the writings of the apostles; they are not deduced or criticised, but assumed as premises. For such a purpose as that of the present article they have to be extracted and presented systematically; and there is always danger that when this is done some greater precision of definition may be given to the ideas than they really possess.

There is another difficulty, even greater than this, which arises from the critical discussions recently raised over the authorship and date of books. This presses more hardly on the student of OT ideas than of Christianity. For even if the date of individual books of the NT be uncertain, the margin of uncertainty is comparatively narrow; and the period within which they all must fall is, comparatively speaking, a short one. Hence critical questions may be neglected without any serious loss. But with the OT it is different. We can no longer take for granted the traditional order or date of the books; and, what is much more serious, the period within which they must all have been written is a very long one, so that it would be unreasonable to expect that the ethical point of view can have suffered no serious change. It is obviously impossible to discuss the various critical questions by the way. We can only call attention to the part they play in the whole discussion of our present subject, and then leave them aside. The plan of the present article is, then, to set forth the ethical ideas in the Bible, as far as possible, without reference to the literary history of the books, following such order as the subject itself seems to require.

I. IN THE OT AND APOCRYPHA.—The first point requiring attention is one of great importance, which will have decisive influence in regard to our whole subject-matter. It is the partial exception (considered later) of the Sapiential Books, the whole of the Jewish Scriptures are under the sway of religion. The ruling idea of life was conditioned by the prevalent conception of God, and the peculiar relation in which the Jewish people stood towards Him. Hence the larger portion of the discussions with which other ethical writings have made us familiar, has no place whatever in Jewish literature. Greek ethical speculation busied itself with the questions of the end of life, or the ideal order of life, or the nature of virtue, or the sanction of the moral law. But to the Jewish mind all these questions were prejudged by the peculiarly close relation of religion with life. The God they worshipped was to the Jews the source and the sanction of the moral law. Their moral evolution consisted in their gradual discovery of the full meaning of their primary ethical conviction. Their notion of the content of the ethical idea varied as time went on; their history is, in a sense, reflected in their ethical evolution. Things which at one time were thought compatible with the due worship of God, cease to be thought so; but the general relation in which they stand to God remains undisturbed: morality is, to them, the embodied will of God.

It follows necessarily from this that there are, roughly speaking, two, and only two, questions for the Jewish moralists. (1) What conduct does God command? (2) What conduct does God forbid? Why He ordains or prohibits one or another line of conduct does not matter to them. They are concerned only with the fact. The answers to these remoter questions may, to some extent, be revealed in the process of moral evolution, but they are not of primary interest or importance. The central question is that of the actual content of the divine law.

It might seem, at first sight, as if this theory of the moral law must exclude a people from any marked development in ethical matters. The most cursory glance, however, at the actual facts would destroy this supposition. The law of God is adapted to various stages in the progress of the people, and enforces the morality characteristic of the stage at which they are. It is obvious that this must necessarily have been the case. If, as the Jews believed, God Himself revealed the moral law to them, it must necessarily have been in terms which they could understand. It would have been idle, for instance, to promulgate to a nation, as yet only in the tribal stage of its existence, a law which assumed the existence of settled civilisation. Thus the conviction of the special union of God with His people, and interest in their moral life, affects the character of the evolution of ethical ideas, but does not prevent their real growth.

(A) The Pentateuch and the Historical Books.—The note of law is struck in the account of Paradise and the Fall. In this story we have all the elements of the ethical idea as it presented itself to the Jews. God gave a command which man disobeyed. In like manner the sin which led to the Flood was disobedience or rebellion against God. The law of murder, enacted after the Flood has disappeared, is given as a definite act of vengeance on the part of God (Gn 9<sup>4-7</sup>). In the same way the sin of Sodom is represented as an outrage upon God; and the destruction of the cities as the judgment of God. When we reach the times of Abraham the same phenomena appear in a more complex form. The intercourse between God and man, of which the covenant after the Flood was typical, is concentrated and intensified in the relation of God with Abraham. A demand is made for a more complete and detailed obedience; and the rite of circumcision has a special significance assigned to it. The special covenant is based on the readiness of Abraham to accept the guidance of God; cf. Gn 17<sup>1-2</sup>. 'The LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am God Almighty: walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.' The same idea of a covenant is sustained throughout the whole history between Abraham and Moses; the people are regarded as standing in a peculiar relation to God, and bound by it to certain lines of conduct. The protection and interest of God in the chosen family is represented as a thing which they are bound to cherish with the greatest care, and it is implied throughout that the covenant is part of a larger scheme. The sin of Esau consists in the neglect of this covenantal right of access to God; and the blessing of Jacob consists in his fitness to be the vehicle of the covenant-relation, rather than in any commendation bestowed upon his own character.

Whatever may be the literary history of the books in which this story is preserved, there is no doubt that it represents the belief of the Jewish people, and, that hung so, it characterized their ethical ideas. But it is important to notice also the area of moral action covered by the commands of God. We have already noticed the prohibition of murder, and the condemnation of Sodom. Apart from these, the morality consistent with the stage of civilization so far attained is implicitly permitted. There is no condemnation of polygamy; the fraud of Abraham upon Abimelech is not condemned, though its uselessness is displayed by the action of God; and, in like manner, Jacob's fraud upon Isaac is shown to be unprofitable by the fact of his exile. At the same time the witness of God is sought in order to preserve the validity of treaties (Gn 26<sup>27-28</sup>), and His worship is regarded as distinct from that of many other deities. There is little sign at present of any elaborate moral reform depending on the covenant-relation; and the morality of the people as it is described is strictly governed by principles which prevail in the patriarchal stage. What is new and has the germs of much of the future development in it, is the intensification of the idea of the tribal God. The relation asserted between God and the family of Abraham is peculiarly close and far-reaching in its character; and the ground is prepared for the substitution of a moral for a physical or tribal basis of the covenant.

The next stage in the history as it is presented in the OT books is marked by the Levitical legislation. It is here, probably, that the difficulties caused by critical discussions reach their highest point. In pursuance of our plan we shall describe, first, the facts as they stand, and reserve such criticism upon the matter. Under the head of the Mosaic legislation we have to consider the Decalogue, the Priestly Code, and the Deuteronomic exposition of the Mosaic law. This will involve a brief consideration of the meaning and character of Sacrifice, and the meaning of Sin.

Of the Decalogue it is not necessary to say much. We need only call attention to the fact that it consists of two distinct parts: one containing prohibitions concerning man's relations to God, the other dealing more directly with ordinary social questions. The Decalogue throws comparatively little light on the condition of society at the time of its promulgation. It deals with acts forbidden before, such as murder and idolatry; but its last three sections imply the existence of a settled mode of life different from that of the patriarchal family. Theft, false witness, and covetous desire belong to a social state in which there existed within the social whole various houses or families holding property. The process of ἐνοικισμός must have taken place; but beyond this there is nothing that can be said definitely. It is, however, important to notice that the commandments come with the imprimatur of God upon them, and that the covenant-relation is alluded to in the prefatory verse as it stands in Ex 20<sup>2</sup>: 'I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.'

The Priestly Code consists of a number of regulations which are largely ceremonial in character. The laws of ceremonial uncleanness and other kindred matters are precisely defined: the great occasions of the ecclesiastical year are ordained, and the ritual due to them established. Further, the various types of sacrifice are described, the occasions on which they are to be performed, and the method of performing them. In regard to the whole of this we need only for our present purpose to call attention to two points. In the first place, it is important to observe that the whole order is rested upon the covenant-relation with God, and, more than this, that the character of God is placed in definite connexion with the rules laid down. The holiness of God requires this elaborate ceremonial order to preserve it from the contamination of hasty and unfit intruders, and to retain the condition of the people at a level high enough to enable them to use their covenant privileges. This is proved by the refrain which recurs at intervals in the course of Leviticus—'I am the LORD'; and by such marked phrases as the following: 'Ye shall not profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel; I am the LORD which hallow you, that brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God; I am the LORD' (Lv 22<sup>32, 33</sup>). But, in the second place, it is no less important to notice the extraordinarily limited moral range of the laws enacted. In Lv 6 there is a short list of moral delinquencies which require the atonement of a guilt offering. These consist chiefly of broken pledge and other forms of dishonest dealing. Besides this there are sacrifices ordained for sins of ignorance: 'If any one shall sin unwittingly, in any of the things which the LORD hath commanded not to be done, and shall do any one of them; and if the anointed priest shall sin so as to bring guilt upon himself' (Lv 4<sup>2, 3</sup>). If we are justified in regarding this command to the legislation which appears in Exodus, it will include a certain number of other moral delinquencies. Thus, besides the Decalogue, there are regulations concerning assault and murder, the proper treatment of slaves, the relations of parents and children, and specially concerning idol-worship and magic. Besides these there are ordinances referring to lost property; the duty of actively aiding the restoration of straying animals is inculcated; the poor are remembered, and severe condemnations passed upon those who judge unjustly. The service for the Day of Atonement is placed in close connexion with the unwarranted intrusion of the sons of Aaron into the presence of the Lord (Lv 16<sup>1</sup>), and is apparently intended to do away with ceremonial breaches of the covenant-relation, though the ritual would lend itself easily to a deeper meaning. See ATONEMENT (DAY OF).

The legislation in the Book of Deuteronomy, as it stands at present, covers a good deal of the ground of the preceding books. It repeats and further develops laws elsewhere laid down. There is the same rigorous condemnation of idolatry, the same care for justice and equality between man and man, and the like. But there is a more pronounced insistence on the moral character of God, and the close relation of God to the people in view of His moral character. He is not only demanding exclusive worship, but as a long-suffering (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>), caring not only for the people of His choice, but also in a special degree for the fatherless and stranger. The characteristic feature of Dt is that which it is now the fashion to call its parenetic tone; it goes so far, indeed, as to find a spiritual meaning for circumcision as opposed to that which is purely ceremonial. Moreover, the relation of the people to God is presented in a more spiritual manner: the 'first great commandment of the law,' 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind,' is in Dt 6<sup>5</sup>.*

It has seemed hardly consistent with the subject of the present article to go into any preciseness of detail as regards the Pent. legislation. Enough, however, has been said to show the truth of the position maintained at the outset, that morality for the Jew meant that which God had commanded; immorality, that which God forbade. It is obvious that the Bk. of Dt takes a slightly different view of moral life from that which is expounded in Lv. The laws concerning the functions of judges (12<sup>18, 20</sup>), the kingly office (17<sup>14-20</sup>), the single central shrine, and the killing of animals for food (12<sup>15</sup>), clearly contemplate, either in fact or in anticipation, the position of a settled nation. Similar cases might be quoted from the earlier books. But whereas in Lv the largest portion of the book concerns the ritual order in the land of Canaan, the Bk. of Dt is chiefly concerned with the religious effect upon the people.

On the other hand, the ritual order is not entirely neglected. The law and the ritual of sacrifice, the importance given to ceremonial pollution, the practices connected with the avenger of blood, the use of the lex talionis, the levirate law of marriage, the use of the ordeal, are all of them archaic in character, and must have survived into later Judaism out of an archaic past. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that the evolution of ethics among the Jews followed something like the same course as that which we find in those of early humanity all the world over, from the lowest moral elements to the highest. It has sometimes been maintained that the elaborate ceremonial is a subsequent development to the more spiritual attitude of Deuteronomy. This is surely inconsistent with the teaching of anthropology. The more spiritual conceptions rise naturally out of the less spiritual; the moral truth breaks loose from the half-savage practice in which it was enshrined. It is almost inconceivable that this order should be reversed; and that the mind of the nation should have passed from a lofty spiritual conception of life to one that belongs to the material world. The fact is that God takes command over life as a whole, and, while the actual condition of the people is left unaltered, the way is prepared for further progress. The fundamental ideas as to right and wrong of communicating with the national God and materialize the God.*

It has often been observed that the indications of the operation of the Levitical law are rare, if not altogether non-existent, in the historical books. It is certainly true that the supremacy of the sanctuary at Shiloh, and then later at Jerus., falls considerably short of the unique sanctity ascribed in the law to the central shrine of J<sup>n</sup>. Further, there are no records of the celebration of the legal feasts till the time of the later kings. It is plain that the worship of J<sup>n</sup> had not established its hold upon the common people; they are continually liable to defections to the gods of neighbouring races. Moreover, the unity of the people is hardly attained; there are obviously differences of opinion and interest between various tribes. These facts and others like them have been generally recognized enough, as bearing on the early history of the books of the law. They do not affect what has been said above as to the archaic character of many of the legal enactments. And we may say even more than this. The records contained in the historical books are the records of a people emerging from the tribal state into that of national life. The nature of such a state of things underlies the history of Israel; they are displayed in the wars of extermination which form a somewhat repellent feature (to modern eyes) in the history of the invasion of Canaan, and in Samuel's denunciation of the Amalekites; they appear in the attitude of the Jews towards the gods of the neighbouring tribes, still more noticeably in such a case as that of the Levite and his concubine (Jg 19, 20), or that of Micah the Ephraimite (Jl 17, 18).

The means by which the change is effected, is, to a large extent, the institution of the Kingship. It is this that prevents the separate action of the separate tribes, and develops the idea of a justice which is due to an individual, as opposed to the tribal notion according to which the tribe, not the individual, is the unit. At the same time it is clear that J<sup>n</sup> is regarded as the protector of moral rights. David, for instance, commands Abigail for preserving him from the sin against the Lord that reckless vengeance implies (1 S 25). The eating of blood is a sin against J<sup>n</sup> (1 S 14<sup>33</sup>); there is, to use a modern phrase, a taboo upon the shew-bread offered to J<sup>n</sup>;† and other cases might be quoted showing that this evidence is lacking for a complete social organization, such as is described in the Pent., much of the legislation embodied therein (and therefore the morality implied by it) dates from a time in which these social ideas prevailed.

(B) The Prophetic Literature.—We must now turn to the prophets and endeavour to estimate the importance of their work in the ethical development of Israel. They are rightly identified with the higher moral progress of the people; but it is necessary in dealing with them, more even than with any of the other OT authors, to remember that their writings are occasional and not systematic. They deal with the condition of the people as it appears to them, they comment on the vices which arrest their attention, and they give special weight to the effect of these lines of conduct on the field of politics.

* Cf. Lv 13<sup>34</sup> 20<sup>1-6</sup>, Dt 12<sup>2-5</sup> etc.

* The second, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' occurs in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>.

† It is not accurate to say, with Wellhausen (Proleg. p. 181, Eng. tr.), that there is no distinction between holy and unholy in the matter of the shew-bread.

The cycle of ideas in which the prophets move is much the same in outline, though of course some speak more precisely and fully than others.

(a) The most conspicuous feature in their moral doctrine is their sense of the union of the nation with God, and the interest of God in the moral development of men. Condemnations of idolatry and of all forms of defection from the proper allegiance to God are frequent in the prophetic books. The nation is described under the figure of a bride, bound by the marriage tie to J<sup>h</sup>, and continually breaking it. This appears in Is, Jer, Ezk, Hos; it will not be necessary to quote passages in illustration of so familiar a phrase. The practices most frequently condemned are unrighteous judgment, oppression of the poor, and various forms of luxury and extravagance, especially drunkenness. These do not take us much beyond the ideas which appear in the earliest legislation. The development is to be found rather in the application of the ideas which have already prevailed, and in the appearance of some of the problems which necessarily belong to moral life. Thus the theory of evil receives some consideration. We have seen that the ceremonial legislation referred largely to ceremonial pollutions. It may possibly have been due to this association that the presence of evil was treated as a taint which affected others besides the actual sinner. On the other hand, holiness or qados was also regarded as a state which was effectual as a protection against pollution. Thus in Abraham's qados (Gen. 17:1) the presence of righteousness is given as the reason for suspending judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah. There is, of course, a real moral difficulty contained in this doctrine. It must be remembered that evil is inseparably connected by the Jews with acts of rebellion, i.e. with individual self-will and disobedience. If, therefore, others who have not taken part in the sin are involved in its consequences, it is obvious that a serious question must be raised as to the definition of responsibility, and the relation of responsibility to guilt. We find in Is a sense of the polluting effect of the presence of evil. Thus in the account of his call to the prophetic work (6<sup>1</sup>) he says: 'Woe is me, for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips.' Isaiah expresses the general effect of evil in the people, and acknowledges its influence upon himself. It is, in fact, a doctrine of the OT that the guilt of sin extends to those who are connected with the sinner, as is expressed in the second commandment. These ideas give rise to several lines of moral speculation. In the first place, the sense of individual responsibility is greatly strengthened, so that we find in Ezk a definite restriction or correction of the principle laid down in the Decalogue. Thus (ch. 18<sup>20</sup>), 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die: the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.' This position is carried out on the side of virtue also; the presence even of the three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, shall not avail to suspend judgment upon a sinful city (Ezk 14<sup>12-22</sup>), nor shall righteousness at one time prevent judgment if a soul relapse into wickedness (Ezk 33<sup>10-17</sup>). Responsibility belongs to the individual soul for actual things done, and for nothing else.

On the other hand, the prevalence of evil and the uncertain incidence of affliction absolutely prevent the adoption of the view that each man is punished simply for his own sins. Evil enters far too deeply into the constitution of things to be explained on these terms. Hence we find in Is and elsewhere the view expressed that God works through evil, and leads men to higher things. This notion is involved in the idea of visitation; it gives meaning to the metaphor of the refining fire; and it expresses itself in the doctrine of the faithful remnant. These are they on whom suffering and trouble have done their proper work; they have learnt the lessons which God was teaching them. This conception reaches a climax in Is 53. The boldness in language, which is so characteristic of the prophets, is nowhere more noticeable than in some isolated statements to be found on the subject of evil. Not content with 'evil' as the probationary functions of it in the world, both Amos and Deutero-Isaiah speak of it as the direct effect of God's action. 'Shall evil befall a city, and the Lord hath not done it?' Am 3<sup>8</sup>. 'I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I am the Lord that doeth all these things,' Is 45<sup>7</sup>. These passages, in which 'evil' has not the moral sense but = 'calamity,' 'misfortune,' are not inconsistent with the condemnation of sin ascribed to God, and with His character as elsewhere described. Their real aim is to express in the sharpest form the absolute supremacy of God over the whole course of things.

(b) A second point in regard to which the prophetic attitude is fairly consistent is the contrast between ceremonial performance and real morality. The emphasis laid by the prophets on the moral law, the growing sense of the holiness of God, the comparative lack of moral reference in the ceremonial legislation, are factors in this development. Sacrifice in various parts of the world has tended to pass from an act of communion into an act of commerce. Instead of being a means of reopening intercourse that had in some way become suspended, it is a process of barter by which something valuable is given up or destroyed in order to secure some gain. Further, the tendency to polytheism—so rife in Palestine during the time of the kings—rests upon an assumption that it is worth while to make friends with a variety of gods in hopes of benefits to be received from them. This theory, as well as the other, is inconsistent alike with the ceremonial law as we now read it, and with the doctrine of God. In proportion, however, as the sense of moral conditions to communion with God prevailed over every other, it became necessary to insist on the inadequacy of sacrifice in itself as a means of religious approach. This law is a common subject of the declamation of the prophets. We find it in Is (1<sup>10-17</sup>), Jer (6<sup>19-20</sup> etc.), Hos (2<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>6</sup>), Am (ch. 6), Mic (ch. 2), Zec (7<sup>9</sup>), and many other places, and in a most elaborate form in II Is (58). In all these, the close relation of J<sup>h</sup> to His people, their sinfulness and His hatred of sin, are the basal assumptions. It is the sense of the failure of material means of intercourse, and the difficulty of the more spiritual view of moral life, that gives force to the whole doctrine of salvation. The moral character of God was itself an assertion that evil was not final. If the means at hand of getting rid of it were inadequate, God Himself must take measures to remove it. The one thing certain is that it cannot remain unmodified; the holiness of God forbids this. Hence we find God continually represented as longing to pardon—rising up early and sending His messengers—men may come back to their allegiance; the blessings of the covenant-union. The two ideas are here held together—the separation from God caused by sin—the prospect of forgiveness from the side of God. It would take us into the region of theology, pure and simple, if we discussed this matter further; but it is impossible to avoid reference to it, as it is the characteristic feature of the ethics of the prophets, and is perhaps an inevitable result of the peculiarly theological tone of the ethical thought of Israel.

It has already been observed that the ordinary list of virtues and vices in the prophets falls roughly under the same heads as those in the law. They are vices or virtues connected with the intercourse of man with man; in other words, they are political rather than ethical, in the narrower sense. They belong to the political activity of the prophets, and express their influence upon the ordinary life of the State.

There are, besides these, certain other conditions mentioned from time to time which are more purely subjective. Such is the peace which comes to those who are in true union with God, which the wicked can never share. But these are not the most frequent types of virtue. For these and such conditions we must go to the Psalms.

(C) The Psalms really require a treatise to themselves to set forth their ethical contents adequately. They have formed men's devotional handbook for century after century; and this, in spite of the fact that they are full of national feeling, and are unmistakably Jewish. There are frequent allusions in them to the situation of the Jewish people in politics or warfare; they must have been written, in many cases, like the prophecies, in close connexion with various political events. Yet their influence is never exhausted. They have the 'word of the Lord' to perpetuity, that they regard the current history in the light of the permanent principles that underlie all history and all life, and that they present these in the form of the highest poetry. The Psalmists see in the events of their own day the manifestation of the divine laws, and it is often this aspect of them alone which they present. Hence the task of dating the Psalms is no easy one; the particular immediate event is often lost in the sense of the universal laws, the working of which it displays. In this connexion, as before in this article, we must disclaim any intention of discussing or deciding the dates of the individual psalms, and confine ourselves to a general presentation of the moral indications in the book as a whole.

As before in Jewish writings, we have to notice the decisive way in which the character of God is represented as the rule for the character of man. A very striking expression is given to this principle in Ps 135 (RV): 'With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful; with the perfect man thou wilt show thyself perfect; with the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with the perverse thou wilt show thyself froward.' The reference of all this is put beyond question by the next verse: 'For thou wilt save the meek: but the haughty eyes thou wilt smite.' (Ps 25<sup>9-10</sup> 97<sup>10-11</sup>, and many other passages). Here, therefore, in the most decisive way, the character of God is represented as the moral ideal. If we ask, further, for greater detail in regard to this divine character, we find many points of contact with the books already considered. It is a commonplace throughout the Psalms that God has a fiery hatred of evil. This is especially displayed in a hatred of all forms of oppression. 'For the spoiling of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the LORD' (12<sup>5</sup>). 'Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it. The eyes of the LORD are toward the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry. . . . The righteous cried, and the LORD heard, and delivered them out of all their troubles. The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit' (34<sup>14-18</sup>). It is probably this care for the poor that leads, both in the Ps and Dt, to the condemnation of usury (Ps 15<sup>9</sup>) and of unrighteous judgment (Ps 82<sup>1-2</sup> 101<sup>1</sup>). But the Psalmists take us much further than this condemnation of wickedness. God is represented as a God of loving-kindness—that is, looking with interest and love upon mankind. It is this character which, if the phrase may be used, accounts for and is expressed in the special intimacy between the Lord and His people. 'The earth is full of the loving-kindness of the LORD' (Ps 33<sup>9</sup>): it is 'in the multitude of the loving-kindness' of God that the Psalmist goes to the temple (Ps 5<sup>7</sup>): 'He sheweth loving-kindness to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore' (Ps 135<sup>10</sup>). The merciful nature of God shows itself in two directions: in forgiveness and in judgment. The two are not apparently regarded as incompatible. He is full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy (Ps 103<sup>8</sup>). 'If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared' (Ps 130<sup>4</sup>). At the same time, upon those who work wickedness, the judgment of God falls severely and relentlessly. 'Thou settest them in slippery places; thou castest them down to destruction' (Ps 73<sup>18</sup> etc.).

The character of God as thus described forms the model of the true follower of J<sup>h</sup>. His central motive is that of love and adoration to God; but, at the same time, he so far identifies himself with the cause of God that he too burns with anger against the wicked. This is partly the explanation of the tone of unmodified hatred that pervades certain psalms (esp. 69. 109). It is not merely the annoyance of a person whose will is crossed, and who vents himself in petulant cursing of those who stand in his way. It is the wrath of the person who feels that God's cause is attacked through him, and who is persecuted by the powers of evil. Such a condition is no doubt a perilous one; but it is important to observe that these psalms by no means stand alone. The echo of conflict pervades the whole book. The course of this world is largely affected by the presence of sin and unfaithfulness. The followers of God are not by any means in the majority; nor do they always prevail against their enemies. They pass through times of oppression, of menace, of persecution; they are the victims of treachery in the house of friends; they see the ungodly in apparent prosperity, and the holy things of God defiled and insulted. This condition of the world produces the fury against the enemies of God, already mentioned, together with some other remarkable conditions of mind. It is to this—the apparent triumph of the enemy—that we must assign the sense of being forsaken by God Himself which appears in Ps 22; to this also is to be traced the perplexity of mind as regards the providence of God which appears in Ps 73. The moods in which this problem is approached vary greatly. At times it produces deep depression, almost despair; at times it is treated (as in Ps 37) with calm and quiet triumph. But it is important, for it is to the Jewish mind the fundamental problem of ethics, to account for the lack of apparent balance between a man's lot and the life he leads. The idea of the probationary value of suffering appears in some places; but the full discussion of the problem belongs rather to the Sapiential Books than to the Psalms.

It would not, however, be true to suppose that all the evil in the world is due to the action of the enemies of God. There are in many places signs that sinfulness is regarded as a trouble that touches even the righteous. It erects a barrier between the soul and the world, and sacrifices and burnt-offerings are powerless to break down. In one place

(Ps 51<sup>5</sup>) it seems to be regarded as affecting the actual birth of men. The man stands in solitary responsibility before God (49<sup>7</sup> 51<sup>4</sup>); and the essence of sin consists in not having the heart right (78<sup>8</sup>). Together with this sense of sin and weakness may be classed the yearning for God which marks Ps 42, and the passionate enthusiasm for the service of God which appears in Pss 119 and 84.

There would be no room for extending largely this account of the character of the Psalms; but the space at our disposal does not permit it. We therefore can only point out here the general character of the whole book. It is essentially a book of reflective devotion. The whole of life is viewed from the point of view of the worship of and intercourse with J<sup>h</sup>. It never reaches the point of ethical theory, even in regard to the ethical problem noticed above. The solution, so far as any is offered, is always spiritual and religious, and not philosophical.

(D) The Sapiential Books.—It is in these only that we find a more definite ethical teaching, as the Jews; and the book of Proverbs begins in the proverbial form; the first moral were men who spoke proverbs. These intellectual maxims to the wise king Solomon, who was wiser than all the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Calcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol . . . and who spake three thousand proverbs (1 K 4<sup>31</sup>). These proverbs, if we may judge from the Bk. of Pr as we have it, were of a somewhat utilitarian tone. They started with the assumption that virtue leads to worldly success and happiness; and they dwelt on this point with various degrees of insistence. They were maxims of ordinary prudence, rather than speculations as to ultimate moral problems, and the religious view of all these questions was somewhat left on one side. Moral practice is still closely allied with the fear of the LORD, but its natural outcome is expected to appear in the form of worldly prosperity. Thus 3<sup>2-10</sup> 'Honour the LORD with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy fats shall overflow with new wine.' The reflections upon life which fill up the larger portion of the book are also somewhat subdued in enthusiasm, and seem to lack in some degree high moral inspiration. But it must not be supposed that commonplace utilitarian reflections are the sum of the contents of the Sapiential Books. It is to these that we must trace the development of two of the most striking of all the ethical figures of the OT—the Wise Man and the Fool. The wise man is he whose life is orderly and well arranged—the man who follows the law of the LORD. The fool is he who is self-willed and sinful, and whose life therefore lacks principle, and fails to attain success. A large portion of the antitheses in the Bks. of Pr and Sir present the contrasted pictures of these two characters. They are seen in various relations of life; but the essence of the two characters lies in their different relation to the law of the LORD; for the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge (Pr 1<sup>7</sup>, Sir 1<sup>4-20</sup>). 'All wisdom is the fear of the LORD, and in all wisdom is the way of life' (Sir 19<sup>20</sup>). The grossest forms of immorality, as well as the less impressive, are regarded as acts of folly (see esp. Pr 2<sup>2-27</sup>, and comp. Pr 10<sup>2-9</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>8-9</sup> etc.). It is noticeable that the nature of wisdom and of folly consists, not in an accurate intellectual knowledge of things, but in a prudent or imprudent ordering of life. The wise man shows his wisdom by his right choice, his far-seeing plans, his control of passion, and avoidance of all self-assertion. The fool is he who does the exact opposite of all these things. See FOOL.

It is this notion of a wise ordering of practical life which reappears in the far more definite conception which we owe to these books of wisdom of God. This is conceived partly as an attribute of God, partly as a counsellor standing, as it were, by the throne of God. According to the latter view, which appears in some of the finest passages in these books, wisdom was the counsellor and helper of God in the creation of the world (Pr 8, cf. Wis 10, Job 28<sup>20</sup> etc.), and has been conspicuously embodied in the law (Sir 24<sup>23</sup>). Wisdom is the power that guides the history of man, and has watched over that of the chosen people (cf. Wis 10<sup>32</sup>). Hence the previous connexion between morality and wisdom is explained. Man's wisdom consists in following out the embodied wisdom of God in the law.

This particular character of the divine wisdom brings us back to the consideration of the problems which, as has been already pointed out, appear in the Psalms. The problem of the true relation of virtuous action or righteousness is set forth, as in a tragedy, in the Bk. of Job. The author emphasizes the fact that Job was free from all blame in the truest and strictest sense. He bewails his misery—the cruel change of fortune which comes upon him; but in it all 'he sinned not.' He neither rejected the verdict of his conscience, which acquitted him of sin, nor called in question the supreme justice of God. In this he proves superior to the popular opinion on such matters, as it is represented in the utterances of the friends. And the justification of his attitude is found in the answer of J<sup>h</sup> out of the whirlwind, the point of which consists in the assertion of the variety and mysteriousness of the activity of God. The question is not solved by any philosophical formula, but is referred simply to the nature of God Himself.

In the Bk. of Ec we find a much more gloomy point of view. In this case the obscurity of the whole matter presses very hard upon the author's mind. He is impressed with the apparent futility and lack of coherence in the life of man; he can see no purpose served and no object attained by the pursuit of wisdom, or the indulgence of pleasure, or the enjoyment of high place. Everything lies under the doom of vanity; there is no profit under the sun—no good that endures, and can satisfy man's desire for the enduring. Under these circumstances he approaches the form of ethical thought which in modern times is called pessimism. Indeed he only falls short of it in so far as he finds the good of man in the grim adherence to the commandments of God (if Ec 11<sup>13</sup> be genuine).

In both these works the general view of the life of man is closely akin to that which we have had occasion to notice before. It is noted (Job 1<sup>5</sup>) that Job rose up early in the morning and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all (i.e. his family), 'for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and renounced God in their hearts.' He deemed it necessary to provide for their inadvertences of this sort as regards God; and this of course adds to the impression of his complete virtue. In later chapters we find the usual emphasis laid upon the protection of the poor, and the wickedness of oppression (cf. ch. 24. 31<sup>18</sup> etc.), upon purity (ch. 31), and justice (29<sup>16</sup>). In like manner, oppression is one of the things which attracts the attention of the preacher (Ec 4<sup>1-3</sup>), as well as the vanity of the efforts of the righteous, when death comes and cuts short all that he is planning to achieve.

We may now review briefly the drift of this very imperfect sketch of the ethical ideas of the OT.

It seems that the central feature of OT morality is that it is religious; it is grafted on to the national faith and worship. But this must not be taken to imply that the ceremonial order was indissolubly bound up with the moral ideas; the various sacrifices, and the like, are, on the whole, held apart from the definite scheme (so far as there is one traceable) of virtues and vices. It would be truer to say that the ceremonial order and the ethical code are two co-ordinate developments of the one principle—the holiness of J'. The character of God was the final rule of the life of man, and the archaic details of sacrificial purification were filled with this holiness. On the other hand, the general impression left upon the mind by the history of the people and the reflections upon their life is one of considerable simplicity. The acts condemned, the ideals commended, belong to a simple condition of society. Acts of oppression are the chief burden of denunciation; the tendency is manifest to exact usurious interest; and there are some few other forms of sin noticed, such as drunkenness and impurity. But the real depth and value of Jewish moral teaching is found, not in the political or social sphere, but in the religious life. It is in the Psalms and in those passages of the Prophets which come nearest in tone to the Psalmists that we find the permanent and supreme value of the Jewish notion of life. Varieties of religious emotion and aspiration such as we find in these forms are possible only to a people whose whole ethical outlook is religious.

II. IN THE NT.—When we pass over into the NT we come into an atmosphere which is in many respects different from that of the OT. In the NT the literature covers a comparatively small area in point of time, instead of containing history and tradition from a long series of ages. Hence the type of life and thought, though there are signs of rapid development in it, is much the same throughout. Further, the history in NT describes in fragmentary style a single life, and the results which flowed from its activity. We are not concerned with the history of a people, but of a body that was included in, but claimed to be wider than, the firmly established Roman Empire. Our knowledge of its external history is comparatively slight; the emphasis falls on the development of its mind. Hence, while a large portion of OT requires to be explained out of the political history of the time, the tone of NT is more definitely moral, and deals more positively with the qualities and errors of individual minds; it is ethical rather than political. And once more, the NT stands in much closer relation to our own modern experience than anything in the OT. At the best, it is always difficult to get back to the point of view from which the OT writers spoke and wrote; there is much which it requires careful argumentation to explain at all. But with the NT this is different. In spite of the obvious differences of national character, and the effects of all the history that has happened since, we still feel that we understand and are in sympathy with the ethical attitude of those who wrote the NT books. Indeed, the fact that they seem so little strange is the measure of their effect.

On the other hand, there are points of very close contact between the OT and the NT. We do not find the same external conditions, but the moral attitude is much the same. The morality of the NT is essentially a religious morality; it stands in very close relation to the worship of God. That which was hope or aspiration under the old covenant is fulfilled in the new; the access to God, which was before an object of longing, is attained through Christ; the forgiveness, the lack of which so seriously complicated the ancient religious efforts, has become possible through Christ. This is, in fact, the central point in the comparison of the two systems; the note of the old covenant is promise, that of the new is fulfilment. From this most of the other differences may be derived, directly or indirectly.

As in connexion with the OT, so here, it will be impossible to enter into the various critical questions raised over the Gospels and Epistles. Taking the NT as it is, we shall endeavour to indicate its bearing on ethical questions.

(A) The Sermon on the Mount.—Different views have been taken as to the actual history of this sermon as it stands in the Gospels, and of its meaning in relation to the purpose of Christ. All are agreed that it stands to the new covenant as the law on Sinai stood to the old; it contains the law of the new kingdom. From this point of view two questions arise in regard to it. (1) What is its relation to the old law? (2) What new features does it add of its own?

(1) In the Sermon on the Mount the old law is revised and fulfilled; the precepts which it contained are interpreted, and their application deepened. Our Lord definitely affirms that He has come, not to destroy (καταλῦσαι), but to fulfil (πληρῶσαι). Hence He touches on a series of points upon which the law had defined its position, and develops them. The law of Murder includes in its prohibition the sin of anger and the harsh unforgiving temper. The law of Adultery includes the sin of lust and covetousness. The law of Perjury is extended in like manner. But the law of Retaliation is reversed; and the narrow command to love the neighbour is extended so as to cover the enemy. In all this the difference lies not so much in principle as in interpretation. We are still in the region of law. Commands are addressed to the will from without, which it has to obey. But the significance of the law is increased tenfold by means of the application of the rules. They no longer concern outward conduct only; they touch the inmost springs of conduct in the heart. In this they are akin to the deeper aspirations of the Prophets and Psalmists; these too, though with less profound and unflinching insight, saw that it was in these inward springs that the real issue of right and wrong was to be tried. In the same way, on the spiritual side, in the matter of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, our Lord lays emphasis on the spiritual side of these acts, without in any way condemning the exterior and formal aspect of them.

(2) But the most striking feature of the character of the citizens of the new kingdom contain the most significant departures from ancient rule. These appear chiefly in the Beatitudes, and in other parts of the NT in which the character of the new kingdom is described. The nature of the description given in the Beatitudes is not, perhaps, easy to bring into formal order; but there is no question as to the fundamental principles of the character therein set forth. Its rules and interests are in the spiritual world, and there alone. The rewards of its virtues are spiritual. The pure in heart see God; those that hunger and thirst after righteousness gain their desire; the merciful receive mercy; the poor in spirit (or the poor, Lk 6<sup>20</sup>) are those to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs; the peacemakers are called the sons of God. The meek are said to inherit the earth; but this must not be assumed to contradict the blessing upon those whom the world persecutes. The general drift of the passage is to bless those who are characterized by certain spiritual qualities, and to leave on one side their relation to the ordinary standards of the world. The opinion of the world is, as such, of no value; all that matters is the spiritual condition of the citizens of the kingdom. In like manner, later on in the sermon, the motive to prayer and fasting is found in the same region. The critical temper is excluded from the true life (Mt 7<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-30</sup>); and it is distinctly asserted that care is to be exercised in the presentation of that which is holy. The whole temper indicated is inward and spiritual, though it is affirmed that the character must be expressed in act: the tree is to be known by its fruit.

* Cf Philo, De Spec. Legg Tom. ii. p. 314, ed. Mang.

(B) Similar principles appear in our Lord's Parabolic teachings. A large number of the parables refer to the general characteristics of the new Society, and therefore do not immediately concern us.* But others deal directly with moral character. Thus the Parable of the Unmerciful Servant deals with the law of forgiveness; that of the Pharisee and the Publican with moral righteousness; the Good Samaritan defines the duty of the love of our neighbour; that of the Two Sons distinguishes true and false obedience. Dives and Lazarus illustrates the peril of the love of this world. Besides these, the Prodigal Son, the Unjust Judge, and the Friend at midnight declare the relations between the true believers and God. In these, and in the generality of the teaching recorded in the synoptic Gospels, our Lord uses a quasi-proverbial method. He does not promulgate rules of conduct, but describes in indirect fashion the principles upon which true conduct is to be based.

(C) In the more profound teaching recorded in St. John's Gospel, we are taken still further into the inner secrets of the moral life. While in the Synoptists we have the life presented in the simple picture of the Two Ways, St. John represents the true and the false life as two opposed conditions of being—Life and Judgment. This, while it contains ultimately the same idea as the simpler language in St. Matthew, lies deeper, and contains assumptions which do not appear elsewhere. In this type of teaching, as in the other, the essential principle is that human life is truly seen only on its spiritual side, and that in this view of it there is a single issue offered for the determination of each particular man. That course which places man on the side of God is described as Life; the other is in itself Judgment. Further, whereas in synoptic tradition we find our Lord opening His mission with the preaching of repentance, so, in the first discourse recorded by St. John (ch. 3), He sets forth the necessity of regeneration for the recognition of and entry into the new kingdom. Here, again, the positions are ultimately the same, but that in St. John is the deeper. The new birth spoken of is essential to the repentance. Once more, the need of faith, which is constantly emphasized in the synoptic Gospels, is by St. John shown to involve moral issues of a serious kind. It is the self-assertion, the self-seeking of the Jews, that prevents their understanding the claims of Christ. And, lastly, it is union with Christ, and dependence upon His life, which sustains those who are His representatives in the world. And thus, again, a moral virtue inculcated in the synoptic tradition is asserted in deeper form in St. John. The love which the followers of Christ are to have to one another rests upon their union with Christ, the indwelling of the Spirit, and has as its ideal the love of the Father and the Son.

In this Gospel there is very little direct exhortation, even of the proverbial kind. The most conspicuous parenthetic passage is that in which our Lord (as also in the other Gospels) lays down the absolute necessity of sacrifice for all (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>). The discourses are concerned rather with the exposition of the final conditions of moral action, and in this sense they are of vital importance for the Christian ethic. It should be noticed that they deal with action, so it seems at first sight, very simply. Truths which are complementary are stated, sometimes in antithesis, sometimes without any sign in the context of the complementary truth, which may appear elsewhere also without qualification. Thus, in ch. 6, the mysterious relations of the work of the Father and the coming of men to Christ are asserted, but not connected by any theory. Or, on the other hand, the judgment given is said to be the coming of the light into the world, and the consequent action of men (3<sup>19</sup>); whereas in vv. 22, 30 judgment is placed in the control of the Son of Man. This is largely due to the close connexion of the discourses in this Gospel with the circumstances under which they were delivered, and to the fact that, in life, different aspects of complex unities have a tendency to emerge into exclusive prominence. But the great importance of all these passages for our present purpose is this: they represent the Christian development of the principles already asserted in Judaism—the connexion of the character of God with moral life, and the historic operation of God in the lives of men. Where God declares Himself as a merciful God—in answer to the request of Moses to see Him—and declares His condemnation of the Jews (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>), Christ in St. John sets out the law of life as the rule of life for the Christian society (Jn 17<sup>26</sup>). Whereas in the OT the hand of God is seen in the guidance of man throughout his life and history, Christ in St. John affirms definitely the entry of the Father's will into the actual life and choice of individual man. The importance of this, in regard to life, can hardly be exaggerated. It means that the apparent simplification of moral ideas attained by referring all things to a spiritual standard must not be regarded as extinguishing all moral problems. The Gospel of St. John contains no other such solution of such problems, such as we find in St. Paul's Epistles; it only indicates, in the direct way which lies close to immediate experience, that they are present. Thus we derive from the teaching of Christ, not only a deeper view of moral issues, but also an indication of a higher field of moral thought of which comparatively little had been known before.

(D) In turning to the Apostolic Epistles we find the Church engaged in the endeavour to introduce the Christian law into the world. We derive, therefore, from these writings some knowledge of the effect of Christianity upon the life of Greece and Rome. And, further, we find in the Epistles, especially in those of St. Paul, an endeavour to connect the faith of the Church with its practice. It will be desirable to consider these points in the reverse order, as the dogmatic basis of Christian practice in many cases largely determines its form. In the first place, let us observe that there are, in the NT writers, certain moral premises or assumptions which are inherited from the OT, and have been accentuated by the teaching of Christ. The end of man is union or intercourse with God, and sin impedes it. Men are in a position of enmity—sin dwells in them—the wrath of God at present abides upon them—they have not passed from death to life. And they have no power of their own to break loose from this position; the old lamentations of the Psalmist over their moral incapacity are taken up and confirmed by the authority of the apostolic writers. However great and sincere man's desire may be to attain to virtue and to holiness, there is an anagnorisis. The law did little to improve the position; it showed instead of reviving; it displayed the real nature of sin, so far as man was capable of appreciating it, but it gave him no power to express his knowledge in his life. The sacrifices and other ceremonies, which were part of the legal dispensation, could never take away sin. They only symbolized a purification which they could never convey.

* Such are: the Leaven, the Draw-net, the Hidden Treasure, the Seed growing secretly, etc.

In all this the apostolic writers are using partly ideas which are inherited, partly ideas which are original in them. The sense of failure and ruin appears, as we have said, in the OT, but in the Epistles it is more precise in itself, and its causes and range are more clearly known. The disabilities thus described are removed by the work of Christ. And it is in consequence of this that the dogmatic basis of the Christian practice is so firmly and carefully fixed. The views of man's condition, with which the apostles start, are such that the first thing to be done in order to attain morality is to remove the impediment which at present bars the way. To describe the advantages or the beauties of moral life—to develop a system of new and attractive moral ideas, is secondary to this; to have made it the first interest would have been to leave mankind in the position of the law. It was power they wanted, more even than knowledge. Christ in His teaching had concentrated attention increasingly upon Himself; the central feature of the discourses recorded by St. John had been the presentation of Himself as anti-syn in various ways the desires and the needs of man. Thus the apostles had general guidance as to the way in which they were to deal with life, as well as particular instructions for certain occasions. Christ had not, so far as we can gather from His recorded teaching, entered into any detailed and precise account of the effect of His work in the moral world. It is this that the apostolic writers undertake.

In this respect it is possible to observe development and the presence of individual tendencies of thought. At first, the sum of their preaching seems to be contained in the phrase, Jesus is Lord. The resurrection, of which all are witnesses, is the proof of this; and the effect is that men have repentance and remission of their sins. The Holy Spirit has been poured out upon them, and they have thus gained various moral and spiritual powers. They are not left, as before, to struggle vainly; a new spring of new life has entered into the world, arising from the person of the risen and ascended Lord. St. Paul develops this position with great fulness in his Epistles. 'If Christ be not risen,' he says (1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>), 'ye are yet in your sins.' And this position is elsewhere described as the state 'under law,' the condition of inability to attain to the agape which prevailed in the kingdom of God (Gal 4<sup>22</sup>). There is no question but that St. Paul's mind the possibility of moral achievement depends absolutely on the person and work of the Son of God. And we can go further than this. The death of Christ, which was the means of removing the barrier of separation between us and God, was of the nature of a sacrifice—a sacrifice of propitiation (ἱλαστήριον, cf. Ro 3<sup>25</sup>). Thus the ancient efforts at reconciliation were made effectual. In similar fashion St. John represents Jesus Christ the righteous as a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον) for our sins and for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2<sup>2</sup>). The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews dwells at length upon the unique importance of the priesthood of Christ, and emphasizes the effect of it upon man's relations with God. St. John, the cast of whose mind is more contemplative than argumentative, sets forth as the essential condition of real Christian life, the confession that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (2 Jn 7, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>). His characteristic interest is in the truth of the incarnation considered as a fact in history; his treatment of all the other points arises out of this. The others, not less certain than St. John as to the nature of Christ, have given more space to the discussion of the redemptive acts of Christ. But, in spite of differences in the nature and order of the presentation, one salient fact appears on the very surface of the NT, namely, that moral life depends upon the acts and the nature of Christ; in other words, that the true basis for morality is Christ.

The controversy over the principles of ethics, which occupies so large a place in St. Paul, has no more to do with this; it arises, and is of practical importance, just because it affects the relations of God and man. In like manner, as has been already implied in our remarks upon St. John's Gospel, the controlling will of God in history becomes an element in man's moral life; and in this connexion we have, of course, the Pauline doctrine of predestination. Here, again, we are dealing, not with a mere speculation, but with a series of facts which must be taken into consideration in any valid account of actual practical life.

It would be beyond our purpose to dwell further on these theological points. We have said thus much about ethics in order to call attention to the fact that the Christian ethic as it appears in the NT, rests upon certain convictions as to the nature and acts of Christ. The whole bearing and range of morality depends upon these.

We must now return to the other matter remaining for discussion, viz. the attitude of the Church in its endeavour to spread the Christian view of life through the world, and in this connexion we shall consider two points—(1) the general attitude of the Church towards practical life; (2) the system of virtues and vices which flowed from the use of the Christian ideal.

(1) We notice, first of all, that the Church displays an attitude of hostility to all that is worldly. The world, to the eyes of St. Paul, presents a spectacle of varied and widespread wickedness. The heathen have lost the light that might once have belonged to them, and, as they have lost the knowledge of God, have fallen into idolatry, and so into gross sin. They have concentrated their attention and interests upon the material side of life, and find their satisfaction in the created world (Ro 1<sup>23</sup>). The world appears in connexion with the moral evil of 'the flesh.' St. Paul does not mean by this that the flesh, as such, is the seat of evil; but it is the material and transient side of man's nature, which has no right to stand as the object of his life. The works of the flesh (Gal 5<sup>19</sup>) are all those acts and states of which the real explanation lies in man's choice of the material and transient, his desire for selfish satisfaction. Though there are still higher ideas and signs of moral aspiration among the heathen, yet the predominant note of their life is degradation and sensuality.*

* It is always hard to read St. Paul's descriptions, esp. in Ro 1, without wondering whether he has exaggerated and, if so, to what extent. It must, however, be remembered that we derive our view of the ancient world rather from the highest minds of the particular periods we consider, than from men on ordinary levels. It was these lower, more ordinary strata of society with which St. Paul was chiefly acquainted. And, further, there can be no question that the entry of Christianity has altered the face of things in many more directions than we ordinarily think; so that, in all probability, the tone of ancient society is much farther from us than we are wont to suppose. St. Paul represents the case of a person with sentiments very like our own acting and thinking under the old conditions. And, lastly, it must always be remembered that St. Paul's method of presenting his ideas is to insist strongly on one aspect of a matter at one time, modifying it or insisting on the complementary truth in

In like manner, St. John speaks of the world as lying in the evil one (καὶ τὰ ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ, 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>), and uses the word κόσμος somewhat in the same way as St. Paul uses the word οἶκος, for the material creation considered, first as apart from, and then as hostile to God. The world is guided by principles of self-interest, and is doomed to pass away. As Christ had anticipated persecution and hatred for those who follow Him, so St. Paul and St. John recognize an endless hostility between the world and those born of God—between the flesh and the Spirit. There is no compromise and no cessation in the strife.

Hence the first thing which strikes us in the general attitude of the Church towards the world is its uncompromising hostility. But in large measure these phrases, the flesh and the world, stand for tendencies or principles rather than for individuals. These tendencies appear in individuals; but there is quite another aspect in which the individuals arrest the attention of the Church. The world from this point of view is capable of being saved; and this fact determines the character of the warfare. There is no limit to the sacrifices which must be expected of the Christian: he must, as Christ said, hate his father and mother if he is worthy of his calling. But he will not retire into himself, and live an isolated withdrawn life in which mankind in general has no part. He will live quietly in the state in which his lot is cast, fulfilling ordinary duties of citizenship (Ro 13, cf. 1 P 4<sup>10</sup>), accepting even such an institution as slavery (1 Co 7<sup>21</sup>, Philem), without strife or cry. At the same time, he will not conceal his way of life, nor evade inquiry into its motive; the power of example, the mere presence of the new life of action, will tell. The world will be won by the disciples of Christ—by the fact that they love one another. And the love to the world, which is the sign that they have passed from death to life (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), is extended to the neighbour, and in this is the fulfilling of the law (Ro 13<sup>10</sup>). As God loved the world, even when men were in a state of rebellion against Him, so those who are called by the name of Christ will endeavour, so far as in them lies, to fulfil God's desire to save it. Thus the Christian's attitude towards the world is partly hostile and partly friendly—hostile so far as the world tries to convert him, but friendly in so far as he endeavours to convert the world. We must now consider certain special conditions of mind which, owing to the peculiar views of life characteristic of the Church, are now brought within the ethical sphere.

(a) We propose to consider, first, three moral conditions which are sufficiently similar to admit of such treatment, and which all depend upon a lack of zeal or whole-heartedness. In Ja 1<sup>5-8</sup> we find a severe condemnation passed upon the διψυχος or double-souled man. In Rev 3<sup>15-17</sup> the severest judgment of all those passed upon the Seven Churches is the denunciation of the lukewarm (χλιαροί). And, again, in Rev 21<sup>8</sup> the first of those whose portion is the second death are the cowards (δειλοί). These three words, especially in view of the context they are in, seem to convey more than a reproach upon vacillation of purpose. The man who is double-souled and unstable in all his ways fails to obtain his prayers; his life loses consistency and firmness, and becomes like the sea, driven by the wind and tossed. So the lukewarm is worse than the open enemy ('I would thou wert cold or hot'), and the coward is coupled in his condemnation with the unfaithful as well as those who are guilty of open and obvious sin. All three are cases of insincerity. They are attempts to serve two masters, and they lack the absolute singleness of aim which Christ demands of those who follow Him. The severity of the condemnation upon them is the measure of the importance of the demand made upon the believer. He is to live by spiritual or lukewarmness or double-souledness is nothing less than the surrender of all this; in other words, the rejection of Christ. On the positive side, we have St. Paul's exhortations to sincerity of work (Col 3<sup>22</sup>), to tolerance of weaker consciences in all things lawful (1 Co 8<sup>13-14</sup>, Ro 14), and these exhortations are based upon the same general principle. The sole concern of men is to be their relation to God, and this will colour all that they do in the ordinary ways of life.

Under the same condemnation will be placed various sensual sins. Thus St. Paul bases his exhortation to purity on the true function of the body, and its capacity as a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6<sup>12</sup> etc.). Covetousness, mentioned at the end of a list of sensual sins, is stigmatized as idolatry (Col 3<sup>5</sup>); the love of money is said to have power to pervert men from the faith, and to be a root of all evil things (1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>); and again the love of pleasure is set over-against the love of God (2 Ti 3<sup>4</sup>). In all these cases the error lies in misdirection of aim, the transient is preferred to the eternal. They are not merely breaches of law, or, as a Greek philosopher might have said, disturbances of the due balance of man's nature. In the light of the faith they are errors in principle, a choice of the wrong thing altogether.

This singleness of aim takes shape in social life in various noticeable forms. The bond which holds the Christian society together is love—love to God and love to the brethren. This, in itself, would prevent any violence of self-assertion or rivalry. But there are also positive virtues based upon the conception of the Christian society. One of the most striking of these is humility. This appears in St. Paul primarily as a social virtue. It consists in voluntarily accepting a subdued estimate of oneself. It is based on the fact of all diffidence or indisposition to accept the call of God to special work by the fact that it is not fairly and simply with reality. On the practical side it consists largely in doing without hesitation or discontent the work assigned. So St. Paul exhorts the Romans (12<sup>3</sup>) not to think more highly of themselves than they ought; and gives as his reason their unity in the body of Christ. Immediately afterwards he exhorts them to perform faithfully the function that has been allotted to them in the Church. So in the Epistle to the Philippians (2<sup>3</sup>) the spirit of humility is opposed to the spirit of rivalry, and the factiousness of a hireling. So St. Peter (1 P 5<sup>5</sup>). Thus the normal aspect of this virtue in the apostolic writings is social; it answers to the social reserve of the Greeks—the disposition to give and take without savage selfishness or personal rivalry. But it differs widely from this, in that it is not based upon the mere fact that all men cannot have the same thing, and must give way to one another; it rests upon a positive love of men, one to another, and a profound conviction of the unique value of spiritual things. Moreover, it goes back upon the example and the precept of Christ Himself; it is a conspicuous embodiment of His mind and temper.

In this connexion it will be well to speak of another virtue which holds a high place in St. Paul's teaching. In the list of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>), the virtue which appears at the end as a kind of climax is ἐγκράτεια, self-control. It will not be justifiable to press too far its position in this catalogue; but there can be no doubt that it holds an important place in St. Paul's mind. It is one of the virtues required of the bishop (Tit 1<sup>6</sup>); it is inculcated by the example of the zealous athlete (1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>), and it appears in 2 P 1<sup>6</sup> as a stage in the progress of men in this world. It is in regard to this virtue, probably, that the ethical ideas of the apostolic writers differ most characteristically from the view of contemporary Gr. writers. The Gr. view of virtue was chiefly that of a condition attained after struggle; it did not contemplate the persistence of temptation, or of any disposition to yield on the part of the virtuous man. The material side of man was not, so to speak, an actual element in virtuous action; it required suppression, not control: on the other hand, the Christian virtue does not pretend to introduce warfare or separation into the organization of man. It recognizes the need of self-control, but the character of the man who manages his physical nature and keeps it in its proper relation to his whole life is selected for commendation. The ἐγκράτεια of St. Paul is a more real thing than the σωφροσύνη of a Gr. philosopher; and it is not, morally speaking, a lower conception of virtuous life.

another context. If Ro 1 represents the darker side of his mind, Ro 2, not to mention his practical attitude towards the Gentiles, represents the aspect of the question neglected here.

(b) We now come to consider three states or conditions or virtues which are most of all identified with the Christian point of view. These are the well-known triad, Faith, Hope, and Love. They are for the most part identified with St. Paul, and found especially in 1 Co 13. But it is not true to suppose that they are limited to that passage. They occur in close connexion, both in St. Peter (1<sup>21, 22</sup>), and in the Ep. to the Hebrews (10<sup>22</sup>), and in other places. Of St. Paul (1 Th 1<sup>3, 5</sup>, Col 1<sup>3-5</sup>), the connexion is so remarkable that it has been recently argued that it must have been based on the teaching of Christ Himself.* Without committing ourselves on this point, it is at least worth noticing that the connexion is frequent, and it is natural to infer that it had some definitely ethical significance. The question then arises, What is implied by the combination of these three virtues? There is practically no doubt as to the meaning of ἐλπίς and πίστις. It is true that ἐλπίς means sometimes a particular state of mind, sometimes the object on which it rests, but there is no serious ambiguity. But with the third ἀγάπη this is not the case. It is ambiguous, because it stands both for the temper of the faithful person and for the object of his faith; but (2) more seriously, because the character of the moral temper is not clear. The word means not only trustfulness, but also trustworthiness. And even in those passages where the context excludes the passive sense, there are further differences in the associations given by various writers to the words. St. James (2<sup>18</sup>) seems to mean by it little more than an intellectual assent to a proposition; it is a state of mind in which the devils can be said to be. The word in St. Paul has a moral rather than a purely intellectual meaning. It describes the temper of one who, in full view of all that makes the other way, trusts in the character and power of God (cf. Ro 4<sup>19</sup> RV). And so St. Paul speaks naturally of faith being made active by love (ἐνεργουμένη δι' ἀγάπης, Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). It is inspired by the love of the person on whom it rests, and therefore does not fail. In the Ep. to the Hebrews we again notice a slight variation in use. The author describes faith in somewhat precise fashion as 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen' (11<sup>1</sup>). By this he seems to mean a certainty in the mind of the faithful person that the hopes he has will be realized. The confidence is so great that he seems almost to have in his possession the things which are not yet in being. Such a man, like Moses, 'endures as seeing the invisible.'

It is somewhat difficult to describe succinctly the character in which these three virtues converge. It must be remembered that, for the apostles, the death and resurrection of Christ were the primary and salient facts with which all life had to deal. Hence these determine the primary reference of the faith, hope, and love of the believer. His faith rests upon Christ as risen and ascended; his hope is in the consummation of God's purpose in the world; his love is directed to the Father who guided, and the Son who effected, his redemption. The whole atmosphere of the Epistles is full of these facts, and all practical results which flow out from the presence of these virtues are dependent on the truth of these facts. Thus, because the believer holds to the truth of the death and resurrection of Christ, he has certainty, where others doubt, in his view of the history of the world and of himself. His faith is not a blind assurance of anything that happens. He knows as well as any one the difficulties in life, and the darkness which hangs over human things. He sees things occur which he did not foresee and cannot explain. But he is not in presence of a mere chaos of irrational forces, with a blind belief in the existence of a purpose behind them; he has a sure confidence in the death and resurrection of Christ; that is, he is able to take them as a type of the action of God, and to find in them a ground of anticipation for the future. Because Christ has risen from the dead, instead of being of all men the most miserable he is the person of all others who has a sure hold upon life. See FAITH.

In like manner, the natural object of the virtue of hope is the second coming of our Lord, and the consummation of all things which that event will bring. It is this hope that enables men to endure the sorrows and pain of the world; it is hidden in some sort in the groaning and travelling of creation (Ro 8<sup>18-25</sup>). It looks on from the steady endurance of persecution (Ro 5<sup>3</sup>), and it does not make ashamed. It is not difficult to see how this confidence in the future will affect life on this side. It involves no veiling of the real world. With a full sense of the presence of all the troubles in the world, it looks upon the course of history with certainty and fearlessness. There is no haunting dread lest the world may be, after all, a chaos of irrational forces without purpose or true guidance; because the events of Christ's life, the truth of His person, and the certainty of His return, are all such hazy and depressing things. The virtue of hope is closely allied with the virtue of faith. They both rest upon the character and self-manifestation of God; they both affect life by bringing within its sphere the realities of the spiritual order.

And, lastly, the virtue of love depends upon the cessation of the feeling of hostility and estrangement which had so long been abroad in the world. The efforts of God for the salvation of man, His care for the souls of individual men—that is, the prominent events in the incarnate life of His Son—commend the love of God to us. From of old, men had sought by various means for intercourse with God, and yet had fallen short. The life of Christ opened the way to a fuller communion than they had ventured to anticipate. The law of God, seen in the light of the death and resurrection of Christ, could be a regular principle of action; not imposed

* Resch, Agrapha, p. 181; cf. Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu, p. 24. Both these works are in Harnack's series of Texte und Untersuchungen, Bd. v. 4 and Bd. xiv. 2.

The Ancient Faith of the Creator (1897), ii. 1898.

I. B. STRONG.

ETHIOPIA (Aithiopia), the name whereby the LXX translators rendered the Heb. כְּנָעַן passim, and in Ps 72<sup>o</sup> and 74th the Heb. כְּנָעַן.

1. DERIVATION, etc.—The word occurs in the earliest Gr. literature as the name of a race to be found in the extreme E. and the extreme W.; in later writers* the nation is more definitely localized as dwelling S. of Egypt. The name would seem to be Greek, and to signify 'Red-faces' (cf. the similar word aithe applied by Homer to wine), a designation derived from the colour of the people, just as many names given by the Gr. geographers to African tribes are derived from their characteristics, habits, or mode of life; and indeed the present inhabitants of Abyssinia are said to call themselves Kay ('red' in Amharic), as opposed to the Nubians, whom they term black (tekour in Amharic, salim in Ethiopic; Lejean, Voyage en Abyssinie, 1872, p. 77). As, however, the colour that is associated with the 'Ethiopians' is not red, but black (Juv. Sat. ii. 23), it has been suggested that the Gr. name represents the Grecized form of some foreign appellation, such as Aṭyāb, plural of the Arab. ṭīb, 'scents,' used to designate the inhabitants of the country whence the incense came (Glaser, Die Abyssinier in Arabien, p. 10). The word is a loan-word in the language called Ethiopic, imported from the Greek, and only employed by the Abyssinians in Christian times to denote themselves. In the inscription of Adulis, the Abyssinian king claims to have defeated the Ethiopians among other foreign races: . . . by this name, according to Lejean's . . . the Shangallas, a tribe placed in the maps of Harris and Lefèvre to the W. of the Abyssinian province Shiré, between the rivers Mareb and Taccazé. The name Habash, whereby the Abyssinian country and people are designated in Arabic (whence the European Abyssinia), would appear to represent an ancient Egypt. name for some African race (Glaser, l.c., after W. Max Muller); the native name is Geez.

2. GEOGRAPHY.—Although the Gr. geographers after the time of the Ptolemies designated the kingdom of Meroë from the neighbouring tribes, they make the term Ethiopia include both. The extent of territory covered by this name is therefore very great: to the ancients it represented all the land bounded by the Upper Nile on the W., and the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf on the E.; the southern extremity they did not profess to be able to fix. Only modern—the most modern—researches have been able to map out accurately the land known to the old geographers by vague reports.

The land whence the Nile derives its waters is described by Lucan as putres arenas, but this description is not true of the whole of Ethiopia. While the . . . constantly been, and are still, fluctuating . . . are three. The highlands of Abyssinia . . . usually spelt Soudan, or 'black country,' on the N. and W. from the Danā-kul country, which lies between the Ethiopian range and the sea.

. . . have been rarely traversed by Europeans . . . Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, 1867), has, since the enterprise of Mohammed Ahmad, been frequently the centre of European interest, and the campaigns that have been fought there have led to the elucidation of its geography; and the works of Wingate (Mahdism in the Egyptian Soudan, 1891), Slatin Pasha (Fire and Sword in the Soudan, 1896), and others, give accurate details both of the nature of the country (2,000,000 sq. miles in extent) and of the tribes that inhabit it. South of the thirteenth parallel of latitude is fertile country with a six months' rainfall; N. of it are vast steppes with frequent thorns and thinly-scattered wells (Wingate, p. 8). A narrow strip . . . to be found on either side of the Nile, . . . making a gigantic curve between the third and fifth cataracts, and receiving at Al-Damer (about 33° 45' E. long., 17° 30' N. lat.) the Atbara, laden in the rainy season with the waters of Abyssinia, but in the dry season a bed of white sand; and some . . . farther S. splitting at the modern town of Khartoum. . . . B. . . . and White Nile. The scenery is diversified by mountain ranges of no great height.

(b) Very different from this flat rolling plain is the Switzerland of Africa, Abyssinia, a plateau with a mean elevation of 6000 ft., extending from 9° to 15° 28' N. lat., and at its greatest width from 37° to 40° E. long. Never completely severed from communication with Europe, this country was first accurately described in the Historia Ethiopiae of the Ethiopic scholar Job Ludolf (1681), while . . .

. . . t and vastly increased . . . of it, which has been supplemented yet more . . . researches of M<sup>me</sup> d'Abbadie (Géographie d'Ethiopie, 1890) and others (e.g. Theodore Bent, Journal of the Ethiopian, 1891; . . . Reise in der Colonia . . . the Red Sea by the Ethiopian range (as it was . . . S. by the rivers Ansaba, Barka, and Gash, and on the N. by the Atbara, the Abyssinian plateau inclines towards the N.W., but reaches the mts of Samen or Semyen, of which . . . is 14,200 ft. high. The four rivers Taccazé (the Nile of Ethiopia), Mareb, Abay, and Hawash, with their numerous tributaries, divide the country into a great number of natural provinces; and as these rivers flow in deep ravines, intercommunication during the rainy season is frequently suspended: while the Mareb and the Hawash lose . . . to many channels, the the Setite flows into of Katarif, while the Abay (which near its rise curves through Lake Tsana, the in its course is called . . . division of the . . . districts is recent; . . . to which the native geographers divide their land into zones—the Kola or lowlands (below 5500 ft.), the Woina-Deja (5500-7500 ft.), and the Deja (over 7500 ft.), distinguished by their flora and fauna. (See on these esp. J. Dove, Organisationsheft 37 to Petermann's Mitteilungen der Kulturzone Nord-A . . . and for another division A. . . Beiträge zur Ethnographie, 1882.)

(c) Third . . . the Ethiopian range, and extending to the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden, is a vast tract inhabited now by three Hamitic races called Oromo or Gallas, Afar or Danakils, and Somalis, not yet thoroughly explored, among the . . . which may be mentioned Borelli's . . . 1890), and Paulitsche's Ethnologie . . . and zoology of . . . Reisen in Ost.

3.

3. SKETCH OF HISTORY.—Portions of this vast region were under some sort of government during the existence of the ancient kingdom of Napata, the earlier history of which has been sketched in the article CUSH. In the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus we find an Amonian king Ergamenes reigning at Meroë (Diod. iii. 6), whose name (Tikamon, 'oath of Amon') was found in cartouches on Nubian monuments shortly after the commencement of hieroglyphic studies (see Champollion, Voyage en Nubie, 119; Rosellini, Monumenti Storici, ii. 321). To the time of the same Ptolemy, Brugsch (Zschr. f. Ägypt. Sprache, etc. 1890, p. 29) assigns the reign of a king Horsiatef or Arsioes (whose stele with a lengthy inscription is . . . by Mariette, Monuments Divers, . . . two kings of the same family as . . . and Hormachis, after the death of Ptolemy Philopator seized the Thebaid, when they reigned twenty years (Brugsch, l.c.; Ravetoul, Revue Égypt. v. 39 ff.). As Energetes I. is said to have sent an expedition into Lower Nubia (Mon. Adul.), the two powers must have been long at variance. The invaders of the Thebaid were ejected by Ptolemy Epiphanes—if the combinations of Révillout be correct—by the aid of the Blemmyans, an Ethiopian tribe, whose princes henceforth become supreme at Meroë, though acknowledging the suzerainty of the Egyptians and their heirs the Romans, whence it comes that inscriptions in honour of Tiberius and Nero have been found at Dakke (the ancient Pselcis).

* Still the confusion of Ethiopia with India comes long into the Christian era (I. . . Muller pour l'histoire du Christianisme, p. 32).

An attempt was made during the reign of Augustus by a queen named Cleopatra to drive the Romans out of the Thebaid, but the attempt failed. The reign of Meroë by C. Petronius in the 21st century B.C. was marked with the Ethiopian queen by Augustus at Samos in A.C. 21, the defeat of the former may not have been so complete as Strabo (Geog. 16. 7. 3) and Révillout (l.c.). The same queen has been mentioned in Hermetica, which is dated in the year B.C. 13 as sending a letter to Augustus. In Hermes for 1893, p. 153, it is mentioned that the queen of Kandake (in Egypt. Kabacki with many names Amn-urru; Lepsius, Denkmäler, v. 47 a and b; ap. Dr. Lepsius, Der Meroit. Denkm., p. 7) is said to have been the wife of the queen of Ethiopia. D. S. Margoliouth, Fraser's Hist. of Ethiopia, 351, 5. Beyond a doubt, the queen of the queen of Meroë in A.C. 877 the history of the queen of Meroë, when the Blennians invaded the empire (Révillout, Mém. sur les Nubiens, 12. Mem. pres par divers savants à l'Académie, t. 2. 371; and Pliny asserts that a tribune with some praetorians sent to reconnoitre by Nero, who was contemplating an Ethiopian war, reported that the regions about Meroë were deserted (Nat. Hist. vi. 35). It has been conjectured by Dillmann ('Über die Anfänge des Aksumitischen Reiches' in Abhandl. der Akad. zu Berlin, 1878, p. 204) that the downfall of Meroë was the result of the campaign of Petronius. Though this may seem doubtful, he is probably right; for whereas the classical geographers prior to A.D. 50 (e.g., Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, etc.) of the 1st century B.C. Artemidorus of Ephesus, of the 1st century A.D., who relies in his elaborate account of the Nile, chiefly on Agatharchides, but partly on information which he had himself collected in Egypt; Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, etc., know of no other state but that of Meroë, the Periplus of the Prithi (the second half of the 1st century A.D.) mentions Axumita (Αἰθιοπία) Adulis, 'whither all the goods of the country are brought through Cyrenium to Adulis' for exportation. It was governed by a king named Zoskales; and in one of the inscriptions of Adul recorded by Cosmas Indicopleustes, the king, inferred from the phrases he employs to have been king of Axum, a worshipper of the Greek gods Ares, Zeus, and Poseidon, enumerates conquests extending over a great portion of modern Abyssinia, and into Arabia, and countries, in a list where no names exist, for the first time. Since this king claims to have been the first of his line to conquer tribes which, in the time of the Periplus, were subject to Zoskales, Dillmann (l.c. 200) argues plausibly that the monument of Adulis is earlier than the Periplus; whence it would appear that the empire of Axum came into being somewhere in the middle of the 1st century A.D. The date cannot be much earlier, since otherwise its existence could not have escaped the Greeks, who had many factories on the Red Sea coast, and from the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who is said to have organized elephant-hunting expeditions. Adul (see below) is a gap of some centuries in the history of Axum, it is clear that the great antiquity claimed for their empire by the native Abyssinian chroniclers is fabulous (see Dillmann, DMG vi.) as well as its supposed Jewish basis. Besides Meroë and Axum, the classical writers know only of tribes existing in Ethiopia in various stages of savagery, some of whose characteristics may well be preserved in extant races, while some may be relegated to the region of fable. (See further CASU.)

4. LANGUAGE, etc. — The chief monuments of Nubian monarchs are in the Egypt. character and language; although, in the opinion of experts, many of them display a very imperfect acquaintance with both. Ergamenes however, in the 3rd cent. B.C., after overthrowing the power of the priests (it is thought), introduced the native language of Nubia into the monuments, using for it modifications of the hieroglyphic and demotic writing, in which the phonetic value of the Egypt. symbols seems to have been shifted. In his Nubian grammar (1880) Lepsius speaks of these inscriptions as a still unsolved mystery; and the important study of them by P. de Sacy, Der Meroit. Denkm., Leipzig, 1887, etc., as having finally solved it, although the discovery by Schafer (Zschr. für Ägyptologie, 1896) of elements of modern Nubian in the Nubian words recorded by classical writers makes in favour of Brugsch's system. While the basis of the language is, according to these authorities, to be sought, not in the Beja dialect (as Lepsius had imagined), but in modern Nubian, Brugsch has made it probable that the language of the inscriptions was largely intermixed with Egyptian words, and indeed he fancies that many such are to be detected in the existing language. While the Ethiopian Pantheon was largely peopled with Egypt. gods, a few native names are recorded by the ancients, as may be made out from the inscriptions; and likewise Ethiopian civilization, though largely borrowed from Egypt, retained not a few native peculiarities.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.—According to Ac 8<sup>27</sup> an Ethiopian eunuch, minister of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, who was over all her treasure, shortly after the martyrdom of Stephen was met by the deacon Philip when returning from a religious journey to Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity. From the authorities cited in the article ETHIOPIA we know that Gr. literature had spread to the kingdom of Meroë as early as the 3rd cent. B.C.: there is therefore nothing improbable in the LXX translation, which this Ethiopian was found reading, having penetrated thither by the same channels; but whether he also belonged to the Jewish community cannot be made out with certainty. While on his journey to Jerusalem 'to worship' (cf. the ἱεροσολίμους in ETHIOPIA) might imply it, his apparent unfamiliarity with OT (v. 31) and his physical condition render it improbable. The word 'eunuch' might indeed be regarded as a mistranslation for 'minister' if there were any likelihood that this narrative was originally in Aramaic, since in some dialects of that language the same word signifies both; but the fact that the passage of Isaiah quoted (Is 53<sup>7-8</sup>) is according to the LXX, takes away the force of any such supposition.

The notices of the Eth. kingdom for this period failing us altogether, it is impossible to identify this personage from external sources; but the historical character of the narrative seems to be acknowledged in most quarters.

The confession of faith put into his mouth in v. 37 AV is now universally admitted to be an early introduction. Assuming the Lucan authorship of the Acts, the source of the above narrative may have been personal information received from Philip (cf. Ac 21<sup>8</sup>). Like the baptism of Cornelius by St. Peter, the case of the Ethiopian eunuch marked an important stage in the history of the admission of non-Jews to the Christian Church. Its bearing from this point of view will be discussed in art. PHILIP (the evangelist). See also CORNELIUS.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN (כְּשִׁיטָה).—According to Nu 12<sup>1</sup> (JE), when the children of Israel were at Hazeroth, Miriam and Aaron 'spoke against' Moses on account of his marriage with an Ethiopian (RV 'Cushite') woman. In the sequel, however, Moses' conduct in this matter is neither impugned nor defended; for 'the Lord said unto Miriam and Aaron, Turn ye, for ye have despised my word, saying, We will speak against Moses as he doth: for he hath married an Ethiopian woman' (v. 2)—a claim which is refuted by J<sup>1</sup> in a theophany, while Miriam is punished with leprosy, from which she is immediately relieved through Moses' intercession made at Aaron's request, but has nevertheless to be confined for seven days (v. 4th). As the 'Ethiopian woman' is mentioned nowhere else, and the death of Moses' wife Zipporah is not recorded, some of the early interpreters thought the two must be identical; and this view is favoured by the Jewish expositors, who assign reasons for Zipporah's being called Eth. that are either frivolous (as Rashi) or merely uncritical (as Ibn Ezra); Rashi's interpretation being as old as Targ. Onk. On the other hand, LXX has Αἰθιοπία, and Jos. (Ant. II. x. 2) makes her an Eth. princess. If the woman mentioned in Nu be identical with Zipporah, the word Kāshīth must be used in the sense of non-Israelite—a usage which is found in late Rabbin. writings (Levy, NHWB), and cannot be dissociated from the similar employment of the word ḥazir (being found in the Bib. does not expressly assert) that the marriage was of recent occurrence. It is therefore more likely that a black slave-girl is meant, and that the fault found by Miriam and Aaron was with the indignity of such a union; and this accords with the statement (v. 3) that Moses was the 'meekest' of mankind. The employment of Nubians as slaves dates back to the early dynasties of Egypt (cf. Brugsch, Gesch. Ägypt. p. 266). Although no etym. of the name Hazeroth is given in the text, this word (from the Arab. ḥazara, 'confine') would seem to stand in some connexion with the confinement of Miriam. Perhaps it is merely accidental that the word ḥazir in Arab. is employed in an idiom meaning to 'calumniate' (Maydani, c. 3); albeit this double etym. would contain implicitly a large portion of the narrative. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIIC VERSION.—This subject will be treated under the following heads:—

- i. The Ethiopic Canonical Books.
- ii. The Manuscripts.
- iii. Printed Editions.
- iv. Source of the Text.
- v. Critical Value.
- vi. Date.

i. THE ETHIOPIIC CANONICAL BOOKS.—(A) Old Testament.—The Eth. OT embraces all the books included in the LXX (except the Books of the Maccabees), together with several others, such as the Book of Enoch, Jubilees, 4 Ezra, Rest of the Words of Baruch, etc. The Maccabees were either never translated or else were early lost. Since, however, the Eth. scholars found the titles of these books in their Ṣinódós and Fetha Nagast, they proceeded to supply them from their own imagination. In this way these books came into circulation (Dillmann). In later times, indeed, the Latin version of these books was translated into Ethiopic. (See Wright, Cat. Eth. MSS Brit. Mus. p. 14.) No distinction whatever appears to have been made between the canonical and the uncanonical books of OT. The number of books in OT is set down unanimously at 46, but hardly two lists of these books agree. As a rule, the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books which appear in one list are replaced in another by quite different works of the same class of literature. (See Walton's Polyglot i., Proleg. p. 100; Dillmann in Ewald's Jahrbücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft, v. 1853, pp. 144–151; Fell, Canones Apostolorum Ethiopice, p. 46.)

(B) New Testament.—35 books are reckoned in NT. This number is arrived at by including a book of Canon Law with the usual 27 books of NT. As this work, called the Ṣinódós, is counted as 8 books, we thus get 35 in all. (See Zotenberg, Cat. des MSS Éthiopiens de la Bibliothèque Nationale, p. 141 ff.; Ludolf, Historia Æthiopica, III. iv. 27; Vansleb, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandria, 239 ff.)

The Western division of the Bible into chapters made its way into Abyssinia through the contact in later times of the latter with Western Christendom. The older MSS exhibit quite a different division of the books.

ii. THE MSS OF THE ETHIOPIIC VERSION.—The chief MSS of OT, the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and of NT will be found in the following catalogues:—Wright, Ethiopic MSS of the British Museum, OT and Apocr. pp. 1–22, NT pp. 23–29, 1878; Zotenberg, Catalogue des MSS Éthiopiens de la Bibliothèque Nationale, OT and Apocr. Nos. 1–31, 49–51, NT Nos. 32–48; D'Abbadie, Catalogue

Raisonné des MSS Éthiopiens, Paris, 1859, OT and Apocr. Nos. 16, 21, 22, 30, 35, 55, 99, 105, 117, 137, 141, 149, 195, 197, 203, 204, 205. Some of these MSS contain only single books. MSS of Enoch are found in 16, 30, 99, 197; Gospels, Nos. 2, 9, 47, 82, 95, 112, 173; Pauline Epp. 9, 119, 164; Cath. Epp., Apoc. and Acts, 9, 119, 164. Dillmann, Catalogus MSS Æthiop. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, 1848, OT and Apocr. 1–9, NT 10–15. There are small collections of MSS also in Berlin. See Dillmann, Abessinische Handschriften der Königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin; OT and Apocr. Nos. 1–6, of the Psalms 7–19; NT 20, 21. Of these, No. 1 is a MS of Enoch. For the MSS in Vienna, see ZDMG xvi. p. 554; in St. Petersburg, see Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences, ii. 302, iii. 145 ff.; in Tübingen, see ZDMG v. 164 ff. There are also a few MSS in Frankfurt of some value, and in private libraries in Germany.

iii. PRINTED EDITIONS.—We shall mention only a few of these. For further information the reader may consult Le Long, Bibliotheca Sacra, 1878, ii. 140–157; Fell, Literarische Rundschau für das Kathol. Deutschland, Feb. 1, 1896.

(A) Old Testament.—Of OT Dillmann has edited vol. i. Gn–Ruth, 1853 (some of the best MSS were inaccessible when this volume was edited); vol. ii. Samuel and Kings, 1861–1871; Joel (in Merx, Die Prophetie des Joels). The Psalms were edited by Ludolf in 1701, and in the various Polyglots and by the Bible Society. Bachmann published texts of Isaiah, Lamentations, and Malachi. The text of the last two books neither adequately nor accurately represents the best MSS in Europe.

(B) Apocrypha.—The honour of publishing the first Apocryphal texts belongs to Oxford. Thus Laurence edited the Ascension of Isaiah in 1819, the Book of Ezra in 1820, and the Book of Enoch in 1823. These are valuable now only from an historical point of view. Dillmann has given us a splendid edition of the Apocryphal books, Baruch, Epistola Jeremiae, Iosifus, Ecclesiasticus, Sapientia, Esdræ Apocalypsis, Esdras Græcus (1894). He edited texts also of Enoch (1851), Jubilees (1859), and the Ascension of Isaiah (1877). In 1893 Charles published an edition of Enoch, in which there is a continuous correction of Dillmann's text from 10 hitherto uncollected MSS, and in 1894 the Ethiopic text of Jubilees from 4 MSS.

(C) New Testament.—The NT was first printed at Rome in 1548–49 by the Abyssinian Tasfâ-Sion, with the omission, however, of the 13 Pauline Epistles. As the translator possessed only a fragmentary MS of the Acts, he supplied an Eth. version of the missing chapters from the Greek and Latin. This edition, which is disfigured by countless errors, was reprinted in Walton's Polyglot. Another edition, Nov. Testamentum . . . Æthiopice, ad codicum . . . fidem, was issued by T. P. Platt in 1826. For. Bible Society, 1826–1830. A reprint of this edition appeared at Basle in 1874. These editions are of no critical value.

iv. SOURCE OF THE TEXT.—(A) Old Testament.—The Ethiopic or Geez version, which from the earliest times was universally used in all branches of the Abyssinian Church as well as amongst the Jewish Itala-ha, was, according to some of the poets of the country, derived from the Arabic, its authors being variously said to be the Abba Salâmâ (=Frumentus, the Apostle of the Abyssinians, according to Ludolf, see Zotenberg, Cat. des MSS Eth. pp. 3, 4, or a later Abba Salâmâ, see Zotenberg, 194; Dillm. Zur Gesch. des azum. Reichs, p. 20) or the holy Nine (Guidi, Le traduzioni degli evangelii in arabo e in etiopico, p. 33, note). But Ludolf saw reason for doubting this view later (Historia aethiopica, pp. 235, 296) when he came to recognize that the Ethiopic version was closely dependent on the text of the LXX. Subsequent investigation has tended to substantiate the later view of Ludolf. Hence the view of Renaudot, that the version was made from the Egyptian, must be summarily rejected; likewise the preposterous theory of Lagarde, that it was derived either from the Egypt. or Arab. in the 14th cent.

* See also Margoliouth's art. on the Eth. VS in Miller's edition of Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the NT.

It is . . . that our version was made in the . . . Greek,—in the main, for there are certain phenomena in the MSS which cannot be explained from this hypothesis alone. These we will touch upon presently, and in the meantime . . . account of the various texts . . . In his V.T. Aethiopici, Tom. i. apparat. crit. p. 8 (1853), he draws attention to a large number of readings which agree with the Hebrew against the LXX, and suggests that these are due to the use of the Hexapla of Origen. Later he revises this theory and replaces it by another; thus in Herzog's RE, 1877, i. 205, he writes that there are three distinct types of text. i. The original translation more or less corrupted but seldom represented in the MSS. (See also Zotenberg, op. cit. 3, 5, 7, 8.) ii. A text revised and completed from the Greek, and found most frequently in the MSS. This is the Eth. Korai or Textus receptus. iii. A text corrected from the Hebrew, younger in age. See also V.T. Aethiopici, Tom. ii. Fasc. i. apparat. crit. pp. 3-6. This text has been accepted by Zotenberg, and lately by Pretorius, Herzog's RE iii. p. 87 ff.

It is possible, however, to interpret the evidence otherwise. Thus Dillmann may be wrong (a) in his later rejection of his first theory that the Hexapla of Origen was used by the Eth. translators, and (b) in attributing all Eth. transliterations of Heb. words and many Eth. readings which agree with the Heb. against the LXX to the work of later scholars correcting from the Heb. text.

Some evidence will now be cited which points in this direction. This evidence will be drawn from Lamentations and Malachi. First as regards (a), we find that in La 2<sup>13</sup> the Eth. astamslaki agrees exactly with the version of Symmachus ἐξέσωσε against the Heb., LXX, and all other Gr. VSS. Likewise in 3<sup>4</sup> and 5<sup>10</sup> our text again agrees with Symm. against the LXX, but this time it is in harmony with the Hebrew. As some other divergences from the LXX can be explained by this version and that of Aquila, it seems reasonable to conclude that the Hexapla was used by the Eth. translators. These divergences, however, may have been derived directly from the Heb. text. In many passages in all the biblical books the Eth. version is independent of and attests a purer form of text than the LXX. Next as regards (b), it is just as likely that many of the transliterations of Heb. words which are found in certain Eth. MSS.* but not in the LXX, may be survivals of the earliest form of the text made directly in many cases from the Hebrew. If they are all to be ascribed to the corrections of later scholars, how are we to account for their appearance in all MSS of La 3<sup>13</sup> and Job 16<sup>12</sup>? What we usually find in the history of a version is that the unintelligible or foreign words are by degrees displaced either by their antive equivalents or by emendations, or else they are simply omitted. The theory that the primitive Eth. version contained a large number of words transliterated from the Heb. receives some confirmation from the fact that the Abyssinians first received Christianity through Aramæan missionaries, and that very many Aram. words were actually naturalized in order to express the new doctrines of the Christian faith. The Levitical character of Ethiopic Christianity points in the same direction, i.e. its acceptance of the rite of circumcision, and the Levitical laws of purification of women.

Thus, we have a complete and critical edition of the Eth. version, it will not be possible to settle finally the above questions. Even Dillmann's edition (vols. i. ii. v.) is inadequate for this purpose, as vols. i. and ii. were completed before the best MSS were accessible.*

(B) New Testament.—Zotenberg (Cat. des MSS Éth. de la bibloth. Nat. pp. 24, 25, 30, 1877) showed that there were two forms of text present in the MSS,—the first, that which was made from the Greek original; the second, a corrected text. In the same year Dillmann (Herzog's RE i. pp. 203-206) suggested that the numerous variations in the more widely read books of the NT, such as the Gospels, were due to the influence of the Copt. and Arab. versions. That such versions were known in Abyssinia he infers from the following grounds: . . . translated from the Arab. were prefixed . . . books derived from the Arab. . .

in later times the native nomenclature of the NT books; e.g. the Acts were called Abraxis (= Πράξεις), Revelation Abukalamis (Ἀποκάλυψις). The Arabic-Coptic Sinódos became early naturalized in the Eth. Church.

These hints of Dillmann's are further developed by Guidi, who pointed out that such corrections are derived from an Arabic text in Egypt (Guidi, Le Traduzioni degli Evangelii in Arabico e in Etiopico, Accad. L. 1888, p. 33 ff.). The MSS are corrected in various degrees by these corrections. In some they appear side by side with the original text.

v. CRITICAL VALUE.—The Eth. version of the OT is generally a very faithful and verbal tr. of the Greek. It frequently reproduces the very order of the words. On the other hand, it is not possible to explain many of its readings by any extant Gr. text, and over-against the LXX it frequently attests a purer text. But its critical value cannot be determined until the questions discussed in the preceding section have been treated exhaustively.

As regards the NT, this version is related to the older type of text attested by the great Greek Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. It has also Western and Alexandrian and Syrian elements. But no critical text has yet been published.

vi. DATE.—Dillmann (Herzog's RE i. 203, 204) confidently ascribes the Eth. version to the 4th and 5th centuries of our era, and regards it as containing not only the oldest memorial but also the foundation of Eth. literature. This conclusion he draws from the following facts: i. Christianity was already firmly established in the 5th cent. ii. The poet and musician Jared had already produced a church hymn in the 6th cent. iii. Chrysostom (Hom. in Johan., Opera

* Such as the MS E for the books of the Kings. See Dillmann, op. cit. ii. apparat. crit. p. 5; see also Zotenberg, Cat. pp. 9, 10, 11 on Version corrigée d'après le texte hébreu. Dorn called attention as early as 1825 to the use of the Heb. text in his introduction to Ludolf's edition of the Psalter.

* For many interesting details see Reckendorf, 'Ueber den Werth der altäthiopischen Pentateuch-Übersetzung für die Reconstruction der Septuaginta,' in ZATW (1857) pp. 61-90. Among other points he controverts Cornill's view in his Commentary on Ezekiel (p. 67 ff.), that the Ethiopic version is derived from the Hesychian recension of the LXX.

† ἄλλα καὶ Σέσι καὶ Ἀγύττοι καὶ Ἰδαὶ καὶ Πέραι καὶ Ἀλβίους . . . ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς ἑκκλησίας ὅτι οὗτοι τὰ παρὰ τοῦτο δογματὰ ἀποχρίνουν, κ.τ.λ.

[From Antiq. viii. p. 10] appears to have known of an Eth. version of the Bible. iv. The version is made directly from the Greek. Now, it was only in the first period of Eth. literature that translations were made from the Greek; for after the appearance of the Arab. language in Egypt, Eth. literature came under the sway of the Arabic.

The above views of Dillmann have recently been confirmed by the peculiar title used for God in Sir 31<sup>8</sup> 37<sup>21</sup>, i.e. Astôr. This shows that heathenism still prevailed when this book was translated (Dillmann, V.T. Ethiopici, Tom. v. p. 117). Guidi . . . to the end of the 5th and . . . the 6th cent. Lagarde's view . . . neuen Ausgabe der griech. Uebersetzung des A.T.s, 1882, p. 28), that the version was made in the 14th cent., not from a Gr. but from an Arab. or an Egypt. translation of the original, is wholly contradicted by the evidence. We may safely assume that the version was completed before the 7th cent.

R. H. CHARLES.

ETH-KAZIN (עֶתְחָזִין, where AV, misunderstanding the locale, writes Ittah-kazin, as in same verse Gittah-hepher for Gath-hepher).—A town on the E. frontier of Zebulun, whose name has not been identified, Jos 19<sup>11</sup>.

J. A. SELBIE.

ETHNAN (אֶתְנָן).—A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>7</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ETHNARCH (ἐθνάρχης).—In 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup> it is stated that 'in Damascus the ethnarch under Aretas . . . 'ed the city of the Damascenes,' the . . . being tr. in both AV and RV by GOVERNOR. Its exact meaning seems doubtful: it is used of Simon the high priest (1 Mac 14<sup>47</sup> 15<sup>1-2</sup>), of Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 2), and of Archelaus (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ II. vi. 3). It was also used for the governor of the Jews in Alexandria (Strabo, ap. Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2), and the head of the Jewish community in Pal. in the time of Origen (Origenes, Ep. ad Africanum, § 14). The last two instances suggest that the normal use of the word was for the ruler of a nation or ἔθνος living with separate laws and customs amongst those of a different race. But the sense of the term seems to have widened, and it became a little superior to that of tetrarch, but inferior to that of king (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 244, etc.).

A. C. HEADLAM.

ETHNI (אֶתְנִי).—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6<sup>4</sup>, called in v. 21 Jeatherai). See GENEALOGY.

ETHNOLOGY.—See RACES.

EUBULUS (Εὐβούλος).—A leading member of the Christian community at Rome, who sends greeting to Timothy through St. Paul at the time of the second imprisonment (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). His name is Greek, but nothing further is known of him.

W. LOCK.

EUERGETES (Prol. to Sirach).—See BENEFACTOR.

EUMENES (Εὐμενής, 'well-disposed') II, king of Pergamus, succeeded his father Attalus in B.C. 197. Through the friendship of Rome he secured a large extension of his territories, so that his kingdom became for a time one of the greatest in the East. In B.C. 169 he was suspected of secret . . . with the enemies of Rome, but . . . in B.C. 159; see Clinton, F. H. iii. 403, 406) before an open rupture took place. The principal authorities for his life are Livy (Ann., esp. bk. xxxvii. and Ept. xlv.), Polybius, and Appian, with Strabo xiii. p. 264, and Justin xxxi.

8, xxxii. 4. In 1 Mac 8<sup>8</sup> the Romans are said to have taken 'the country of India and Media and Lydia' from Antiochus the Great, and to have given these dominions to E. The MSS agree in this reading, which is, however, . . . India was never under the rule . . . Media, too, on account of its eastward position, is not likely to have ever been ceded to E. The best correction is to substitute, with Michaelis, Mysia for Media, and, with Grotius, Ionia for India. In agreement with this are Livy's statements (xxxvii. 44) . . . from Antiochus the . . . Taurus, and of these districts granted (xxxvii. 55) the part north of the Mæander to Eumenes. R. W. MOSS.

EUNICE (Εὐνίκη, so Tisch., WH, with all the uncial MSS; not Εὐνέκη, as TR with many cursives).—The mother of Timothy, and probably the daughter of Lois (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>). The name is Greek, so that conceivably she may have been a proselyte; but this is not a necessary inference, and more probably she was by birth a Jewess (Ἰουδαία, Ac 16<sup>1</sup>). She was married to a Gentile husband, and, probably out of deference to his prejudices, her son was not circumcised; but she gave him a God-fearing name (Τιμόθεος), and trained him carefully in the OT Scriptures (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>). She was probably converted to Christianity on St. Paul's first visit to Lystra, as she is described as already a believer on the second visit (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>). She is not mentioned afterwards, but the curious addition of χίρας (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>) in cursive 25, and the substitution of it for Ἰουδαία in Gig. fu., may embody a tradition of her widowhood; this would give a fresh point to the injunction in 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup>.

W. LOCK.

EUNUCH (εὐνοῦχος, εὐνοῦχος).—εὐνοῦχος is rendered in AV eunuch, officer, chamberlain. The employment of eunuchs in Oriental courts was one of the base accompaniments of polygamy and despotism. The harems of the monarchs were committed to their charge, and they frequently superintended the education of young princes. Much influence was thus at times acquired by them in affairs of state (see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iv. 175). They were often closely connected with the palace intrigues, which played so important a part in Oriental history. It seems that the Heb. word was also used in a wide sense of persons not emasculated, who held offices which were usually entrusted to eunuchs. Such is probably its use in the case of Potiphar (Gn 39<sup>7</sup>; Whiston's Jos. Ant. x. x. 2n.). Where the word occurs in 1 and 2 K, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether it bears its proper or its derived sense. Herodotus (viii. 105) says that . . . barbarians eunuchs are more valued than others on account of their perfect fidelity, and instances the case of Heimonius, who was highly esteemed by Xerxes. Xenophon (Cyrop. v. 3. 6) . . . giving the reasons why Cyrus employed them, alludes to the alleged fact that their having no domestic ties rendered them capable of peculiar devotion to the interests of their masters, and of gratitude to those who conferred honour and consideration upon them. They also naturally adhered to one able to protect them, as they found themselves objects of contempt to other men. He denies the allegation that they are lacking in vigour and excellent qualities, and illustrates their tendencies by the case of 'dogs,' which, when castrated, cease to desert their masters, but are not at all less fitted for watching and the chase.

The Law of Dt 23<sup>1</sup> (cf. Lv 22<sup>3</sup>), attaches a religious stigma to the condition. (See, for the prob. ground of this, Driver on Dt 23<sup>1</sup>). The prohibition in 1 S 8<sup>1</sup> was designed to intimate the degradation of the national life consequent upon the establishment of the kingdom through the adoption of unsanctioned gentile customs. Acc. to Herodotus (vi. 32), the Persians made eunuchs of the goodliest of the youth of captured countries; but as to whether Daniel and his companions were thus treated by the Bab. conquerors, no absolutely certain conclusions can be reached (cf. 2 K 20<sup>7-18</sup>). Eunuchs were in the courts of the Herods in our Lord's time (Jos. Ant. xv. vii. 4; xvi. viii. 1); hence His allusion to them (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>) as familiar to His hearers. See ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.

G. WALKER.

EUODIA, AV Euodias (Εὐδία, fem. form of Eὐδίας). Both names are found in Gr. literature and on the inscriptions. The Euodias of AV seems to have arisen from a mistake of the translators, who took Eὐδίας for the accusative of the masculine form Eὐδίας, and regarded it as the name of a man.—A Christian woman of Philippi, whom the Apostle Paul beseeches 'to be of the same mind in the Lord' with another Christian woman named Syntyche (Ph 4<sup>2</sup>). They may have been deaconesses, or women of some position in whose houses the brethren were accustomed to meet. The language of St. Paul suggests a religious difference rather than a private quarrel (Ph 2<sup>2</sup>). They may have represented different types of piety, or may have differed on some question of church life. St. Paul begs a certain Syzgyus, or, as some critics think, an unnamed 'true yoke-fellow,' to help forward the work of reconciliation, being mindful of the former services of these women to the cause of the gospel (Ph 4<sup>3</sup>). The theory of Baur, Schwegler, and Volkmar, that Euodia and Syntyche are symmetrical names for Jewish and Gentile Christianity, is now generally abandoned. A mode of speaking so mysterious is out of harmony with the general tenor of the Epistle. J. GIBB.

EUPATOR (Εὐπάτωρ, 1 Mac 6<sup>17</sup> etc., 2 Mac 2<sup>20</sup> etc.), the surname of Antiochus v., son and successor of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. See ANTI-IOCHUS V.

EUPHRATES (ἡρ, Εὐφράτης).—The Euphrates was called Pura-nun, 'the great water,' or simply Pura, 'the water,' in Sumerian, the pre-Semitic language of Chaldea (cf. Gn 15<sup>18</sup>). From this the Semitic Pur or Purattu with the Heb. Perath, the Old Persian Ufrātu, where the prosthetic u was explained as the word u, 'good,' and so gave rise to the Greek Euphrates. In the OT it is generally known as 'the river' (e.g. Dt 11<sup>24</sup>, Ex 23<sup>31</sup>), it being the largest and most notable river of Western Asia, and accordingly in Gn 2<sup>14</sup> alone of the rivers of Paradise no geographical description is given of it.* In Babylonia it was also called 'the river of Sippara' as well as the Urattu, a dialectical form of Purattu.

The Euphrates (Arab. Frat) has two sources, one of which was called the Euphrates in antiquity; in Armenian, Yephra; while the other, which rises to the south-east, the modern Murād-Su, was termed the Arsanias, Arm. Aradzani, Arzan in the Assyrian inscriptions. They rise in two valleys of Armenia, from 6000 to 6500 feet high, the one in the Anti-Taurus, the other in Mount Ararat, and unite near Ma'atich (Melitēnē, Assyrian Melid) in a valley about 2000 feet high, whence they flow eastward in a narrow gorge toward Syria. From there to the alluvial plain of Babylonia the river is about 1000 feet in 700 miles, so that it is navigable only down stream. The high road from east to west passed it in OT times at Birtu (Birejik) and Carchemish (Jerab's). There was another 'river' at Thapsakos, the Tiphshah of 1 K 4<sup>24</sup>. The river flows to the south of Carchemish was Pethor (Assyrian Pitru), on the western bank at the junction of the Euphrates with the Sajur (Assyrian Sagura). Still farther south, but on the eastern bank, it was joined by the Belikh (Assyrian Balikh) and Khabur (Assyrian Khabur), which came from the land of Gozan (Assyrian Guzanu, 2 K 17<sup>6</sup>). At the mouth of the Khabur was Circesium (now Karkisia, Assyrian Sirki). After this the Euphrates receives no more affluents; but northward of Sippara or Sepharvaim it approaches the Tigris very nearly, and by its meandering forms the plain of Babylonia. The Tigris and Tigris now unite before falling into the sea, owing to the accumulation of silt at the head of the Persian Gulf, but in OT times they still entered the sea by separate mouths. The water of the Euphrates was dissipated over Babylonia by means of canals for the purposes of irrigation, and at its mouth were great salt marshes, called Marratu by the Babylonians (see Jer 50<sup>21</sup>). Here lived the Kaldā or Chaldeans, with their capital Bit-Yakin, of which Merodach-baladan was king.

* It is disputed whether Jer 13<sup>47</sup> really refers to the Euphrates see Ewald, ad loc.

LITERATURE.—Frd. Delitzsch, Paradies, 1691; Schrader, KATZ 341; Chesney, Euphrates Exped. vol. i.; Loftus, Excavations at Nineveh; Layard, Nin. and Bab. chs. xxi.-xxxi.; P. A. H. SAYCE.

EUPOLEMUS (Εὐπόλεμος), the son of John, the son of Accos, one of the ambassadors sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus, after his victory over Nicanor, in order to conclude an alliance between the Romans and the Jews in B.C. 161 (1 Mac 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Mac 4<sup>11</sup>, comp. Jos. Ant. xii. x. 6). Eupolemus has often been identified with the author of a history of the Jews, written in Greek, which is quoted by Alexander Polyhistor, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 23), and Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix. 30-34). Since the historian Eupolemus seems to have written about B.C. 157, and was almost certainly a Jew, this identification may be correct (comp. Schurer, HJP ii. iii. 203 ff.).

H. A. WHITE.

EURACILO.—The word is the reading adopted at Ac 27<sup>14</sup> by WH and the RV, instead of Euroclydon in the TR and AV, as the name of the wind, which, suddenly descending from the heights of Crete on St. Paul's ship as it was sailing closely along the shore, seized it and drove it before the storm, which ended in the shipwreck on Melita. St. Luke describes the wind as, in character, 'typhonic' (RV 'tempestuous'), that is, marked by sudden eddying squalls, as Luke says of them, adding that 'every one who has any experience of sailing on lakes or bays overhung by mountains will appreciate the epithet "typhonic" which Luke uses' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 326), and by way of greater exactness adds its nautical name, 'which is called' (ὁ καλούμενος). Unhappily, the state of the text leaves the precise name doubtful. A summary of the various readings will be found in Sanday, Appendices ad NT, p. 140. The great mass of later testimony yields 'Euroclydon'; the oldest uncials A<sup>1</sup> have ευρακίλων, and this was probably the reading of B<sup>1</sup>. To B<sup>1</sup> appear to be due the superimposed T and A which appear in this MS (ΕΤΡΑΚΑΤΑΝ). B<sup>3</sup> then either turned A into Δ, or, if it was done by B<sup>3</sup>, patched up the letter afresh. Vercellone-Cozza in the appendix to their facsimile say 'ευρακίλων B<sup>1</sup>, ευρυκλύδων B<sup>3</sup>'. The Vulg. Cassiod. give Euro-aquilo. Apart from ampler attestation, Euroclydon may claim a preference as the more difficult reading, by positing which we may explain the others as emendations, but hardly the converse. The word in this form is not found anywhere else. The compound is obscure. It would mean 'a surge raised by the wind' or S.E. wind, but such a description of the effect could hardly be applied to the wind itself which caused it. If we should take the form εὐρακύλων (which occurs in B<sup>2</sup>, one or two cursives, and a gloss of the Etym. M. s.v. τυφών, and is also found by Griesb.) and derive it from εὐρύς, it could mean 'a wind raising a broad surge or surf'; but besides its lack of attestation, it is for the very reason of its greater suitability dismissed by Meyer as an obvious correction; and it would yield a character more or less applicable to any wind blowing strongly rather than such a note (e.g. of direction, as we might expect to be the basis of a distinctive nautical name. Euraquilo, on the other hand, commends itself not only by its early attestation, but by its special precision, as made up of Eurus the S.E. or rather (as Smith adduces strong reasons for holding) the E., and Aquilo the N.E., wind, fitly expressing the direction E.N.E. whence this wind blew. It well accords (a) with the narrative of the incidence and effects of the storm, and (b) with the experience of navigators in the Levant, quoted by Smith and others, in which 'southerly winds almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind.' The exception taken to the form as 'inadmissible' (Reuss and others), 'because it is composed of a Greek and a Latin element,' vanishes in presence of analogous compounds such as Euronotus and Euroaster, and of the probably mixed nationality of the sailors and traders to whom such coinages were primarily due; to say nothing of the survival, to which Renan calls attention, of the word Euraquilo itself in the name Gregolia given to the same wind by the Levantines 'as Euripus has become Egripou.' Following strict analogy, we might expect the word to be, as in the V and the presence of a less regular form led to conjectural emendation (Overbeck); but we can hardly see how this should have deviated into so enigmatic a word as Euroclydon. Meyer says, 'Far more naturally would the converse take place, and the Εὐρακύλων, not being understood, would be displaced by the similar Εὐρακύνων . . . so that the latter form remains a product of old emendatory conjecture'—a curious anticipation, in this particular case, of the theory more recently formulated by Burgon and Miller as to the older witnesses whom they designate 'the licentious scribes of the West.' For them (Causes of the Corruption of the Traditional Text, p. 46 f.) this passage supplies a signal confirmation of their view, leading them to denounce in strong language Euraquilo as 'an imaginary name,' 'an impossible Latin name,' 'utterly missing the point, which is the violence of the wind as expressed in the term Euroclydon' (a remarkable begging of the question, where the violence of the wind had already been explicitly affirmed in the epithet 'typhonic'). Why should these early copyists be thus severely blamed for suspecting some corruption to underlie the anomalous Euroclydon, and preferring the more intelligible Euraquilo on such grounds of internal probability as have since commended it to the majority of critics and commentators? But when we consider the mass of testimony on the side of Euroclydon, and the difficulty of accounting for the emergence of this form, if it had not been original, may we not find a feasible key to the solution of the problem in the view put forward by Conybeare and Howson (ii. p. 402 n.): 'The addition of the words ὁ καλούμενος seems to us to show that it was a name popularly given by the sailors to the wind; and nothing is more natural than that St. Luke should use the word which he heard the sailors employ on the occasion?'

LITERATURE.—The subject is discussed in the 'Lives of St. Paul' by Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, and others; at considerable length, but with unequal relevancy, by Falconer, Diss. on St. Paul's Voyage, 2nd ed. pp. 12-19, 24-26, most fully and satisfactorily by Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, in his 'Diss. on the wind Euroclydon,' p. 119 ff., and by Bentley and Granville Penn, pp. 287-292; and by William P. Dickson.

EUTYCHUS (Εὐτυχός).—When St. Paul was at Troas on his final journey to Jerus., on the first day of the week he and his party, with the Christians of the place, assembled in an upper room to break bread. As St. Paul was leaving the next morning, his speech was lengthy, and a young man of the name of Eutychus, who was sitting at the window (ἐπὶ τῆς ᾠκίας), fell asleep (perhaps owing to the heat of the many lamps that were lit) and, falling down from the third storey, was killed dead (ἤρθη νεκρός). St. Paul went down and embraced him, and bade them not trouble themselves, as his life was yet in him. Then he went upstairs, broke bread, and continued talking until the morning. As they departed the young man was brought to them alive (Ac 20<sup>7-12</sup>).

The incident occurs in the 'we' section of the Ac and is clearly authentic, but two opinions are held. It has been pointed out that it may be capable of a perfectly natural explanation, and it is suggested that it illustrates the growth of mythical stories on a basis of fact, and has been introduced here as a parallel incident to that related concerning Peter (9<sup>36-43</sup>). But Ramsay points out that St. Luke's language is very precise; that he does not, as in 14<sup>9</sup>, merely state that E. was thought to be dead, and that weight must be attached to his medical knowledge. Even if this be (as is perhaps the case) a somewhat unnatural strain on the words, it is a fact that the story was related as an instance of the exhibition of power by the apostle, and that the writer, who was an eye-witness, believed it to be such.

LITERATURE.—Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 290; Holtzmann, Handbuch, p. 402; Zeller, Acts, ii. p. 62, Eng. tr.

A. C. HEADLAM.

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής,—'a preacher of good news,' the substantive of εὐαγγελίζω—or εὐαγγελίζομαι, the commoner bibl. form). The verb is used in bibl. Gr. occasionally in the general sense of class. Gr. (1 S 31<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>1</sup>), and, when specialized, stands for the work of Gospel preachers of all kinds: the subst., however—which is rare, and entirely sacred and eccles., occurring in bibl. Gr. only in Ac 21<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>—is confined strictly to the Christian good tidings, and, in the Ac, to a particular office or function (see 11<sup>19</sup>, 13<sup>1</sup>, 15<sup>8</sup>). The clearest evidence for the distinctness of office or function lies in Eph 4<sup>11</sup> '[Christ] gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers.' It is true that, in the list at 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, evangelists are omitted (also ἐπισκοποι and διακονοί); but there the point is, perhaps, to illustrate spiritual aptitude rather than to give an exhaustive list of eccles. offices. When a similar omission occurs, Ro 12<sup>8-9</sup>, St. Paul seems bent chiefly on distinguishing certain charismata, being content to leave the calling of evangelists to be accounted for the omissions. But in Eph the context suggests that the writer desires to mention all the principal offices, whereby Christ had provided for the spiritual edification of the Church universal, and εὐαγγελιστής appears to come third in order of institution and of spiritual significance. At the same time it is noticeable that we do not find the word (even in places where it might naturally be looked for) in any of the Pauline Epistles whose genuineness meets with most general acceptance. Evangelists will be made to the passage in 2 Ti 4<sup>6</sup>; it will be sufficient here to say that the phrase ἔργον πόλιν εὐαγγελιστοῦ, 'do the work of an evangelist', marked and peculiar to be interpreted as merely equivalent to 'preach'.

The third and last instance—that in Ac 21<sup>8</sup> (a verse in one of the 'we' passages), 'we came unto Cæsarea; and entering into the house of Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven, we abode with him'—must be compared with Ac 8<sup>4-6</sup>, where it is said that among those who were scattered from Jerus. after the martyrdom of Stephen, and went thither and thither preaching the word, Philip preached the Christ at Samaria, without being qualified (v. 14<sup>1</sup>) to impart the Holy Spirit; was sent by the Spirit to teach the Ethiopian eunuch in the desert between Jerus. and Gaza; was afterwards carried off by the Spirit and found at Azotus; and, finally, having evangelized 'all the cities' in his route, took up his abode at Cæsarea. He may therefore have been called εὐαγγελιστής, not because he had been definitely set apart for the office, but because of the missionary work he had done and was perhaps still doing with Cæsarea as centre. He had, in fact, been set apart for something else, 'to serve tables' (Ac 6<sup>1-6</sup>, 21<sup>8</sup>), but had superadded, and possibly, in the end, substituted, the work of a missionary, because he was, like Stephen, 'full of the Holy Ghost' (Ac 6<sup>3</sup>), and possessed the charisma for the work of preaching to those who had not heard the Gospel before.

The three passages, as above discussed and illustrated, suggest the following conclusions: (1) The evangelists were inferior to the apostles. They are placed third in order in Eph; Philip was unable to impart the Holy Spirit to the Samaritans; Timothy was the assistant and delegate of St. Paul. Constant with this conclusion is the epigram of Pseudo-Jerome (in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) 'omnis apostolus evangelista, non omnis evangelista apostolus.' (2) They were travelling missionaries, preaching the Gospel to those unacquainted with it, yet sometimes with a settled place of abode, as Philip at Cæsarea, and Timothy at Ephesus. Thus they were officers acting for the whole Christian community, not for a single church only. Their function could be general, covering wide districts, or it could be, in practice, local and circumscribed. Thus Theodoret's apparently contradictory statements can be reconciled: περιὸντες ἐκίρουν, yet μη περιὸντες πανταχοῦ. 'Going about they used to preach,' yet 'not going about everywhere' (as apostles might do). (3) They were charismatically endowed. Compare the influence of the Holy Spirit upon Philip, and the χάρισμα of Timothy (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). Yet the revelations to the prophet and apostle were of a higher and more striking order. The apostles were fitted to be the direct authoritative representatives of Christ (Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, Gal 4<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>23</sup>); the prophets to sway the heart and conscience by the demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Co 14<sup>1-5</sup>); the evangelists were more 'matter-of-fact men,' preaching the word, communicating the facts of the Gospel, paving the way for the more systematic work of the pastors and teachers (see order in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) who watched over and trained the churches when founded (2 Ti 4<sup>2-3</sup>). But while this may suffice for a distinction in work, it must not be taken as exclusive, so that apostles could not be prophets, or that apostles and prophets could not be evangelists, or that evangelists could not be pastors or teachers, or both. In the floating constitution of the half-organized early Church, different kinds of work were amalgamated (as must always happen) according to qualifications and circumstances (cf 1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>, Ac 8<sup>2</sup>, and the mixed instructions to Timothy and Titus). (4) They were, sometimes at any rate, solemnly set apart for the special function. Thus Timothy (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>); and probably Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13<sup>3</sup>) were (so far as the Church was concerned) set apart, in the first instance, not as apostles, but as evangelists from among the 'prophets and teachers' at Antioch.

But we are still left in much uncertainty as to the exact position of the εὐαγγελιστής, and this uncertainty is increased rather than diminished by the contributions of later literature to the subject. Why, for instance, is there no mention of evangelists in the Apostolic Fathers? Because, says Harnack, there was no definite primitive distinction between apostle and evangelist, and in the Didaché the 'apostles' are just evangelists. But why should not evangelist have survived, and apostle have been reserved (as in later days) for the first direct representatives of Christ? And, further, when in the Didaché the 'apostles' are forbidden to stay more than two days in the same place, can we regard them as parallels to Paul, or Philip, or Timothy? In a letter to the last named such a restriction is condemned (1 Ti 5<sup>13</sup>). Of course the strict injunction in the Didaché may be due to the opportunities afforded upon the journey of well-to-do missionaries, and the missionaries referred to in 1 Ti may have been caricatures of the evangelist type; but the difference is striking. A partial reply to the former question may be that the extension of the apostolate beyond the Twelve and St. Paul (an extension obtainable in the apostolic age itself) soon became a less familiar and less dignified name of evangelist. This, however, scarcely accounts for the speedy and growing exclusiveness of the apostolic title; or for the fact that Eusebius recognizes in Pantænus the evangelist a type of an old order still largely surviving in the days of the Alexandrian, but not common in his own days (Eus. HE v. 10).

The material Eusebius affords us on this subject, though to some extent unhistorical, throws back light on the primitive use of the term evangelist. He tells how Pantænus found that his arrival in India had been anticipated by the written Gospel of Matthew; he tells how Thaddæus, one of the Seventy, had been sent by the Apostle Thomas, under divine impulse, to Edessa, as a preacher and evangelist of the teaching of Christ (HE i. 13), and this 'teaching' (also called 'the seed of the word of God') is the story of Jesus (S. 19). We may combine these hints with the fact that Eusebius (leaving the rest unmentioned) records 'the names of those [evangelists] only who have transmitted the apostolic doctrine to us in writings still extant'; that Theodoret definitely restricted the name to this class; that, finally, Clement and Chrysostom confined the name to the writers of the Four Gospels; and that εὐαγγελιστής became (in the Didaché and Ordinances, Harnack, Texte, ii. 5) an appellation of the ἀναγνώστης, the reader of the Gospel for the day, who had also to be διδάσκων, capable of explaining it. We may further recall that Philip interpreted the prophet Isaiah to the eunuch; that Apollos (probably an evangelist) was mighty in the Scriptures; that he had been taught the way of the Lord more perfectly by Aquila and Priscilla (probably evangelists also, as Theophylact believes); that Timothy the evangelist was strong in the Scriptures, one of the reasons doubtless for his choice; that Paul was set on to Timothy the 'deposit' of the Gospel he had received from Christ, exhorts him to keep the original model of sound words, and reminds him of the word that is trust-to everich * of you.' Cf. also Ex 35<sup>10</sup> 'every wise hearted among you.'

Trench (On the Auth. Ver. of NT, p. 63) points out that both 'each' and 'every' take occasionally plu. concord, as Ph 2<sup>3</sup> 'Let each esteem other better than themselves'; Rev 20<sup>13</sup> 'They were judged every man according to their works.' He adds, "'each' and 'every,' though alike implying 'all,' are really different many into its units, and refer to it in 'each' as distinct parts, with only the difference that 'each' segregates, and 'every' aggregates, the units which comprise it."

J. HASTINGS.

EVI (אֵי 'desire' (?)).—One of the five kings of Midian slain, Nu 31<sup>8</sup>, Jos 13<sup>21</sup> (Eli) P.

EVIDENCE, EVIDENTLY.—עֵוִד (מִן 'book') by 'evidence' in Jer 32<sup>10</sup>, 11, 12, 14, 16, 44. The meaning is 'title-deeds.' Coke (1623) says, "עֵוִד is a word without seale, as Court Rolles, Accounts, and the like . . . are called Evidences." RV gives 'deed' throughout. Cf. T. Adams, II Peter, p. 23 (on 1<sup>2</sup>), 'Therefore a man should be often perusing and looking over his own evidence, as we review our assurances of worldly possessions, that he may be sure of the whole and every part of it: for it is dangerous to have any flaw or defect in our conveyance of salvation.'

'Evidence' is also the tr. of εἰργος in its single occurrence in NT, He 11<sup>1</sup> (RV 'proving,' Rm 'test') 'Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' This is the Bishops' tr., Wyclif having 'an argument of thingis not aperynge,' Tind. 'a certayntie of thinges which are not sene,' Gen. 'sheweth evidently the things which are not sene.'

'Evidently' is the tr. of φανερός, Ac 10<sup>3</sup> 'He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day an angel of God coming in to him' (RV 'openly'); and of the prep. προφανῶς, Gal 3<sup>1</sup> 'before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified' (RV 'openly'). In both places 'evidently' has the obsol. meaning of 'clearly,' 'distinctly,' as in Knox, Hist. 261, 'And lest that your Honors should doubt in any of these premises, we offer ourselves evidently to prove, That,' etc. J. HASTINGS.

EVIL.—This word is likely to become obsolete except in the theological sense of the doctrine of evil (for which see SIN).† In AV it is freely used as subst., adj., and adverb. 1. As subst., often in immed. antithesis to 'good,' as Gn 29 'the tree of knowledge (RV 'the knowledge') of good and evil' (עֵץ הַיָּדְעַת); 2 Es 2<sup>14</sup> 'I have broken the evil in pieces, and created the good' (malum et . . . bonum): sometimes in the plu., as Pr 14<sup>19</sup> 'The evil bow before the good' (רָעָה לִפְנֵי טוֹבָה); 2. As adj. 'evil' is applied, not only to things, but even to persons, a usage now quite obsolete; thus Jer 12<sup>13</sup> 'all mine evil neighbours.' Cf. Knox, Hist.

* 'Every' is 'ever each'; the above example shows it in process of formation; and the two words are often practically interchangeable, as Milton, Comus, 811—

'I know each lane and every alley green.'

† The loss of 'evil' seems to be the result of a discrimination in words with cognate meaning. The AV used 'evil,' 'bad,' 'naughty,' quite indiscriminately. Thus in Jer 24<sup>2, 3</sup> 'the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad . . . the good figs, very good; and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.' This goes farther in the way of variety than the earlier versions by introducing 'bad.' The Heb. is the same throughout, and RV gives 'bad' throughout.

In Mt 21<sup>44</sup> the AV has followed the Bishops' 'he will miserably destroy those wicked men,' and has thus lost the force of the Greek (καταστρέψω καὶ τὸν οἶκον αὐτῶν). Tindale is no better, 'He will cruelly destroy those evil persons.' But Wyclif, 'He schal lese (=destroy) yuel the yuele men'; Rheims, 'The naughty men he will bring to naught'; and RV 'He will miserably destroy those miserable men,' all give the repetition its advantage.

283, 'He had a very evil woman to his wife.' For 'evil spirit' (Lk 7<sup>21</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Ac 19<sup>12</sup>, 13, 15, 16) see DEMON. In Mt 5<sup>37</sup> 6<sup>13</sup> RV prefers 'the evil one' to AV 'the evil,' and in 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup> for AV 'wickedness': see DEMON, and consult Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision, pp. 269–323; Chase, Lord's Prayer in Early Church ('Texts and Studies,' i. iii.), pp. 71–167. The 'evil eye' is a Heb. expression for ENVY (which see). 3. As adv. chiefly in the phrase 'evil entreat' (Ex 5<sup>22</sup>, Dt 26<sup>8</sup>, Job 24<sup>21</sup>, To 10<sup>12</sup>, Sir 7<sup>20</sup> 33<sup>31</sup>, Ac 7<sup>8</sup>): the other phrases are 'went evil with' (1 Ch 7<sup>23</sup>); 'evil affected' (Ad. Est 13<sup>5</sup>, Ac 14<sup>2</sup>); 'evil spoken of' (Sir 38<sup>17</sup>, Ro 14<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>30</sup>); 'fare evil' (Sir 3<sup>26</sup>). Cf. Grindal, Letter to Q. Eliz. (Parker Soc. ed. p. 381) 'Much like to the Popish Bishops in your father's time, who would have had the English translation of the Bible called in, as evil translated; and the new translating thereof to have been committed to themselves; which they never intended to perform.'

Evilfavouredness.—See FAVOUR.

J. HASTINGS.

EVIL-MERODACH (אֵיל מֶרֶדַּח) was the son and successor of the great Nebuchadrezzar on the throne of Babylon. According to 2 K 25<sup>27–30</sup>, he promoted the captive king of Jerus., Jehoiachin, in the 37th year of his captivity, set his throne above the thrones of the kings who were with him in prison, changed his prison garments, and made him a guest at the royal table to the end of his life. The Sept. reads Εὐλάμαρδοκός, and Berosus Ἀμύλμαρδοκος. The cuneiform equivalent of his name is Amēl (Avēl)-Maruduk (cf. Haupt in Zeitsch. f. Assyriol. ii. 266 and 234 f.), 'man (servant) of Merodach.' According to Berosus, he administered the kingdom during his two years' reign (562–560) with wanton unrestraint. Tele (Bab.-Assyr. Ges. pp. 437, 464) concludes, on the basis of this character of E.-M., that the benevolent act towards Jehoiachin should be attributed to his successor on the throne of Babylon. Yet none of his annals, though the tablets date from his reign. In the year 560 his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (Nergal-sar-usur, 'Nergal preserve the king'), in a conspiracy, slew him and seized the throne.

LITERATURE.—Meyer, Gesch. d. Alterthums, vol. i. p. 597; Delitzsch, Ueb. Lang. p. 12; Boscawen, Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch. vol. vi. p. 1 ff.; and authorities above cited.

IRA M. PRICE.

EVIL SPEAKING.—See SLANDER. EVIL SPIRIT.—See DEMON.

EXACT.—1. The adj., only Sir 51<sup>19</sup> 'In my doings I was exact' (ἐν ποιήσει μου διεκριβησάμην A, but B has ἐν ποιήσει λιμοῦ διεκριβασάμην, 'in the doing of hunger (?) I was exact'; Fritzsche suggests, and most edd. adopt, νόμου, 'in the doing of the law'). Here 'exact' means 'strict,' 'particular,' as Shaks. Troil. and Cres. iv. v. 232—

'Now, Hector, I have fed mine eyes on thee;
I have with exact view perused thee, Hector,' and Herbert, The Temple: 'Faith,' l. 43—

'What though my bodie runne to dust?
Faith cleaves unto it, counting every grain
With an exact and most particular trust,
Reserving all for flesh again.'

2. As verb frequently. Notice Ps 89<sup>22</sup> 'The enemy shall not exact upon him' (לֹא יִשְׁאָל עָלָיו), Rm 'do him violence': the mod. phrase is 'impose exactions upon.' Cf. Burnet (1687), Trav. ii. 86, 'Innkeepers think they have a right to exact upon Strangers.'

In Lk 3<sup>13</sup> RV has changed 'Exact no more than that which is appointed you,' into 'Exhort no more,' etc. But 'exact' was surely strong enough; were they permitted to extort anything? Tind. has 'require.' Following the Vulg. faciatis, Wyclif has 'do ye no more,' and Rheims 'Do nothing more,' which seems a natural reply to 'What shall we do?' But the Greek verbs are not the same, Τί οὐ ποιῶμεν (TR ποιῶμεν) and Μηδὲ . . .

The practice of excommunication as we find it among the Jews in the time of Christ is the outgrowth of the hērem in the first of these senses. In the early history of Israel the punishment of idolatry or other gross sins was physical death. Thus we find the prophets referring to the future triumph of Israel over their enemies as the wholesale devotion of them to destruction by J<sup>r</sup> (so Is 34<sup>2-5</sup>, Mic 4<sup>13</sup>, Jer 50<sup>21</sup>), and Zech. looks forward to the happy time in the future when there shall be no more 'ban' (14<sup>11</sup>). Temporary exclusion from the services of the sanctuary meets us only, in the case of ceremonial offences, as part of the general requirement of the ceremonial law. At the time of the Restoration we find a modification of the older practice in the interest of greater humanity. Those Isr. who had married foreign wives, and who refused at the command of Ezra to give them up, instead of being put to death had their substance confiscated, and were separated from the congregation of Israel (Ezr 10<sup>8</sup>). In the time of Christ, exclusion from the synagogue was the regular punishment for serious moral and religious offences, and is distinguished by the Rabbis as hērem proper, the formal 'ban,' which could be inflicted by not fewer than ten persons, and which deprived him on whom it fell of all religious . . . the milder niddah (נִדְּהָ), which . . . by a single person, and which merely cut off him who suffered it from conversation and contact for a period of thirty days. For a supposed third grade, the so-called shammāthā (שַׁמְתָּה), there seems to be no good authority.

The origin of Christian excommunication is often found in Christ's words to Peter (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.' (Cf. Mt 18<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>.) But, whatever the view taken of this much disputed . . . reference seems to be rather to the . . . which the Church is to exercise . . . preaching and witness-bearing than to . . . ecclesiastical procedure. The . . . comes nearer to the mark, . . . threefold admonition, first privately, then in the presence of two or three witnesses (cf. Tit 3<sup>10</sup>), and finally before the Church, reminds us somewhat of the . . . of the Jewish synagogue. Hence . . . lieve th . . . direct utterance of Jesus . . . in the Jewish-Christian circles for which the Gospel of Matthew was written.

In the letters of St. Paul, besides general directions to 'admonish the disorderly' (1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>; cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>20</sup>), and to hold aloof from brothers who are fornicators, or covetous, or idolaters, or revilers, or drunkards, or extortioners (1 Co 5<sup>11</sup>), or who refuse to obey the word of St. Paul by his letters (2 Th 3<sup>14</sup>; cf. Ro 16<sup>17</sup>), we have in the Church of Corinth at least one case, and possibly two cases, of ecclesiastical discipline. The first is that of the incestuous person, referred to in 1 Co 5, whom St. Paul delivers unto Satan 'for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus' (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). The reference in v. 4 to the Corinthians as being gathered together, shows that whatever the exact nature of the punishment described as committing unto Satan, it had ecclesiastical significance. In v. 13 the Corinthians are expressly charged to put away the wicked man from among themselves. If 2 Co 2<sup>6-11</sup> refer, as is most commonly supposed, to this same matter, it would follow that the exclusion from church fellowship was not permanent. 'Sufficient to such a one is this punishment, which was inflicted by the many; so that contrariwise ye should rather forgive him and comfort him, lest by any means such a one should be swallowed up by his overmuch sorrow' (vv. 6, 7). If, however, as . . . pa- sage refers to an entirely mentioned in 1 Co, we have a case of discipline administered by the Corinthians themselves without special instigation by St. Paul. Interesting and perplexing is the mention of Satan in 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup> (cf. 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup> 'that no advantage may be gained over us by Satan'; 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup> 'Hymenæus and Alexander, whom I delivered unto Satan that they might be taught not to blaspheme'). That St. Paul does not mean by the expression 'I deliver unto Satan' a final cutting off from fellowship, such as seems to be implied in the anathema of 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8, 9</sup>, Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, is clear from the reference in v. 5 to the salvation of the spirit. On the other hand, that some suffering besides the formal exclusion from church fellowship is intended, seems equally clear from the reference to the destruction of the flesh. Hence the conjecture of some physical punishment miraculously inflicted upon the offender, possibly, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, death itself. But the matter is too obscure to warrant a definite conclusion.

The Corinthian letters picture a loose organization, without formal officers, in which discipline is administered, now by the Corinthians, now by St. Paul himself. There is no definite rule of procedure. The general principle is laid down in 1 Co 5<sup>8-12</sup>, . . . application is made acc. to the circumstances of each case. In the Pastorals we have already a definite mode of procedure, with its public reproof, and its accusation before witnesses (1 Ti 5<sup>19, 20</sup>). Not moral offences only, but a schismatic spirit may be the occasion for exclusion from church fellowship (Tit 3<sup>10</sup> 'A man that is heretical [i.e. 'factions'] after a first and second admonition, refuse.' Cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>, and esp. 2 Jn v. 10, where false doctrine is made the ground for absolute breach of intercourse). That excommunication might be inflicted by a faction, as well as by the Church at large, is clear from the case of Diotrephes (3 Jn 9, 10). These later instances show that excommunication was not merely disciplinary, having as its end the punishment . . . of the offender, but . . . to guard the infant . . . In no case, however, is it regarded as consigning the person cut off to eternal punishment, as later theories have sometimes held. That was the work of God alone, with which man had nothing to do. In general, this brief survey of the NT passages shows that we have to do only with the first . . . from which the later ecclesiastical . . . with its elaborate process, was developed in this matter, as in so many others of interest, the development was a gradual one, a part of that slow process by which the flexibility of early Christian institutions was gradually transformed into the fixed rules of a powerful ecclesiastical organization.

LITERATURE.—The art in Smith, DB<sup>2</sup>, by F. Meyrick, unchanged; and Herzog, RE<sup>2</sup> 'Bann bei den Hebräern,' by Itzisch, where the older literature is given. For the practice among the Jews, see 'Dowar', Heb. Archæol.; and Benzinger, Heb. Archæol. On the case of the Corinthian offender, cf. Weizsäcker, Das 1. Korinther Brief, 2<sup>a</sup> ed., discussion of NT passages in the appendixes.

W. ADAMS BROWN.

EXECUTIONER.—Mk 6<sup>27</sup> AV, of the officer sent by Herod to behead John the Baptist, RV 'a soldier of his guard.' The Gr. word σπεκουδῶν is a transliteration of Lat. speculator, and the speculatores were originally scouts or spies (speculator, to watch), and then the police or bodyguard of the Roman emperors and military . . . (The word is fully discussed in 1 . . . , 505 f.)

Buldering was a Roman, not a Jewish punishment. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. J. HASTINGS.

EXERCISE.—As a verb: 1. The primary meaning is to occupy oneself with, engage in, Ps 131: 'Neither do I exercise myself in great matters' (נִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, lit. 'neither do I walk,' as RVm); Sir 50<sup>23</sup> 'Blessed is he that shall be exercised in these things' (ἀναστροφῆσεται); 2 Es 15<sup>8</sup> 'those things in which they wickedly exercised themselves' (quæ inique exercent, RV 'which they wickedly practise'). Cf. Pref. to AV 1811, 'in Latine we have been exercised almost from our verie cradle.' 2. To put into practice, bring into use, as Knox (Works, ed. Laing, iv. 135), 'Even such, deare brethren, is the blessed Evangelic of our Lord Jesus; for the more that he is entered, the more comfortable and puissant is it to such as do heare, reade, or exercise the same'; or as Dunbar (The Thiristill and the Rois, 16) uses exerce, the obsolete form of the verb, direct from exercere—

'Exerce justice with mercy and conscience.'

So Rev 13<sup>2</sup> 'he exerciseth all the power of the first beast' (ποιεῖ); Jer 9<sup>24</sup> 'I am the LORD, which exercise lovingkindness' (עָשָׂה 'doing'); To 12<sup>9</sup> 'Those that exercise arms and righteousness shall be filled with life' (ποιούσιντες); Ezk 22<sup>29</sup> 'The people of the land have used . . . and exercised robbery' (עָשָׂה וְשָׁדָד); was requisite that upon them exercising tyranny should come penalty' (ἐκείνοις τυραννοῦσι, RV 'in their tyrannous dealing'); and the passage in the Synoptics, Mt 20<sup>25</sup>, Mk 10<sup>42</sup>, Lk 22<sup>25</sup>, where κατακυριεύω (Lk κυριεύω) and κατεξουσιάζω (Lk ἐξουσιάζω) are translated in AV 'exercise dominion' and 'exercise authority' in Mt, 'e. lordship' and 'e. authority' in Mk and Lk; RV gives 'lord it' for κατακ, and 'e. authority' for κατεξ. in Mt and Mk, 'have lordship' and 'have authority' in Lk. 3. To practise for training or discipline. Ac 24<sup>16</sup> 'And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man' (ἀσκήω); 1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> 'exercise thyself unto godliness' (γυμνάζω); so He 5<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>14</sup>; 1 Mac 6<sup>30</sup> 'elephants exercised in battle' (εὐδότες πόλεμον, RV 'trained for war'); 2 Mac 15<sup>12</sup> 'exercised from a child in all points of virtue' (ἐκμεμελησ-ηκότα). 4. All those meanings belong to the Lat. exercere, and the influence of the Vulg. is conspicuous throughout. There are even two examples of 'exercise' in the sense of 'allot', 'torment', which also belongs to exercere; Ec 1<sup>13</sup> 'this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith,' and 3<sup>10</sup>. The Heb. is עָשָׂה, 'to be bowed down.' Cf. Fuller, Holy Warre (ed. 1640, p. 155), 'they had to do with Meladine King of Egypt, who lay besides them, . . . exercising the Christians with continual skirmishes.' Milton has the same sense in Par. Lost, ii. 89—

'Where pain of unextinguishable fire Must exercise us without hope of end'; and Par. Reg. i. 156—

'But first I mean,
To exercise him in the wilderness.'

As a subst.: 1. Wis 8<sup>18</sup> 'in the exercise of conference with her, prudence' (ἐν συγγυμνασίᾳ διμίας, RV 'assiduous communing,' RVm 'practice of communion'); 1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup> 'bodily exercise profiteth little' (σωματικὴ γυμνασία). 2. In 1 Mac 1<sup>24</sup> and 2 Mac 4<sup>9</sup> the complaint is made that a Greek 'place of exercise' had been erected in Jerusalem. The Gr. is γυμνάσιον. See GAMES. In 2 Mac 4<sup>24</sup> ἐν παλαίστρᾳ is similarly translated 'in the place of exercise,' RV 'in the palaestra.' See PALÆSTRA. J. HASTINGS.

EXILE.—See ISRAEL.

EXODUS AND JOURNEY TO CANAAN.—

- i. Route of the Exodus.
- ii. From Egypt to Sinai.
- iii. From Sinai to Kadesh.
- iv. From Kadesh to the Jordan.

i. ROUTE OF THE EXODUS.—The question of the route of the Exodus has had a good deal of light thrown upon it in recent times, from the standpoint both of archæology and of literature. On the one hand, the work of excavation of lost cities and monuments has gone far to negative certain hypotheses as to the Exodus, if not to render others impossible; and, on the other hand, the decipherment of inscriptions and papyri belonging to the time of the Exodus has furnished us with geographical and historical annotations of the highest value. It must not be supposed that the result is an unmixed confirmation of the biblical account. A recently-deciphered Egyptian inscription, for example, shows that the Benê-Israel were already in Palestine at the time of the Exodus, so that the migration must have been partial and not national. But with this point we are not concerned in the present article, whose business is to indicate what was the route of the Exodus on the hypothesis that it actually took place.

Even though we are not yet in a position to completely vindicate the historical character of the Exodus, we may do much to extract a correct picture from the accounts, and so to prepare the way for accurate history. The researches, for instance, of Naville have practically settled the first stages in the line of march; and in the same way a closer knowledge of the Sinaitic peninsula encourages the belief that it is more to be urged in favour of the traditional Sinai than can be brought forward against it [See SINAI]. We acquiesce in this way what are almost fixed points in the route, without being troubled by a priori considerations as to whether the whole of the story is historical or whether any of it is miraculous. Indeed this last . . . be omitted; for as regards the actual passage of the sea, the configuration of the land at the head of the Gulf of Suez and across the Isthmus is such that the shallow waters of the sea and detached lakes furnish exactly the situation for such a transit as is poetically called a passage 'in the heart of the Red Sea.' Moreover, the action of wind . . . after has been constantly the cause . . . effects which are not far removed from the miraculous statements in Exodus. For example, the Russians in 1738 entered the Crimea, which was strongly fortified against them by the Turks, at the Isthmus of Perekop, by a passage made for them by the wind through the shallow waters of the Putrid Sea at the N.W. corner of the Sea of Azov. And Major-General Tulloch has recorded an instance even more to the point, when, as he himself observed, under a strong east wind the waters of Lake Menzaleh at the entrance to the Suez Canal receded for a distance of 7 miles (see Journal of Victoria Institute, vol. xxviii. p. 267). Other instances of the same effect, which would be counted miraculous if they had been biblical, may be found in a paper by Naville (Jour. Vict. Instit. xxvi. p. 12). We may therefore lay on one side any question of direct miraculous agency: where the phenomena are so nearly natural to the country, we may be content to say that they are not necessarily unhistorical, and that the question of miracle is merely one of interpretation. Nor need we be delayed in our inquiry by considerations as to whether the story has suffered from over-colouring; both the numbers of the persons involved and the length of their supposed stay in the desert may be deterred, if thought fit, for future examination. The account is not to be judged from its weakest points.

The best way to form an idea as to what such a migration would be like, is to compare it with an annual phenomenon of a similar character, viz. the Mecca pilgrimage from Cairo. The analogy is a good one, inasmuch as the account in the Bk of Exodus expressly suggests that the Israelites wished to go into the wilderness for the purpose of a haj (the Heb. word in Exodus 10<sup>9</sup> haj is, in fact, the same that is applied to the modern festival, and to the route taken by . . . . .). What point was aimed at in the . . . . . days' journey into the wilderness must remain uncertain; it has been suggested that it was Sarbut el-Khadeem, on the northern road to Mt. Sinai, where the remains of famous Egyptian temples are still to be seen. But, wherever it was, the Israelites could do what the Mecca pilgrims are in the habit of doing; nor is there any a priori reason why . . . . . account of the migration as . . . . .

We may go further, and say that whatever may be objected against the general facts of the Exodus, the list of stations (or mansiones) in the wilderness which is given in Nu has . . . . . being part of a conventional . . . . . book, and is therefore susceptible of identification and verification, altogether apart from the history in which it is embedded. All that we have to do with such data is to make such literary and topographical investigations as will determine whether the routes indicated are possible, and the stages of the journey feasible.

One of the first things that will strike the careful reader of the account of the first stages of the Exodus is that there is a certain verisimilitude about the nomenclature. It is a mixture of Egyptian and Hebrew. Pithom and Pihahiroth are certainly Egyptian; Migdol and Baal-zephon as certainly Hebrew; Succoth will be shown to be a mere Heb. perversion of an Egypt. name; and there is even a suspicion that alternative names in the two languages are found in the narrative, as when the desert into which the Israelites go out is called in one place the desert of Etham, and in another the desert of Shur. This is as it should be, if we bear in mind that we are on the frontier of Egypt, that the country next the frontier on both sides is in the hands of a Semitic people, and that the fortifications and great cities are in the care of the Egyptian Government.

The locality from which the Israelites emigrated is defined by the two store-cities, Rameses and Pithom, which they built for Pharaoh. From Rameses they started, and their first encampment is Succoth, which Naville has shown to be the equivalent of Pithom. The identification of the two cities is of the first importance. . . . . Brugsch (L'Exode et les monuments . . . . . Leipzig, 1875), we are to identify Rameses with Zoan (Tanis), and to place Pithom and the district of Succoth in the N.E. corner of the Delta, between Tanis and Pelusium. He then . . . . . suggesting . . . . . ventured . . . . . Schleiden, . . . . . the . . . . . along the shore of the Mediterranean on a neck of land between that sea and the ancient Serbonian lake; that the Egyptians followed them along the same course, but were overtaken by a rush of water from the Mediterranean and destroyed. On this hypothesis he identifies Etham with the fortification on the frontier of Egypt, Migdol with a Migdol mentioned in the Antonine Itinerary . . . . . being 12 miles from Pelusium, and Baal-zephon with Mt. Casius; the supposed Red Sea (yam suph) turns out to be the Serbonian lake, as is suggested by the name (yam suph=sea of weeds). Unfortunately, this theory, which is stated with great confidence . . . . . Brugsch, appears to be almost . . . . . fact that Pithom has been found somewhere else than on the Mediterranean seaboard, where Brugsch had located it. It is to Naville that we owe this important discovery. His excavation of the mounds known as Tell el-Mashkuta, in the Wady Tumilat, on the line of railway from Zagazig to Suez, and in close proximity to the modern Sweet-water Canal and to the line of the ancient Sweet-water Canal, has proved . . . . . that this place is Pithom [abode . . . . .], and that its secular name, or at all events the name of the adjacent district, is Thuket, which may be . . . . . the Heb. Succoth. It is curious that . . . . . engineers had suspected this mound to be the site of Rameses, and had named the adjacent railway station accordingly. It seems probable that Rameses will be found in the excavation of the mound Tell el-Kebir; Tanis is clearly excluded by Naville's discoveries. We are thus led to conclude in favour of an exodus along the line of the ancient canal, and the fugitives following this course would soon reach the frontier of Egypt and be stopped by the fortifications which ran along the Isthmus from north to south. This is the station Etham, which . . . . . coincide with the Egyptian yetem or . . . . . and to be the same thing as is meant by the Heb. shur or wall. [The only difficulty in this identification lies in the fact that we should have expected a stronger guttural in the beginning of the Heb. word]. The route is evidently one of the main roads out of Egypt; and we may compare . . . . . translated by Goodwin, which . . . . . of runaway slaves who follow this very road, and whose journey is described in very similar terms.

Several difficulties now present themselves. One of them relates to the question as to whether the head of the Gulf of Suez was not at the time of the Exodus much farther north than at present, and whether the sea was not actually connected with the Bitter Lakes. In that case the transit may very well have been made at the head of the Bitter Lakes. There is much to be said in favour of this hypothesis.

Unfortunately, none of the . . . . . in . . . . . part of . . . . . have been identified. Pihahiroth, Migdol, and Baal-zephon have all to be located. It has been suggested that Baal-zephon [Typhon] is the mountain Ataka to the S. of Suez, and that it is dedicated to the god of the north wind because Phœnician sailors used to pray for fair wind on their voyages down the Red Sea. Our own impression is that the case has not yet been made out for moving the head of the Red Sea so far north as the Bitter Lakes, and that it is more likely that the crossing took place not far north of the present Suez. [Its ancient Greek name Clysmia appears to carry a tradition of the disaster]. The test for a true solution would appear to lie in a search for Baal-zephon, especially by examination of Mt. Casius on the shore of the Mediterranean, and of Jebel Ataka at the head of the Red Sea.

ii. FROM EGYPT TO SINAI.—After crossing the frontier of Egypt the Israelites go three days in the wilderness and find no water. It has been suggested that they went by the haj route right across the plateau of the Tih to Akabah, and that this Akabah (or Elath, as it is called in OT) is the Elim of the itinerary, where they found wells of water and palm trees, and from which they proceeded to a Mt. Sinai in Midian. We are not able to accept the theory of a Midianite Sinai. It seems more probable that the route described is that taken by travellers to the traditional Sinai, which is the same as was taken by St. Silvia of Aquitaine in the 4th century. The route goes along the wilderness between the plateau of the Tih and the E. shore of the Red Sea. Marah (see sep. art.) is not identified with any reasonable probability; but Elim, which follows it, may very well be the Wady Ghurundel, where there are even at the present time wells and palms (see ELIM). From this point the road to Sinai bifurcates; the northern road goes by the Egyptian mines and temples of Sarbut el-Khadeem, the southern winds by the Wady Tayibeh until it strikes the seashore: this is, then, the encampment by the sea (see sep. art.) of Nu 33<sup>10</sup>; following the shore, the ancient Egyptian port and road are reached, and the route turns inland, passing the entrance to the Wady Maghara, where are the oldest Egyptian mines. This is the station Dophkah (see sep. art.). Dophkah being a misreading of Mafkah, the Egypt. name for the ore stone which they obtained from the mines in this region. The next station, Alush, is not known; it was probably not far beyond the Wady Mukattab or 'written valley' through which the road now passes. The next stage is Rephidim, which is commonly identified with Feiran, the oasis of the peninsula, the ancient Faran and Paran, and from this point the road winds through the long Wady es-Sheykh, until by a long detour (or, if preferred, by a short cut through a pass called Nukb el-Hawa, or 'Pass of the Wind') the plain is reached at the foot of Mt. Sinai, where the Israelites are supposed to have assembled for the giving of the Law. The most striking identification on this route is the encampment on the seashore five days after having left it. But it is clear that, striking as this is, the same thing is true of the route of the Mecca. It can hardly be called a conclusive. It is a very weighty consideration that the name Sinai implies a place of sanctity [Sin=the Babylonian moon-god] from very early times; but no Babylonian signs or inscriptions have been found which would settle conclusively that the traditional Sinai is the same as the biblical one. The route described is an ancient trade route of Nabatean traders before the Christian era and in the early years of the Christian era. It is not a road worked out by biblical explorers, as has sometimes been suggested. See further art. SINAI.

LITERATURE.—The student should consult, inter alia, Robinson, Biblical Researches (1851, 3rd ed. 1857), Fiers, Durch Gorn zum Sinai (2nd ed. Leipzig, 1881), Lewis, Tour from Thebes to the Peninsula of Sinai in 1845 (Eng. by Cottrell, London, 1846); Naville, Store City of Fihom (Publications of Egypt. Exploration Fund); Brugsch, L'Égypte et les Monuments (Paris, 1875, Eng. tr. 1879); Gannurim, Peregrination (1871).

iii. FROM SINAI TO KADESH.—About this portion of the route little need be said. The account in Nu 10<sup>11</sup> states that the first march from Sinai was into the wilderness of Paran. This is described in v. 33 as a three days' journey; and the places mentioned as on the route are Taberah (Nu 11<sup>3</sup>), Kibroth-hattaavah, and Hazeroth (11<sup>34, 35</sup>), whence they removed into the wilderness of Paran (12<sup>11</sup>), and from this place (13<sup>3</sup>) the spies were sent out. Taberah is not mentioned in the itinerary of Nu 33. In Dt 1<sup>2</sup> the whole route from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea is described as eleven days' journey by the way of Mt. Seir. This indicates a route from Sinai by way of Akabah to Kadesh, and accordingly travellers have sought to identify Kibroth-hattaavah and Hazeroth with points in the route between Sinai and Akabah. Further particulars are given in the articles on those names; and for the names which follow

Hazeroth in Nu 33, see iv. and the article on KADESH.

iv. FROM KADESH TO THE JORDAN.—The accounts of this part of the route are found in Nu 20, 21, Dt 1. 2, and in the itinerary of Nu 33. Nu 20, 21 are composite in character, as will be seen from the following analysis (taken from Driver's LOT<sup>6</sup> p. 66):—

|    |                     |    |      |                 |                   |      |        |
|----|---------------------|----|------|-----------------|-------------------|------|--------|
| P  | 20 <sup>1a</sup>    | 2  | 3b-4 | 5-13            | 22-29             | 4a   | 10. 11 |
| JE | 1b                  | 3a | 5    | 14-21           | 21 <sup>1-3</sup> | 4b-5 |        |
| P  |                     |    |      | 22 <sup>1</sup> |                   |      |        |
| JE | 21 <sup>12-13</sup> |    |      |                 |                   |      |        |

The first verse of Nu 20 deserves special notice. Its first clause (as far as the word 'month') is due to P. According to that authority, the spies were sent out from the wilderness of Paran, and in that wilderness (Nu 14<sup>29</sup>) the children of Israel remained until the rebellious generation had been consumed. They then moved in the first month (apparently of the fortieth year, and for the first time) into the wilderness of Zin. The next clause, 'and the people abode in Kadesh,' etc., is due to another source, which represents the stay in Kadesh as a prolonged one, and associates with that stay many events, but without assigning dates. Two of these events are recorded in Nu 20<sup>2-21</sup>: the first, the judgment passed on Moses and Aaron at Meribah (vv. 2-13), presents difficulties which cannot here be fully discussed, but the following considerations make it probable that this incident occurred at an early period of the sojourn at Kadesh: (a) the account is in many points similar to that in Ex 17<sup>1-7</sup>; (b) lack of water would have been felt soon after the arrival at Kadesh, rather than at the close of their sojourn there; and the complaint, Nu 20<sup>4</sup>, seems more appropriate in the mouths of those who remembered the fleshpots of Egypt, than of those who, having left Egypt in youth, had since passed forty years in the desert; (c) Dt 1<sup>27</sup> the exclusion of Moses from the land was decreed about the same time as the judgment was pronounced against the spies who came up out of Egypt. Hence two alternatives: either the account Nu 20<sup>2-13</sup> which gives the reason for the exclusion must describe the same event as that referred to Dt 1<sup>27</sup> (i.e. an event which happened soon after the return of the spies, and therefore at an early period of the journeyings), or there are two varying traditions as to when and why Moses was not permitted to cross the Jordan.

The second passage (Nu 20<sup>14-21</sup>) records Edom's refusal to allow a passage through his territory to the children of Israel, in consequence of which they journeyed 'by the way to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom' (Nu 21<sup>4</sup>). Compare this with Dt 2<sup>1</sup>, very similar language. The passage is used to describe a compassing of Edom, which is assigned to an earlier stage of the journeyings. It is reasonable to suppose that this circuitous route was adopted because a more direct course towards the E. side of the Dead Sea was not open; Edom's conduct, as described in Nu 20, though not recorded in Dt, was the cause of, and therefore prior to, the compassing mentioned in Dt. Hence both the events in Nu 20<sup>2-21</sup>, though in their present connexion they appear as incidents of the fortieth year, may belong to an earlier period of the journeyings. Two distinct geographical pictures of the period are presented,—the one, that of JE, figures Kadesh as the scene of the middle portion of the journey, and is to be traced in Dt 1. 2 (with which the brief summary in Jg 11<sup>16-18</sup> should be compared); the other, that of P, locates these events partly in Paran and partly in Zin. The combination of the two, with the introduction of exact dates, has produced difficulties which are to be explained, not by the assumption of two places bearing the name of Kadesh, nor by the assumption of a second visit to Kadesh (which is nowhere indicated, and seems excluded by Dt 2<sup>14</sup>), but by the resolution of the narrative into its original components.

In the list of stations (Nu 33) Kadesh does not occur until v. 38, where it is identified with Zin, immediately precedes Mt. Hor, and is only eight stations removed from the final settlement in the plains of Jordan. This itinerary makes the identification of Zin with Kadesh, which is implied in Nu 20, and refers to Kadesh for the first and only time towards the close of the journeyings. It might be expected that Paran would be found in an earlier part of the chapter, but it is not; the stations from Egypt, as far as Hazeroth, correspond closely with those mentioned in the narrative portions of Ex and Nu, but after Hazeroth [instead of either Paran or Kadesh] twelve stations are given (Rithmah . . . Hashmonah, vv. 18-29), the names of which occur only in these verses, and no event happening in connexion with these places is anywhere recorded. It has been suggested that Rithmah, or some other of these names, is a designation of Kadesh, but nothing in the nature of an argument has been advanced in favour of such a hypothesis.

The wilderness of Paran (Nu 13<sup>8</sup>) is a vague indication of locality for the events described in Nu 13, 14, and it may be that more than one of these twelve stations were within that area, but there is no indication that such is the case. The list of Nu 33 has been incorporated with the narrative without specifying the place where the important events recorded in Nu 13, 14 and Dt 1 happened. In this respect the list is independent of the narrative, and any attempt to establish a connexion between the two must be conjectural.

The eight stations . . . Hashmonah (Moseroth-Mt. Hor) must . . . With the first four may be compared the fragment of an itinerary preserved in Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup>. They are as follows:—

| Nu 33 <sup>30-38</sup> | Dt 10 <sup>6-7</sup> |
|------------------------|----------------------|
| Moseroth.              | Beeroth Bene-jaakan. |
| Bene-jaakan.           | Moserah.             |
| Hor-haggidgad.         | Gudgodah.            |
| Jotbathah.             | Jotbathah.           |

There can be little doubt that the same four places are referred to in both passages, and it seems also reasonable to suppose that the same part of the journey is described in both. The inversion of order, Moserah preceding Bene-jaakan in the one, and following in the other, may be attributed to an error of transcription, or explained by supposing that some of the wells of . . . were visited both before and after the encampment at Moseroth. Moserah is noted (Dt 10) as the place where Aaron died and was buried, and must therefore be close to Mt. Hor, probably the place of encampment at its base. Further, as Abironah and Ezion-geber follow these four places in Nu, and the position of Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Akabah is known, it follows that these stations describe the journey from Mt. Hor down the Arabah to the Red Sea. Pursuing the journey from this point, as described Dt 2<sup>8</sup>, the children of Israel passed 'from the way of the Arabah from Elath and from Ezion-geber.' This is generally explained by supposing that they completed the circuit of Edom by compassing it on its E. side. From the S. end of the Arabah a valley called Wady Ithem leads upwards in a N.E. direction to the high table-land which lies to the E. of Edom and Moab, across which runs the Hajj route from Damascus to Mecca. Along or near this route the children of Israel, after leaving the Arabah by Wady Ithem, passed in a N.E. direction towards the sunrising (Nu 21), the next definite geographical indication afforded in the narrative.

But against accepting this view of the journey, it may be argued as follows: The two stations in Nu 33<sup>30-31</sup> which follow Ezion-geber are the wilderness of Zin (Kadesh) and Mt. Hor. These verses imply that, after reaching the Gulf of Akabah, instead of bearing eastward as above described the children of Israel retraced their steps along the Arabah to visit Mt. Hor, on the occasion of Aaron's death and burial. Moseroth is separated by six stations from Mt. Hor, and, if the identity of Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup> with Nu 33<sup>30-31</sup> be maintained, there are two statements concerning the time and place of Aaron's death which cannot be reconciled. In order to harmonize the accounts, many commentators consider that the stations in Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup> have nothing to do with the same names in Nu 33<sup>30-31</sup>, but must be supplied as part of the journey from Mt. Hor to Zalmonah (Nu 33<sup>41</sup>). The omission of these stations in Nu 33 is explained by supposing that names which have been previously mentioned are not repeated in this list. Besides the double visit to Kadesh, two visits to Mt. Hor (for Moserah or Moseroth must be considered as equivalent to Mt. Hor) and two journeys down the Arabah to Ezion-geber must be assumed, before the narrative of Dt 2<sup>8</sup> can be combined with Nu 33 from Zalmonah onwards, as representing the final departure from the Arabah on the way to the E. of Moab. This reiterated duplication of events, inferred from combining the accounts, but nowhere indicated in the narrative, raises more than a suspicion that this harmonistic interpretation, though possible, does not represent the actual progress of the journey. The main difficulty arises from the position of Zin and Mt. Hor following Ezion-geber in Nu 33<sup>30-31</sup>. Ewald proposes (Hist. of Isr. ii. 201, Eng. tr.) to remove vv. 38-41a from where they now stand, and insert them after Hashmonah in ver. 30. The order of the stations would then be Hashmonah, Zin, Mt. Hor, Moseroth, Bene-jaakan, Hor-haggidgad, Jotbathah, Ebronah, Ezion-geber, Zalmonah, etc. The necessity for assuming the unproved duplication of events is removed, and the direction of the journey would be as traced above. The obvious criticism of Ewald's hypothesis is, that if the arrangement he proposes were the original one, it is difficult to understand why a change which introduces such difficulties should have been made. May a slight variation of his hypothesis be suggested? The verses which he would transpose differ in character from the rest of the chapter; instead of giving only names, they relate events and furnish details. May they be regarded as a later addition? If so, they may be either omitted or . . . the same result attained. One . . . remains: the insertion of Zin and Mt. Hor after Ezion-geber indicates a movement up the Arabah northwards. This northern direction may have been continued to the Dead Sea, where a turn eastwards would bring the children of Israel to the E. side of Moab. The compassing of Edom would then be on its W. and N. border. In favour of this it may be suggested that an Israelite might understand the border of Edom to mean the border towards his own land. So long as the sites of Zalmonah and the stations following remain uncertain, this interpretation of the existing text of Nu 33<sup>41a</sup> cannot be rejected as impossible, though it would represent a tradition different from that followed in Nu 21<sup>4</sup> and (probably) Dt 2<sup>8</sup>.

The concluding section from the E. of Moab

onwards is ... free from ambiguity. though defin ... of places is wanting here as in the preceding stages. The children of Israel cross the brooks Zered and Arnon (Nu 21<sup>12-13</sup>). The latter is by general consent identified with the Wady Mojib, a stream which is fed by many tributaries, ... into the Dead Sea about the middle of its E. side. The deep valley, about three miles broad, through which it passes, is a marked feature of the district, and forms a natural boundary line. It was the southern limit of the territory assigned to Israel on the E. of Jordan. The position of the brook Zered is uncertain. The Wady el-Ahsa, which runs into the Dead Sea at its S. extremity, is too far south to be identified with it, for Iye-abarim to the E. of Moab is reached before crossing it (Nu 21<sup>14</sup>). The Wady Feranjy, the upper portion of the stream passing by Kerak and reaching the Dead Sea at the promontory called El-Lisan, or the main affluent of Wady Mojib (that coming from the S.E.), may with greater probability be considered as the ancient Zered. The nomenclature of the tributaries of Wady Mojib is somewhat unsettled, but Bliss, when exploring the country of Moab in March 1895 (see his memoir in PEFSI, 1895) took special pains to ascertain the names assigned to them. He follows Tristram in giving the name of Wady Saideh to the E. affluent of the Wady Mojib and not to the S.E. branch, which is generally so called in maps and commentaries. The description in Buhl (Geog. d. Alten Palastina, p. 51) is again different. Until arriving at the Arnon, the Israelites probably crossed the upper courses of the rivers and kept away from Moab towards the E. They would thus obey the injunction not to meddle with Moab, and find the rivers shallower, and more easy of passage. The deep and rugged sides of these streams for some distance from their outlets into the Dead Sea cause considerable difficulty to the modern traveller, and would have been impracticable for the hosts of Israel. But after crossing the Arnon it was necessary to turn W. and afterwards in a N.W. direction in order to reach Dibon-Gad and the mountains of Abarim—the high ridge to the E. of the N. extremity of the Dead Sea from which they descended into the plains of Jordan, opposite Jericho. The names given in Nu 21<sup>18-20</sup> are different from those in the itinerary of Nu 33, but the last-named place, 'the top of Pisgah that looketh toward Jeshimon' ('the desert' RV), indicates a spot on the Abarim range whence W. Palestine and the Jordan valley were visible. The last stage, Nu 22<sup>1</sup>, is given with additional detail in Nu 33<sup>48-49</sup>.

LITERATURE.—Commentaries on the Books of Nu and Dt, especially those of Dillmann in the Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb. z. Alten Testament and Driver on Dt in the Internat. Crit. Comm., may be consulted for further information. Trumbull's Adesh-Barnea discusses the whole route from Egypt to Canaan, and contains a full list of ancient and modern works dealing with the subject. See also Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, and Kohler, Biblische Geschichte A.T.

J. RENDEL HARRIS AND A. T. CHAPMAN.

EXODUS (עִזְרָא, or simply עִזְרָא; Ἐξόδος: see HEXATEUCH) is the 2nd Book in the Heb. Canon. It is also the 2nd division of the great composite work which contains in one complex whole all that has been preserved of old Heb. writings about the origins of the Isr. people. So much is here assumed, and, further, that it is generally possible, if not to distribute the material among four distinct documents, at least to assign it to one or other of four differing schools of writing, Jahwistic, Elohistie, Deuteronomic, and Priestly (referred to as J, E, D, P),* whose relative age is shown by the order of the names, the periods of the first two overlapping. For the proof of this, and for general matters of introduction, see HEXATEUCH.

* J* (=J-supplements), E* etc., denote later elements, while P* is often used for the original groundwork of the Priestly Document before enlarged by the numerous additions marked

Our aim here is to exhibit the results of such an analysis in detail, with a condensed account of the chief grounds on which it rests. For information about persons, places, things, events, institutions, laws, the student is referred to the separate articles.

The book covers the period from the death of Joseph to the erection of the Tabernacle, and is mainly historical, but contains important legislative sections. It falls readily into three parts—I. Israel in Egypt; II. From Egypt to Sinai; III. At Sinai. The method of notation here adopted needs little explanation. In ordinary small office letters show what documents contain the material next following: the sign ¶ preceding means that the parallel is to be found in another chapter or section. The numbers refer to the chapters.

Thus, by following J, E, and P through in turn, the main contents of the documents can be severally traced, and the amount of coincidence noted.

I. ISRAEL IN EGYPT: 1-13<sup>16</sup>.

A. Summary.

1 JEP Increase, and ... of Israel. 2 EBirth and adoption ... violence, fight, and ... 3-4 Theophany and JEP Commission of Mos. and Aar. JEMos. returns, and Jconvince the people by signs. 5 JEFreedom claimed, bondage increased. 6-7 JPE Commission of Mos. and Aar. 7<sup>8-12</sup> Eleven JEP wonders —7<sup>8-13</sup> PRod becomes serpent, magicians copy; 7<sup>14-25</sup> JEP Nile smitten, magicians copy; 8<sup>1-15</sup> JPFrogs, magicians copy; 8<sup>16-19</sup> JPElice, magicians fail; 8<sup>20-33</sup> JFflies; 9<sup>1-7</sup> JFmurrain; 9<sup>8-12</sup> JFplains, magicians suffer; 9<sup>13-35</sup> JFhail; 10<sup>1-20</sup> JFlocusts; 10<sup>21-35</sup> JFdarkness; Jbanishment of Moses, who 11 JEProphesies death of firstborn and release of Isr. 12-13<sup>16</sup> JPRules for Passover and Feast of Unleav. Bread; Jdeath of firstborn, and JEPexodus of Isr.; JFlaw of firstlings.

B. Analysis.

* marks editorial revision; * shows supplements from documents of the same school; ... Harmonizing and other ... additions by E*, R*, and P*; [ ] enclose vv. forming a displaced passage; ... show that something has dropped out; and if with (...) that the material is found elsewhere; a, b, etc., mark vv. subdivided.

|   |   |   |      |     |    |     |    |     |    |     |    |     |    |     |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |    |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |      |
|---|---|---|------|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|
| J | 1 | 6 | 8-13 | 20b | 21 | 22a | 23 | 24a | 25 | 26a | 27 | 28a | 29 | 30a | 31 | 32 | 33 | 34 | 35 | 36 | 37 | 38 | 39 | 40 | 41 | 42 | 43 | 44 | 45 | 46 | 47 | 48 | 49 | 50 | 51 | 52 | 53 | 54 | 55 | 56 | 57 | 58 | 59 | 60 | 61 | 62 | 63 | 64 | 65 | 66 | 67 | 68 | 69 | 70 | 71 | 72 | 73 | 74 | 75 | 76 | 77 | 78 | 79 | 80 | 81 | 82 | 83 | 84 | 85 | 86 | 87 | 88 | 89 | 90 | 91 | 92 | 93 | 94 | 95 | 96 | 97 | 98 | 99 | 100 | 101 | 102 | 103 | 104 | 105 | 106 | 107 | 108 | 109 | 110 | 111 | 112 | 113 | 114 | 115 | 116 | 117 | 118 | 119 | 120 | 121 | 122 | 123 | 124 | 125 | 126 | 127 | 128 | 129 | 130 | 131 | 132 | 133 | 134 | 135 | 136 | 137 | 138 | 139 | 140 | 141 | 142 | 143 | 144 | 145 | 146 | 147 | 148 | 149 | 150 | 151 | 152 | 153 | 154 | 155 | 156 | 157 | 158 | 159 | 160 | 161 | 162 | 163 | 164 | 165 | 166 | 167 | 168 | 169 | 170 | 171 | 172 | 173 | 174 | 175 | 176 | 177 | 178 | 179 | 180 | 181 | 182 | 183 | 184 | 185 | 186 | 187 | 188 | 189 | 190 | 191 | 192 | 193 | 194 | 195 | 196 | 197 | 198 | 199 | 200 | 201 | 202 | 203 | 204 | 205 | 206 | 207 | 208 | 209 | 210 | 211 | 212 | 213 | 214 | 215 | 216 | 217 | 218 | 219 | 220 | 221 | 222 | 223 | 224 | 225 | 226 | 227 | 228 | 229 | 230 | 231 | 232 | 233 | 234 | 235 | 236 | 237 | 238 | 239 | 240 | 241 | 242 | 243 | 244 | 245 | 246 | 247 | 248 | 249 | 250 | 251 | 252 | 253 | 254 | 255 | 256 | 257 | 258 | 259 | 260 | 261 | 262 | 263 | 264 | 265 | 266 | 267 | 268 | 269 | 270 | 271 | 272 | 273 | 274 | 275 | 276 | 277 | 278 | 279 | 280 | 281 | 282 | 283 | 284 | 285 | 286 | 287 | 288 | 289 | 290 | 291 | 292 | 293 | 294 | 295 | 296 | 297 | 298 | 299 | 300 | 301 | 302 | 303 | 304 | 305 | 306 | 307 | 308 | 309 | 310 | 311 | 312 | 313 | 314 | 315 | 316 | 317 | 318 | 319 | 320 | 321 | 322 | 323 | 324 | 325 | 326 | 327 | 328 | 329 | 330 | 331 | 332 | 333 | 334 | 335 | 336 | 337 | 338 | 339 | 340 | 341 | 342 | 343 | 344 | 345 | 346 | 347 | 348 | 349 | 350 | 351 | 352 | 353 | 354 | 355 | 356 | 357 | 358 | 359 | 360 | 361 | 362 | 363 | 364 | 365 | 366 | 367 | 368 | 369 | 370 | 371 | 372 | 373 | 374 | 375 | 376 | 377 | 378 | 379 | 380 | 381 | 382 | 383 | 384 | 385 | 386 | 387 | 388 | 389 | 390 | 391 | 392 | 393 | 394 | 395 | 396 | 397 | 398 | 399 | 400 | 401 | 402 | 403 | 404 | 405 | 406 | 407 | 408 | 409 | 410 | 411 | 412 | 413 | 414 | 415 | 416 | 417 | 418 | 419 | 420 | 421 | 422 | 423 | 424 | 425 | 426 | 427 | 428 | 429 | 430 | 431 | 432 | 433 | 434 | 435 | 436 | 437 | 438 | 439 | 440 | 441 | 442 | 443 | 444 | 445 | 446 | 447 | 448 | 449 | 450 | 451 | 452 | 453 | 454 | 455 | 456 | 457 | 458 | 459 | 460 | 461 | 462 | 463 | 464 | 465 | 466 | 467 | 468 | 469 | 470 | 471 | 472 | 473 | 474 | 475 | 476 | 477 | 478 | 479 | 480 | 481 | 482 | 483 | 484 | 485 | 486 | 487 | 488 | 489 | 490 | 491 | 492 | 493 | 494 | 495 | 496 | 497 | 498 | 499 | 500 | 501 | 502 | 503 | 504 | 505 | 506 | 507 | 508 | 509 | 510 | 511 | 512 | 513 | 514 | 515 | 516 | 517 | 518 | 519 | 520 | 521 | 522 | 523 | 524 | 525 | 526 | 527 | 528 | 529 | 530 | 531 | 532 | 533 | 534 | 535 | 536 | 537 | 538 | 539 | 540 | 541 | 542 | 543 | 544 | 545 | 546 | 547 | 548 | 549 | 550 | 551 | 552 | 553 | 554 | 555 | 556 | 557 | 558 | 559 | 560 | 561 | 562 | 563 | 564 | 565 | 566 | 567 | 568 | 569 | 570 | 571 | 572 | 573 | 574 | 575 | 576 | 577 | 578 | 579 | 580 | 581 | 582 | 583 | 584 | 585 | 586 | 587 | 588 | 589 | 590 | 591 | 592 | 593 | 594 | 595 | 596 | 597 | 598 | 599 | 600 | 601 | 602 | 603 | 604 | 605 | 606 | 607 | 608 | 609 | 610 | 611 | 612 | 613 | 614 | 615 | 616 | 617 | 618 | 619 | 620 | 621 | 622 | 623 | 624 | 625 | 626 | 627 | 628 | 629 | 630 | 631 | 632 | 633 | 634 | 635 | 636 | 637 | 638 | 639 | 640 | 641 | 642 | 643 | 644 | 645 | 646 | 647 | 648 | 649 | 650 | 651 | 652 | 653 | 654 | 655 | 656 | 657 | 658 | 659 | 660 | 661 | 662 | 663 | 664 | 665 | 666 | 667 | 668 | 669 | 670 | 671 | 672 | 673 | 674 | 675 | 676 | 677 | 678 | 679 | 680 | 681 | 682 | 683 | 684 | 685 | 686 | 687 | 688 | 689 | 690 | 691 | 692 | 693 | 694 | 695 | 696 | 697 | 698 | 699 | 700 | 701 | 702 | 703 | 704 | 705 | 706 | 707 | 708 | 709 | 710 | 711 | 712 | 713 | 714 | 715 | 716 | 717 | 718 | 719 | 720 | 721 | 722 | 723 | 724 | 725 | 726 | 727 | 728 | 729 | 730 | 731 | 732 | 733 | 734 | 735 | 736 | 737 | 738 | 739 | 740 | 741 | 742 | 743 | 744 | 745 | 746 | 747 | 748 | 749 | 750 | 751 | 752 | 753 | 754 | 755 | 756 | 757 | 758 | 759 | 760 | 761 | 762 | 763 | 764 | 765 | 766 | 767 | 768 | 769 | 770 | 771 | 772 | 773 | 774 | 775 | 776 | 777 | 778 | 779 | 780 | 781 | 782 | 783 | 784 | 785 | 786 | 787 | 788 | 789 | 790 | 791 | 792 | 793 | 794 | 795 | 796 | 797 | 798 | 799 | 800 | 801 | 802 | 803 | 804 | 805 | 806 | 807 | 808 | 809 | 810 | 811 | 812 | 813 | 814 | 815 | 816 | 817 | 818 | 819 | 820 | 821 | 822 | 823 | 824 | 825 | 826 | 827 | 828 | 829 | 830 | 831 | 832 | 833 | 834 | 835 | 836 | 837 | 838 | 839 | 840 | 841 | 842 | 843 | 844 | 845 | 846 | 847 | 848 | 849 | 850 | 851 | 852 | 853 | 854 | 855 | 856 | 857 | 858 | 859 | 860 | 861 | 862 | 863 | 864 | 865 | 866 | 867 | 868 | 869 | 870 | 871 | 872 | 873 | 874 | 875 | 876 | 877 | 878 | 879 | 880 | 881 | 882 | 883 | 884 | 885 | 886 | 887 | 888 | 889 | 890 | 891 | 892 | 893 | 894 | 895 | 896 | 897 | 898 | 899 | 900 | 901 | 902 | 903 | 904 | 905 | 906 | 907 | 908 | 909 | 910 | 911 | 912 | 913 | 914 | 915 | 916 | 917 | 918 | 919 | 920 | 921 | 922 | 923 | 924 | 925 | 926 | 927 | 928 | 929 | 930 | 931 | 932 | 933 | 934 | 935 | 936 | 937 | 938 | 939 | 940 | 941 | 942 | 943 | 944 | 945 | 946 | 947 | 948 | 949 | 950 | 951 | 952 | 953 | 954 | 955 | 956 | 957 | 958 | 959 | 960 | 961 | 962 | 963 | 964 | 965 | 966 | 967 | 968 | 969 | 970 | 971 | 972 | 973 | 974 | 975 | 976 | 977 | 978 | 979 | 980 | 981 | 982 | 983 | 984 | 985 | 986 | 987 | 988 | 989 | 990 | 991 | 992 | 993 | 994 | 995 | 996 | 997 | 998 | 999 | 1000 |
|---|---|---|------|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|-----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|

P* stands for the Holiness legislation of Lv 17-26 with kindred passages. R stands for one of the redactors, who (1) edited J and E into a single whole JE, in this case cited as R<sup>1</sup>; or (2) combined JE with D, cited as R<sup>2</sup>; or (3) supplemented P* and combined P with JED, and so are called R<sup>3</sup>. In Exodus, of course, D is not found, and only here and there traces of R<sup>4</sup>.

|   |    |                    |                    |                    |                 |                   |                    |
|---|----|--------------------|--------------------|--------------------|-----------------|-------------------|--------------------|
| J | 12 | 21a                | 21b-23*            | 24-27 <sup>u</sup> | 27b             | 29-34             | 37-39              |
| E | 12 | 1-13               | 14-20 <sup>u</sup> |                    | 28              | ...               | 35f <sup>u</sup>   |
| P | 12 |                    |                    |                    |                 |                   |                    |
| J | 12 |                    | 31*                | 5 <sup>u</sup>     | 61*             | 8-10 <sup>u</sup> | 11-13 <sup>u</sup> |
| E | 12 |                    |                    |                    |                 |                   | 14-16 <sup>u</sup> |
| P | 12 | 40-42 <sup>u</sup> | 43-50              | 51 <sup>u</sup>    | 11 <sup>u</sup> |                   |                    |

Note that no passage has been analyzed unless there is reasonable probability, usually indeed practical certainty, that it is composite; but obviously some of the details of the verses must be rather possible than always certain. The analysis has, however, been carried as far as possible, as being more helpful thus to the student. If any one will take the trouble to mark, (say) with blue, black, and red inks, the analysis on a copy of the RV or the Heb. text, and to underline the phrases, etc., referred to under iii. and iv., and then read through all the passages in the document consecutively, he will gain the full picture of the reality of the analysis, and the distinct character of the documents.

Displacement: 3 and 41-12 prob. stood originally (41b) to go back to Egypt, or to the journey thither. to belong to Goshen, or (better) to the journey thither.

C. Parallels and Contrasts.

Each set is marked with the same letter under J, E, and P, respectively to facilitate comparison. † after refs. means that all the instances in the OT are given; * that all in the Hexateuch are mentioned; italics denote biblic. capitals are used sometimes for emphasis.

J—(a) The people live in Goshen 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>26</sup> Gn 45<sup>10</sup> etc. (only in J); (b) a separate district, so that they and their cattle could be differentiated from the Egyptians 8<sup>4, 9, 11</sup> 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>4, 6</sup> 9<sup>26</sup>; only brought in gangs into Egypt for forced labour 5<sup>5a</sup>; away from the Nile, so that its pollution seems to cause no inconvenience 7<sup>21, 24</sup>; (c) so numerous as to alarm the king 1<sup>9-12</sup>, 600,000 12<sup>37</sup> Nu 11<sup>21</sup> cf. Nu 10<sup>36</sup>; (d) cattle owners Gn 46<sup>32, 34</sup> 47<sup>3, 6</sup> having flocks and herds 10<sup>2, 24</sup> 12<sup>32, 38</sup> 34<sup>3</sup> Nu 11<sup>22</sup> Gn 12<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>2</sup> 24<sup>35</sup> 32<sup>3</sup> 33<sup>13</sup> 45<sup>10</sup> 46<sup>32</sup> 47<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>8</sup>; (e) Mos. demands 3 days' journey 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> cf. Gn 30<sup>36</sup> Nu 10<sup>33ab</sup>, Nu 33<sup>8</sup> R<sup>2</sup>+) that they might sacrifice to Yahweh or (our) God 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>3, 8, 17</sup> 8<sup>25, 27a</sup>, or serve Him 7<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>1, 20</sup> 9<sup>1, 13</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>, etc. 12<sup>31</sup>; (f) the wonders of God before Pharaoh are 7, and are natural, as disease of fish in Nile 7<sup>18a</sup>, when Yahweh smites the river 7<sup>18a, 28</sup>; natural causes being sometimes specified, as the wind in the case of the locusts 10<sup>13, 19</sup> cf. 14<sup>21b</sup>; Moses speaks freely on each occasion to Pharaoh, and the wonders follow the mere announcement; the hail is on every herb of the field 9<sup>25b</sup> cf. 9<sup>22</sup> and 10<sup>15c</sup>, and locusts eat the remaining crops and the fruit; (g) the people is hurried, at instigation of the Egypt. 1<sup>10</sup>, h. Moses' father-in-law is the priest of Midian 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>19</sup> (3<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> R<sup>2</sup>) cf. Gn 41<sup>5</sup>, unnamed here (for Reuel 2<sup>18</sup> is prob. R<sup>1c</sup>), called Hobab Nu 10<sup>29</sup> Jg 4<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>1</sup>; and Moses has one son 2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>24</sup>; (i) the blood of the Nile is the main thing in the Passover, not mentioned 12<sup>21-23</sup> J<sup>2</sup>; (j) the name of God is Yahweh (=Jehovah), or the God of . . .; (k) (I) (see below).

E—(a) The people live in the land of Egypt, with no hint of separate district being assigned them; (b) rather they seem to be herded in the royal city among the houses 1<sup>15a</sup>; no immunity from taxation mentioned (e.g. hail 9<sup>25a</sup>) except for the poor: can beg of neighbours jewels, etc. 3<sup>22</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>; near the Nile 1<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>; (c) only numerous enough to annoy the king, their women needing only 2 midwives 1<sup>15a</sup>, requiring only 600 chariots for pursuit 14<sup>7</sup>; (d) royal pensioners Gn 46<sup>18, 23</sup>, never mentioned as owning cattle; (e) Mos. demands merely that Isr. be let go 3<sup>10a</sup> 21<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1a</sup> (5<sup>1b</sup> R<sup>1c</sup> to harmonize with J) 9<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>, ulterior end being to get to Can. 13<sup>17-19</sup> cf. Gn 46<sup>21</sup>, and incidentally to serve God on this mountain, i.e. Horeb, more than 3 days' journey 3<sup>12</sup>; (f) the wonders or plagues are 5, and have the marvellous element heightened, e.g. Moses smites all the waters in the river, and they turn to blood 7<sup>17b, 20b</sup>; Moses only once speaks to Pharaoh 5<sup>1a</sup>, and the wonders follow his mere gesture; the hail is on man and beast 9<sup>22, 25a</sup>, while locusts devour every herb of the land 10<sup>12, 15b</sup>; (g) departure deliberate, the people gathering supplies beforehand 11<sup>4</sup>; time to take up Joseph's bones 13<sup>19</sup>; (h) Moses' father-in-law is Jethro 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>18</sup> 18, and he has two sons 18<sup>1a</sup>, his wife being a Cushite Nu 12<sup>1</sup>; (j) the name of God is God (Elohim) always up to 3<sup>18</sup> and often afterwards, especially in phrases, e.g. mount of God 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>27</sup> 18<sup>2</sup> 24<sup>13a</sup>, rod of God 4<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>†; angel of God 14<sup>19</sup> Gn 21<sup>17</sup> 28<sup>12</sup> 31<sup>11</sup> 32<sup>1*</sup> cf. Ex 23<sup>20</sup> 32<sup>34</sup> Nu 20<sup>16</sup>; statutes of God 18<sup>16</sup>.

P—(a) The people live in Egypt 1<sup>5</sup>; (b) not in separate district, for the land was filled with them 1<sup>7</sup>; no immunity mentioned; (f) the direct Divine agency in the wonders is emphasized; Aaron is always with Moses, and speaks, etc. 7<sup>1-7</sup> etc. (while in J the insertion of Aaron 4<sup>18-16</sup> seems due to J<sup>2</sup>, for where Aaron or a plur. is found, as 8<sup>1, 12a, 25, 28</sup> 9<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>16a</sup>, the sing. is found close by 8<sup>9, 12b, 29</sup> 9<sup>33</sup> 10<sup>17a, 18</sup>, Moses being sole speaker 7<sup>14, 25</sup> 8<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>1-13</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>); (i) in the Passover the eating is the main thing, the sprinkling is not ordered to be repeated 12<sup>1-13, 43-50</sup>; (j) the name of the Deity is always God up to 6<sup>2</sup>, and always Yahweh (=Jehovah) afterwards.

(k) Moses' rod is the object of Divine power in J, being turned into a serpent (nahash) before the people 4<sup>2-4</sup>; Moses' rod, given him by God 4<sup>17</sup> and called the rod of God 4<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>, is regularly the instrument of Divine power in E 7<sup>15, 17b, 20b</sup> 9<sup>33</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>16</sup> 17<sup>5, 9</sup>; Aaron's rod is in P the object of Divine power, being turned into a serpent (tannin) before Pharaoh 7<sup>18</sup>, and also its instrument 7<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>5, 16a</sup> cf. Nu 17. For describing Pharaoh's obstinacy, we have (1) some form of heavy in 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>15, 29</sup> 9<sup>7, 24</sup> J; (2) some form of strong in 7<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>20, 27</sup> E, and 7<sup>13, 22</sup> 8<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> P, who would have almost unvarying phrase on 8<sup>15</sup> J, but borrows strong from E.

D. Other Clues to the Analysis.

J—7<sup>17a</sup> generation 16 (in P always plur.); mighty 17<sup>9, 20b</sup> Gn 2<sup>10b</sup> Nu 2<sup>10</sup>; come, or go to 10<sup>10</sup> Gn 11<sup>32, 7</sup> 38<sup>16a</sup>; falleth 1<sup>15a</sup> (in E: 1<sup>15a</sup>); taskmasters 1<sup>15</sup> cf. 3<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>1</sup> 23<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>1</sup> 25<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>1</sup> 29<sup>1</sup> 30<sup>1</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>1</sup> 33<sup>1</sup> 34<sup>1</sup> 35<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>1</sup> 37<sup>1</sup> 38<sup>1</sup> 39<sup>1</sup> 40<sup>1</sup> 41<sup>1</sup> 42<sup>1</sup> 43<sup>1</sup> 44<sup>1</sup> 45<sup>1</sup> 46<sup>1</sup> 47<sup>1</sup> 48<sup>1</sup> 49<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>1</sup> 52<sup>1</sup> 53<sup>1</sup> 54<sup>1</sup> 55<sup>1</sup> 56<sup>1</sup> 57<sup>1</sup> 58<sup>1</sup> 59<sup>1</sup> 60<sup>1</sup> 61<sup>1</sup> 62<sup>1</sup> 63<sup>1</sup> 64<sup>1</sup> 65<sup>1</sup> 66<sup>1</sup> 67<sup>1</sup> 68<sup>1</sup> 69<sup>1</sup> 70<sup>1</sup> 71<sup>1</sup> 72<sup>1</sup> 73<sup>1</sup> 74<sup>1</sup> 75<sup>1</sup> 76<sup>1</sup> 77<sup>1</sup> 78<sup>1</sup> 79<sup>1</sup> 80<sup>1</sup> 81<sup>1</sup> 82<sup>1</sup> 83<sup>1</sup> 84<sup>1</sup> 85<sup>1</sup> 86<sup>1</sup> 87<sup>1</sup> 88<sup>1</sup> 89<sup>1</sup> 90<sup>1</sup> 91<sup>1</sup> 92<sup>1</sup> 93<sup>1</sup> 94<sup>1</sup> 95<sup>1</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> 97<sup>1</sup> 98<sup>1</sup> 99<sup>1</sup> 100<sup>1</sup> 101<sup>1</sup> 102<sup>1</sup> 103<sup>1</sup> 104<sup>1</sup> 105<sup>1</sup> 106<sup>1</sup> 107<sup>1</sup> 108<sup>1</sup> 109<sup>1</sup> 110<sup>1</sup> 111<sup>1</sup> 112<sup>1</sup> 113<sup>1</sup> 114<sup>1</sup> 115<sup>1</sup> 116<sup>1</sup> 117<sup>1</sup> 118<sup>1</sup> 119<sup>1</sup> 120<sup>1</sup> 121<sup>1</sup> 122<sup>1</sup> 123<sup>1</sup> 124<sup>1</sup> 125<sup>1</sup> 126<sup>1</sup> 127<sup>1</sup> 128<sup>1</sup> 129<sup>1</sup> 130<sup>1</sup> 131<sup>1</sup> 132<sup>1</sup> 133<sup>1</sup> 134<sup>1</sup> 135<sup>1</sup> 136<sup>1</sup> 137<sup>1</sup> 138<sup>1</sup> 139<sup>1</sup> 140<sup>1</sup> 141<sup>1</sup> 142<sup>1</sup> 143<sup>1</sup> 144<sup>1</sup> 145<sup>1</sup> 146<sup>1</sup> 147<sup>1</sup> 148<sup>1</sup> 149<sup>1</sup> 150<sup>1</sup> 151<sup>1</sup> 152<sup>1</sup> 153<sup>1</sup> 154<sup>1</sup> 155<sup>1</sup> 156<sup>1</sup> 157<sup>1</sup> 158<sup>1</sup> 159<sup>1</sup> 160<sup>1</sup> 161<sup>1</sup> 162<sup>1</sup> 163<sup>1</sup> 164<sup>1</sup> 165<sup>1</sup> 166<sup>1</sup> 167<sup>1</sup> 168<sup>1</sup> 169<sup>1</sup> 170<sup>1</sup> 171<sup>1</sup> 172<sup>1</sup> 173<sup>1</sup> 174<sup>1</sup> 175<sup>1</sup> 176<sup>1</sup> 177<sup>1</sup> 178<sup>1</sup> 179<sup>1</sup> 180<sup>1</sup> 181<sup>1</sup> 182<sup>1</sup> 183<sup>1</sup> 184<sup>1</sup> 185<sup>1</sup> 186<sup>1</sup> 187<sup>1</sup> 188<sup>1</sup> 189<sup>1</sup> 190<sup>1</sup> 191<sup>1</sup> 192<sup>1</sup> 193<sup>1</sup> 194<sup>1</sup> 195<sup>1</sup> 196<sup>1</sup> 197<sup>1</sup> 198<sup>1</sup> 199<sup>1</sup> 200<sup>1</sup> 201<sup>1</sup> 202<sup>1</sup> 203<sup>1</sup> 204<sup>1</sup> 205<sup>1</sup> 206<sup>1</sup> 207<sup>1</sup> 208<sup>1</sup> 209<sup>1</sup> 210<sup>1</sup> 211<sup>1</sup> 212<sup>1</sup> 213<sup>1</sup> 214<sup>1</sup> 215<sup>1</sup> 216<sup>1</sup> 217<sup>1</sup> 218<sup>1</sup> 219<sup>1</sup> 220<sup>1</sup> 221<sup>1</sup> 222<sup>1</sup> 223<sup>1</sup> 224<sup>1</sup> 225<sup>1</sup> 226<sup>1</sup> 227<sup>1</sup> 228<sup>1</sup> 229<sup>1</sup> 230<sup>1</sup> 231<sup>1</sup> 232<sup>1</sup> 233<sup>1</sup> 234<sup>1</sup> 235<sup>1</sup> 236<sup>1</sup> 237<sup>1</sup> 238<sup>1</sup> 239<sup>1</sup> 240<sup>1</sup> 241<sup>1</sup> 242<sup>1</sup> 243<sup>1</sup> 244<sup>1</sup> 245<sup>1</sup> 246<sup>1</sup> 247<sup>1</sup> 248<sup>1</sup> 249<sup>1</sup> 250<sup>1</sup> 251<sup>1</sup> 252<sup>1</sup> 253<sup>1</sup> 254<sup>1</sup> 255<sup>1</sup> 256<sup>1</sup> 257<sup>1</sup> 258<sup>1</sup> 259<sup>1</sup> 260<sup>1</sup> 261<sup>1</sup> 262<sup>1</sup> 263<sup>1</sup> 264<sup>1</sup> 265<sup>1</sup> 266<sup>1</sup> 267<sup>1</sup> 268<sup>1</sup> 269<sup>1</sup> 270<sup>1</sup> 271<sup>1</sup> 272<sup>1</sup> 273<sup>1</sup> 274<sup>1</sup> 275<sup>1</sup> 276<sup>1</sup> 277<sup>1</sup> 278<sup>1</sup> 279<sup>1</sup> 280<sup>1</sup> 281<sup>1</sup> 282<sup>1</sup> 283<sup>1</sup> 284<sup>1</sup> 285<sup>1</sup> 286<sup>1</sup> 287<sup>1</sup> 288<sup>1</sup> 289<sup>1</sup> 290<sup>1</sup> 291<sup>1</sup> 292<sup>1</sup> 293<sup>1</sup> 294<sup>1</sup> 295<sup>1</sup> 296<sup>1</sup> 297<sup>1</sup> 298<sup>1</sup> 299<sup>1</sup> 300<sup>1</sup> 301<sup>1</sup> 302<sup>1</sup> 303<sup>1</sup> 304<sup>1</sup> 305<sup>1</sup> 306<sup>1</sup> 307<sup>1</sup> 308<sup>1</sup> 309<sup>1</sup> 310<sup>1</sup> 311<sup>1</sup> 312<sup>1</sup> 313<sup>1</sup> 314<sup>1</sup> 315<sup>1</sup> 316<sup>1</sup> 317<sup>1</sup> 318<sup>1</sup> 319<sup>1</sup> 320<sup>1</sup> 321<sup>1</sup> 322<sup>1</sup> 323<sup>1</sup> 324<sup>1</sup> 325<sup>1</sup> 326<sup>1</sup> 327<sup>1</sup> 328<sup>1</sup> 329<sup>1</sup> 330<sup>1</sup> 331<sup>1</sup> 332<sup>1</sup> 333<sup>1</sup> 334<sup>1</sup> 335<sup>1</sup> 336<sup>1</sup> 337<sup>1</sup> 338<sup>1</sup> 339<sup>1</sup> 340<sup>1</sup> 341<sup>1</sup> 342<sup>1</sup> 343<sup>1</sup> 344<sup>1</sup> 345<sup>1</sup> 346<sup>1</sup> 347<sup>1</sup> 348<sup>1</sup> 349<sup>1</sup> 350<sup>1</sup> 351<sup>1</sup> 352<sup>1</sup> 353<sup>1</sup> 354<sup>1</sup> 355<sup>1</sup> 356<sup>1</sup> 357<sup>1</sup> 358<sup>1</sup> 359<sup>1</sup> 360<sup>1</sup> 361<sup>1</sup> 362<sup>1</sup> 363<sup>1</sup> 364<sup>1</sup> 365<sup>1</sup> 366<sup>1</sup> 367<sup>1</sup> 368<sup>1</sup> 369<sup>1</sup> 370<sup>1</sup> 371<sup>1</sup> 372<sup>1</sup> 373<sup>1</sup> 374<sup>1</sup> 375<sup>1</sup> 376<sup>1</sup> 377<sup>1</sup> 378<sup>1</sup> 379<sup>1</sup> 380<sup>1</sup> 381<sup>1</sup> 382<sup>1</sup> 383<sup>1</sup> 384<sup>1</sup> 385<sup>1</sup> 386<sup>1</sup> 387<sup>1</sup> 388<sup>1</sup> 389<sup>1</sup> 390<sup>1</sup> 391<sup>1</sup> 392<sup>1</sup> 393<sup>1</sup> 394<sup>1</sup> 395<sup>1</sup> 396<sup>1</sup> 397<sup>1</sup> 398<sup>1</sup> 399<sup>1</sup> 400<sup>1</sup> 401<sup>1</sup> 402<sup>1</sup> 403<sup>1</sup> 404<sup>1</sup> 405<sup>1</sup> 406<sup>1</sup> 407<sup>1</sup> 408<sup>1</sup> 409<sup>1</sup> 410<sup>1</sup> 411<sup>1</sup> 412<sup>1</sup> 413<sup>1</sup> 414<sup>1</sup> 415<sup>1</sup> 416<sup>1</sup> 417<sup>1</sup> 418<sup>1</sup> 419<sup>1</sup> 420<sup>1</sup> 421<sup>1</sup> 422<sup>1</sup> 423<sup>1</sup> 424<sup>1</sup> 425<sup>1</sup> 426<sup>1</sup> 427<sup>1</sup> 428<sup>1</sup> 429<sup>1</sup> 430<sup>1</sup> 431<sup>1</sup> 432<sup>1</sup> 433<sup>1</sup> 434<sup>1</sup> 435<sup>1</sup> 436<sup>1</sup> 437<sup>1</sup> 438<sup>1</sup> 439<sup>1</sup> 440<sup>1</sup> 441<sup>1</sup> 442<sup>1</sup> 443<sup>1</sup> 444<sup>1</sup> 445<sup>1</sup> 446<sup>1</sup> 447<sup>1</sup> 448<sup>1</sup> 449<sup>1</sup> 450<sup>1</sup> 451<sup>1</sup> 452<sup>1</sup> 453<sup>1</sup> 454<sup>1</sup> 455<sup>1</sup> 456<sup>1</sup> 457<sup>1</sup> 458<sup>1</sup> 459<sup>1</sup> 460<sup>1</sup> 461<sup>1</sup> 462<sup>1</sup> 463<sup>1</sup> 464<sup>1</sup> 465<sup>1</sup> 466<sup>1</sup> 467<sup>1</sup> 468<sup>1</sup> 469<sup>1</sup> 470<sup>1</sup> 471<sup>1</sup> 472<sup>1</sup> 473<sup>1</sup> 474<sup>1</sup> 475<sup>1</sup> 476<sup>1</sup> 477<sup>1</sup> 478<sup>1</sup> 479<sup>1</sup> 480<sup>1</sup> 481<sup>1</sup> 482<sup>1</sup> 483<sup>1</sup> 484<sup>1</sup> 485<sup>1</sup> 486<sup>1</sup> 487<sup>1</sup> 488<sup>1</sup> 489<sup>1</sup> 490<sup>1</sup> 491<sup>1</sup> 492<sup>1</sup> 493<sup>1</sup> 494<sup>1</sup> 495<sup>1</sup> 496<sup>1</sup> 497<sup>1</sup> 498<sup>1</sup> 499<sup>1</sup> 500<sup>1</sup> 501<sup>1</sup> 502<sup>1</sup> 503<sup>1</sup> 504<sup>1</sup> 505<sup>1</sup> 506<sup>1</sup> 507<sup>1</sup> 508<sup>1</sup> 509<sup>1</sup> 510<sup>1</sup> 511<sup>1</sup> 512<sup>1</sup> 513<sup>1</sup> 514<sup>1</sup> 515<sup>1</sup> 516<sup>1</sup> 517<sup>1</sup> 518<sup>1</sup> 519<sup>1</sup> 520<sup>1</sup> 521<sup>1</sup> 522<sup>1</sup> 523<sup>1</sup> 524<sup>1</sup> 525<sup>1</sup> 526<sup>1</sup> 527<sup>1</sup> 528<sup>1</sup> 529<sup>1</sup> 530<sup>1</sup> 531<sup>1</sup> 532<sup>1</sup> 533<sup>1</sup> 534<sup>1</sup> 535<sup>1</sup> 536<sup>1</sup> 537<sup>1</sup> 538<sup>1</sup> 539<sup>1</sup> 540<sup>1</sup> 541<sup>1</sup> 542<sup>1</sup> 543<sup>1</sup> 544<sup>1</sup> 545<sup>1</sup> 546<sup>1</sup> 547<sup>1</sup> 548<sup>1</sup> 549<sup>1</sup> 550<sup>1</sup> 551<sup>1</sup> 552<sup>1</sup> 553<sup>1</sup> 554<sup>1</sup> 555<sup>1</sup> 556<sup>1</sup> 557<sup>1</sup> 558<sup>1</sup> 559<sup>1</sup> 560<sup>1</sup> 561<sup>1</sup> 562<sup>1</sup> 563<sup>1</sup> 564<sup>1</sup> 565<sup>1</sup> 566<sup>1</sup> 567<sup>1</sup> 568<sup>1</sup> 569<sup>1</sup> 570<sup>1</sup> 571<sup>1</sup> 572<sup>1</sup> 573<sup>1</sup> 574<sup>1</sup> 575<sup>1</sup> 576<sup>1</sup> 577<sup>1</sup> 578<sup>1</sup> 579<sup>1</sup> 580<sup>1</sup> 581<sup>1</sup> 582<sup>1</sup> 583<sup>1</sup> 584<sup>1</sup> 585<sup>1</sup> 586<sup>1</sup> 587<sup>1</sup> 588<sup>1</sup> 589<sup>1</sup> 590<sup>1</sup> 591<sup>1</sup> 592<sup>1</sup> 593<sup>1</sup> 594<sup>1</sup> 595<sup>1</sup> 596<sup>1</sup> 597<sup>1</sup> 598<sup>1</sup> 599<sup>1</sup> 600<sup>1</sup> 601<sup>1</sup> 602<sup>1</sup> 603<sup>1</sup> 604<sup>1</sup> 605<sup>1</sup> 606<sup>1</sup> 607<sup>1</sup> 608<sup>1</sup> 609<sup>1</sup> 610<sup>1</sup> 611<sup>1</sup> 612<sup>1</sup> 613<sup>1</sup> 614<sup>1</sup> 615<sup>1</sup> 616<sup>1</sup> 617<sup>1</sup> 618<sup>1</sup> 619<sup>1</sup> 620<sup>1</sup> 621<sup>1</sup> 622<sup>1</sup> 623<sup>1</sup> 624<sup>1</sup> 625<sup>1</sup> 626<sup>1</sup> 627<sup>1</sup> 628<sup>1</sup> 629<sup>1</sup> 630<sup>1</sup> 631<sup>1</sup> 632<sup>1</sup> 633<sup>1</sup> 634<sup>1</sup> 635<sup>1</sup> 636<sup>1</sup> 637<sup>1</sup> 638<sup>1</sup> 639<sup>1</sup> 640<sup>1</sup> 641<sup>1</sup> 642<sup>1</sup> 643<sup>1</sup> 644<sup>1</sup> 645<sup>1</sup> 646<sup>1</sup> 647<sup>1</sup> 648<sup>1</sup> 649<sup>1</sup> 650<sup>1</sup> 651<sup>1</sup> 652<sup>1</sup> 653<sup>1</sup> 654<sup>1</sup> 655<sup>1</sup> 656<sup>1</sup> 657<sup>1</sup> 658<sup>1</sup> 659<sup>1</sup> 660<sup>1</sup> 661<sup>1</sup> 662<sup>1</sup> 663<sup>1</sup> 664<sup>1</sup> 665<sup>1</sup> 666<sup>1</sup> 667<sup>1</sup> 668<sup>1</sup> 669<sup>1</sup> 670<sup>1</sup> 671<sup>1</sup> 672<sup>1</sup> 673<sup>1</sup> 674<sup>1</sup> 675<sup>1</sup> 676<sup>1</sup> 677<sup>1</sup> 678<sup>1</sup> 679<sup>1</sup> 680<sup>1</sup> 681<sup>1</sup> 682<sup>1</sup> 683<sup>1</sup> 684<sup>1</sup> 685<sup>1</sup> 686<sup>1</sup> 687<sup>1</sup> 688<sup>1</sup> 689<sup>1</sup> 690<sup>1</sup> 691<sup>1</sup> 692<sup>1</sup> 693<sup>1</sup> 694<sup>1</sup> 695<sup>1</sup> 696<sup>1</sup> 697<sup>1</sup> 698<sup>1</sup> 699<sup>1</sup> 700<sup>1</sup> 701<sup>1</sup> 702<sup>1</sup> 703<sup>1</sup> 704<sup>1</sup> 705<sup>1</sup> 706<sup>1</sup> 707<sup>1</sup> 708<sup>1</sup> 709<sup>1</sup> 710<sup>1</sup> 711<sup>1</sup> 712<sup>1</sup> 713<sup>1</sup> 714<sup>1</sup> 715<sup>1</sup> 716<sup>1</sup> 717<sup>1</sup> 718<sup>1</sup> 719<sup>1</sup> 720<sup>1</sup> 721<sup>1</sup> 722<sup>1</sup> 723<sup>1</sup> 724<sup>1</sup> 725<sup>1</sup> 726<sup>1</sup> 727<sup>1</sup> 728<sup>1</sup> 729<sup>1</sup> 730<sup>1</sup> 731<sup>1</sup> 732<sup>1</sup> 733<sup>1</sup> 734<sup>1</sup> 735<sup>1</sup> 736<sup>1</sup> 737<sup>1</sup> 738<sup>1</sup> 739<sup>1</sup> 740<sup>1</sup> 741<sup>1</sup> 742<sup>1</sup> 743<sup>1</sup> 744<sup>1</sup> 745<sup>1</sup> 746<sup>1</sup> 747<sup>1</sup> 748<sup>1</sup> 749<sup>1</sup> 750<sup>1</sup> 751<sup>1</sup> 752<sup>1</sup> 753<sup>1</sup> 754<sup>1</sup> 755<sup>1</sup> 756<sup>1</sup> 757<sup>1</sup> 758<sup>1</</sup>

justified by less drastic methods and the order which it introduces. There is, however, a growing consensus of opinion in favour of the main conclusions on which the scheme rests. The sources are for clearness given again in the order conjecturally suggested here. The presence of J<sup>s</sup> and E<sup>s</sup> is often felt, especially in 32-34, but cannot be clearly delimited.

J = 19<sup>2b</sup>, 20-22, 24, 11b-13, 25, 24<sup>11</sup>, 9-11, 34<sup>1</sup>-5r, 10-22r, 32<sup>7</sup>-14r, 25r-29, 33<sup>1</sup>, 3 (Nu 11<sup>10c</sup>, 11f, 14f.) Ex 33<sup>12</sup>-23, 34<sup>8</sup>-9, ...

E = 19<sup>3a</sup>, 9r-11a, 14-17, 19, 20<sup>1</sup>-21, 19b-5, 24<sup>12</sup>-14, 18b, 32<sup>1</sup>-6, 31<sup>18b</sup>, 32<sup>16</sup>-24, 30-34, 33<sup>4</sup>, 6, ... 20<sup>22</sup>-25, 23<sup>10</sup>-33r (with 22<sup>29</sup>-31), 24<sup>3</sup>-8, 18<sup>1</sup>-27r, 33<sup>7</sup>-11 and (after the E passages in Nu) 17<sup>8</sup>-16 the war with Amalek, and 21<sup>1</sup>-23<sup>9</sup> the Book of Judgments, whose original position is supposed to be now occupied by Dt.

Ph = 20<sup>42</sup>-45r, 31<sup>12</sup>-17r.
Ps = 19<sup>1</sup>-2a, 20<sup>11</sup>, 24<sup>15b</sup>-18a, 25-27<sup>19</sup>, 28<sup>1</sup>-40, 42f, 29<sup>1</sup>-30, 22-27, 31<sup>18a</sup>.

Ps = 27<sup>20f</sup>, 28<sup>41</sup>, 29<sup>38</sup>-46, 30-31<sup>11</sup>, 32<sup>15b</sup>-16, 35-40.
R<sup>d</sup> (or R<sup>e</sup>) = 19<sup>3c</sup>-6a, 23, 20<sup>2b</sup>, 4b-6, 7b, 9f, 12b, 17b, 22<sup>21b</sup>-22, 24, 25b, 31, 23<sup>9</sup>, 11b, 12b-13, 15b, 17, 19a, 23-25a, 27, 31b-33, 32<sup>8</sup>, 18, 25b, 33<sup>2</sup>, 5, 34<sup>1b</sup>, 4a, 7b, 10b-13, 15, 23f.

C. Parallels and Contrasts.

J—(a) J<sup>r</sup> 19<sup>11b</sup>, 13, 20ab, 21ab, 22ab, 24 etc., (b) came down (see I D) (c) in fire 19<sup>18</sup> (cf. Gn 19<sup>24</sup> Ex 3<sup>2</sup>, and the pillar of fire II Ca, c) (d) upon Mount Sinai 19<sup>11b</sup>, 18, 20, 23, 34<sup>2</sup>, (e) in the SI ... (f) ... (g) ... (h) ... (i) ... (j) ... (k) ... (l) ... (m) ... (n) ... (o) ... (p) ... (q) ... (r) ... (s) ... (t) ... (u) ... (v) ... (w) ... (x) ... (y) ... (z) ... (aa) ... (ab) ... (ac) ... (ad) ... (ae) ... (af) ... (ag) ... (ah) ... (ai) ... (aj) ... (ak) ... (al) ... (am) ... (an) ... (ao) ... (ap) ... (aq) ... (ar) ... (as) ... (at) ... (au) ... (av) ... (aw) ... (ax) ... (ay) ... (az) ... (ba) ... (bb) ... (bc) ... (bd) ... (be) ... (bf) ... (bg) ... (bh) ... (bi) ... (bj) ... (bk) ... (bl) ... (bm) ... (bn) ... (bo) ... (bp) ... (bq) ... (br) ... (bs) ... (bt) ... (bu) ... (bv) ... (bw) ... (bx) ... (by) ... (bz) ... (ca) ... (cb) ... (cc) ... (cd) ... (ce) ... (cf) ... (cg) ... (ch) ... (ci) ... (cj) ... (ck) ... (cl) ... (cm) ... (cn) ... (co) ... (cp) ... (cq) ... (cr) ... (cs) ... (ct) ... (cu) ... (cv) ... (cw) ... (cx) ... (cy) ... (cz) ... (da) ... (db) ... (dc) ... (dd) ... (de) ... (df) ... (dg) ... (dh) ... (di) ... (dj) ... (dk) ... (dl) ... (dm) ... (dn) ... (do) ... (dp) ... (dq) ... (dr) ... (ds) ... (dt) ... (du) ... (dv) ... (dw) ... (dx) ... (dy) ... (dz) ... (ea) ... (eb) ... (ec) ... (ed) ... (ee) ... (ef) ... (eg) ... (eh) ... (ei) ... (ej) ... (ek) ... (el) ... (em) ... (en) ... (eo) ... (ep) ... (eq) ... (er) ... (es) ... (et) ... (eu) ... (ev) ... (ew) ... (ex) ... (ey) ... (ez) ... (fa) ... (fb) ... (fc) ... (fd) ... (fe) ... (ff) ... (fg) ... (fh) ... (fi) ... (fj) ... (fk) ... (fl) ... (fm) ... (fn) ... (fo) ... (fp) ... (fq) ... (fr) ... (fs) ... (ft) ... (fu) ... (fv) ... (fw) ... (fx) ... (fy) ... (fz) ... (ga) ... (gb) ... (gc) ... (gd) ... (ge) ... (gf) ... (gg) ... (gh) ... (gi) ... (gj) ... (gk) ... (gl) ... (gm) ... (gn) ... (go) ... (gp) ... (gq) ... (gr) ... (gs) ... (gt) ... (gu) ... (gv) ... (gw) ... (gx) ... (gy) ... (gz) ... (ha) ... (hb) ... (hc) ... (hd) ... (he) ... (hf) ... (hg) ... (hh) ... (hi) ... (hj) ... (hk) ... (hl) ... (hm) ... (hn) ... (ho) ... (hp) ... (hq) ... (hr) ... (hs) ... (ht) ... (hu) ... (hv) ... (hw) ... (hx) ... (hy) ... (hz) ... (ia) ... (ib) ... (ic) ... (id) ... (ie) ... (if) ... (ig) ... (ih) ... (ii) ... (ij) ... (ik) ... (il) ... (im) ... (in) ... (io) ... (ip) ... (iq) ... (ir) ... (is) ... (it) ... (iu) ... (iv) ... (iw) ... (ix) ... (iy) ... (iz) ... (ja) ... (jb) ... (jc) ... (jd) ... (je) ... (jf) ... (jg) ... (jh) ... (ji) ... (jj) ... (jk) ... (jl) ... (jm) ... (jn) ... (jo) ... (jp) ... (jq) ... (jr) ... (js) ... (jt) ... (ju) ... (jv) ... (jw) ... (jx) ... (jy) ... (jz) ... (ka) ... (kb) ... (kc) ... (kd) ... (ke) ... (kf) ... (kg) ... (kh) ... (ki) ... (kj) ... (kl) ... (km) ... (kn) ... (ko) ... (kp) ... (kq) ... (kr) ... (ks) ... (kt) ... (ku) ... (kv) ... (kw) ... (kx) ... (ky) ... (kz) ... (la) ... (lb) ... (lc) ... (ld) ... (le) ... (lf) ... (lg) ... (lh) ... (li) ... (lj) ... (lk) ... (ll) ... (lm) ... (ln) ... (lo) ... (lp) ... (lq) ... (lr) ... (ls) ... (lt) ... (lu) ... (lv) ... (lw) ... (lx) ... (ly) ... (lz) ... (ma) ... (mb) ... (mc) ... (md) ... (me) ... (mf) ... (mg) ... (mh) ... (mi) ... (mj) ... (mk) ... (ml) ... (mn) ... (mo) ... (mp) ... (mq) ... (mr) ... (ms) ... (mt) ... (mu) ... (mv) ... (mw) ... (mx) ... (my) ... (mz) ... (na) ... (nb) ... (nc) ... (nd) ... (ne) ... (nf) ... (ng) ... (nh) ... (ni) ... (nj) ... (nk) ... (nl) ... (nm) ... (nn) ... (no) ... (np) ... (nq) ... (nr) ... (ns) ... (nt) ... (nu) ... (nv) ... (nw) ... (nx) ... (ny) ... (nz) ... (oa) ... (ob) ... (oc) ... (od) ... (oe) ... (of) ... (og) ... (oh) ... (oi) ... (oj) ... (ok) ... (ol) ... (om) ... (on) ... (oo) ... (op) ... (oq) ... (or) ... (os) ... (ot) ... (ou) ... (ov) ... (ow) ... (ox) ... (oy) ... (oz) ... (pa) ... (pb) ... (pc) ... (pd) ... (pe) ... (pf) ... (pg) ... (ph) ... (pi) ... (pj) ... (pk) ... (pl) ... (pm) ... (pn) ... (po) ... (pp) ... (pq) ... (pr) ... (ps) ... (pt) ... (pu) ... (pv) ... (pw) ... (px) ... (py) ... (pz) ... (qa) ... (qb) ... (qc) ... (qd) ... (qe) ... (qf) ... (qg) ... (qh) ... (qi) ... (qj) ... (qk) ... (ql) ... (qm) ... (qn) ... (qo) ... (qp) ... (qq) ... (qr) ... (qs) ... (qt) ... (qu) ... (qv) ... (qw) ... (qx) ... (qy) ... (qz) ... (ra) ... (rb) ... (rc) ... (rd) ... (re) ... (rf) ... (rg) ... (rh) ... (ri) ... (rj) ... (rk) ... (rl) ... (rm) ... (rn) ... (ro) ... (rp) ... (rq) ... (rr) ... (rs) ... (rt) ... (ru) ... (rv) ... (rw) ... (rx) ... (ry) ... (rz) ... (sa) ... (sb) ... (sc) ... (sd) ... (se) ... (sf) ... (sg) ... (sh) ... (si) ... (sj) ... (sk) ... (sl) ... (sm) ... (sn) ... (so) ... (sp) ... (sq) ... (sr) ... (ss) ... (st) ... (su) ... (sv) ... (sw) ... (sx) ... (sy) ... (sz) ... (ta) ... (tb) ... (tc) ... (td) ... (te) ... (tf) ... (tg) ... (th) ... (ti) ... (tj) ... (tk) ... (tl) ... (tm) ... (tn) ... (to) ... (tp) ... (tq) ... (tr) ... (ts) ... (tt) ... (tu) ... (tv) ... (tw) ... (tx) ... (ty) ... (tz) ... (ua) ... (ub) ... (uc) ... (ud) ... (ue) ... (uf) ... (ug) ... (uh) ... (ui) ... (uj) ... (uk) ... (ul) ... (um) ... (un) ... (uo) ... (up) ... (uq) ... (ur) ... (us) ... (ut) ... (uu) ... (uv) ... (uw) ... (ux) ... (uy) ... (uz) ... (va) ... (vb) ... (vc) ... (vd) ... (ve) ... (vf) ... (vg) ... (vh) ... (vi) ... (vj) ... (vk) ... (vl) ... (vm) ... (vn) ... (vo) ... (vp) ... (vq) ... (vr) ... (vs) ... (vt) ... (vu) ... (vv) ... (vw) ... (vx) ... (vy) ... (vz) ... (wa) ... (wb) ... (wc) ... (wd) ... (we) ... (wf) ... (wg) ... (wh) ... (wi) ... (wj) ... (wk) ... (wl) ... (wm) ... (wn) ... (wo) ... (wp) ... (wq) ... (wr) ... (ws) ... (wt) ... (wu) ... (wv) ... (ww) ... (wx) ... (wy) ... (wz) ... (xa) ... (xb) ... (xc) ... (xd) ... (xe) ... (xf) ... (xg) ... (xh) ... (xi) ... (xj) ... (xk) ... (xl) ... (xm) ... (xn) ... (xo) ... (xp) ... (xq) ... (xr) ... (xs) ... (xt) ... (xu) ... (xv) ... (xw) ... (xx) ... (xy) ... (xz) ... (ya) ... (yb) ... (yc) ... (yd) ... (ye) ... (yf) ... (yg) ... (yh) ... (yi) ... (yj) ... (yk) ... (yl) ... (ym) ... (yn) ... (yo) ... (yp) ... (yq) ... (yr) ... (ys) ... (yt) ... (yu) ... (yv) ... (yw) ... (yx) ... (yy) ... (yz) ... (za) ... (zb) ... (zc) ... (zd) ... (ze) ... (zf) ... (zg) ... (zh) ... (zi) ... (zj) ... (zk) ... (zl) ... (zm) ... (zn) ... (zo) ... (zp) ... (zq) ... (zr) ... (zs) ... (zt) ... (zu) ... (zv) ... (zw) ... (zx) ... (zy) ... (zz) ...

E—(a) God 19<sup>3a</sup>, 17, 19, 20<sup>1</sup>, 19, 20, 21, 21<sup>6</sup>, 13, 22<sup>8</sup>, 24b, 11 in LXX 28, 24<sup>13</sup>, 31<sup>18b</sup> (cf. D) (b) comes 19<sup>9</sup>, 20<sup>20</sup> (c) in a thick cloud 19<sup>9</sup>, 16, 20<sup>18</sup>, 21, cf. 14<sup>20a</sup>, 33<sup>9</sup> Nu 11<sup>25</sup>, 12<sup>5</sup> Dt 31<sup>15</sup> (d) to the mount of God 24<sup>13</sup> (cf. I C f), (e) that the people ... 19<sup>9</sup>, 19, 20<sup>1</sup>, 19, (f) So Moses has ... PLE 19<sup>10f</sup>, 14f, (g) and they only stand afar off through fear 20<sup>21</sup> (h) after Moses has brought them all near 19<sup>17</sup>, (i) when there is the VOICE of a TRUMPET going on and ... much 19<sup>16</sup>, 19, 20<sup>18</sup>. (j) (see below v, x). W. ... individuals drawing nearer, God

speaks the Decalogue to the people 20<sup>1</sup>, 19, (k) (see below w, y), and the covenant is assented to by the people 19<sup>3b</sup>-5r cf. 24<sup>3</sup>-5 Dt 27<sup>11f</sup>, E Jos 24<sup>16</sup>-27, I S 11<sup>14</sup>-12<sup>25</sup> E. (l) Moses is then summoned, and goes up into the mount with Joshua his minister 24<sup>13a</sup>, cf. 33<sup>11</sup> Nu 11<sup>25</sup>, (m) ... give him the tables of STONE which ... and the law and the commandment that he may teach them 24<sup>13</sup> (with a slight transposition rendered necessary by an alteration presumably made when the Book of Judgments was thrust into the centre of the Book of the Covenant to make way for the Deuteronomic ... in the plains of Moab). (n) On the ... has already written 24<sup>13</sup>, 31<sup>18b</sup> (o) apparently the Decalogue, see Dt 5<sup>22</sup>. (p) Moses remains in the mount 40 days and 40 nights for the purpose, it would seem, of receiving the law and the commandment, here ... refer to the material of the Book ... 21-23<sup>9</sup>. (q) On descending he discovers with surprise the idolatry of the people, (r) and breaks the tables, and destroys the golden calf 32<sup>16a</sup>, 17-20. (s) Moses then intercedes for the people, is bidden to lead them himself, but has promise of God's angel to go before him: there is a marked tone of severity in the words of J<sup>r</sup> 32<sup>30</sup>-35. (t) That E spoke of the ark here may be implied from his allusions in Jos passim, (u) and that he described the making of a simpler form of the tent of meeting, placed without the camp, and possibly adorned by aid of the abandoned ornaments, seems to follow from 33<sup>7</sup>-11 Nu 11<sup>16c</sup>, 24b-30, 12<sup>4</sup>, Dt 31<sup>14</sup>, with Ex 33<sup>8</sup>, 32<sup>12</sup>. (v) J<sup>r</sup> gives the Book of the Covenant 20<sup>22</sup>-25, 22<sup>20f</sup>, 23<sup>10</sup>-33r; (w) the covenant is assented to by the people, see k above; (x) certain young men 24<sup>5</sup> cf. 32<sup>6</sup> and Joshua 33<sup>1</sup>, cf. J under k, (y) offer a covenant sacrifice 24<sup>5</sup> cf. 20<sup>24</sup>, 32<sup>2</sup> Dt 27<sup>6a</sup>.

P—(a) J<sup>r</sup> (so throughout) (b) makes His glory (16<sup>7</sup>, 10, 29<sup>43</sup>, 40<sup>34</sup>, Nu 11<sup>10</sup>, 16<sup>19</sup>, 20<sup>6</sup> etc. the less local and physical use of the term 33<sup>18</sup>, 22 Nu 14<sup>21f</sup> J, Dt 5<sup>24*</sup>) to appear (c) like a man of war (40<sup>38</sup> Lv 9<sup>24</sup>, 10<sup>2</sup> Nu 9<sup>15f</sup>, 16<sup>33</sup>) ... out of the midst of the CLOUD (16<sup>10</sup>, 24<sup>15</sup>, 18ab, 17, 18, 40<sup>34</sup>, 35, 38, 37, 38, 39, 40<sup>38</sup> Lv 16<sup>2</sup> Nu 9<sup>15a</sup>, 11 times 10<sup>11f</sup>, 24, 16<sup>41</sup>) (d) upon Mount Sinai (e) in the eyes of the children of Israel 24<sup>15b</sup>-18a, (f) no priests having yet been consecrated 29 Lv 8-10, (g) all except Moses being kept at a distance; (h) Moses is called, and goes up into the mount 24<sup>16</sup>-18a, (m) that he may receive the two tables of the TESTIMONY 31<sup>18a</sup>, 32<sup>15a</sup>, (n) which had, written on both their sides 32<sup>15b</sup>, (o) no doubt the Decalogue, a brief account of the giving of which may have been ... in favour of the impressive narrative of Dt, 24<sup>13</sup> being perhaps the only fragment preserved. (p) Moses remains in the mount (prob. for 40 days and nights) to receive the pattern of the sanctuary (25-30), (s) with a promise of J<sup>r</sup> to meet with the children of Israel (hence tent of meeting) and to dwell among the children of Israel (hence Tabernacle or Dwelling) 29<sup>42</sup>-46. (t) Moses SUBSEQUENTLY ORDERS to be made an ark of acacia wood, overlaid and ornamented with gold 25<sup>10</sup>-22, 37<sup>1</sup>-9, and puts the testimony into the ark 25<sup>16</sup>, 40<sup>20</sup>; (u) he also prepares, erects, and furnishes a Dwelling for J<sup>r</sup>, large and costly and with a numerous body of priests and Levites to attend to it (35-40).

D. Other Clues.

J—God, when stress is on His nature, deity 24<sup>11</sup> Gn 32<sup>28</sup>, 33<sup>10</sup>, stiff-necked 32<sup>9</sup>, 33<sup>5</sup>, 34<sup>9</sup>, quoted Dt 9<sup>6</sup>, 13; consume 32<sup>10</sup>, 12, 33<sup>5</sup> Gn 41<sup>30</sup> cf. Nu 16<sup>21</sup>, 25 P etc.; and I will make of thee a great nation 32<sup>10</sup> Gn 12<sup>2</sup> Nu 14<sup>2</sup>, ... Gn 12<sup>2</sup>, 46<sup>3</sup> E and Gn 17<sup>20</sup> P; face of the ground ... 14, 61, 7, 74, 23, 83, 13, cf. Nu 12<sup>8</sup> E and Dt 6<sup>15</sup>; ... J<sup>r</sup> 32<sup>12</sup>, 14 Gn 6<sup>6f</sup>, cf. Ex 13<sup>17</sup> Nu 23<sup>19</sup>; land flowing, etc. I D; find grace (in the eyes of) 33<sup>18ab</sup>, 16f, 31<sup>14</sup> Gn 6<sup>5</sup>, 18<sup>9</sup>, 19<sup>9</sup>, 30<sup>27</sup>, 32<sup>8</sup>, 33<sup>5</sup>, 10, 15, 34<sup>11</sup>, 39<sup>4</sup>, 47<sup>25</sup>, 29, 50<sup>4</sup> Nu 11<sup>11</sup>, 15, 32<sup>5</sup> Dt 24<sup>1*</sup>; pass by (of J<sup>r</sup> or His glory) 33<sup>19</sup>, 22ab, 34<sup>6</sup>; proclaim ... 33<sup>19</sup>, 34<sup>6</sup> (thy) glory 33<sup>18</sup>, 22, cf. C b under P; stress on mercy 33<sup>19</sup>, 34<sup>6</sup>, Nu 14<sup>19</sup>; I make a covenant 34<sup>10</sup>, 27.

E—Prove, 2020, see II C a; lord of (wife, etc.), Heb. ba'al, RV married, owner, etc. 213. 22. 23. 23ab 34ab. 36 238. 11f. 14f. 2414 Gn 203 3719 Nu 2128 Jos 2411, in J only once, in the poem Gn 4913; bondswoman 25 217. 26. 26f. 32 (Heb. word never used by J); stress on severity of God 232 3233 Nu 2319 Jos 2419; Aaron 2419 217 17 12, rings (i.e. for ears) 322f. Gn 354 Jc 824ff. (p. 11), and 32-37 Gn 2020; Horeb 33f, see I D; pillar of cloud 33 11, etc. C c.

IV. THE LAWS IN EXODUS.

The four earliest Heb. codes occur in this section, all in an expanded form. The principal additions have been shown above (end of III B); they either interrupt the context, or contrast with it in phraseology or material, or seem to be quotations inserted from elsewhere. Limits of space forbid any further attempt to justify their excision from the orig. sources.

It is now generally agreed that E contained three out of the four codes. This confirms the view that this document, like others, represents the end of a long process, during which various elements were successively assimilated. Moreover, those who combined E with J (referred to as R<sup>6</sup>), who added D (R<sup>4</sup>), who finally incorporated the whole in P (R<sup>2</sup>), naturally in the case of such important material showed at its strongest the desire to preserve all they could. Is it unreasonable to conjecture that each fresh combination required some dislocation of the existing material to suit the new adjustment? In the text as we now have it, E's three codes form together the basis of the Covenant. It has been suggested above that in E, in its final form as a separate document, the Decalogue was the basis of the Covenant, the Book of the Covenant led up to the Renewal of the Covenant, while the Book of Judgments belonged to Moses' parting words in the plains of Moab. If R<sup>6</sup> used J's version of the Covenant to serve for the account of the Renewal of the Cov. (341-28), and, to preserve E's Book of the Cov., put it back to form with the Decalogue the basis of the first Cov.; and if R<sup>4</sup>, inserting D in the section about the plains of Moab, kept the Book of Judgments by incorporating it with the Book of the Cov., then the very order which we now have would have been produced. That this actually took place is only conjecture; but it was worth while showing how the present state of the text might have arisen; and this solution has at least the merit that it only presupposes the action of causes which have been clearly traced at work elsewhere.

The Codes compared.

J—The Ten Words of the Covenant (III C 1-p above) —(The list given is only the one thought best of several possible ones. Parallels in E are marked by the number. Laws in 3 codes are in LARGE CAPITALS; given by both J and E in SMALL CAPITALS): (1) MONOLATRY COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; (3) THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD; (4) THE SABBATH; (5) THE FEAST OF WEEKS OF FIRSTFRUITS; and (6) THE FEAST OF INGATHERING, COVENANTED; (7) BREAD WITH SACRIFICES TO BE UNLEAVENED; (8) THE PASSOVER sacrifice TO BE ALL CONSUMED; (9) FIRSTFRUITS REQUIRED; (10) SETHING OF A KID IN ITS DAM'S MILK FORBIDDEN.

E—The Decalogue (1) MONOLATRY COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; false swearing forbidden; (4) THE SABBATH enjoined; reverence to parents commanded, murder, adultery, theft, false witness, and covetousness forbidden.

E—The Book of the Covenant (III C v above) (1) MONOLATRY COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; altars to be built as ordered; (3) FIRSTFRUIT OFFERINGS (cf. 1319f J); the sabbatical year, and (4) THE SABBATH COMMANDED; also (3) THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD, (5) THE FEAST OF HARVEST OF FIRSTFRUITS, and (6) THE FEAST OF INGATHERING; (7) BREAD WITH SACRIFICES TO BE UNLEAVENED; (8) THE FAT OF GOD'S YEAST TO BE ALL CONSUMED; (10) SETHING A KID IN ITS DAM'S MILK FORBIDDEN.

(It will be observed that, while the Decalogue (which see) contains both religious and moral laws, the other two concern only religion and the cultus, and are very closely parallel to one another.)

E—The Book of Judgments (21-28). This code contains a comprehensive series of laws, civil and criminal, all penetrated by a high ethical and religious spirit. They seem drawn up, perhaps originally in sets of 5 or 10, for use of judges and magistrates, but display no very definite order of arrangement. The appeal lies before God, i.e. (presumably) at the sanctuary, cf. 1813-26. With this code, and the care with which it is compared Dt 12-26, which is based on it, and Lv 17-26, the Holiness Legislation, which presents many parallels.

The chapters in P relating to the Tabernacle (which see) remain to be considered. They are not without difficulty, for a close inspection discovers reasons for believing that they are not all from the same hand. The full proof of the analysis given above (end of III B) cannot be reproduced here, but the nature of the principal line of argument can be seen from the accompanying table, which gives the sections in the order of 35-40 (Heb. text)=H<sup>2</sup>, while on either side are given references to 25-31 (Heb. text)=H<sup>1</sup>, and 35-40 (Gr. text)=G. The letters indicate by their alphabetical order the order of sections in the text referred to; and those sections in H<sup>1</sup> which are added later than P<sup>2</sup> are marked by an italic addition. A moment's comparison of H<sup>1</sup> and H<sup>2</sup> shows large variations of order. But while the changes of order in A to K and M to U can be readily accounted for by the mere fact that H<sup>2</sup> records the fulfilment and H<sup>1</sup> the ordering, the passages L, W, X, Z, A', B' seem so out of place where they are that it is necessary to suppose them to be later than the context that would otherwise have contained them. The golden altar of incense (W=m) is the most important case. (1) It is out of its natural place in H<sup>1</sup>; (2) the term the altar in 271-3, and 100 times elsewhere in P<sup>2</sup> and (early) P<sup>1</sup>, would be unnecessary if the altar were one of two, and is replaced in 351 etc. by a distinctive term, the altar of burnt-offering, and so constantly in the later strata of P<sup>2</sup>; (3) the incense altar is not mentioned in G; (4) in Lv 10 and Nu 16 we only read of censers for incense, and the

| H <sup>1</sup> | The Dwelling.                        | H <sup>2</sup> | G                        |
|----------------|--------------------------------------|----------------|--------------------------|
| A. 251-9       | gifts asked . . .                    | a. 354-9       | a. 354-8g                |
| ...            | workmen invited . . .                | b. 10-19       | b. 9-19†                 |
| ...            | gifts presented . . .                | c. 20-29       | c. 20-29                 |
| C. 311-11      | Bezalel, etc. . .                    | d. 30-36†      | d. 30-36†                |
| ...            | gifts finished . . .                 | e. 362-7       | e. 362-7                 |
| E. 261-14      | curtains . . .                       | f. 8-19        | f. 371†                  |
| F. 15-30       | boards . . .                         | g. 20-34       | g. 3818-21†              |
| G. 31f.        | veil . . .                           | h. 35f.        | h. 373f.                 |
| I. 36f.        | screen . . .                         | i. 37f.        | m. 5f                    |
| B. 2510-22     | ark . . .                            | j. 371-9       | p. 381-8g                |
| C. 23-30       | table . . .                          | k. 10-16       | q. 9-12†                 |
| D. 31-40       | candlestick . . .                    | l. 17-24       | r. 12-17†                |
| W. 301-5       | incense altar . . .                  | m. 25-28       | ...                      |
| X. 6-10        | its use . . .                        | ...            | ...                      |
| A'. 22-33      | anointing oil . . .                  | n. 29a         | u. 25a                   |
| B'. 34-38      | incense . . .                        | o. 29b         | v. 25b                   |
| J. 271-8       | brazen altar . . .                   | p. 381-7       | t. 22-24†                |
| Z. 3017-21     | laver . . .                          | q. 8           | u. 26                    |
| K. 279-19      | court . . .                          | r. 9-20        | n. 377-18                |
| L. 20f.        | oil for light . . .                  | ...            | ...                      |
| ...            | summary of gifts . . .               | s. 31-31       | {o. 3719-21y. 391-10 |
| M. 281-5       | priests' dress, ephod . . .          | t. 391-7       | {o. 3913†f. 363-14g  |
| N. 6-12        | breastplate . . .                    | u. 398-21      | g. 3618-29               |
| O. 2813-29     | Urim and Thummim . . .               | ...            | ...                      |
| P. 30          | robe . . .                           | v. 22-26       | h. 30-34                 |
| Q. 31-35       | coats, etc. . .                      | w. 27-29       | i. 35-37                 |
| S. 38-43       | plate on mitre . . .                 | x. 30f         | j. 38-40                 |
| R. 36-38       | summary . . .                        | y. 32-43       | {z. 3911†{b'. 14-22† |
| ...            | order to erect, etc. . .             | z. 401-15      | c'. 401-13†              |
| ...            | brief execution . . .                | a'. 16         | d'. 14                   |
| ...            | erection of dwelling . . .           | b'. 17-19      | e'. 15-17                |
| H. 2638-35     | furniture placed . . .               | c'. 20-30      | f'. 18-28g               |
| ...            | use of laver . . .                   | d'. 31         | z. 3827                  |
| ...            | erection of court . . .              | e'. 32f.       | g'. 4027g                |
| T. 291-35      | consecration of Aaron and sons . . . | Lv 8           | ...                      |
| U. 36f.        | do. of altar . . .                   | ...            | ...                      |
| V. 38-43       | daily sacrifice . . .                | ...            | ...                      |
| Y. 3011-16     | atonement money . . .                | ...            | ...                      |

§ Part omitted.

† With omissions and variations.

altar is still the only one Nu 16<sup>38</sup>. It may be noted that 28<sup>41</sup> 29<sup>21</sup> are late P<sup>a</sup> because Aaron's sons receive anointing, contrary to the clear intention of P<sup>a</sup> in 29<sup>7</sup> 29<sup>14</sup>, and so Lv 8<sup>12</sup> etc. A further comparison of H<sup>2</sup> with G shows a second set of variations. It is held by many that the facts require us to suppose that the Greek tr. of 35-40 was made before the Heb. text had reached its present symmetrical and complete form. By means of the above table the student can readily test for himself the value of this suggestion.

V. CONCLUDING SURVEY.

i. The History.—If we accept the results of this article as in the main correct, we have passed far beyond the boundary of a merely negative criticism. It might be called destructive work to show by detailed proof that we have no contemporary account of the Exodus and subsequent events. But when it is shown that the present narrative is made up of three, so far contrasting with one another as to prove themselves much later in date than the period of which they treat, and the work, not merely of different individuals, but of different schools of historical writing; and when the further step is taken of disentangling, with infinite pains of many labourers in many lands, the several threads of narrative, and recombining them in something like their original connexions, the work of constructive criticism must be held to have been well begun. The summaries will have shown on how many important points the three witnesses are at one. For fuller particulars see MOSES, ISRAEL.

But, while it is well to remember that contrasts are not always, or even usually, contradictions, it would be idle to try to belittle the extent of the change of view brought about. We may rather think of it as the drawing back of a veil of illusion which God wisely allowed to hang over the past, until the growth of truer ideas about history both took away the veil, and made men ready to make use of the facts, whose real relations were at last adequately discovered.

If, therefore, it has to be admitted that the Priestly history (P) has no independent value as a witness to the Mosaic period, and that the materials in E, and to a less extent in J, require careful sifting before being regarded as correctly representing an age which to them was already a distant age, we may set against that two things. First, an exact view of that epoch might have disappointed us, even as a field sown with corn has little beauty till the seeds have shot up into blade and stem. Secondly, we have instead three views of it, so influenced by the ideas of the writers' own times and circumstances as to reveal to us various stages in the after-growth, which was itself entirely dependent on that germinal time. On the face of it, the book tells of the Exodus of Isr. from the bondage of Egypt; in the soul of it, it speaks, to those who have ears to hear, of successive stages in the great outgoing, at once more glorious and more perilous, of the family of man from the bondage of superstition, sin, and sin. The events are not merely typical of spiritual realities; but the very fact that they were thus and then recorded, shows the faith of the men of other days in the God whose hand they loved to trace at work in the world.

ii. The Learning Ideas.—The Heb. writers are not mere annalists, but interpreters of history. Hence their permanent value. They may be criticised as chroniclers of outward events, but they sought and found God everywhere, and they abide to hand on their secret. In all three documents we find the same fundamental verities emphasized, which give to Ex its real unity. J<sup>a</sup> is the supreme God, ruling in Egypt, and master over nature. He is the faithful God who made His choice of the fathers of the Heb. race, and will not draw back. He is the God of grace, and so loves to counsel, help, food, drink, every . . . He is the Holy One, and requires obedience to His will, and takes steps to make known that will. He is the Jealous God, and demands that due worship shall be paid to Him, and to none else. He is the Covenant God, and the two sides of the Covenant are: J<sup>a</sup> Israel's God, Israel J<sup>a</sup>'s people.

But each document has its individual standpoint, even as each of the synoptic Gospels presents its own picture of the life of Christ. The oldest, J, perhaps coming from the priestly circle connected with Solomon's temple, is written from the point of view of a high-minded patriot, keenly interested in every detail of national history, so quick to see God's hand in events as to be able to make his story . . . little use of the miraculous, alive to all the shades of character in men, as well as to the richness of the Divine nature, in which mercy rejoiceth against judgment, valuing highly the common ordinances of religion, and . . . the great opportunities of the priestly . . . document E, probably rather later, and . . . coming from . . . circles, reflects . . . of the prophets. This work (extending from Gn to Kings) is a series of biographical studies of great prophetic heroes, with Moses as the central figure. Much stress is laid on morality. The people sin, and need to be called to repentance. God is righteous, and His requirements must not be despised. The miraculous element is heightened, of course unconsciously. The moral of each incident must be made clear, the reality of the Divine government set unmistakably forth. Sad experience of the faults of the priesthood leads to the priests being either passed over, or introduced for blame. Worship is strictly secondary to morality.

The priestly writer (P) has lost all hold upon the simplicities and brightnesses of the childhood of the nation. So possessed is he with reverence for the religious institutions of the now ruined temple, that he not only has already in the vision-chamber of his imagination elaborated them to an ideal perfection which they never had, but this ideal picture must be, he has become persuaded, the reflection of what actually existed in the primitive, the perfect days. Each new improvement is unconsciously added with the same formula of Divine inspiration, the argument being: 'We see this to be best now, therefore it must have been ordered and done then.' Granted, then, that this stately centralization was the Divine purpose for the Second Temple, we may surely accept the unhistorical form of the priestly legislation as being probably the only means by which it could have been successfully introduced. After all, the full corn in the ear is present in the seed, if not in miniature, at least in promise and potency.

The Bk. of Ex is like a grand symphony, which was once thought to give harmony without discord, but is now being found, in virtue of elements which by themselves are sharply discordant, to sound forth a yet richer harmony.

THE HON. CHURCHMAN. B. W. Bacon's The Triple . . . his arts in the Journal of Bibl. . . . great service to the writer; and . . . plausible . . . Exodus.

G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

EXORCISM, EXORCIST.—The word ἐξορκισμός is a later form of the classical ἐξορκισμός. The latter is employed in Demosthenes in the sense of 'administer an oath to a person.' The verb ἐξορκίζω is used by the high priest to Jesus 'I adjure thee by have been derived. The article 'Kabbalah,' in the same dictionary, may also be consulted with advantage. OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

EXPECT, EXPECTATION.—Following Lat. expectare, 'expect' meant in older Eng. not only 'look forward to,' but 'wait,' or 'await.' Thus in Douay '... nent on Sir 11<sup>8</sup> is 'Expect the end of another mans speach, before you begin to answer. Expect also if anie that is elder, or better able will answer first.' Expect is used in this way in Job 32<sup>m</sup>, 2 Mac 9<sup>25</sup>, and He 10<sup>13</sup> 'From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.' The Gr. of last passage is ἐκδέχομαι, elsewhere in NT tr<sup>d</sup> 'wait for' (Jn 5<sup>8</sup>, RV omits, Ac 17<sup>16</sup>, Ja 5<sup>7</sup>), 'tarry for' (1 Co 11<sup>33</sup>, RV 'wait for'), 'look for' (1 Co 16<sup>11</sup> RV 'expect,' He 11<sup>10</sup>). Cf. Bacon, Adv. of Learning, i. (Selby's ed. p. 14, l. 35), 'The most active or busy man that hath been or can be, hath, no question, many vacant times of leisure, while he expecteth the tides and returns of business.'

Expectation is used throughout in the sense of 'look forward to with hope. Thus even in Ps. 130<sup>1</sup> 'My soul, wait* thou only upon God; for my expectation is from him,' the Heb. is tiqwal (תִּקְוָה), similarly tr<sup>d</sup> in Ps 91<sup>3</sup> and in Pr, but most often tr<sup>d</sup> 'hope,' and the meaning is 'that which I hope for, my deliverance.' In Ro 8<sup>19</sup>, Ph 1<sup>20</sup> 'earnest expectation' is an effort to bring out the full force of the Gr. word ἀποκαρδοκία, which is found nowhere else. It is formed from δοκέω in the sense of 'watch,' κάρα, the 'head,' and ἀπό, 'from,' so that it means (Sanday-Headlam) 'awaiting with outstretched head,' the prep. denoting 'diversion from other things and concentration on a single object.' The Vulg. has simply expectatio, whence Rhemish 'expectation.' Wyc. has 'abiding.' But in Ro 8<sup>19</sup> Tind. gives 'fervent desire,' and is generally followed (Cov. 'fervent longing'). 'Earnest expectation' is the Bishops' translation in both places.

J. HASTINGS.

EXPEDIENT is never found in AV in the sense of 'expeditious,' as so often in Shakespeare. On the other hand, it never means merely 'convenient' (opposed to what is rigidly right), as in modern English. The Greek is always συμφέρει, or (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>) συμφέρον (= 'it is profitable,' as AV and RV elsewhere tr. the word, except in Mt 18<sup>8</sup> AV 'it were better,' and 19<sup>10</sup> AV 'it is not good,' RV 'it is not expedient'). So even Caiaphas (Jn 11<sup>50</sup> 'it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people') does not openly prefer, as a modern politician, the convenient to the just. His words are like those of Jeremiah (28<sup>14</sup> Cov.), 'Now as for me: I am in your hands, do with me as ye thinke expedient and good,' though his spirit is the opposite. J. HASTINGS.

EXPERIENCE, which is the result of 'experiment,' was sometimes used for the experiment itself, as Baker, Jewell of Health, 112<sup>a</sup> 'The Authour . . . hath both seen and done many experiences worthy memorie.' This is no doubt the meaning in Gn 30<sup>27</sup>, where Laban says to Jacob, 'I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake.' It is the Douay translation. The Geneva has 'perceived,' but in marg. 'tried by experience.'

The Heb. (וָעָרַן) means to observe omens, whence RV 'I have divined' (Gn 22<sup>15</sup>, 28<sup>15</sup>, 30<sup>27</sup>, 41<sup>15</sup>, 44<sup>15</sup>, 45<sup>15</sup>, 46<sup>15</sup>, 47<sup>15</sup>, 48<sup>15</sup>, 49<sup>15</sup>, 50<sup>15</sup>, 51<sup>15</sup>, 52<sup>15</sup>, 53<sup>15</sup>, 54<sup>15</sup>, 55<sup>15</sup>, 56<sup>15</sup>, 57<sup>15</sup>, 58<sup>15</sup>, 59<sup>15</sup>, 60<sup>15</sup>, 61<sup>15</sup>, 62<sup>15</sup>, 63<sup>15</sup>, 64<sup>15</sup>, 65<sup>15</sup>, 66<sup>15</sup>, 67<sup>15</sup>, 68<sup>15</sup>, 69<sup>15</sup>, 70<sup>15</sup>, 71<sup>15</sup>, 72<sup>15</sup>, 73<sup>15</sup>, 74<sup>15</sup>, 75<sup>15</sup>, 76<sup>15</sup>, 77<sup>15</sup>, 78<sup>15</sup>, 79<sup>15</sup>, 80<sup>15</sup>, 81<sup>15</sup>, 82<sup>15</sup>, 83<sup>15</sup>, 84<sup>15</sup>, 85<sup>15</sup>, 86<sup>15</sup>, 87<sup>15</sup>, 88<sup>15</sup>, 89<sup>15</sup>, 90<sup>15</sup>, 91<sup>15</sup>, 92<sup>15</sup>, 93<sup>15</sup>, 94<sup>15</sup>, 95<sup>15</sup>, 96<sup>15</sup>, 97<sup>15</sup>, 98<sup>15</sup>, 99<sup>15</sup>, 100<sup>15</sup>). A. (e) and elsewhere. The ptp. is found in 12<sup>15</sup> and 13<sup>15</sup> (see Driver's note).

J. HASTINGS.

* There is no suggested connexion between 'wait' and 'expectation,' as the Heb. for 'wait' is 'be silent unto God,' as RVm (Cheyne), 'be simply resigned to God'.

EXPERIMENT is narrower and more concrete now than in older Eng. Occurring in AV in 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup> only, '... experiment of this ministration they glorify God,' its meaning is 'test,' 'proof,' as Wither (1618), Motto, De Cruce, 533—

'I want not much experiment to show
That all is good God pleaseth to bestow.'

The Gr. is δοκιμή (tr<sup>d</sup> 'experience' in Ro 5<sup>4</sup> AV, but RV 'probation'). 'Experiment' is the Geneva word; RV 'seeing that ... of you by this ministration ... is a return to Wychi, '... of this mynsterie.' J. HASTINGS.

EXPIATION.—See ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

EXPOSURE.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

EXPRESS.—Only He 1<sup>3</sup> 'the express image of his person' (χαράκτῃς, RV 'the very image,' RVm 'the impress'); and Wis 14<sup>17</sup> they . . . made an express image of a king' (ἐμφανῇ εἰκόνα, RV 'a visible image'). On χαράκτῃς see Westcott, in loc. The tr. of RV is after Tind.; the Geneva ('engraved forme') tries to bring out the sense of the Gr. word, which is 'engraved on any object, as a stamp' and this is the meaning of AV 'express image'; cf. Shaks. Hamlet, II. ii. 299, 'What a piece of work is a man! . . . in form and moving, how express and admirable,' which Aldis Wright explains thus: 'Exact, fitted to its purpose, as the seal fits the stamp.' Exprimere (ptcp. expressus) has the meaning among others of 'copy,' 'pourtray,' and from this the Gr. word was used before 1611 in the sense of 'expressly pourtrayed.' Thus Sir T. More, (1513) Rich. III. 'This is ye fathers own figure . . . ye playne expresse lykenes of ye noble Duke.' J. HASTINGS.

EXQUISITE.—From Lat. exquisitus, ptp. of exquirere, to search out, 'exquisite' is 'sought out' and was originally, that which is 'ingeniously devised,' 'ingenious,' and its application may be to good or bad. In the Tragedy of the Learned (ed. p. 16) Milton says Mr. Selden's volume 'proves . . . by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea, errors, known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest.' Milton even uses the word actively of persons in Comus, 359,

'Peace, brother, be not over-exquisite To cast the fashion of uncertain evils,' as other writers had done before him. Exquisite occurs Sir 18<sup>29</sup> 'They . . . poured forth e. parables' (παροιμίας ἀκριβείς, RV 'apt proverbs'), and 19<sup>28</sup> 'There is an e. subtilty, and the same is unjust' (so RV, Gr. πανουργία ἀκριβής). J. HASTINGS.

EXTINCT.—Extinct. (Lat. extinctus, ptp. of extinguere, to extinguish) only expresses a state, 'the volcano is extinct'; 'the volcano is extinct.' But formerly it expressed the action which produces the state, and so Job 17<sup>1</sup> 'my days are extinct' (נִכְרַח יָמַי), and Is 43<sup>17</sup> 'they are extinct, they are quenched as tow' (נִכְרַח). Cf. Shaks. Rich. II. I. iii. 222—

'... extinguished ...'

'Extinguished' occurs, however, in Wis 2<sup>8</sup>.

In the 16th cent. a verb 'to extinct' was coined, of which the past ptp. was sometimes 'extincted' and sometimes 'extinct.' It is thus uncertain whether 'extinct' as ptp. belongs to 'extinguish' or to this verb. Shaks. uses 'extinct' twice, 'extincted' once (Oth. II. i. 81, 'Give renewed fire to our extincted spirits!'), but never 'extinguished.' He uses the verb 'extinguish' only once. J. HASTINGS.

EXTREME is used as an adv. in Sir 42<sup>8</sup> 'the extreme aged' (εσχαρόγητος). So Bacon, Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 156), 'Acting in Song, especially in Dialogues, hath an extreme Good Grace'; and p. 178, 'all Deformed Persons are extreme bold'; and again in Advances of Learning, II. xxiii. 38, 'it [is] extreme hard to play an after game of reputation.' J. HASTINGS.

EYE.—The verb occurs twice: 1. Gn 29<sup>17</sup> 'Leah was tender eyed' (עֵינֶי לֵאָה רַחֲמָנִים, RV 'L's eyes were tender'). Whether 'tender' is appreciatory or depreciatory is disputed. Modern commentators usually say depreciatory, after LXX (ἀσθενείς) and Peshitta. But others, the tender brightness of a child, after Onk. and Saadya, and quoting Gn 33<sup>13</sup> 'My lord knoweth that the children are tender' (same Heb.). See Spurrell, in loc.; also Otts, The Fifth C., i. 11 f.; and Expos. Times, v. 97. The V. ... culis, 'blear-eyed,' is certainly wrong. 2. 1 S 15<sup>15</sup> 'And Saul eyed David from that day and forward' (וַיַּחַד סָאֵל דָּוִד מִיּוֹם הַהוּא וְעַד הַיּוֹם הַהוּא, a denom. from יָרָא to eye). For the construction and Heb. parallels, see Driver, in loc. The meaning is to look on with envy (cf. invidia); and see the 'Evil Eye' under art. ENVY, and Trench, NT Synonymus, p. 106 f.), but there is no other example in English of the verb 'eye' in the sense of 'envy.' J. HASTINGS.

EYE (עֵינִי).—The eyes of Orientals are usually well formed, large, and lustrous, but deficient in that play of expression which accompanies thought, humour, and fancy.

As the chief of the organs of sense, the eye had a leading place in the lex talionis, 'eye for eye' (Ex 21<sup>24</sup>). To put out the eyes of an enemy or prisoner was like breaking the teeth of a captured wild animal, the removal of the chief power to injure. It was also a great degradation (Jg 16<sup>21</sup>, 1 S 11<sup>2</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>7</sup>). Among the begging classes of Palestine, blindness, next to the removal of the chief power to injure, makes the strongest appeal to the charity of the benevolent. Blind men are sometimes known to decline the offer of the medical missionary, as restored sight would mean a loss of privilege (see Blindness under MEDICINE).

The fig. references to the eye are many and varied. As the chief means of contact with the outer world, the eye is the source of pleasurable sensations and the principal avenue of temptation (Gn 3<sup>6</sup>, Pr 27<sup>20</sup>, Ezk 24<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>). Knowledge is the opening of the eyes (Gn 3<sup>7</sup>, Ps 119<sup>18</sup>, Eph 1<sup>18</sup>).

The prophet was first called the 'seer' (נָחֵם) 1 S 9<sup>9</sup>, and his message a 'vision' (חֶזְיוֹן) Is 1<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 7<sup>26</sup> etc. In connexion with the feelings, sorrow is associated with a consumed or wasted eye (Ps 6<sup>7</sup>), and satisfaction in worldly prosperity with an eye standing out with fatness (Ps 73<sup>7</sup>).

Tear-bottles are often found in the ancient tombs, as affecting tokens of regret and grief. This memorial act may be referred to in Ps 56<sup>8</sup> 'Put thou my tears into thy bottle.' (See BOTTLE.) To have the eyes delivered from tears takes rank with the deliverance of the soul from death and the feet from falling (Ps 116<sup>8</sup>); to have all tears wiped from the eyes (Rev 21<sup>4</sup>), is part of the riches in glory.

As a judge of what is pleasant or offensive, the eye indicates an intention of favour or hostility. Thus in an Arabic salutation, in answer to the opening inquiry as to health, the usual reply is, 'Well, by your looking upon me' (favour of your eye), and the conventional parry of politeness is to say, 'By God's looking upon you.' A similar thought of the eye's protective favour lies in the words providence, episcopos, overseer. On the other hand, there is the widespread and silly superstition about the power of the evil-eye, and one of the chief uses of the amulet (wh. see) is to obtain protection against it.

The Eyelids (עַלְמַלְמַל) are mentioned as a means of seduction employed by the 'evil woman' (Pr 6<sup>25</sup>), and not infrequently appear in poetical language as a synonym for, or parallel with, the eyes (Job 16<sup>16</sup>, Jer 9<sup>18</sup>, Ps 11<sup>4</sup> 132<sup>4</sup>, Pr 6<sup>4</sup> 30<sup>13</sup>). By a beautiful metaphor in Job 3<sup>9</sup> 41<sup>18</sup> the first rays of dawn are called the 'eyelids of the morning.'

Eye-paint (מַשְׁחָה, Arab. kahl; cf. מַשְׁחָה Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>) was a paste made of antimony powder, giving a brown-black burnished stain to the eyelashes. The practice which is depicted on the monuments still continues in Egypt (see Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 45 f.). The paint is kept in a small horn or ornamental metal vase with a thin rod for applying it. It makes the eyes look larger and more lustrous (2 K 9<sup>30</sup>, Jer 4<sup>30</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>). One of Job's daughters was called מַשְׁחָה, 'horn of eye-paint' (Job 42<sup>14</sup>).

HORN FOR EYE-PAINT.

The Eye-salve (κολλώριον, collyrium) of Rev 3<sup>8</sup> was a preparation used for healing or strengthening the eye (cf. Hor. Sat. i. 5. 30; Epic<sup>1</sup> Deus i. 21. 20, iii. 21. 21; Cels. vi. 6. 7). (See MEDICINE.)

G. M. MACKIE.

EYESERVICE.—This is a literal tr. in Eph 6<sup>8</sup>, Col 3<sup>24</sup> of the Greek ὀφθαλμοδουλεία, and seems to have been coined by Tindale, although he uses it only in Col, in Eph giving 'service in the eye sight.' The word was at once adopted into the language, Crowley (1550), Last Trump, 163, having 'Se thou serve him . . . not with eye-service faindly.' The AV of 1611 is, however, the first Version that has eye service in Eph (it writes two separate words as all the Versions do in Col). The Greek word is found nowhere else: 'This happy expression,' says Lightfoot, 'would seem to be the apostle's own coinage.' J. HASTINGS.

EZBAI (עֶזְבַּי).—The father of Naarai, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11<sup>37</sup>). The parallel passage 2 S 23<sup>35</sup> reads 'Paarai the Arbite' (פָּאֵרַי אֲרִבִּי) for 'Naarai the son of Ezbai' (נָאֵרַי בֶּן־עֶזְבַּי). It is impossible to decide with any confidence between the rival readings. (See Kittel's note on 1 Ch 11<sup>37</sup> in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT.)

J. A. SELBIE.

EZBON (עֶזְבוֹן, אֶזְבוֹן).—1. Eponym of a Gadite family (Gn 46<sup>16</sup>), called in Nu 26<sup>16</sup> Ozni (which see). 2. A grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 7<sup>7</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

EZEKIAS.—1. (A 'Ezekias, B 'Ezelas, AV Ezechias) 1 Es 9<sup>14</sup> = JAHZELAH, Ezr 10<sup>15</sup>. 2. ('Ezekias, AV Ezechias) 1 Es 9<sup>14</sup>.—Called HILKIAH, Neh 8<sup>4</sup>.

EZEKIEL (Vulg. Ezechiel, LXX 'Ιεζεκιήλ, Heb. עֶזְקִיָּה, 'God is strong,' or 'God strengthens'), the son of Buzi, was one of the temple priests who shared the exile of Jehoiachin in B.C. 597 (Ezk 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. 2 K 24<sup>14-16</sup>). His work as a prophet commenced in the fifth year of his banishment (1<sup>2</sup>), and extended over a period of not less than 22 years (592-570); the latest date in the book being the 'seven and twentieth year' of his sojourn in Babylonia (29<sup>17</sup>). This part of his life (as far as appears) in a Jewish settlement near the 'river Chebar' (כְּבַר), which was probably a canal or a tributary of the Euphrates in the vicinity of Babylon, certainly not the Haboras (חַבּוֹר 2 K 17<sup>6</sup>) in N. Mesopotamia. The life of this colony of expatriated Jews is but dimly reflected in the pages of Ezk; the picture is partly supplemented by the 29th ch. of Jer. Those carried captive were the élite of the nation; and they seem to have lived in tolerably easy circumstances, enjoying a large measure of freedom and self-government, forming a little world of their own, and cherishing a moderate interest in the concerns of their native land. They kept up by some means an active intercourse with Jerus.; and, in spite of intense mutual antipathy between them and the ruling classes at home, they never ceased to regard themselves as part and parcel of the Heb. nation, confidently expecting that some great upheaval would speedily restore their place at the head of the state. This delusion was fostered by the rise of prophets of the same type as Jeremiah's opponents in Jerus.—an event which was hailed with immense satisfaction, not unmixed with surprise, by the exiled community (Jer 29<sup>15</sup>). The false patriotism thus engendered threatened to bring down the heavy arm of Nebuchadnezzar on the captives, and Jer., though his sympathies were with the patrician exiles rather than with the people left in the land (Jer 24<sup>1-3</sup>), endeavoured to allay the dangerous political excitement which blinded them to their true position. Altogether, it would seem that the main currents of feeling and opinion prevalent in Pal. were reproduced with remarkable fidelity in the community where E. was destined to labour.

Although little is known of E.'s previous life, it cannot be doubted that he found himself from the first in a peculiar social atmosphere. In spite of the Ant. X. vi. 3, παῖς ὧν, he was probably no longer a young man when deported to Babylon. The meaning of 'the 30th year' in ch. 1<sup>1</sup> is too obscure to throw light on the matter, but his familiarity with the technical details of the temple and its ritual seems to show that he had officiated for a considerable time in the national sanctuary. The numerous points of contact between him and Jer. would indicate that he had come early under the influence of that great prophet, and from the whole trend of his thinking it is probable that he had belonged to the priestly caste, which sought to bring the nation into accordance with the requirements of the Deuteronomic legislation. That party had been powerless since the death of Josiah, and it is reasonable to suppose that E.'s stern and even embittered attitude towards the people was in part the fruit of the years of reaction and disappointment spent under the reign of Jehoiakim. As we have seen, there was nothing in the state of mind of his fellow-exiles to draw him into sympathy with them; he certainly agreed with Jer. in regarding them as superior to those left behind in Judæa. Accordingly, at the time of his consecration as a prophet, he appears with his convictions matured as to the character of his countrymen and the reception he may expect at their hands (2. 3 pass.). They are, to use one of his stereotyped phrases, a 'rebellious house,' brazen-faced and stiff-hearted children, a people that refuse to hear J<sup>h</sup>, separated from Him by a moral and spiritual barrier more formidable than that caused by a strange language (23. 4 33<sup>7</sup>). Although these facts are expressed in the form of divine communications to the prophet, they are not to be regarded as a new revelation of the disposition of his compatriots; they are rather the settled convictions of his life assuming definite shape in the light of his commission to speak the word of the Lord. They show, at all events, how fully he recognized the depth of the antagonism that prevailed between the prophetic conception of religion and the impulses that swayed the national mind both in Judæa and in Babylonia.

The actual circumstances of E.'s prophetic career are greatly obscured for us by the difficulty we have in separating what is real from what is merely imagined, in the representation given by the book. That everything did not happen literally as it is recorded, is evident enough from several indications. The symbolic actions described as performed by the prophet are in some instances incapable of a literal acceptance (see, e.g. 4<sup>22</sup>, 5<sup>12</sup>, 12<sup>18</sup> etc.); yet there is no external criterion by which these can be distinguished from others which are possible. A similar uncertainty hangs over the events that are mentioned. These are never introduced for their own sake, but only as the setting of some idea which the writer wishes to enforce, and it is frequently impossible to determine how far the allusions correspond with actual experiences. In such incidents as the death of the prophet's wife (24<sup>18</sup>), or the opening of his mouth in the presence of 'the fugitive' (24<sup>27</sup> 33<sup>22</sup>), fact and symbolism seem to be so intimately blended that we cannot tell where the one ends and the other begins. The book, in short, is not an autobiography, but a systematic exposition of prophetic ideas, and any attempt to extract historical information from it has to be made with a certain measure of caution. At the same time, it is quite incredible that the whole representation should be nothing but an elaborate fiction, without any basis in fact. There can be no reasonable doubt that E. really exercised an oral public ministry amongst his fellow-captives, or that its main outlines may be gathered from the thin thread of narrative that runs through the book. His work was divided into two distinct periods by the overthrow of the state in the year 586; or, to speak more accurately, the first period ends with the commencement of the siege of Jerus. (Jan. 587, cf. 24<sup>1</sup>), and the second begins with the reception in Babylon of the tidings of its fall (Jan. 585, cf. 33<sup>21</sup>).* During the interval of two years, his public activity appears to have been suspended. Throughout the first period the almost exclusive theme of his preaching was the approaching destruction of Jerus. and the lessons to be drawn by the nation. His reiterated predictions of that inconceivable calamity made no impression on the mind of the exiles, and the prophet felt himself cramped and paralyzed by the stolid indifference which his message encountered. It is probable, however, that from the outset his character commanded respect; we read of visits paid to him in his own house by the 'elders' to inquire the word of the Lord (8<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>20</sup>), and there is no reason to dismiss these as dramatic inventions. Still less can we doubt the popularity of his public orations; for the picture of the prophet, with the tedium of their exile by listless hearers, and the eloquence (33<sup>30-32</sup>) is one of the notions which convey an irresistible impression of historical reality. In the second part of his career his position before him and his hearers is greatly relaxed. The people were crushed by the terrible disaster that had befallen their nation, and the immediate effect was a feeling of despair expressed in such woeful utterances as those of 33<sup>10</sup> 37<sup>11</sup>. The prophet on his part adopts a more conciliatory attitude towards them, as he addresses himself to the task of setting forth the hopes and ideals on which the formation of a new Israel depended. The circle of his immediate auditors was probably widened at this time by the arrival of the new bands of captives from Judæa, amongst whom there must have been at least a few adherents of Jer., who would naturally rally round E. as the representative of their master's teaching. It has even been surmised that it was through this channel that E. first became acquainted with the writings of Jer., which have left so deep a mark on his thinking. This is unlikely, because it is hardly credible that he should have recast the substance of his oral prophecies under the literary influence of another prophet; and, moreover, he must have had abundant opportunity of knowing Jeremiah's teaching before his own captivity. But it must be admitted that with regard to all that took place after the fall of the city we are left almost entirely in the dark. There is but one allusion in the book to the relations between the earlier exiles and the later (14<sup>22a</sup>); and if it is at all coloured by the prophet's actual impressions after the event, it certainly does not encourage the notion that he found the new-comers hopeful material to work upon. It was probably not very long after the commencement of the second phase of his work that E. prepared the first written edition of his prophecies (see below). There is an interval of about 13 years (584-572) from which no prophecy is dated. What his occupations were during this period is of course unknown, but there are some signs that chs. 1-39 had been written wholly in their present form before the fall of the city. This last section may reveal the character of the prophet's thoughts had been moving in those years; and a still later oracle (29<sup>17a</sup>) shows that he did not cease to be a close observer of public events.

* The MT gives as the date 'the 12th year' of Jehoiachin's captivity, i.e. 584. But it is hardly credible that the transmission of the news should have been delayed so long as 18 months, and hence the reading '11th year' found in the Syr. and some Heb. MSS. is generally regarded as correct.

While the character of E.'s ministry does not differ essentially from that of his predecessors, it presents some exceptional features of a very instructive kind. The mere fact of his being an exile accounts for much that is peculiar in his method of working and his conception of his office. To say that he was no prophet at all, but merely a pastor exercising the cure of souls amongst those who came under his personal influence, is an exaggeration, but it is the exaggeration of a truth. His insistence on the independence of the individual soul before God (18. 33<sup>12a</sup>), and his comparison of himself to a watchman responsible for each person who perishes through not being warned of his danger (3<sup>17a</sup>, 33<sup>12a</sup>), suggest that the care of the individual must have occupied a larger place in his work than was the case with the pre-exilic prophets. At a time when the unity of the nation was broken up, and the new kingdom of God had to be born in the hearts of those who embraced the hope set before them by the prophets, it was inevitable that a religious teacher should devote much of his attention to the conversion and spiritual direction of individuals. This, however, is a side of E.'s activity which does not directly come to light in the book; there are more subtle indications of the effect which his position as an exile had on his prophetic mission. It was by no means a matter of course, according to the ideas of the age, that prophecy could be transplanted to a foreign soil, and in reality it could not flourish there without losing some of its most characteristic functions. The old prophets had all more or less been religious politicians, in touch with the pulsations of a vigorous popular life, and bringing the word of God to bear directly on those national problems which arose out of the relation between J<sup>h</sup> and the community of Israel. E.'s audience, on the other hand, was but a dismembered limb of the body politic; his political interests were remote and secondary, and the whole cast of his thinking betrays a sense of isolation from the main current of national life. This appears most clearly in his habit of treating the exiles as representatives of the larger Israel, with whose destinies he never ceased to concern himself. From the first he recognized that his mission had a double aspect: on the one hand he was sent to 'them of the Captivity'; and on the other hand he was a prophet to the whole house of Israel (cf. 3<sup>11</sup> with 2<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>). Thus he had two audiences, one real and present and the other ideal; and for the most part they are identified to such a degree that in addressing the exiles or their elders he fancies himself speaking to the idealized nation, whose members were then scattered far and wide over the world. It is an extension of the same tendency when he delivers imaginary discourses to those left in the land, or apostrophizes the mountains of Israel (6. 36), or calls up the whole of the history of the people from the days of the kings of Samaria and Sodom, and treats them as if they had a present existence, and a real interest in the unfolding of the divine purpose (16<sup>4a</sup>, 23<sup>38a</sup>). It is obvious that oratory of this kind is very near being independent of the actual situation altogether; and some perception of this fact is perhaps revealed by the too facile appreciation which it received from the immediate hearers. And although E. never abandoned the art of public speaking, it is undoubtedly the case that in his hands prophecy became far more of a literary occupation than it had hitherto been. A perusal of the book shows that it has been carefully planned with an eye to literary effect; and if the prophet had simply worked out his conceptions in the solitude of his chamber, the result would hardly have differed much from what we actually find. More than any of his predecessors he lives in a world of abstract ideas, which are more vividly real to his imagination than the circumstances of his everyday life; though now and then an echo from the outer world breaks in to remind us that after all he was no mere recluse, but a man of large experience, keenly observant of the life of his time. Several things, indeed, go to show that his intellectual interests reached far beyond the Jewish world in which he lived. His long and accurate enumeration of the natural and industrial products of different countries (27), exhibits a knowledge of contemporary commerce which is surprising in a Heb. prophet. It is probable also that he had gained some new impressions from the world amidst the monuments of a strange civilization in the Euphrates valley. The conception of the cherubim in chs. 1, 10, and 40, to borrow some of its features from the animal figures of Babylonian art; and in other parts of the book some striking phrasological coincidences have been thought to suggest a direct influence of the cuneiform inscriptions (Müller, p. 56 ff.).

There is, however, another feature of E.'s work which cannot be wholly explained by the novelty of his position, and has sometimes been regarded as the result of abnormal physical states to which the prophet was subject. Amongst the most peculiar features in the book are those to a spell of 'trance' which lay upon him from near the commencement of his ministry till the announcement of the fall of Jerus. (cf. 3<sup>4a</sup>, 24<sup>27</sup> 33<sup>2</sup>). Closely akin to this is the representation of his being bound with ropes (3<sup>25</sup>), and lying immovable for months together on one side or the other for a sign to the house of Israel, although at the same time performing actions which formed a necessary part of the sign (4<sup>4a</sup>). There seems no strong reason why all these descriptions should not be treated as of a piece with the general symbolism which runs through the book. But to some recent interpreters they have suggested the theory that the reiterated assertion of it shows that it is a truth to which he himself attaches the utmost importance. 2. Another instance of the same tendency to rigorous and even extreme statement of a prophetic principle is found in his conception of Israel. In opposition to Hosea, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, he does not think there was any good time in the nation's past, tracing the idolatrous proclivities of the people back to the sojourn in the wilderness and the oppression in Egypt (20<sup>a</sup>, 24, 23<sup>a</sup>). Thus, while all the prophets teach or assume that the relation between J<sup>h</sup> and Israel rests on a free elective act of God, E. takes the further step of assigning as the positive ground of this relationship J<sup>h</sup>'s regard for the glory of His name in the eyes of the nations (20 pass.). 3. From this position an important consequence follows. Since the honour of J<sup>h</sup> is identified with the destinies of Israel, His divinity can be accomplished only by the restoration of this people to its own land, under conditions which reflect the holy nature of J<sup>h</sup>. E. is alive to the false impression of the God of Israel produced on the heathen mind by the great calamity of the Exile (36<sup>20</sup>). This effect must be wiped out when the lesson of the history is complete (39<sup>23</sup>). The same principle of the divine action which caused the temporary rejection of Israel becomes the guarantee of its ultimate redemption. The prophet is thus led to a conception of salvation in which everything depends on the sovereign irresistible grace of God, which breaks the stubborn heart of the people, and produces in them an abiding sense of shame and self-contempt, and bestows on them a new spirit, enabling them to walk in His statutes and keep His judgments to do them (6<sup>11</sup>, 13, 16<sup>23</sup>, 20<sup>43</sup>, 36<sup>26f</sup>, 37<sup>14</sup>, 39<sup>26f</sup>). 4. The doctrine which is usually considered E.'s most distinctive contribution to theology is the doctrine of the freedom and responsibility of the individual soul before God. But even here he builds on the foundation laid by his predecessors. The conception of religion as personal fellowship between the individual and God is implicitly contained in the consciousness which all the prophets have of their own relation to J<sup>h</sup>; and in Jer the truth is enunciated that what had hitherto been the possession of the prophets is the form which the perfect religion must assume universally. It was reserved for E., however, to formulate the principle logically, showing that neither the burden of his own guilt nor the sins of a man's past can hinder the action of God's forgiving mercy towards the penitent sinner (18).

But the part of Ezekiel's work that was destined to have the most direct and powerful historical influence was the ideal embodied in the vision of chs. 40-48. The unique significance of that remarkable creation lies in the fact that under the form of a Messianic prophecy it presents the scheme of a politico-religious constitution in which the fundamental idea of holiness is applied to the regulation of every part of the national life. It is a picture of the kingdom of God in its final and perfect state as this prophet was led to conceive it. The ruling conception is that of J<sup>h</sup> dwelling in visible glory in His sanctuary in the midst of His people, and the practical purpose of the vision is to set forth the conditions on Israel's part which such a relation involves. That the institutions prescribed are mainly of a priestly character is partly due to the fact that E. was himself a priest, deeply imbued with the traditions of his office; but still more to his perception of the inherent fitness of the priestly idea of holiness to be the formal principle of a theocratic polity giving expression to the essential character of Israel as the people of J<sup>h</sup>. How fully the ideal met the needs of the time is shown in all the best tendencies of the post-exilic movement. This is not the place to discuss the bearing of E.'s ideal legislation on the development of the pentateuchal laws (see HEXATEUCH). The view of most recent critics is that he occupies a position intermediate between the Book of Deut. and the Law of the so-called Priestly Code; and he has been denied that the peculiar features of E.'s system are more fully explained on this theory than on any other (see esp. the regulations as to the status of the Levites, ch. 44). But, setting aside the purely critical question, the fact is clear that the whole movement by which the new Israel was consolidated proceeded on the lines foreshadowed in E.'s vision. His position in this respect may be compared with that of Augustine in the history of the Latin Church. What the civitas Dei was to mediæval Christendom, that the vision of E. was to post-exilic Judaism: each furnished the ideal that moulded the polity of the age that followed. To what extent this section of the Book of E. was adopted as a legislative programme by the leaders of the Return cannot be precisely determined from the somewhat meagre records at our disposal (see Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 442 f.). But it is important to observe that the Messianic hope as set forth by E. formed one of the most powerful impulses that made for the reconstruction of the Jewish state. We learn from Hag and Zec that the erection of the second temple was carried through under the conviction that that unpretentious edifice was to be the centre of a renovated world, and the earnest of the latter-day glory just about to dawn; while the expectation that the Lord would suddenly come to His temple meets us nearly a cent. later in the book of Malachi. These are conceptions which it would be difficult to understand otherwise than as consequences of the work of Ezekiel.

As compared with his master Jeremiah, or Is 40ff., Ezekiel's teaching as a whole appears lacking in breadth of sympathy and evangelical freedom, and to be a preparation for an age of legalism rather than for the advent of the Christian dispensation. He is not quoted expressly by any NT writer, and it is doubtful if he has directly influenced any except the author of the Apoc., who was familiar with the book and has drawn largely on its imagery. But while all this is true, there are many things in E. which gave him a high place amongst the heralds of Christ in OT. His clear assertion of the value of the individual soul and of the efficacy of repentance, his profound sense of sin as a personal failure and of the need of a new heart in order to do the law of God, his impassioned vindication of the character of God as merciful and eager to forgive, are amongst the brightest gems of spiritual truth to be found in the pages of prophecy.

LITERARY HISTORY.—Of the literary history of the book little needs to be said. It is mentioned by the son of Sirach (49<sup>8</sup>) in a connexion which shows that it formed part of the prophetic Canon in his time (c. B.C. 200). In the order given by the Talmudic treatise Baba bathra (14<sup>b</sup>) it stands second amongst the greater prophets, being preceded by Jer and followed by Isaiah. A further statement in the same source that the book was written (like Dn, Est, and the Twelve Prophets) by 'the men of the Great Synagogue,' has no significance, unless it be an inference from the theory that no prophetic book could be written outside of the Holy Land (so Rashi, quoted by Ryle, Canon of OT, p. 263 f.). According to Jerome (præfatio ad Ezech.), certain parts of it were, on account of their obscurity, forbidden to be read by any Jew under the age of 30 years; and its deviations from the Mosaic Law caused doubts to be expressed as usual escort. After fasting and prayer on the journey, the company set out, and reached the holy city.

E. did not find a community ready and eager for the new government which he was authorized to establish. Many of the people were idolatrous (Hag 1<sup>4</sup>), but there was not that spirit of devotion to the God of Israel which the zealous E. regarded as essential. E. was informed that many Jews, including even priests and princes, had taken foreign wives. He knew the story of Solomon's decline (1 K 11); he perceived the danger now of a relapse into idolatry; above all, he feared the consequences of further disobedience of the law of God (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>). Shecaniah, as the representative of the people who had been much moved by the prayer which E. poured forth in the night (9<sup>6-15</sup>), proposed that the people should separate their foreign wives and their children. E. accepted the proposition, and exacted an oath on the spot that the offenders would comply with this agreement. A decree was issued by the princes and elders that all the offenders should be removed from the city within three days, on pain of confiscation of goods and excommunication. But the assembly found the task too great to be accomplished in an open-air meeting during a severe winter storm, and the matter was referred to a divorce court, with E. at its head.* After three months' labour, and not without apparently (Ezr 10<sup>15</sup> RV),† the work was finished, and many innocent women and children were cast out, as Hagar and Ishmael had been.

The account of E.'s formal institution of the law is found in Neh 8-10. Neh. had come to Jerus. in B.C. 444. His first work was the rebuilding of the walls. E. was the compiler of Ezr-Neh (see further, EZR AND NEH), it was after this event that E. read the law to the people assembled at Jerus., and obtained their pledge to observe it. It is singular that E., who had brought the law to Jerus. for the purpose of making it the code of the community, should not have promulgated it sooner. It may be that Stade is right in supposing that E. had aroused the hostility of the people by the compulsory divorce, and that the times were not ripe before (Gesch. ii. 173 f.); or it may be that the chronology is not exact, as the compilation was made long after the events described, and the description of the reading of the law interrupts Nehemiah's narrative (cf. 7<sup>4-5</sup>, 11<sup>1-2</sup>).‡

On the second day's reading the people heard the directions for observing the feast of booths. Steps were taken at once to celebrate this feast, and the reading of the law was continued on each day of its observance. Two days later a great fast was held, the people separating themselves from strangers, and confessing their sin. E. gave utterance to a remarkable prayer, § praising God for His great goodness to Israel, deploring the apostasy and disobedience of the people, and tracing the past misfortunes of the nation, as well as their present condition of vassalage, to their great sins.||

The relation of E. and Neh. is one of the perplexing problems of this period. Neh. in his memoirs mentions E. but once (12<sup>36</sup>).¶ In the E. portions of Neh, Nehemiah is mentioned but once (8<sup>9</sup>).**

* Reading, after Ewald (Hist. v. 142 n. 4), וַיִּקְרָא, Ezr 10<sup>16</sup>.

† See Bertheau-Rysse, Ezr., Neh., Est., in 'Kurzg. Ex. Handbuch,' in loc.

‡ On this reading of the law see Trumbull's Yale Lectures on the Sunday School, 1888, p. 7.

§ The words 'and Ezra said' are not in the original. NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF, of the Pent. by those readings; see OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 171.

** The Ezra of Neh 12. 18-23 is another person.

¶ The best Gr. versions lack the title Tirshatha (8<sup>9</sup>); 1 Es has the title, but lacks the name (8<sup>9</sup>); Lagarde's ed. agrees with Heb. The Neh. of 10 is the same as that of Ezr 2<sup>2</sup>.

There is scant justification for Ewald's statement that 'the chronicler unites these two men very closely in his representations' (Hist. v. 161). E. and Nehemiah were granted high authority in the Judæan colony, and that in the same sphere. Yet Nehemiah entirely ignores E.* Their purposes were different, it is true, one desiring to promote especially the religious welfare of the colony, the other the political; but among the Jews these spheres overlapped or rather interlaced at all points. It is E.'s chief work in Jerus. was accomplished with Nehemiah's arrival.†

E. made a deep impression upon the Jewish people. The later Jewish life followed the lines laid down by him. This is due, not so much to his personal influence, as to the future, as to the influence which shaped Jewish life and thought in a way from which it never wholly departed. He gave the law an authority which it had never had before in Jewish history. This zeal was contagious, and accounts for that enthusiasm for the letter of the law which characterizes later ages.

LITERATURE.—Besides works referred to above, see PRE<sup>2</sup> art. 'Ezra und Nehemia'; OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 168; Wellhausen, Hist. of Isr. and Jud. 130 ff.; see also literature at end of foll. art.

2. The eponym of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12. 12. 33 = AZARIAH of Neh 10<sup>2</sup>. L. W. BATTEN.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, THE BOOKS OF.—

There is much gain in treating these two books together. They present similar problems; they deal with the same period; they were originally one in the Jewish canon; and they were put into their present form by the same hand.

The Ezra-Neh combined in one book in the early Jewish canon. The Massorètes have appended notes to the end of each book of OT, stating the number of verses, etc. There are no such notes at the end of Ezr, but those at the end of Neh include both books: 'the book of Ezr contains 685 verses, and the middle verse is וְהָיָה עִלְיָהּ (Neh 5<sup>32</sup>). The Massoretic sections show that our two books were regarded as one, one section being Ezr 8<sup>35</sup>-Neh 2<sup>1</sup>. The twenty-two sacred books do not all agree in the number of verses.

In the LXX the two are included under Esdras B in Swete's ed.; under Esdras A in the ed. of Lagarde.

Ezr-Neh precedes Ch in the Heb. Bible, but follows it in the LXX. The order of the books has been attributed to the compiler of the canon. It is by no means certain that the present Heb. order is original. The OT was divided into three parts. At the end of each part the Massorètes placed a list of the books included in the part. The order of the books in the canon is the same as in the Heb. Bible. At the end of Ezr-Neh, not at the end of Ch. Moreover, as Ezr-Neh is a continuation of Ch, and in its present form has come from the same hand, it is altogether unlikely that the original arrangement was so unmindful of chron. order.

A. CONTENTS.—A review of the following outline reveals the striking fact that Ezr-Neh is far from a complete history of the restoration. We find rather a short sketch of a few important events in that history. There are long periods,—one of more than a half-century (515 to 458),—about which our book is absolutely silent. The whole time covered by this book, from the return of the first exiles in 537 to the second visit of Neh. in 432 is more than a cent., but as a matter of fact the actual time covered by the narrative is scarcely more than one-tenth of this time.

* See Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jud. Gesch. p. 168 n.; Kuenen, Critique de L'Ancien Test. p. 510.

† There is an article in TSBA ii. pt. 1, in which the writer argues that E. and Neh. came to Jerus. to restore the law.

‡ See Raer, Libri Danielis Historia et Chronologia, pp. 200, 201, Jos. c. 4p. 18.

§ See further Oettli, 'Die Gesch. Haglogr. und d. Buch Daniel,' 1889, in Strack and Zöckler's Kurzgef. Kom.; Cornill, Evangel. 45; PRE<sup>2</sup> iv. 332 ff.; Ryle, Canon of OT, 134 f.

I.—(1) Ezr 1-6.—The return of the exiles from Babylon; the rebuilding of the temple; the sacrifices; the purification of the sanctuary; the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. (2) Ezr 7-10.—The return of Ezra and his company with a firm decree from Artaxerxes; the divorcing of the foreign wives; the efforts of the enemies of Judah to hinder the rebuilding of the city walls, mainly in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, B.C. 465-425.

II.—(1) Neh 1-7<sup>38</sup>.—Neh., learning of the bad condition of affairs in Jerus., obtains permission from Artaxerxes to go to Jerus. as its governor, and rebuilds the walls. He reaches Jerus., rebuilds the walls, and the people for the first time since the exile succeed in the complete reconstruction of its walls, B.C. 444. (2) Neh 8-10.—Ezra promulgates the law, and the people 'seal unto it' (Neh 10:1). (3) Neh 11-12<sup>26</sup>.—List of those who dwelt in Jerus., and of the Levites who had come to Jerus. with Zerubbabel. (4) Neh 12<sup>27</sup>-13<sup>31</sup>.—The dedication of the walls; regulation of the temple services, B.C. 443. (5) Neh 13<sup>32</sup>.—Nehemiah's second visit to Jerus., and the reforms accomplished at that time, B.C. 432.

B. SOURCES.—Modern criticism has shown that Heb. literature, like other Sem. literature,* is usually the result of compilation. No trained critical eye is required to see that the book under discussion has reached its present form from several different sources, and is difficult to analyze the book into its constituent elements, though it is not always possible to trace these elements back to their origin. In some cases we must be content with probabilities, and in others must confess ignorance. In the analysis of the book the results will be clearer if we follow an order which disregards the present arrangement of chapters.

The casual reader will not fail to notice that considerable portions, especially of Neh., are written in the first person. The 'I' refers to Ezra everywhere in Ezr., and to Nehemiah everywhere in Neh. The first person is used in Ezr 7<sup>27</sup>-9<sup>23</sup>, Neh 1<sup>1</sup>-7<sup>38</sup>, 12<sup>27</sup>-43, 13<sup>32</sup>. These are portions of memoirs written by Ezra and Neh. respectively. They are for the most part preserved in their original form. It is evident that considerable parts of the memoirs have been lost. Ezra's narrative has no proper beginning; he came to Jerus. to establish the law, but his own narrative tells us nothing about the accomplishment of this design. Neh.'s narrative breaks off abruptly; the sequel to 7<sup>38</sup> is not found in his account; 13<sup>32</sup> begins in medias res; 13<sup>32</sup> must originally have had another connexion. But, imperfect as they are, these personal records of the two great leaders in the restoration of the Jewish state are of the greatest value. For convenience these memoirs will hereafter be designated by the symbols E and N respectively.†

The other portions dealing with the work of Ezra and Neh. are not original parts of their memoirs, though in part based on them. Ezr 7<sup>1-10</sup> is an introduction to the story of Ezra written by the compiler. For Ezra is spoken of in the third person: the genealogy of Ezra omits his immediate ancestors, Seraiah, who is named as his father, having been put to death by Nebuchadnezzar in 586; Ezra would hardly have spoken of himself as 'an expert scribe'; this introduction anticipates matter found in E. (See further in Driver, LOT p. 549).

Ezr 7<sup>12-26</sup> is the firman which Artaxerxes gave Ezra as his authority for governing the Jewish colony. V. 11 is an introduction due to the compiler. The letter itself is in Aramaic, and held by many to be in its original form. Such a document would naturally be written in Aram., and the Jewish colouring, which is so apparent in the edict of Cyrus (Ezr 1<sup>2-5</sup>), is not conspicuous in this passage. Cornill's statement that 'in details it is of such specific Jewish colouring that it at least must have been strongly retouched,'* is not justified by facts; and J. Voss, that 'it may have been cast into its present form by one familiar with the terminology of the Jewish sacred books,'† is quite consistent with the view that we have the original edict signed by the king, in the preparation of which it is not inconceivable that Ezra himself may have had a hand. At all events, its preservation was probably due to its incorporation by Ezra in his memoirs, for the 'I' corresponding with which E. begins is naturally conceived as the royal edict.

Ezr 10 is the proper continuation of the preceding section of E, but Ezra is spoken of in the third person. All efforts to explain this change of person as due to Ezra have been hopeless failures.‡ The force of the fact lies in the change taking place right in the middle of the narrative without any explicable cause. Moreover, we find one room in the temple is the son of the high priest; but Eliashib was a prominent priest in 432 (Neh 12<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>), and a room could not have been called his son's in 453.§ Yet there are points of resemblance with E. The passage is probably a revision and abbreviation of E, the work of the compiler.

Neh 7<sup>73b</sup>-10. Of this portion 9<sup>1-10<sup>38</sup></sup> is regarded by Sayce as an original portion of E. The prayer prefixed to Ezr., and the words prefixed in the LXX 'and Ezra said' may be an original note of the compiler's to explain his extract from E. The remainder of the section, 7<sup>73b</sup>-9<sup>5</sup>, is usually accounted for in the same way as Ezr 10, to which it bears striking resemblance. There is room for grave doubt about the chronology.¶ There is practically no guide except the position of the passage. A comparison of 7<sup>73</sup> and Ezr 3<sup>1</sup> shows that the compiler has made a false connexion of this passage with N, and he does not appear to have been an expert in chronology. The section took its present form long after the events described, so that confusion of order was easily possible. Sayce has pointed out that the names in Neh 10 are for the most part found also in Ezr 2.** He regards this section as the work of 'a layman,' and not a priest like Ezra, since he classes himself with 'the people' (19<sup>32</sup> 37. 38).††

Neh 11-12<sup>26</sup> is made up of lists extracted from the temple registers, with explanatory notes by the compiler. Ch. 11 is closely connected with 7<sup>73</sup>, and may be based on N. König says that ch. 11 'might indeed have been incorporated by Neh. into his writings,' but that 12<sup>1-26</sup> 'on account of Jaddua (12<sup>22</sup>) falls into the time of Alexander the Great.'‡‡

Neh 12<sup>27</sup>-13<sup>31</sup> cannot be from N, for it uses the expression 'in the days of Neh.' (12<sup>27</sup>), as of a time long past. König admits that 12<sup>27</sup>-47 comes from a later hand, but holds that N begins with 13<sup>1</sup> instead of 13<sup>4</sup>, as most critics maintain. W. R. Smith, OTJC p. 427 n., suggests that 13<sup>1-2</sup> originally stood between Ezr 10<sup>38</sup> and 11.

There remains for consideration Ezr 1-6. Ch. 1 is very likely due to the compiler, though he may have used written sources. . . Vv. 1-3a are found also in 2 Ch 36<sup>22</sup>. The differences are very slight, * Eintl. p. 264. See also Kuenen, Critique de L'A. T. p. 507, for details of the alleged colouring.

† LOT p. 550.

‡ See, e.g., Keil, Ezra, Neh., Esth. 1873, p. 121.

§ See Cornill, Eintl. p. 266.

¶ Gesch. d. V. Isr. ii. 153 ff.

‡ See art. Ezra.

** Introd. to Ezra, Neh., and Esth. 1885, p. 60.

†† Id. p. 30.

‡‡ Eintl. in das AT, 1893, p. 273. On the relation of Neh 11 to 1 Ch 9<sup>3-22</sup>, see Sayce, Introd. p. 32; Oettli, op. cit. p. 150; Bertheau-Ryssel, 'Kgt. Exeg. Handb. z. AT', 1887, Ezr., Neh., u. Esth. p. 12.

* Sayce, HCM c. 2.

† So Kautzsch, Die Heilige Schrift des AT.

and are due to accident in copying. Vv. 2-4 contain the edict of Cyrus. From a comparison with the inscriptions of Cyrus,* it appears to be strongly coloured by Jewish ideas. Cyrus attributes his success to Merodach, not to J<sup>h</sup>.

2<sup>1-3</sup> is found also in Neh 7<sup>6-7</sup>. In the latter place it is appended to Nehemiah's memoirs with this preface: 'And I found the book of the genealogy of those who first came up: and I found written in it' (7<sup>6</sup>). There are more than a hundred variations in the two versions. The numbers esp. differ oftener than they agree.† Such variation is always found in duplicates. Cf. Pss 14 and 53, Ps 18 and 2 S 22. This does not destroy identity of origin. It appears from the large number of such lists that the Jews were in the habit of keeping registers of important names. From such a register the Chronicler has incorporated the list into its present place. These lists have been carefully preserved in the transmission of the documents, as we find many errors wherever we have data to test them. This list was already a part of a narrative when copied by Neh., since both versions end with narrative. This ending in Ezr introduces the assembling at Jerus. for the setting up of the altar, in Neh the assembling for the promulgation of the law.

3<sup>4-5</sup> are very generally assigned to the Chronicler (so Cornill, Schrader, Ryssel, Driver, etc. For the grounds of this see LOT<sup>6</sup> 547 f.).

4<sup>6</sup>. These are two fragments from unknown sources. They cannot be from the Chronicler, for they are out of joint with the context. V<sup>6</sup> contains a statement about an accusation made against the Jews in the beg. of the reign of Xerxes. There is no hint of this elsewhere. 4<sup>7</sup> may have been placed here on the supposition that it was introductory to the passage following, but we shall see that this is not so. There is no reason, however, to doubt the genuineness or authenticity of these verses.

4<sup>8-6</sup>18. This passage is written in the Aram. language, and is a portion of a more or less complete history of these times written originally in Aramaic.‡ The compiler, finding his best sources for this period in Aramaic, introduced considerable portions without translation. In its present arrangement, however, the course of the history is very much obscured, as will be more fully pointed out below. The section falls into two parts, both of which present considerable problems will be discussed in this connexion.

4<sup>8-24</sup>. According to the present arrangement of our book, this part describes the securing of a decree from Artaxerxes to stop the rebuilding of the temple. But, as a matter of fact, the passage has nothing to do with the temple, and is evidently misplaced. According to 4<sup>7</sup> Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of his companions 'wrote a letter to king Artaxerxes in Aramaic.' This letter is not the one found in the version of Ezr, for that was written by Nehum the chancellor or scribe; moreover, the letter which begins with v. 11 is overloaded with introductions in the Aram. passage vv. 8-10. Since Artaxerxes reigned from 465 to 423, this passage can have nothing to do with the times of Zerubbabel. The correction of Xerxes v<sup>6</sup> to Cambyses (reigning 529-522), and Artaxerxes to Gomates, is out of the question, since the contents of the letter are late assigned in the text. The letter says that the Jews are rebuilding the rebellious and bad city, and have finished the walls, and repaired the foundations. It further declares that if this city is rebuilt and the walls finished, the Jews will rebel and refuse to pay tribute, and in the end it will endanger the king. The building of the temple cannot be the point of attack, for that would not signify rebellion. If the temple were the matter at issue, the Jews would have appealed to the decree of Cyrus as they did later. The king's answer agrees with this view. He orders that the city be not built, until a decree shall be made by him, but makes no allusion to the temple. If a royal decree had been issued forbidding the rebuilding of the temple, the people would have had ample excuse for their neglect when Haggai reproaches them so sharply. . . . Zerubbabel and Joshua would scarcely have ventured to renew the work on the temple with such a decree in force. Finally, Tattenai would not have failed to make use of such a good weapon if it had been at hand.

The passage refers to an attempt to rebuild the walls of the city, which must have occurred in the first part of the reign of Artaxerxes. 'The Jews which came up from Babylon' (Ezra and his company, or to some other band concerning which the history is silent. V<sup>24</sup> does refer to the building of the temple, and is the effort of the compiler to harmonize the passage with the history with which he has erroneously connected it.

5, 6. . . . that Joshua and Zerub. . . . of the first pilgrims. The required sacrifices . . . . . The text is somewhat confused, but the writer says that the foundations of the temple were laid at this time; see esp. v<sup>10</sup> 'and the builders laid the foundation of the temple of J<sup>h</sup>.' The work thus begun was stopped by the adversaries, who 'weakened the hands of the people of Judah, and troubled them in building, . . . . . of Persia' (44. 5).

inspiration the work of . . . . . to completion, give no . . . . . ling was but the resumption of a task already begun and laid aside with good reason. Hag speaks of 'the house that lieth waste' (14. 9); . . . . . condition to the neglect of the . . . . . of the excuse that the time was not suitable. The unsuitableness of the time . . . . . before one laid stone upon a stone, . . . . . a time evidently within his recent experience. He gives the date upon which the foundation was laid in a prophecy delivered that very day; 'from this day forward, from the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, from the day that the foundation of J<sup>h</sup>' . . . . .

Zech. says: . . . . . of this house: hitherto . . . . . the laying of the foundation just accomplished. Two years later he said: 'Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words from the mouths of the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the temple of J<sup>h</sup> of hosts was laid' (8. 9). . . . .

A large number of difficulties are connected up with the defence of the Jews. . . . . that they were only doing what Cyrus had authorized. . . . . had been appointed governor, and he came to Jerus., and laid the foundations of the house of God which is in Jerus.; and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not completed' (Ezr 5. 16). Hag 2. 3 shows the contempt for the new temple felt by these old men, who still remembered the glory of the temple of Solomon. We find the same feelings expressed in Ezr 3. 12. It seems impossible that these two passages do not refer to the same event.

In Ezr 5. 1 we read that 'Zerubb. and Jos. stood up and began to build the wall of Jerusalem.' . . . . . a wall . . . . . Tattenai in v. 8. 'Who gave you a decree to build this house?' and his subsequent action imply not a re-umption of a work which had been forcibly stopped, but the coming up of a new issue. The passage in 5. 16 already quoted, which may appear to harmonize with the resumption theory, does not do so, for it proves too much; its statement that the temple had been in process of building ever since the decree of Cyrus had been issued, is contrary to all that we know from other sources. It may be a sufficient explanation of this inaccuracy to note that it is contained in the letter, and Tattenai may have misunderstood the Jews, who might have said that from the time of Cyrus they had purposed to build the temple, but had not been able to do so. König holds that Ezr 3. 1-4<sup>6</sup> contains fragments which, by tradition, have been received into the original picture of the temple-building story. It is quite possible that we have here, in fact, poorly preserved fragments of an orig. Heb. account of the rebuilding of the temple. The passage would then be parallel with the Aram. section cc. 5, 6; and in that case the troublesome passage 4<sup>8-24</sup> would not be seriously out of place; that is, it originally would * Sayce's view that v<sup>24</sup> properly follows v<sup>5</sup>, as indicated by the grammatical construction of the original Chaldean, and that the whole passage is introduced here episodically, is quite untenable. See his Introd p. 22.

† The words following 'and to finish this wall' do not support the view of an earlier work on the temple. מְבָנֵי rendered 'wall' is a word of doubtful meaning. Kaatzsch, Gram. des Heb. Ar. § 62, suggests the emendation מְבָנֵי 'foundations' as v<sup>16</sup> Bleek held that the word refers to the walls of the city, Erl.<sup>3</sup> p. 207. Bertheau-Ryssel interprets after LXX the wooden framework for the building.

* See RP, new ser. v. 144 ff.

† The sum-total in each case is the same, but varies by 12,000 from the sum of the distalled numbers. (See further Kuenen, Rel. Isr. ii. 178).

‡ On Renan's view that the Aram. section is from the Targums, see Expos. Times, iv. 546.

§ David advocated this position, Hist., Eng. tr. iv. 106.

F

FABLE is usually defined (with Dr. Johnson in his life of Gay) to be 'a narrative in which beings, irrational and sometimes inanimate, are, for the purposes of moral instruction, feigned to act and speak with human interests and passions'; and hence, as such beings do not present analogies to man in the strict sense, it differs from other tropes (see Allegory), its lessons are confined to the sphere of practical worldly prudence. Accepting this prevailing usage, we find (and the rarity is not surprising) two instances of fable in sacred literature: (1) Jotham's fable of the trees choosing their king (Jg 9<sup>8-16</sup>); and (2) the fable of the fig-tree and the cedar of Lebanon, in the answer of Jehoash to Amaziah (2 K 14<sup>9</sup>). In neither of these cases, however, is the story described by any . . . Indeed the word fable does not . . . canonical OT, nor is μῦθος (its Apoc. and NT equivalent) certainly found in the LXX, except in Sir 20<sup>19</sup> ('a man without grace is as a tale out of season'), where in the next verse παπαβολή appears as the parallel, 'a wise saw.' The compound μυθολόγος, author of fables, is used in Bar 3<sup>22</sup>; and here the parallel, searcher out of understanding, suggests a similar interpretation. Accordingly, we may conclude that the nearest . . . the OT to the idea of μῦθος is found in . . . proverb, adage, in which Or . . . their deeper thoughts (Ps 49<sup>4</sup> 78<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 17<sup>2</sup>), and which sometimes appears to stand for a warning example (Jer 24<sup>9</sup> [Judah] 'a reproach and a proverb' παπαβολή, LXX). This does not differ materially from the Homeric and almost purely poetical use of μῦθος,—found once or twice also in Plato,—from which the connotation of truth had not yet been entirely banished.

But in Greek prose, as a rule, and even occasionally in poetry as early as that of Pindar (O. 1. 47, N. 7. 34), μῦθος was the Latin fabula, connoting fiction, sometimes (in opposition to πλάσμα) spontaneously growing, as, in religious tradition, the myth of god or hero (Plato, Legg. 9. 865 D); sometimes deliberately composed, like Aesop's Fables (Plato, Phaed. 60 C), and then opposed to λόγος, the historic story, or to ἀλήθεια, actual fact (Plato, Phaed. 61 B; Aristot. Hist. An. 9. 12). It is to this usage that the NT μῦθος allies itself (1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> 47, 2 Ti 4<sup>4</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>16</sup>).

In 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> the word apparently bears the general sense of fiction, 'what we tell you as to the power and coming of the Lord is not cunningly devised fiction, but sober truth.' But the fables referred to in the Pastoral Epp. as already . . . the soundness of the faith and the health of the churches in Ephesus and Crete, are of a special kind. They are 'Jewish' (Tit 1<sup>14</sup>); they are 'profane and anile' 1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> (cf. Plat. Rep. 1. 350); they are connected with genealogies, 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> (cf. Plato, Tim. 22 A, as to the offspring of Deucalion and Pyrrha), with fightings about the law (Tit 3<sup>9</sup>) and with commandments of men (Tit 1<sup>14</sup>). The two last expressions and the epithet Jewish find some explanation in the rigid asceticism of abstaining from meats and forbidding to marry (1 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>), which was doubtless founded upon Jewish law, and was a characteristic of that side of Gnosticism which was afraid of matter, even as licence (Tit 1<sup>15</sup>, 16) was the characteristic of that other side which affected to despise its power; the 'genealogies' remind us of the worship of angels at Colossæ (Col 2<sup>18</sup>), and the Gnosticism which bridged the gulf between God and the world by means of angelic intermediaries generated from the pleroma and from one another; and when we read also elsewhere in these epistles of the 'gnosis falsely so-called' (1 Ti 6<sup>20</sup>), of the 'resurrection past already' (2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>), of the 'enchanters' (2 Ti 3<sup>13</sup>), and of the 'doctrines of demons' (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), we are irresistibly drawn towards the belief that the fables of these epistles are closely akin to the teachings of Ophite Gnosticism—that earliest Gnosticism of Asia Minor, which was a strikingly similar mixture of Jewish and heathen speculation, ritual, and practice. See Gnosticism.

1. . . . γενεολογία; Tit 1. 1. . . . γενεολογία; Moore, Jav. 2. 2. . . . γενεολογία; and see A. 1. 1. . . . of Past. Epp. see Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 411 ff. . . . heresy is simply Judaistic—Hort, . . . .

J. MASSIE.

FACE is AV tr. of 1. 78, for which RV in several instances substitutes more exact renderings, such as 'nose' (Gn 24<sup>47</sup>), 'nostrils' (Ezk 38<sup>13</sup>). 2. 78, lit. 'eye' (e.g. Ex 10<sup>5</sup> 15, Nu 22<sup>8</sup> 'the face of the earth'). RV rightly gives 'eyes' instead of 'face' in 1 K 20<sup>38</sup> 41, 2 K 9<sup>30</sup>, Jer 4<sup>30</sup>. 3. 78, very frequent both in a lit. and a metaphorical sense (e.g. 18 78 'upon the face of'). The shewbread (see BREAD, p. 318<sup>5</sup>) was called 78 78, lit. 'bread of the face, i.e. presence' (see next παρουσία). With a personal pronoun 'my (thy, his, etc.) face' may be simply a circumlocution for 'me (thee, him, etc.)'. Hence the substitution by RV of 'them' for 'their face' in Ex 14<sup>19</sup>, and of 'thee' for 'thy face' in Gn 30<sup>38</sup>, Dt 9<sup>28</sup>. Conversely, in Jer 17<sup>18</sup> AV has 'thee' and RV 'thy face.'

The face or countenance as the noblest part of the person was used to mean presence, and is often so translated. From the invitation or permission to approach . . . it came to mean favour, acceptance. On the other hand, the withheld or averted face was equivalent to disapproval or rejection (Ps 13<sup>4</sup> 27<sup>8</sup> 88<sup>1</sup> 143<sup>5</sup> etc.). Such favour was called the light of the countenance, giving life and refreshment like that of the sun (Ps 89<sup>15</sup> etc.). Among the Arabs, a fit of anger or the sudden effect of hearing bad news is called the darkening of the sky on the face. To 'respect persons' is generally 78 78, but in Dt 17<sup>16</sup>, Pr 24<sup>23</sup> 28<sup>21</sup> it is 78 78, lit. to recognize the presence of one (sc. unjustly).

To spit in the face was the strongest possible expression of scorn and aversion (Nu 12<sup>14</sup>, Dt 25<sup>9</sup>, Job 30<sup>10</sup>, Is 50<sup>6</sup>, Mt 26<sup>67</sup> 27<sup>30</sup>, Mk 10<sup>34</sup> 14<sup>65</sup>, 15<sup>19</sup>, Lk 18<sup>32</sup>). In heated altercation, an Oriental often uses an ejaculation which means 'I spit in your face,' at the same time spitting on the ground at the feet of the person he is quarrelling with. Modesty, humility, worship, self-abasement, are expressed by the veils of women (Gn 24<sup>65</sup>), the reverential shrouding of the face with the mantle (1 K 19<sup>13</sup>), the wings with which the seraphim covered the face (Is 6<sup>3</sup>), and the face bowed to the ground (Gn 42<sup>6</sup> etc.). To have the face covered by another, as in the case of Haman (Est 7<sup>8</sup>), was a sign of doom; the napkin drawn over the face and wound round the head was part of the covering of the dead (Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>).

G. M. MACKIE.

FACT.—A 'fact' (Lat. factum) is any act or deed, good or bad; and this was the commonest

... of the word till about the beginning of the 17th century. Thus Spenser, Sp. 34—

'But, when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruel facts he often would repent.'

Similarly Bunyan, PP (Clar. Pr. ed. p. 42), 'falling down upon his knees, he [Christian] asked God forgiveness for that his foolish fact.' So T. Adams, II Peter (Pur. Divines), p. 3, 'Theodosius excused a foul fact, because David had done the like.' This is the meaning in 2 K 10 (heading) 'Jehu by his letters causeth seventy of Ahab's children to be beheaded: he excuseth the fact by the prophecy of Elijah'; and 2 Mac 4<sup>36</sup> 'Certain of the Greeks that abhorred the fact also' (Gr. συμμοσπονδούντων καὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων, RV 'the Greeks also joining with them in hatred of the wickedness.' This is the only example of συμμ., though μωσπονδία is found 2 Mac 4<sup>36</sup> [A. -εύω] 8<sup>4</sup>). The present use of 'fact' for something that has actually occurred, an undeniable truth, though quite classical for factum, and 'fact' for all the Romanic equivalents (Fr. fait, It. facto, Sp. hecho), is not found in English before 1632.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIN is properly 'glad,' as Dyke, Worthy Commun. 56, 'Then full faine wilt thou be to have Christ Jesus receive thy soule'; or 'gladly,' as Jn 12<sup>21</sup> Tind. 'Syr, we wolde fayne se Jesus.' But the commonest meaning has always been 'glad under the circumstances,' and that is its meaning in AV: Job 27<sup>22</sup> 'he would fain flee out of his hand' (יִפְּדֶה, AVm 'in fleeing he would flee'); 1 Mac 6<sup>54</sup> 'they were fain to disperse themselves' (ἐσκοπίσθησαν, RV 'they were scattered'); Lk 15<sup>16</sup> 'he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat' (ἐρεθύμει). Cf. Shaks. Lear, iv. vii. 38—

'and wast thou fain, poor father,
To hovel thee with swine, and regues forlorn,
In short and musty straw?'

From this the word easily slipped into the sense of 'obliged,' 'compelled,' as in Pref. to AV 'he was fain to make this answer, I cannot [read the book] for it is sealed'; Is 17 Cov. 'Youre londe lieth waist . . . and ye must be fayne to stonde and loke upon it'; and Defoe, Crusoe: 'When the tide was out, I got most of the pieces of cable ashore, and some of the iron, though with infinite labour; for I was fain to go for it into the water, a work which fatigued me very much.'

To the three examples in AV, RV adds two: Lk 13<sup>31</sup> 'Herod would fain kill thee' (θέλει σε ἀποκτείνειν); AV 'will kill thee,' the tr. of all previous Eng. VSS (Wyc. 'will slay thee'); and Ac 26<sup>28</sup> 'With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian' (Ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις Χριστιανὸν ποιεῖσαι); AV 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian,' following TR γενέσθαι for ποιῆσαι).

The reading, ποιῆσαι or γινέσθαι, is discussed in WH 'Select Readings,' ad loc. The best argument for ποιῆσαι is its difficulty: to simplify the construction, γινέσθαι may have been taken in from the next verse.

The translation is, on either reading, nearly impossible. The AV is a combination of the Geneva NT (1537), 'Almost thou persuadest me to become a Christian,' and the Bishops', 'Somewhat thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' But it gives an unknown sense to ἐν ὀλίγῳ, besides following the less probable πῶς (?) 'labour' after ἐν ὀλίγῳ; (2) by translating πείθεις 'wouldest fain,' so as to bring out the sense, which it certainly has, of 'attempt to persuade'; and (3) by supplying ὅτι before ποιεῖσαι. It is adversely criticised by Field, Octum. Nov. iii. ad loc. But Rendall, Acts of Apostles in Greek and English (1897), accepts it, rendering, 'At little cost thou wouldest fain persuade me to make me a Christian.' (The exclamation mark is intended to suggest the irony in Agrippa's voice).

J. HASTINGS.

FAINT.—From feint the ptep. of Old Fr. feindre to feign, faint signified first 'feigned,' 'pretended,' as Earl Rivers, Dictes, 144, 'He that loueth the with feynt loue.' But it passed early into the sense of weak: whether (1) as a purely physical state, as Gn 25<sup>29</sup> 'Esau came from the field, and he was faint' (יָגַע, so 25<sup>30</sup>, Dt 25<sup>18</sup>, Jg 8<sup>4-5</sup>, Is 29<sup>8</sup>; יָגַע 1 S 14<sup>28, 31</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>15</sup>; יָגַע 1 S 30<sup>10, 21</sup>; יָגַע 2 S 16<sup>2</sup>, Is 40<sup>29</sup>; ἐκλύομαι 1 Mac 3<sup>17</sup>); or (2) as chiefly moral, almost = 'cowardly,'* which occurs only in the phrase faint-hearted, Dt 20<sup>8</sup> (לֵב יָגַע, lit. 'soft-hearted'); Is 7<sup>4</sup> (לֵב יָגַע, RV 'neither let thine heart be faint'), Jer 49<sup>23</sup> (לֵב יָגַע, RV 'they are melted away'), Sir 4<sup>9</sup> (μὴ ἴγῃ, so 7<sup>10</sup>); or (3) as spiritual, through sorrow, Jer 8<sup>1</sup>, La 1<sup>22</sup> (both יָגַע 1<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>17</sup> (both יָגַע), or calamity, Is 1<sup>5</sup> (יָגַע)). The verb is derived from the adj. It is used in the foregoing senses, and also in the modern physical sense of 'swoon' (Dn 8<sup>27</sup>, Ad. Est 15<sup>7</sup>). Faintness is used physically in Ad. Est 15<sup>15</sup> and spiritually in Lv 26<sup>36</sup>.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIR.—1. Beautiful, as Sus v. 3 'a very fair woman' (καλὴ σφόδρα); Sir 24<sup>18</sup> 'I am the mother of fair love' (τῆς ἀγαπήσεως τῆς καλῆς). So frequently in OT; but in NT only Ac 7<sup>20</sup> [Moses] 'was exceeding fair' (ἀστεῖος τῷ θεῷ, lit. 'fair to God,' see under EXCEEDING). The adj. occurs also He 11<sup>23</sup> and again of Moses; AV 'proper'; RV 'goodly,' the word in Ex 2<sup>2</sup> where the Heb. is טוֹב 'good'. 2. Unspotted, Zec 3<sup>3</sup> 'a fair mitre' (טהור). Cf. Pr. Bk. (1552) 'a fayre white linnen clothe'; Ezk 17 Cov. 'fayre scoured metall'; Wesley (1737), Works, i. 46, 'a paper book; all the leaves thereof were fair, except one.' Wyclif's tr. of Zec 3<sup>3</sup> is (1382) 'a cleene cappe' (1388, 'a cleene mytre'); Douay, 'a cleane mitre.' Coverdale gives 'fair,' and the other VSS follow him. Amer. RV restores 'clean.' 3. Plausible, Gal 6<sup>12</sup> 'to make a fair show' (εὐπροσώπησα); elsewhere only of speech. In Sir 6<sup>5</sup> 'fair speaking' is used in a good sense, 'a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings' (εὐλαλος). The modern form 'fair-spoken' had also a good meaning once, as Capgrave (1460), Chron. 81, 'He was . . . fayre-spokyn, but he spak but seldam.'

In Ezk 27<sup>12-14</sup>, 16, 19, 22-27 'fairs,' i.e. markets, is used in AV (after Wyc. in v. 12 and Geneva throughout) as tr. of Heb. מַרְכָּא, which is evidently 'wares' as AV has it in v. 33, the only other occurrence of the word. RV gives 'wares' (wh. see) throughout.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIR HAVENS (Καλὸι Λιμένες), one of the places mentioned in connexion with St. Paul's voyage to Rome (Ac 27<sup>8-12</sup>), is a small bay, two leagues E. of Cape Matala, on the S. coast of Crete. There does not seem to have been a town at the place, but there was one near it, called Lasea. Neither Fair Havens nor Lasea is mentioned in classical writings, but the former name survives in the modern Gr. dialect as Λιμεῖνας Καλοῖς, and archaeological research has confirmed the identity of both places. It has been suggested that the name is euphemistic, and the fact that an attempt was made to reach Phoenix, the modern Lutro, a considerable distance W. along the coast, in the circumstances mentioned in Ac, adds emphasis to the statement that the haven was not commodious to winter in. On the other hand, it proved a welcome shelter to St. Paul and those who were with him, for a considerable time, at a most critical part of their voyage. The difference between Fair Havens and Phoenix was, that while the former was sheltered only from the N. and N.W. winds, the latter was 'the only secure harbour in all winds on the S. coast of Crete.'

W. MUIR.

FAIRS.—See FAIR, WARES.

* Cf. H. Smith, Works, ii. 219, 'The faint spies that went to the land of Canaan.'

FAITH.—I. THE PHILOLOGICAL EXPRESSION OF FAITH.—The verb 'to believe' in AV of OT uniformly represents the Heb. אָמַן, Hiph. of אָמַן, in Dn 6<sup>23</sup> where it represents Aramaic form. The root, which is widely spread among the Semitic tongues, and which in the word 'Amen' has been adopted into every language spoken by Christian, Jew, or Mohammedan, seems everywhere to convey the fundamental ideas of 'fixedness, stability, steadfastness, reliability.' What the ultimate conception is which underlies these ideas remains somewhat doubtful, but it would seem rather that of 'holding' than that of 'believing' (although this last is the sense adopted in Lez.). In the simple species the verb receives both transitive and intransitive vocalization. With intransitive vocalization it means 'to be firm,' 'to be secure,' 'to be faithful,' and occurs in biblical Hebrew only in the past participle, denoting those who are 'faithful' (2 S 20<sup>19</sup>, Ps 42<sup>1</sup>, 31<sup>1</sup>). With transitive vocalization it occurs in biblical Hebrew only in a very specialized application, conveying the idea, whether as participle or verbal noun, of 'caretaking' or 'nursing' (2 K 10<sup>4</sup>, Est 2<sup>7</sup>, Ru 4<sup>15</sup>, 2 S 4<sup>4</sup>, Nu 11<sup>12</sup>, Is 49<sup>23</sup>, La 4<sup>5</sup>; cf. 2 K 18<sup>18</sup> 'pillars' and [the Niphal] Is 60<sup>4</sup>), the implication in which seems to be that of 'holding,' 'bearing,' 'carrying.' The Niph. occurs once as the passive of transitive Qal (Is 60<sup>4</sup>); elsewhere it is formed from intransitive Qal, and is used very much in the same sense. Whatever holds, is steady, or can be depended upon, whether a wall which securely holds a nail (Is 22<sup>23, 25</sup>), or a brook which does not fail (Jer 15<sup>18</sup>), or a kingdom which is firmly established (2 S 7<sup>16</sup>), or an assertion which has been verified (Gn 42<sup>20</sup>), or a covenant which endures for ever (Ps 89<sup>28</sup>), or a heart found faithful (Neh 9<sup>8</sup>), or a man who can be trusted (Neh 13<sup>13</sup>), or God Himself who keeps covenant (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>), is אָמַן. The Hiphil occurs in one passage in the primary physical sense of the root (Job 39<sup>24</sup>). Elsewhere it bears constantly the sense of 'to trust,' weakening down to the simple 'to believe' (Ex 4<sup>1</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup>, 28<sup>16</sup>, Hab 1<sup>5</sup>). Obviously it is a subjective causative, and expresses the acquisition or exhibition of the firmness, security, reliability, faithfulness which lies in the root-meaning of the verb, in or with אָמַן. The אָמַן is therefore one who is free from faintheartedness (Is 7<sup>9</sup>) and anxious haste (Is 28<sup>16</sup>), and who stays himself upon the object of his contemplation with confidence and trust. The implication seems to be, not so much that of a passive dependence as of a vigorous active commitment. He who, in the Hebrew sense, exercises faith, is secure, assured, confident (Dt 28<sup>66</sup>, Job 24<sup>22</sup>, Ps 27<sup>13</sup>), and lays hold of the object of his confidence with firm trust.

The most common construction of אָמַן is with the preposition בְּ, and in this construction its fundamental meaning seems to be most fully expressed. It is probably never safe to represent this phrase by the simple 'believe'; the preposition rather introduces the person or thing in which one believes, or on which one believingly rests as on firm ground. This is true even when the object of the affection is a thing, whether divine words, commandments, or works (Ps 106<sup>12</sup>, 119<sup>98</sup>, 78<sup>32</sup>), or some earthly force or good (Job 39<sup>12</sup>, 15<sup>31</sup>, 24<sup>22</sup>, Dt 28<sup>96</sup>). It is no less true when the object is a person, human (1 S 27<sup>12</sup>, Pr 26<sup>25</sup>, Jer 12<sup>5</sup>, Mic 7<sup>5</sup>) or superhuman (Job 4<sup>18</sup>, 15<sup>15</sup>), or the representative of God, in whom therefore men should place their confidence (Ex 19<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>). It is above all true, however, when the object of the affection is God Himself, and that indifferently whether or not the special exercise of faith adverted to is rooted in a specific occasion (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, Ex 14<sup>31</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup>, 20<sup>12</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Jon 3<sup>5</sup>). The weaker conception of 'believing' seems, on the other hand, to lie in the construction with the preposition אֶל which appears to introduce the person or thing, not on which one confidently rests, but to the testimony of which one assentingly turns. This credence may be given by the simple to every untested word (Pr 14<sup>15</sup>); it may be withheld until seeing takes the place of believing (1 K 10<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>6</sup>); it is due to words of the Lord and of His messengers, as well as to the signs wrought by them (1 S 10<sup>4</sup>, Is 53<sup>1</sup>, Ex 4<sup>8</sup>). It may also be withheld from any human speaker (Gn 45<sup>26</sup>, Ex 4<sup>1</sup>, Jer 40<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 32<sup>15</sup>), but is the right of God when He bears witness to His majesty or makes promises to His people (Is 43<sup>10</sup>, Dt 9<sup>23</sup>). In this weakened sense of the word the proposition believed is sometimes attached to it by the conjunction וְ (Ex 4<sup>8</sup>, Job 9<sup>16</sup>, La 4<sup>12</sup>). In its construction with the infinitive, however, its deeper meaning comes out more strongly (Jg 11<sup>20</sup>, Job 15<sup>5</sup>, 17<sup>2</sup>), and the same is true when the verb is אָמַן (Ex 4<sup>1</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup>, 28<sup>16</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>, Job 29<sup>24</sup>, 11<sup>1</sup>); these constructions faith is evidently the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen.

No hiphilate noun from this root occurs in OT. This circumstance need not in itself possess significance; the notions of 'faith' and 'faithfulness' lie close to one another, and are not uncommonly expressed by a single term (so pietas, fides, faith). As a matter of fact, however, 'faith,' in its active sense, can barely be accounted an OT term. It occurs in AV of OT only twice: Dt 32<sup>20</sup> where it represents the Heb. אָמַן, and Hab 2<sup>4</sup> where it stands for the Heb. אָמַן; and it would seem to be really demanded in no passage but Hab 2<sup>4</sup>. The very point of this passage, however, is the sharp contrast which is drawn between arrogant self-sufficiency and faithful dependence on God. The purpose of the verse is to give a reply to the prophet's inquiry as to God's righteous dealings with the Chaldeans. Since it is by faith that the righteous man lives, the arrogant Chaldean, whose soul is puffed up and not straight within him, cannot but be destined to destruction. The whole drift of the broader context bears out this meaning; for throughout this prophecy the Chaldean is ever exhibited as the type of insolent self-assertion (17<sup>11, 19</sup>), in contrast with which the righteous appear, certainly not as men of integrity and steadfast faithfulness, but as men who look in faith to God and trustingly depend upon His arm. The obvious reminiscence of Gn 15<sup>6</sup> throws its weight into the same scale, to which may be added the consent of the Jewish expositors of the אָמַן. If we have, therefore, thrown into a אָמַן contrasting characteristics of the wicked, typified by the Chaldean, and of the righteous: of the one the fundamental trait is self-sufficiency; of the other, faith. This faith, which forms the distinctive feature of the righteous man, and by which he obtains life, is mere assent. It is a profound and abiding disposition, an ingrained attitude of mind and heart towards God which affects and gives character to all the activities. Here only the term occurs in OT; but on this its sole occurrence it rises to the full height of its most pregnant meaning.

The extreme rarity of the noun 'faith' in OT may prepare us to note that even the verb 'to believe' is far from common in it. In a religious application it occurs in only some thirteen OT books, and less than a score and a half times. The thing believed is sometimes a specific word or work of God (La 4<sup>12</sup>, Hab 1<sup>5</sup>), the fact of a divine revelation (Ex 4<sup>1</sup>, Job 9<sup>16</sup>), or the words or commandments of God in general (with אָמַן Ps 106<sup>12</sup>, 119<sup>98</sup>). In Ex 19<sup>9</sup> and 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup> God's prophets are the object of His people's confidence. God Himself is the object to which they believingly turn, or on whom they rest in assured trust, in some eleven cases. In two of these it is to Him as a faithful witness that faith believingly turns (Dt 9<sup>23</sup>, Is 43<sup>10</sup>). In the remainder of them it is upon His very person that faith rests in assured confidence (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, Ex 14<sup>31</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Jon 3<sup>5</sup>). It is in these instances, in which the construction is with  $\tau\epsilon$ , together with those in which the word is used absolutely (Ex 4<sup>31</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>), to which may be added Ps 27<sup>13</sup> where it is construed with the infinitive, that the conception of religious believing comes to its rights. The typical instance is, of course, the great word of Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, 'And Abram believed in the LORD, and he counted it to him for righteousness'; in which all subsequent believers, Jewish and Christian alike, have found the primary example of faith. The object of Abram's faith, as here set forth, was not the promise which appears as the occasion of its exercise; what it rested on was God Himself, and that not merely as the giver of the promise here recorded, but as His servant's shield and exceeding great reward (16<sup>1</sup>). It is therefore not the assentive but the fiducial element of faith which is here emphasized; in a word, the faith which Abram gave 'when he put his trust in God' ( $\epsilon\mu\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\hat{\omega} \theta\epsilon\omega$ , LXX), was the same faith which later He sought in vain at the hands of His people (Nu 14<sup>11</sup>, cf. Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>), and the notion of which the Psalmist explains in the parallel, 'They believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation' (Ps 78<sup>22</sup>). To believe in God, in the OT sense, is thus not merely to assent to His word, but with firm and unwavering confidence to rest in security and trustfulness upon Him.

In the Greek of the LXX  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  takes its place as the ordinary word for  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ , and is very rarely so used by any other word expressing trust (Pr 26<sup>25</sup>  $\mu\epsilon\lambda\theta\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$ ). In a few cases, however, it is strengthened by composition with a preposition (Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, Jg 11<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, cf. Sir 15<sup>20</sup> etc., 1 Mac 13<sup>715</sup> etc.,  $\epsilon\mu\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ ; Mic 7<sup>5</sup>,  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ ); and in a few others it is construed with prepositions ( $\epsilon\kappa \tau\upsilon\iota$ , Jer 12<sup>6</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Dn 6<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 27<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>1</sup>, Mic 7<sup>5</sup>, Sir 35<sup>21</sup>;  $\epsilon\pi\iota \tau\upsilon\alpha$ , Is 28<sup>16</sup> (?), 3 Mac 27;  $\epsilon\pi\iota \tau\upsilon\alpha$ , Wis 12<sup>1</sup>;  $\epsilon\kappa\tau\upsilon \tau\upsilon\alpha$ , Sir 38<sup>21</sup>;  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha \tau\upsilon\alpha$ , Job 4<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> 24<sup>22</sup>).

It was by being thus made the vehicle for expressing the high religious faith of OT that the word was prepared for NT use. For it had the slightest possible connexion with religious faith in classical speech. Resting ultimately on a root with the fundamental sense of 'trusting' and standing in classical Greek as the common term for 'trusting', 'putting faith in', 'relying upon', shading down into 'believing', it was rather too strong a term for ordinary use of that ungenial relation to the gods which was characteristic of Greek thought, and which was substantively expressed by  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ —the proper acknowledgment in thought and act of their existence and rights. For this  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  was the usual term, and the relative strength of the two terms may be observed in their use in the opening sections of Xenophon's Memorabilia (I. i. 1 and 5), where Socrates is charged with not believing in the gods whom the city owned ( $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omega\iota\varsigma$ ), but is affirmed to have stood in a much more intimate relation to them, to have trusted in them ( $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omega\iota\varsigma$ ). Something of the same depth of meaning may lurk in the exhortation of the Epinomis (980 C),  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omega\iota\varsigma \epsilon\lambda\chi\omicron\upsilon$ . But ordinarily  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omega\iota\varsigma$  appears as the synonym of  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omega\iota\varsigma$ , and imports merely the denial of atheism (Plut. de Superst. ii.; Arist. Rhet. ii. 17). It was only by its adoption by the writers of the LXX to express the faith of OT that it was fitted to take its place in NT as the standing designation of the attitude of the man of faith towards God.

This service the LXX could not perform for  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  also, owing to the almost complete absence of the noun 'faith' in the active sense from OT; but it was due to a Hellenistic development on the basis of OT religion, and certainly not without influence from Gn 15<sup>6</sup> and Heb. 11:1, that  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ , too, was prepared for NT use. In classical Greek  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  is applied to belief in the gods chiefly as implying that such belief rests rather on trust than on sight (Plut. Mor. 756 B).

There is no suggestion in this of weakness.

(for  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  expresses a strong conviction, and is therefore used in contrast with 'impressions'), yet the word, when referring to the gods, very rarely rises above intellectual conviction into it.

more congenial region of moral trust (see Rea, 146, 147). That this, its fuller and more characteristic meaning, should come to its rights in the religious sphere, it was necessary that it should be transferred into a new religious atmosphere. The usage of Philo bears witness that it thus came to its rights on the lips of the Greek-speaking Jews. It is going too far, to be sure, to say that Philo's usage of 'faith' is scarcely distinguishable from that of NT writers. The ground two is very wide, and has not been bridged by saying that with Philo, faith, as the queen of the virtues, is the chief of the virtues of the man, while with NT it is the chief of the virtues of all claim to virtue, it is the chief of the virtues of the righteous. But it is of the nature of the word in the pages of Philo, the conception is filled with a content which far transcends any usage of the word in heathen Greek, and which is a refraction of the religious conceptions of OT. Fundamental to his idea of it as the crowning virtue of the godly man, to be attained only with the supremest difficulty, especially by creatures akin to mortal things, is his conception of it as essentially a changeless, unwavering 'standing by' (cf. De 1:1, 2:1, 3:1, 4:1, 5:1, 6:1, 7:1, 8:1, 9:1, 10:1, 11:1, 12:1, 13:1, 14:1, 15:1, 16:1, 17:1, 18:1, 19:1, 20:1, 21:1, 22:1, 23:1, 24:1, 25:1, 26:1, 27:1, 28:1, 29:1, 30:1, 31:1, 32:1, 33:1, 34:1, 35:1, 36:1, 37:1, 38:1, 39:1, 40:1, 41:1, 42:1, 43:1, 44:1, 45:1, 46:1, 47:1, 48:1, 49:1, 50:1, 51:1, 52:1, 53:1, 54:1, 55:1, 56:1, 57:1, 58:1, 59:1, 60:1, 61:1, 62:1, 63:1, 64:1, 65:1, 66:1, 67:1, 68:1, 69:1, 70:1, 71:1, 72:1, 73:1, 74:1, 75:1, 76:1, 77:1, 78:1, 79:1, 80:1, 81:1, 82:1, 83:1, 84:1, 85:1, 86:1, 87:1, 88:1, 89:1, 90:1, 91:1, 92:1, 93:1, 94:1, 95:1, 96:1, 97:1, 98:1, 99:1, 100:1). - binding us to God, to the exclusion of every other object of desire, and making us one with Him. It has lost that soteriological content which is the very heart of faith in OT; though there does not absolutely fail an occasional reference to God as Saviour, it is, with Philo, rather the Divinity,  $\tau\hat{\omega} \delta\epsilon\upsilon$ , upon which faith rests, than the God of grace and salvation; and it therefore stands with him, not at the beginning but at the end of the religious life. But we can perceive in the usage of Philo a development on Jewish ground of a use of the word  $\mu\alpha\rho\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  to describe that complete detachment from earthly things, and that firm conviction of the reality and significance of the things not seen, which is the whole NT use.

The disparity in the use of the terms 'faith' and 'believe' in the two Testaments is certainly in a formal aspect very great. In contrast with their extreme rarity in OT, they are both, though somewhat unevenly distributed and varying in relative frequency, distinctly characteristic of the whole NT language, and oddly enough occur about equally often (about 240 times each). The verb is lacking only in Col, Philem, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and the Apocalypse; the noun only in the Gospel of John and 2 and 3 Jn: both fail only in 2 and 3 Jn. The noun predominates not only in the epistles of St. Paul, where the proportion is about three to one, and in St. James (about five to one), but very markedly in the Epistle to the Hebrews (about sixteen to one). In St. John, on the other hand, the verb is very frequent, while the noun occurs only once in 1 Jn and four times in the Apocalypse. In the other books the proportion between the two is less noteworthy, and may fairly be accounted accidental. In OT, again, 'faith' occurs in the active sense in but a single passage; in NT it is the passive sense which is rare. In OT in only about half the instances of its occurrence is the verb 'to believe' used in a religious sense; in NT it has become so clearly a technical religious term, that it occurs very rarely in any other sense. The transitive usage, in which the object is someone, occurs in OT (16<sup>11</sup>, Jn 2<sup>24</sup>) and the passive (Rev 3<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>7</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3</sup>); but besides this special case there are very few instances in which the word does not express religious believing, possibly only the following: Jn 9<sup>18</sup>, Ac 9<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>12</sup>, Mt 24<sup>23-25</sup>, Mk 13<sup>21</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>21</sup>, cf. Ac 13<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>11</sup>, Jn 4<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>. The classical construction with the simple dative which prevails in the LXX retires in NT in favour of constructions with the dative and the absolute use of the verb; the latter with the dative occurs about forty-five times, while that with prepositions occurs some sixty-three times, and the verb is used absolutely some ninety-three times.

When construed with the dative, πιστεύειν in NT prevalently expresses believing assent, though ordinarily in a somewhat pregnant sense. When its object is a thing, it is usually the spoken (Lk 1<sup>3</sup>, Jn 4<sup>50</sup> 5<sup>47</sup> 12<sup>38</sup>, Ro 10<sup>16</sup>, cf. 2 Th 2<sup>21</sup>) or written (Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>47</sup>, Ac 24<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>27</sup>) word of God; once it is divine works which should convince the onlooker of the divine mission of the worker (Jn 10<sup>38</sup>). When its object is a person it is rarely another than God or Jesus (Mt 21<sup>25-27</sup>, Mk 11<sup>31</sup>, Lk 20<sup>5</sup>, Jn 5<sup>46</sup>, Ac 8<sup>12</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>), and more rarely God (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>, Ac 16<sup>34</sup> 27<sup>28</sup>, Ro 4<sup>27</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>, Tit 3<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>23</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>) than Jesus (Jn 4<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>38</sup>, 46 6<sup>50</sup> 8<sup>31</sup>, 45, 46 10<sup>37-38</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>, Ac 17<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>). Among these passages there are not lacking some, both when the object is a person and when it is a thing, in which the higher sense of devoted, believing trust is conveyed. In 1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup>, for example, we are obviously to translate, not 'believe the name,' but 'believe in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ,' for in this is summed up the whole Godward side of Christian duty. So there is no reason to question that the words of Gn 15<sup>6</sup> are adduced in Ro 4<sup>2</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>, Ja 2<sup>23</sup> in the deep sense which they bear in OT text; and in the NT faith consciously be excluded from the list of words which God adverted to in Ac 16<sup>34</sup>, Tit 3<sup>8</sup> (cf. Jn 5<sup>24</sup>), or from the belief in Jesus adverted to in 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup> (cf. Jn 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>30</sup>), and is obviously the prominent conception in the faith of Jesus adverted to in Ac 18<sup>8</sup>. The passive form of πιστεύειν occurs only twice—once of believing assent (2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>), and once with the highest implications of confiding trust (1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>). The few instances in which the construction is with the preposition εἰς (11<sup>26</sup>, Ac 13<sup>41</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>16</sup>) take their natural place along with the commoner usage with the dative, and need not express more than crediting, although over one or two of them there floats a shadow of a deeper implication. The same may be said of the cases of attraction in Ro 4<sup>17</sup> and 10<sup>14</sup>. And with these weaker constructions must be ranged also the passages, twenty in all (fourteen of which occur in the writings of St. John), in which what is believed is joined to the verb by the conjunction ὅτι. In a couple of these the matter believed scarcely rises into the religious sphere (Jn 9<sup>18</sup>, Ac 9<sup>28</sup>); in a couple more there is specific reference to prayer (Mk 11<sup>23-24</sup>); in yet a couple more it is general faith in God which is in mind (He 11<sup>6</sup>, Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). In the rest, what is believed is of immediately soteriological import—now the possession by Jesus of a special power (Mt 9<sup>28</sup>), now the central fact of His saving work (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>), now the very hinge of the Christian hope (Ro 6<sup>5</sup>), but prevail-ingly the divine mission and the personality of Jesus Himself (Jn 6<sup>50</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>27</sup>, 42 13<sup>19</sup>, 16<sup>7</sup>, 17<sup>3</sup>, 21 20<sup>31</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>1-5</sup>). By their side we may recall also the rare construction with the infinitive (Ac 15<sup>11</sup>, Ro 14<sup>2</sup>).

When we advance to the constructions with prepositions, we enter a region in which the deeper sense of the word—that of firm, trustful reliance—comes to its full right. The construction with ἐν, which is the most frequent of the constructions with prepositions in the LXX, retires almost out of use in NT; it occurs with certainty only in Mk 1<sup>5</sup>, where the object of faith is 'the Son of Man,' though Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13</sup> may also be instances of it, where the object would be Christ. The implication of this construction would seem to be the fixedness of confidence in its object. Scarcely more common is the parallel construction of ἐν with the dative, expressive of steady, resting repose, reliance upon the object. Besides the quotation from Is 28<sup>16</sup>, which appears alike in Ro 9<sup>33</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>, this construction occurs only twice; Lk 24<sup>25</sup>, where Jesus rebukes His followers for not 'believing on,' relying implicitly upon, all that the prophets have spoken; and 1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>, where we are declared to 'believe on' Jesus Christ unto salvation, i.e. to obtain salvation by relying upon Him for it. The constructions with prepositions εἰς, πρός, ὑπέρ, which involve an implication of motion, mental direction towards, are more frequently used. That with εἰς, indeed, occurs only seven times (four of which are in Ac). In two instances in Ro 4, where the reminiscence of the faith of Abraham gives colour to the language, the object on which faith is thus said relyingly to lay hold is God, described, however, as savingly working through Christ—as He that justifies the ungodly, He that raised Jesus our Lord from the dead. Elsewhere its object is Christ Himself. In Mt 27<sup>42</sup> the Jewish leaders declare the terms on which they will become 'believers on' Jesus; in Ac 16<sup>31</sup> this is the form that is given to the proclamation of salvation by faith in Christ—'turn with confident trust to Jesus Christ,' and appropriately, therefore, it is in this form of expression that those are 'saved' who have savingly believed on Christ (Ac 16<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>19</sup>). The special NT construction, however, is that with εἰς, which occurs some forty-nine times, about four-fifths of which are Johannine and the remainder more or less Pauline. The object towards which faith is thus said to be reliantly directed is in one unique instance 'the witness which God hath witnessed concerning his Son' (1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>), where we may well believe that 'belief in the truth of the witness is carried on to personal belief in the object of the witness, that is, the Incarnate Son Himself.' Elsewhere the object believed on, in this construction, is always a person, and that very rarely God (Jn 14<sup>1</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>, and also 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, where, however, the true reading is probably πιστεύετε εἰς θεόν), and most commonly Christ (Mt 18<sup>9</sup>, Jn 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>16</sup> 18 36 42 9 [Jn 33, 40] 5 [Jn 31, 32, 33] 8 30 9 35 38 10 42 11 25 28 45 48 12 11 27 42 44 46 14 12 16 17 20, Ac 10 13 14 23 19 4, Ro 10 14 14, Gal 2 6, Ph 1 29, 1 P 1 6, 1 Jn 5 10, cf. Jn 12 36 12 23 31 8, 1 Jn 5 13). A glance over these passages will bring clearly out the pregnancy of the meaning conveyed. It may be more of a question wherein the pregnancy resides. It is probably sufficient to find it in the sense conveyed by the verb itself, while the preposition εἰς, which implies motion, person towards whom the strong implication by the verb is directed. In any event, what these passages express is 'an absolute transference of trust from ourselves to another,' a complete self-surrender to Christ.

Some confirmation of this explanation of the strong meaning of the phrase πιστεύειν εἰς may be derived from the very rich use of the verb absolutely, in a sense in no way inferior. Its absolute use is pretty evenly distributed through the NT, occurring 24 times in John, 23 times in Paul, 22 times in Acts, 15 times in the Synoptics, and once each in Hebrews, James, 1 Peter, and Jude; it is placed on the lips of Jesus some 18 times. In surprisingly few of these instances is it used of a non-religious act of crediting,—apparently only in our Lord's warning to His followers not to believe when men say "Lo, here is the Christ," or "here" (Mt 24<sup>23, 26</sup>, Mk 13<sup>31</sup>). In equally surprisingly few instances is it used of specific acts of faith in the religious sphere. Once it is used of assent given to a specific doctrine—that of the unity of God (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). Once it is used of believing prayer (Mt 21<sup>22</sup>). Four times in a single chapter of John it is used of belief in a specific fact—the great fact central to Christianity of the resurrection of Christ (Jn 20<sup>25, 27, 29, 31</sup>). It is used occasionally of belief in God's announced word (Lk 1<sup>47</sup>, Ac 26<sup>7</sup>), and occasionally also of the credit given to specific testimonies of Jesus, whether with reference to earthly or heavenly things (Jn 3<sup>12, 12, 150</sup>, Lk 22<sup>67</sup>), passing thence to general faith in the word of salvation (Lk 8<sup>12, 12</sup>). Twice it is used of general faith in God (Jude<sup>5</sup>, Ro 4<sup>18</sup>), and a few instances of the same pregnancy of implication, where the reference, whether to God or Christ, is more or less uncertain (Jn 1<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>11, 2</sup>, Co 4<sup>14, 13</sup>). Ordinarily, however, it is used of theological faith directed to the person of Christ. In a few instances, to be sure, the immediate trust expressed is in the extraordinary power of Jesus for the performance of earthly effects (the so-called 'miracle faith'), as in Mt 8<sup>13</sup>, Mk 5<sup>36, 9, 23, 24</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup>, Jn 4<sup>48, 11, 40</sup>; but the essential relation in which this faith stands to 'saving faith' is clearly exhibited in Jn 4<sup>48</sup> compared with v. 33 and 9<sup>38</sup>, and Jn 11<sup>40</sup> compared with v. 15 and 12<sup>39</sup>; and, in any case, these passages are insignificant in number when compared with the great array in which the reference is directly to saving faith in Christ (Mk 9<sup>42, 15</sup>—[Jn 3<sup>15</sup>], Jn 3<sup>15, 41, 42, 53, 54, 63, 47, 64, 64, 93, 10, 25, 26, 11, 15, 12, 30, 14, 3, 19, 35, 20, 21</sup>, Ac 2<sup>44, 44, 32, 51, 8, 13, 11, 12, 30, 40, 14, 15, 7, 12, 34, 18, 27, 19, 13, 21, 20, 25</sup>, Ro 1<sup>16, 3, 22, 10, 10, 13, 15, 13</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>21, 3, 14, 2, 15, 11</sup>, Gal 3<sup>22</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13, 19</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7, 21, 13, 2</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, He 4<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>). A survey of these passages will show very clearly that in the NT 'to believe' is a technical term to express reliance on Christ for salvation. In a number of them, to be sure, the object of the believing spoken of is sufficiently defined by the context, but, without contextual indication of the object, enough remain to bear out this suggestion. Accordingly, a tendency is betrayed to use the simple participle very much as a verbal noun, with the meaning of 'Christian': in Mk 9<sup>42</sup>, Ac 11<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>21</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13, 19</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7, 21, 13</sup> the participial construction is evident; it may be doubted, however, whether oi πιστεύοντες is not used as a noun in such passages as Ac 2<sup>44, 43, 2</sup>, Th 1<sup>10</sup>, He 4<sup>3</sup>; and in Ac 5<sup>14</sup> πιστεύοντες is perhaps generally recognized as used substantively. Before the disciples were called 'Christians' (Ac 11<sup>26</sup>, cf. 26<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>) it would seem, then, that they were called 'believers'—those who had turned to Christ in trusting reliance (oi πιστεύοντες), or those who were resting on Christ in trusting reliance (oi πιστεύοντες); and that the undefined 'to believe' had come to mean to become or to be a Christian, that is, to turn to or rest on Christ in reliant trust. The occasional use of oi πιστοί in an equivalent sense (Ac 10<sup>45</sup>, Eph 1<sup>1, 1</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>3, 12</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, Rev 17<sup>14</sup>), for which the way was prepared by the comparatively frequent use of πιστός in the classically rare active sense (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>, Gal 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>10, 5, 6, 2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>6</sup>), adds weight to this conclusion; as do also the use of ἀπιστοί of 'unbelievers,' whether in the simple (1 Co 6<sup>6, 7, 12, 15, 10, 14, 23, 24</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>) or deepened sense (2 Co 4<sup>4, 6, 44</sup>, Tit 1<sup>15</sup>, cf. Jn 20<sup>27</sup>, Mt 17<sup>17</sup>, Mk 9<sup>18</sup>, Lk 9<sup>41</sup>), and the related usage of the words ἀπιστία (Mk 9<sup>24</sup> (16<sup>14</sup>), Mt 13<sup>58</sup>, Mk 6<sup>6</sup>, Ro 4<sup>20, 11, 20, 23</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>, He 3<sup>12, 19</sup>), ἀπιστεύω (Mk 16<sup>11, 10</sup>, Lk 24<sup>11, 41</sup>, Ac 28<sup>24</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>), and ἀλογόπιστος (Mt 6<sup>30, 8, 23, 14, 31, 16, 8</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup>), ἀλογόπιστία (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>).

The impression which is thus derived from the usage of πιστεύειν is only deepened by attending to that of πίστις. As already intimated, πίστις occurs in NT very rarely in its passive sense of 'faithfulness,' 'integrity' (Ro 3<sup>8</sup> of God; Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Tit 2<sup>10</sup>, of men; cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>12</sup> 'a pledge'; Ac 17<sup>31</sup> 'assurance'; others add 1 Ti 6<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>22, 3, 10</sup>, Philem<sup>5</sup>). And nowhere in the multitude of its occurrences in its active sense is it applied to man's faith in man, but always to the religious trust that reposes on God, or Christ, or divine things. The specific object on which the trust rests is but seldom explicitly expressed. In some six of these instances it is a thing, but always something of the fullest soteriological significance—the gospel of Christ (Ph 1<sup>27</sup>), the saving truth of God (2 Th 2<sup>19</sup>), the working of God who raised Jesus from the dead (Col 2<sup>12</sup>, cf. Ac 14<sup>9, 3, 16</sup>), the name of Jesus (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>), the blood of Jesus (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>), the righteousness of Jesus (2 P 1<sup>1</sup>). In as many more the object is God, and the conception is prevailingly that of the Father (Ro 14<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, He 1<sup>12</sup>). In the remaining instances, however, the object is specified as Christ, and the faith is ἐν Χριστῷ (Ac 20<sup>21, 24, 26, 18</sup>, Gal 2<sup>1</sup>, Eph 1<sup>15, 3, 12, 4, 13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, Col 1<sup>4, 25</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>14, 3, 15, 2</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13, 3, 13</sup>, Philem<sup>5</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, Rev 2<sup>13, 14, 12</sup>). Its object is most frequently joined to πίστις as an objective genitive, a construction occurring some seven or eight times, twelve of which all in the writings of Paul. In four of them the genitive is that of the thing, viz. in Ph 1<sup>27</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> the saving truth, in Col 2<sup>12</sup> the working of God, and in Ac 3<sup>16</sup> the name of Jesus. In one of them it is God (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>). The certainty that the genitive is that of object in these cases is decisive with reference to its nature in the remaining cases, in which Jesus Christ is set forth as the object on which faith rests (Ro 3<sup>22, 26</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16, 16, 20, 3, 22</sup>, Eph 3<sup>12, 4, 13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, Rev 2<sup>13, 14, 12</sup>). Next most frequently its object is joined to faith by means of the preposition ἐν (9 times), by which it is set forth as the basis on which faith rests, or the sphere of its operation. In two of these instances the object is a thing—the blood or righteousness of Jesus (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>); in the rest it is Christ Himself who is presented as the ground of faith (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, Eph 1<sup>15</sup>, Col 1<sup>4, 1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>14, 3, 13</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13, 3, 13</sup>). Somewhat less frequently (5 times) its object is joined to πίστις by means of the preposition εἰς, designating, not merely the object with reference to which faith is exercised (cf. especially Ac 20<sup>21</sup>); the object thus specified for faith is in one instance God (1 P 1<sup>21</sup>), and in the others Christ (Ac 20<sup>21, 24, 26, 18</sup>, Col 2<sup>5</sup>). By the side of this construction should doubtless be placed the two instances in which the preposition πρός is used, by which faith is said to look and adhere to God (1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>) or to Christ (Philem<sup>5</sup>). And it is practically in the same sense that in a single instance God is joined to πίστις by means of the preposition ἐν as the object to which it restingly turns. It would seem that the pregnant sense of πίστις as self-abandoning trust was so fixed in Christian speech that little was left to be expressed by the mode of its adjunction to its object. Accordingly, the use of the word without specified object is vastly preponderant. In a few of such instances we may see a specific reference to the general confidence which informs believing prayer (Lk 18<sup>8</sup>, Ja 1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). In a somewhat greater number there is special reference to faith in Jesus as a worker of wonders—the so-called ‘miracle faith’ (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 22 15<sup>28</sup> [17<sup>20</sup>] [21<sup>21</sup>], Mk 2<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>40</sup> 5<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>82</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>25</sup> 48 17<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>42</sup>, Ac 3<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>)—although how little this faith can be said to be as non-soteriological the language of Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup> shows, as well as the relationship between Lk 7<sup>50</sup> (cf. 8<sup>48</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>) and Mt 11<sup>12</sup>. The immense mass of the passages in which the undefined πίστις occurs, however, are distinctly soteriological, and that indifferently whether its implied object be God or Christ. Its implied reference is indeed often extremely difficult to fix; though the passages in which it may, with some confidence, be referred to Christ are in number about double those in which it may, with like confidence, be referred to God. The degree of clearness with which an implied object is pointed to in the context varies, naturally, very greatly; but in a number of cases there is no direct hint of object in the context, but this is left to be supplied by the general knowledge of the reader. And this is as much as to say that πίστις is so used as to imply that it had already become a Christian technical term, which needed no further definition. It conveys its full sense of saving faith in Jesus Christ to the mind of every reader. This tendency to use it as practically a synonym for ‘Christianity’ comes out sharply in such a phrase as οἱ ἐκ πίστεως (Gal 3<sup>7-9</sup>), which is obviously a paraphrase for ‘believers.’ A transitional form of the phrase meets us in Ro 3<sup>26</sup>, τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ; that the Ἰησοῦ could fall away and leave the simple οἱ ἐκ πίστεως standing for the whole idea, is full of implications as to the sense which the simple undefined πίστις had acquired in the circles which looked to Jesus for salvation. The same implications underlie the so-called objective use of πίστις in the NT. That in such passages as Ac 6<sup>7</sup>, Gal 1<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>23</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, Jude 3<sup>20</sup> it conveys the idea of ‘the Christian religion’ appears plain on the face of the passages; and by their side can be placed such others as the following, which seem transitional to them, viz.: Ac 16<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>13</sup>, Col 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>1-6</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>13</sup>, and, at a slightly further remove, such others as Ac 13<sup>8</sup>, Ro 1<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>26</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>9</sup>. It is not necessary to suppose that πίστις is used in any of these passages as doctrina fidei; it seems possible to carry through them all the conception of ‘subjective faith conceived of objectively as a power,’—even through those in Jude and 1 Timothy, which are more commonly than any others interpreted as meaning doctrina fidei. But this generally admitted objectivizing of subjective faith makes πίστις a truly Christian term, and doctrina fidei, on the verge of which it in any case trembles, a synonym for ‘the Christian religion.’ It is only a question whether ‘the Christian religion’ is designated in it from the side of doctrine or life; though it be from the point of view of life, still ‘the faith’ has ‘the Christian religion’ as its object, ‘believers’ for its subjects, and ‘to believe’ for ‘to become a Christian,’ and we may trace a development by means of which πίστις has come to mean the religion which is marked by and consists essentially in ‘believing.’ That this development so rapidly took place is significant of much, and supplies a ready explanation of such passages as Gal 3<sup>23-25</sup>, in which the phrases ‘before the faith came’ and ‘now that faith is come’ probably mean little more than before and after the advent of ‘Christianity’ into the world. On the ground of such a usage, we may at least re-affirm with increased confidence that the idea of ‘faith’ is conceived of in the NT as the characteristic idea of Christianity, and that it does not import mere ‘belief’ in an intellectual sense, but all that enters into an entire self-commitment of the soul to Jesus as the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

II. THE HISTORICAL PRESENTATION OF FAITH.—It lies on the very surface of the NT that its writers were not conscious of a chasm between the fundamental principle of the religious life of the saints of the old covenant and the faith by which they themselves lived. To them, too, Abraham is the typical example of a true believer (Ro 4, Gal 3, He 11, Ja 2); and in their apprehension ‘those who are of faith,’ that is, ‘Christians,’ are by that very fact constituted Abraham’s sons (Gal 3<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>16</sup>), and receive their blessing only along with that ‘believer’ (Gal 3<sup>9</sup>) in the steps of whose faith it is that they are walking (Ro 4<sup>12</sup>) when they believe on Him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead (Ro 4<sup>24</sup>). And not only Abraham, but the whole series of OT heroes are conceived by them to be examples of the same faith which was required of them ‘unto the gaining of the soul’ (He 11). Wrought in them by the same Spirit (2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>), ‘they are in them the same fruits, and constitute a ‘cloud of witnesses’ by whose testimony we should be stimulated to run our own race with like patience in dependence on Jesus, ‘the author and finisher of our faith’ (He 12<sup>1</sup>). Nowhere is the demand of faith treated as a novelty of the new covenant, or is there a distinction drawn between the faith of the two covenants; everywhere the sense of ‘faith’ is prominent (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>, 46 12<sup>35</sup>, 38, 44, 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>). ‘Proclamation of faith’ (Gal 3<sup>2-5</sup>, Ro 10<sup>18</sup>) is conceived as essentially one in both dispensations, under both of which the law reigns that ‘the just shall live by his faith’ (Hab 2<sup>4</sup>, Ro 1<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>38</sup>). Nor do we need to penetrate beneath the surface of the OT to perceive the justice of this NT view. Despite the infrequency of the occurrence on its pages of the terms ‘faith,’ ‘to believe,’ the religion of the OT is obviously as fundamentally a religion of faith as is that of the NT. There is a sense, to be sure, in which all religion presupposes faith (He 11<sup>6</sup>), and in this broad sense the religion of Israel, too, necessarily rested on faith. But the religion of Israel was a religion of faith in a far more specific sense than this; and that not merely because faith was more consciously its foundation, but because its very essence consisted in faith, and this faith was the same radical self-commitment to God, not merely as the highest good of the holy soul, but as the gracious Saviour of the sinner, which meets us as the characteristic feature of the religion of the NT. Between the faith of the two Testaments there exists, indeed, no further difference than that which the progress of the historical working out of redemption brought with it.

It is only a question whether ‘the Christian religion’ is designated in it from the side of doctrine or life; though it be from the point of view of life, still ‘the faith’ has ‘the Christian religion’ as its object, ‘believers’ for its subjects, and ‘to believe’ for ‘to become a Christian,’ and we may trace a development by means of which πίστις has come to mean the religion which is marked by and consists essentially in ‘believing.’ That this development so rapidly took place is significant of much, and supplies a ready explanation of such passages as Gal 3<sup>23-25</sup>, in which the phrases ‘before the faith came’ and ‘now that faith is come’ probably mean little more than before and after the advent of ‘Christianity’ into the world. On the ground of such a usage, we may at least re-affirm with increased confidence that the idea of ‘faith’ is conceived of in the NT as the characteristic idea of Christianity, and that it does not import mere very beginning to the end of the world (Gn 3<sup>2-10</sup>), and of God’s grace (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>) and consequent saving activity (Gn 3<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>, 18<sup>1</sup>). This saving activity presents itself from the very beginning also under the form of promise or covenant, the radical idea of which is naturally faithfulness on the part of the promising God with the answering attitude of faith on the part of the receptive people. Face to face with a holy God, the sinner has no hope except in the free mercy of God, and can be authorized to trust in that mercy only by express assurance. Accordingly, the only cause of salvation is from the first the pitying love of God (Gn 3<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>21</sup>), which freely grants benefits to man; while on man’s part there is never question of merit or of a strength by which he may prevail (1 S 2<sup>2</sup>), but rather a constant sense of unworthiness (Gn 3<sup>20</sup>), by virtue of which humility appears from the first as the keynote of OT piety. In the earlier portions of the OT, to be sure, there is little abstract statement of the ideas which ruled the hearts and lives of the servants of God. The essence of patriarchal religion is rather exhibited to us in action. But from the very beginning the distinctive feature of the life of the patriarchs is that it is a life of faith, that its principle is drawn, not from the earth but from above. Thus the first recorded human acts after the Fall—the naming of Eve, and the birth and naming of Cain—are expressive of trust in God's promise that, though men should die for their sins, yet man should not perish from the earth, but should triumph over the tempter; in a word, in the germ of the Seed (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>). Similarly, the life of the Flood is so ordered as to throw into relief, on the one hand, the free grace of God in His dealings with Noah (Gn 6<sup>8, 18, 81, 21, 9<sup>8</sup></sup>), and, on the other, the determination of Noah's whole life by trust in God and His promises (Gn 6<sup>22, 7<sup>1, 9, 20</sup></sup>). The open declaration of the faith-principle of Abraham's life (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>) only puts into words, in the case of him who stands at the root of Israel's whole national and religious existence, what not only might also be said of all the patriarchs, but what actually is most distinctly and both of Abraham and of them through the medium of their recorded history. The entire patriarchal narrative is set forth with the design and effect of exhibiting the life of the servants of God as a life of faith, and it is just by the fact of their implicit self-commitment to God that throughout the narrative the servants of God are differentiated from others. This does not mean, of course, that with them faith took the place of obedience: an entire self-commitment to God which did not show itself in obedience to Him would be self-contradictory, and the testing of faith by obedience is therefore a marked feature of the patriarchal narrative. But it does mean that faith was with them the precondition of all obedience. The patriarchal religion is essentially a religion, not of law but of promise, and therefore not primarily of obedience but of trust; the holy walk is characteristic of God's servants (Gn 5<sup>22, 24, 6<sup>9, 17, 24, 40, 48, 15</sup></sup>), but it is characteristically described as a walk 'with God'; its peculiarity consisted precisely in the ordering of life by entire trust in God, and it expressed itself in conduct growing out of this trust (Gn 3<sup>20, 41, 6<sup>22, 7<sup>8, 12, 17, 21, 22</sup></sup>). The life of the patriarchal age was thus but the expression in life of an entire self-commitment to God, in unwavering trust in His promises.</sup>

The piety of the OT thus began with faith. And though, when the stage of the law was reached, the emphasis might seem to be thrown rather on the obedience of faith, what has been called 'faith in action,' yet the giving of the law does not mark a fundamental change in the religion of Israel, but only a new stage in its orderly development. The law-giving was not a setting aside of the religion of promise, but an incident in its history; and the law given was not a code of jurisprudence for the world's government, but a body of household ordinances for the regulation of God's family. It is therefore itself grounded upon the promise, and it grounds the whole life of Israel in the grace of the covenant (Dt 10<sup>20</sup>). It is only because Israel are the children of God, and God has sanctified them unto Himself and chosen them to be a peculiar people unto Him (Dt 14<sup>1</sup>), that He proceeds to frame them by His law for His especial treasure (Ex 19<sup>5</sup>; cf. Tit 2<sup>14</sup>). Faith, therefore, does not appear as one of the precepts of the law, nor as a virtue superior to its precepts, nor yet as a substitute for keeping them; it rather lies behind the law as its precondition. Accordingly, in the history of the law, faith is expressly emphasized: 'The whole relation existing between Israel and J'. The signs by which Moses was accredited, and all J's deeds of power, had as their design (Ex 3<sup>12, 41, 5, 8, 9, 19, 29</sup>) and their effect (Ex 4<sup>21, 12, 28, 34, 14, 24, 7</sup>, Ps 106<sup>12</sup>) the working of faith in the people; and their subsequent unbelief is treated as the deepest crime they could commit (Nu 14<sup>11</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32, 9, 23</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22, 32, 106, 44</sup>), as is even momentary failure of faith on the part of their leaders (Nu 20<sup>12</sup>). It is only as a consequent of the relation of the people to Him, instituted by grace on His part and by faith on theirs, that J proceeds to carry out His gracious purposes for them, delivering them from bondage, giving them a law for the regulation of their lives, and framing them in the moral and legal order of priests and a holy nation. In the giving of the law a precondition of the law that Israel's life is not of the earth, but is hid with God, and is therefore to be ordered by His precepts. Its design was, therefore, not to provide a means by which man might come into relation with J, but to publish the mode of life incumbent on those who stand in the relation of children to J; and it is therefore that the book of the law was commanded to be put by the side of the ark of the covenant of the LORD, that it might be a witness against the transgressions of Israel (Dt 31<sup>26</sup>).

The effect of the law was consonant with its design. Many, no doubt, looked upon it in a purely legalistic spirit, and sought, by scrupulous fulfilment of it as a body of external precepts, to lay the foundation of a claim on God in behalf of the nation or the individual, or to realize through it, as a present possession, that salvation which was ever represented as something future. But, just in proportion as its spirituality and inwardness were felt, it operated to deepen in Israel the sense of sin, and to sharpen the conviction that the grace of God alone could salvation be expected. This humble frame of conscious dependence on God was met by a twofold proclamation. On the one hand, the eyes of God's people were directed more longingly towards the future, and, in contrast with the present failure of Israel to realize the ordinances of life which had been given it, a new dispensation of grace was promised in which the law of God should be written upon the heart, and the instinctive law of life of His people (Jer 24<sup>7, 31, 22</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>26, 27</sup>; cf. Ezk 16<sup>56</sup>, Jl 3, Hos 2<sup>9</sup>). It lay in the very nature of the OT dispensation, in which the revelation of God was always incomplete, the still unsolved enigmas of life numerous, the work of redemption unfinished, and the consummation of the kingdom ever yet to come, that the eyes of the saints should be set upon the future; and these deficiencies were felt very early. But it also lay, in the nature of the case, that the sense of them should increase as time passed and the perfecting of Israel was delayed, and especially as the whole national and religious existence of Israel was more and more put in jeopardy by assaults from without and corruption from within. The essence of piety came thus to be ever more plainly proclaimed as consisting in such a confident trust in the God of salvation as could not be confounded either by the unrighteousness which reigned in Israel or by J's judgments on Israel's sins,—such a confidence as, even in the face of the destruction of the theocracy itself, could preserve, in enduring hope, the assurance of the ultimate realization of God's purposes of good to Israel and the establishment of the everlasting kingdom. Thus hopeful waiting upon J became more and more the centre of Israelitish piety, and J" became before all 'the Hope of Israel' (Jer 14<sup>s</sup> 17<sup>is</sup> 50<sup>r</sup>, cf. Ps 71<sup>s</sup>). On the other hand, while thus waiting for the salvation of Israel, the saint must needs stay himself on God (Is 26<sup>s</sup> 50<sup>10</sup>), fixing his heart on J" as the Rock of the heart (Ps 73<sup>35</sup>). His people's strength (Ps 46<sup>s</sup>) and trust (Ps 40<sup>s</sup> 65<sup>s</sup> 71<sup>s</sup>, Jer 17<sup>r</sup>). Freed from all illusion of earthly help, and most of all from all self-confidence, he is meanwhile to live by faith (Hab 2<sup>s</sup>). Thus, along with an ever more richly expressed corporate hope, there is found also an ever more richly expressed individual trust, which finds natural utterance through an ample body of synonyms bringing out severally the various sides of that perfect commitment to God that constitutes the essence of faith. Thus we read much of trusting in, on, to God, or in His word, His name, His mercy, His salvation (נֶאֱמָר), of seeking and finding refuge in God or in the shadow of His wings (קִנְיָה), of committing ourselves to God (לִלְבָּא), setting confidence (בְּטָחָה) in Him, looking to Him (לְהִיטָה), relying upon Him (לְהִיטָה), staying upon Him (לְהִיטָה), or fixing our faith in Him (לְהִיטָה), dwelling on His word (לְהִיטָה), or waiting to Him (לְהִיטָה). So, on the hopeful side of faith, we read much of hoping in God (קָוָה), waiting on God (לְהִיטָה), of longing for Him (קָוָה), patiently waiting for Him (לְהִיטָה), and the like.

By the aid of such expressions, it becomes possible to form a somewhat clear notion of the attitude towards Him which was required by J<sup>o</sup> of His believing people, and which is summed up in the term faith. It is a reverential (Ex 14<sup>31</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>) and loving faith, which rests on the basis of firm and unshaken conviction of the grace and of the covenant God and of the trustworthiness of all His words, and exhibits itself in confident trust in J<sup>o</sup> and unwavering expectation of the fulfilment of, no doubt, all His promises, but more especially of His promise of salvation, and in consequent faithful and exclusive adherence to Him. In one word, it consists in an utter commitment of oneself to J<sup>o</sup>, with confident trust in Him as guide and saviour, and assured expectation of His promised salvation. It therefore stands in contrast, on the one hand, with trust in self or other human help, and on the other with doubt and unbelief, dependency and unfaithfulness. From J<sup>o</sup> alone is salvation to be looked for, and it comes from His free grace alone (Dt 7<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>, Am 3<sup>2</sup>, Hos 13<sup>5</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>6</sup>, Jer 39<sup>18</sup>, Mal 1<sup>2</sup>), and to those only who look solely to Him for it (Is 31<sup>7</sup> 57<sup>1</sup> 65<sup>2</sup> 66<sup>2</sup>, Jer 17<sup>9</sup> 39<sup>18</sup>, Ps 118<sup>8</sup> 146<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 17<sup>45</sup>, Ps 28<sup>28</sup> 112<sup>2</sup>, Job 22<sup>23</sup> 24<sup>3</sup> 31<sup>24</sup>, Ps 52<sup>9</sup>). The reference of faith is accordingly in the OT always distinctly soteriological; its end the Messianic salvation; and its essence a trusting, or rather an entrusting of oneself to the God of salvation, with full assurance of the fulfilment of His gracious purposes and the ultimate realization of His promise of salvation for the people and the individual. Such an attitude towards the God of salvation is identical with the faith of the NT, and is not essentially changed by the fuller revelation of God the Redeemer in the person of the promised Messiah. That it is comparatively seldom designated in the OT by the names of 'faith,' 'believing,' seems to be due, as has been often pointed out, to the special place of the OT in the history of revelation, and the adaptation of its whole contents and language to the particular task in the establishment of the kingdom of God which fell to its writers. This task turned on the special temptations and difficulties of the OT stage of development, and required emphasis to be laid on the majesty and jealousy of J<sup>o</sup> and on the duties of reverence, sincerity, and patience. Meanwhile, the faith in Him which underlies these duties is continually implied in their enforcement, and comes to open . . . . . and synonym, and . . . . . as is natural in the circumstances. . . . . the great crises of the history of . . . . . 15, Ex 4th 19th, Is 7) is the fundamental requirement of faith rendered explicit and prominent.

On the coming of God to His people in the person of His Son, the promised Messianic King, bringing the salvation, the hope of which had for so many ages been their support and stay, it naturally became the primary task of the vehicles of revelation to attract and attach God's people to the person of their Redeemer. And this task was the more pressing in proportion as the form of the fulfillment did not obviously correspond with the old and especially with the expectations of the Jews. This fundamental function dominates the whole NT, and accounts at once for the great prominence in its pages of the demand for faith, by which a gulf seems to be opened between it and the OT. The demand for faith in Jesus as the Redeemer so long hoped for, did indeed create so wide a cleft in the consciousness of the times that the term faith came rapidly to be appropriated to Christianity and 'to believe' to mean to become a Christian; so that the old covenant and the new were discriminated from each other as the ages before and after the 'coming of faith' (Gal 3<sup>23, 25</sup>). But all this does not imply that faith now for the first time became the foundation of the religion of J<sup>n</sup>, but only suggests how fully, in the new circumstances induced by the coming of the promised Redeemer, the demand for faith absorbed the whole proclamation of the gospel. In this primary concern for faith the NT books are more alike than; but, for the rest, they differ; and especially in the prominence given to it and in the aspects in which it is presented, in accordance with the place of each in the historical development of the new life; and that is as much as to say in accordance with the historical occasion out of which each arose and the special object to subserve which each was written.

And, the word 'to believe' first appears on the pages of the NT in quite OT conditions. We are conscious of no disbelief even in atmosphere between the commendation of faith and rebuke of unbelief in Exodus or the Psalms and the same commendation and rebuke in the days just before the 'coming of faith' (Lk 12<sup>45</sup>); these are but specific applications of the thesis of propheticism, expressed positively in 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup> and negatively in Is 7<sup>9</sup>. Already, however, the dawn of the new day has coloured the proclamation of the Baptist, the essence of which Paul sums up for us as a demand for faith in the Coming One (Ac 19<sup>4</sup>), and which John reports to us (Jn 3<sup>38</sup>). In the synoptic report of the teaching of Jesus, the same purpose is the dominant note. All that Jesus did and taught was directed to drawing faith to Himself. Up to the end, indeed, He repelled the unbelieving demand that He should 'declare plainly' the authority by which He acted and who He really was (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>67</sup>); but this was only that He might, in His own way, the more decidedly confound unbelief and assert His divine majesty. Even when He spoke of general faith in God (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>), and that confident trust which becomes men approaching the Almighty in prayer (Mt 21<sup>22</sup> || Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, Lk 18<sup>9</sup>), He did it in a way which inevitably directed attention to His own person as the representative of God on earth. And this accounts for the prevalence, in the synoptic report of His allusions to faith, of a reference to that exercise of faith which has sometimes been somewhat harshly divided from saving faith under the name of 'miracle faith' (Mt 8<sup>10.18</sup> || Lk 7<sup>9</sup>; Mt 9<sup>2</sup>; Mt

922 || Mk 5<sup>34</sup>, Lk 8<sup>48</sup>; Mt 9<sup>28, 29</sup>; Mt 15<sup>21</sup>; Mt 17<sup>20</sup> || Mk 9<sup>20</sup>; Mt 21<sup>21, 22</sup>, cf. Lk 17<sup>5</sup>; Mk 4<sup>40</sup>; Mk 5<sup>36</sup> || Lk 8<sup>50</sup>; Mk 10<sup>52</sup> || Lk 18<sup>42</sup>; Lk 7<sup>19</sup>. That in these instances we have not a generically distinct order of faith, directed to its own peculiar end, but only a specific movement of that entire trust in Christ which Jesus would arouse in all, seems clear from the manner in which He dealt with it, — now praising its exercise as a specially great exhibition of faith quite generally spoken of (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>), now pointing to it as a manifestation of that believing to which 'all things are possible' (Mk 9<sup>23</sup>), now connecting with it not merely the healing of the body but the forgiveness of sins (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>), and everywhere using it as a means of attaching the confidence of men to His person as the source of all good. Having come to His own, in other words, Jesus took men upon the plane on which He found them, and sought to lead them through the needs which they felt, and the relief of which they sought in Him, up to a recognition of their greater needs and of His ability to give relief to them also. That word of power, 'Thy faith hath saved thee,' spoken in direct reference to bodily wants and of the deeper needs of the soul (Lk 7<sup>50</sup>), not only resulted, but was intended to result, in focusing all eyes on Himself as the one physician of both body and soul (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>). Explicit references to these higher results of faith are, to be sure, not very frequent in the synoptic discourses, but there are quite enough of them to exhibit Jesus' specific claim to be the proper object of faith for these effects also (Lk 8<sup>12, 13</sup> 22<sup>32</sup>, Mt 18<sup>8</sup> || Mk 9<sup>42</sup>, Lk 7<sup>50</sup>), and to prepare the way for His rebuke, after His resurrection, of the lagging minds of His followers, that they did not understand all these things (Lk 24<sup>26, 45</sup>), and for His great commission to Paul to go and open men's eyes that they might receive 'remission of sins and an inheritance among the sanctified by faith in Him' (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>).

It is very natural that a much fuller account of Jesus' teaching as to faith should be given in the more intimate discourses which are preserved by John. But in these discourses, too, His primary task is to bind men to Him by faith. The chief difference is that here, consonantly with the nature of the discourses recorded, much more prevailing stress is laid upon the higher aspects of faith, and we see Jesus striving specially to attract to Himself a faith consciously set upon eternal good. In a number of instances we find ourselves in much the same atmosphere as in the Synoptics (4<sup>21, 42</sup> 48<sup>36</sup> 9<sup>36</sup>); and the method of Jesus is the same throughout. Everywhere He offers Himself as the object of faith, and claims faith in Himself for the highest concerns of the soul. But everywhere He begins at the level at which He finds His hearers, and leads them upward to these higher things. It is so that He deals with Nathanael (1<sup>51</sup>) and Nicodemus (3<sup>12</sup>); and it is so that He deals constantly with the Jews, everywhere requiring faith in Himself for eternal life (5<sup>24, 25, 39</sup> 6<sup>35, 40, 47</sup> 7<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>25, 36</sup> 12<sup>44, 46</sup>), declaring that faith in Him is the certain outcome of faith in their own Son (10<sup>37, 38</sup>), is involved in and is indeed identical with faith in God (10<sup>37, 38</sup> 12<sup>44</sup>), and is the one thing which God requires of them (6<sup>29</sup>), and the failure of which will bring them eternal ruin (3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>54</sup> 8<sup>24</sup>). When dealing with His followers, His primary care was to build up their faith in Him. Witness especially His solicitude for their faith in the last hours of His intercourse with them. For the faith they had reposed in Him He returns thanks to God (17<sup>19</sup>), but He is still nursing their faith (16<sup>31</sup>), praying for its increase through the events to come, and with almost passionate eagerness claiming it at their hands (14<sup>1, 10, 11, 12</sup>).

Even after His resurrection we find Him restoring the faith of the waverer (20<sup>29</sup>) with words which pronounce a special blessing on those who should hereafter believe on less compelling evidence — words whose point is not until we realize that they contain an allusion to the work of the apostles as like His own, summed up in bringing men to faith in Him (17<sup>20, 21</sup>).

The record in Ac of the apostolic proclamation testifies to the faithfulness with which this office was prosecuted by Jesus' delegates (Ac 3<sup>22, 23</sup>). The task undertaken by them was, by persuading men (Ac 17<sup>2</sup> 28<sup>24</sup>), to bring them unto obedience to the faith that is in Jesus (Ac 6<sup>7</sup>, Ro 1<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>26</sup>, cf. 2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 10<sup>5</sup>). And by such 'testifying faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20<sup>21</sup>, cf. 10<sup>42</sup>) there was quickly gathered together a community of 'believers' (Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>32</sup>), that is, of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 5<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>), and that not only in Jerus. but beyond (8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>42</sup> 10<sup>45</sup> 11<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>48</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>), and not only of Jews (10<sup>45</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>30</sup>) but of Gentiles (11<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>48</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>12, 34</sup> 18<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>25</sup>). The enucleation of this community of believers brought to the apostolic teachers the new task of preserving the idea of faith, which was the formative principle of the new community, and to propagate which in the world, pure and living and sound, was its chief office. It was inevitable that those who were called into the faith of Christ should bring into the infant Church with them many old tendencies of thinking, and that within the new community the fermentation of ideas should be very great. The task of instructing and disciplining the new community soon became unavoidably one of the heaviest of apostolic duties; and its progress is naturally reflected in their letters. Thus certain differences in their modes of dealing with faith emerge among NT writers, according as one lays stress on the deadness and pointlessness of a faith which produces no fruit in the life, and another on the valuelessness of a faith which does not emancipate from the bondage of the law; or as one lays stress on the perfection of the object of faith and the necessity of keeping the heart set upon it, and another on the necessity of its being in its purity that only a real and true faith can be unseen and future which constitutes the very essence of faith; or as one lays stress on the reaching out of faith to the future in confident hope, and another on the present enjoyment by faith of all the blessings of salvation.

It was to James that it fell to rebuke the Jewish tendency to conceive of the faith which was pleasing to J<sup>h</sup> as a mere intellectual acquiescence in His being and claims, when imported into the Church and made to do duty as 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory' (2<sup>1</sup>). He has sometimes been misread as if he were depreciating faith, or at least the place of faith in salvation. But it is perfectly clear that with James, as truly as with any other NT writer, a sound faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as the manifested God (2<sup>1</sup>) lies at the very basis of the Christian life (1<sup>8</sup>), and is the condition of all acceptable approach to God (1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). It is not faith as he conceives it which he depreciates, but that professed faith (Ἀγγ, 2<sup>14</sup>) which cannot be shown to be real by appropriate works (2<sup>18</sup>), and so differs by a whole diameter alike from the faith of Abraham that was reckoned unto him for righteousness (2<sup>23</sup>), and from the faith of Christians as James understood it (2<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>8</sup>, cf. 1<sup>22</sup>). The impression which is easily taken from the last half of the second chapter of James, that his teaching and that of Paul stand in some polemic relation, is nevertheless a delusion, and arises from an insufficient realization of the place of occupied by faith in the discussions of the Jewish schools, reflections of which have naturally found their way into the language of both Paul and James. And so far are we from needing to suppose some reference, direct or indirect, to Pauline teaching to account for James' entrance upon the question which he discusses, that this was a matter upon which an earnest teacher could not fail to touch in the presence of a tendency common among the Jews at the advent of Christianity (cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>, Ro 2<sup>17</sup>), and certain to pass over into Jewish-Christian circles: and James' treatment of it finds, indeed, its entire presupposition in the state of things underlying the exhortation of 1<sup>22</sup>. When read from his own historical standpoint, James' teachings are free from any discord with those of Paul, who as strongly as James denies all value to a faith which does not work by love (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). In short, James is not depreciating faith: with him, too, it is faith that is reckoned unto righteousness (2<sup>23</sup>), though only such a faith as shows itself in works can be so reckoned, because a faith which does not come to fruitage in works is dead, non-existent. He is rather deepening the idea of faith, and insisting that it includes in its very conception something more than an otiose intellectual assent.

It was a far more serious task which was laid upon Paul. As apostle to the Gentiles he was called upon to make good in all its depth of meaning the fundamental principle of the religion of grace, that the righteous shall live by faith, as over-against what had come to be the ingrained legalism of Jewish thought now intruded into the Christian Church. It was not, indeed, doubted that faith was requisite for obtaining salvation. But he that had been born a Jew and was conscious of the promise of the children of the promise, found it hard to think that faith was all that was requisite. What, then, was the advantage of the Jew? In defence of the rights of the Gentiles, Paul was forced in the most delicate way to validate the great principle of the religion of grace, the matter of salvation, there was a difference between Jew and Gentile,—that the Jew has no other advantage than that which comes through faith in Christ (Gal 2<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>16</sup>), and that the Gentile fully possesses this righteousness from faith alone (Gal 3<sup>8</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>); in a word, that the one God, who is God of the Gentiles also, 'shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith' (Ro 3<sup>30</sup>). Thus was it made clear not only that 'no man is justified by the law' (Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>, Ro 3<sup>20</sup>), but also that a man is justified by faith apart from law-works (Ro 3<sup>28</sup>). The splendid vigour and thoroughness of Paul's dialectic development of the absolute contrast between the ideas of faith and works, by virtue of which one peremptorily excludes the other, left no hiding-place for a work-righteousness of any kind or degree, but cast all men solely upon the righteousness of God, which is apart from the law and comes through faith unto all that believe (Ro 3<sup>21</sup> 2<sup>22</sup>). Thus, in vindicating the place of faith as the only instrument of salvation, Paul necessarily dwelt much upon the object of faith, not as if he were formally teaching what the object is on which faith savingly lays hold, but as a natural result of his effort to show from its object the all-sufficiency of faith. It is because faith lays hold on Jesus Christ, who was delivered up for our trespasses and was raised for our justification (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>), and makes us possessors of the righteousness provided by God through Him, that there is no room for any righteousness of our own in the ground of our salvation (Ro 10<sup>3</sup>, Eph 2<sup>8</sup>). This is the reason of that full development of the object of faith in Paul's writings, and of the specific connexion between faith and the righteousness of God proclaimed in Christ, by which the doctrine of Paul is sometimes said to be distinguished from the more general teaching of the Hebrews. This more general is not, however, the peculiar property of that epistle, but is the fundamental conception of the whole body of biblical writers in OT and in NT (cf. Mt 6<sup>25</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>, Jn 20<sup>30</sup> 31, 1 P 1<sup>8</sup>), Paul himself (2 Co 4<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>16-22</sup> 8<sup>24</sup>); the other hand, the Epistle to the Hebrews, no less than Paul, teaches that there is no righteousness except through faith (10<sup>38</sup> 11<sup>7</sup>, cf. 11<sup>14</sup>).

That in the Epistle to the Hebrews it is the general idea of faith, or, to be more exact, the subjective nature of faith, that is dwelt upon, rather than its specific object, is not due to a peculiar conception of what faith lays hold upon, but to the particular task which fell to its writer in the work of planting Christianity in the world. With him, too, the person and work of Christ are the specific object of faith (13<sup>7-8</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>). But the danger against which, in the providence of God, he was called upon to guard the infant flock, was not that it should fall away from faith to works, but that it should fall away from faith into despair. His readers were threatened not with legalism but with 'shrinking back' (10<sup>39</sup>), and he needed, therefore, to emphasize not so much the object of faith as the duty of faith. As a result, it is not so much on the righteousness of God as on its perfecting that he insists; it is not so much its contrast with works as its contrast with impatience that he impresses on his readers' consciences; it is not so much to faith specifically in Christ and in Him alone that he exhorts them as to an attitude of faith—an attitude which could rise above the seen to the unseen, the present to the future, the temporal to the eternal, and which in the midst of trials could retain patience, in the midst of difficulties could preserve hope. This is the key to the whole treatment of faith in the Epistle to the Hebrews—its definition as the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen (11<sup>1</sup>); its illustration and enforcement by the example of the heroes of faith in the past, a list chosen and treated with the utmost skill for the end in view (11); its constant attachment to the promises (4<sup>1-2</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>36</sup> 38 11<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>); its connexion with the faithfulness (11<sup>11</sup>, cf. 10<sup>23</sup>), almightiness (11<sup>19</sup>), and the rewards of God (11<sup>26</sup> 28); and its association with such virtues as boldness (3<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 23), confidence (3<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>), patience (10<sup>36</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>), hope (3<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>11</sup> 18 10<sup>23</sup>).

With much that is similar to the situation implied in Hebrews, that which underlies the Epistles of Peter differs from it in the essential particular that their prevailingly Gentile readers were not in imminent danger of falling back into Judaism. There is, accordingly, much in the aspect in which faith is presented in these epistles which reminds us of what we find in Hebrews, as, for example, the close connexion into which it is brought with obedience (1 P 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>), its prevailing reference to what is unseen and future (1 P 1<sup>5</sup> 7-10 21), and its consequent demand for steadfastness (5<sup>9</sup>, cf. 1<sup>7</sup>), and especially for hope (1<sup>21</sup>, cf. 13<sup>13</sup> 35<sup>15</sup>). Yet there is a noteworthy difference in the whole tone of the commendation of faith, which was rooted, no doubt, in the character of Peter, as the tone of his speeches recorded in Acts shows, but which also grew out of the nature of the task set before him in these letters. There is no hint of despair lying in the near background, but the buoyancy of assured hope rings throughout these epistles. Having hearkened to the prophet like unto Moses (1 Jn 15<sup>27</sup>, Ac 32<sup>22</sup>), Christians are the children of obedience (1 P 1<sup>14</sup>), and through their precious faith (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>) possessors of the preciousness of the promises (1 P 2<sup>7</sup>). As they have obeyed the voice of God and kept His covenant, they have become His peculiar treasure, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (Ex 19<sup>6</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>). Naturally, the duty rests upon them of living, while here below, in accordance with their high hopes (1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>). But in any event they are but sojourners and pilgrims here (1 P 2<sup>11</sup> 1<sup>17</sup>), and have a sure inheritance reserved for them in heaven (14), unto which they are guarded through faith by the power of God (15). The reference of faith in Peter is therefore characteristically to the completion rather than to the inception of salvation (15<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. Ac 15<sup>11</sup>). Of course this does not imply that he does not share the common biblical conception of faith: he is conscious of no difference of view from that of OT (1 P 2<sup>6</sup>); and, no less than with James, with him faith is the fountain of all good works (1 P 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>); and, no less than with Paul, with him faith lays hold of the righteousness of Christ (2 P 1<sup>1</sup>). It only means that in the circumstances of his writing he is led to lay special emphasis on the reference of faith to the consummated salvation, in order to quicken in his readers that hope which would sustain them in their persecutions, and to keep their eyes set, not on their present trials, but, in accordance with faith's very nature, on the unseen and eternal glory.

In the entirely different circumstances in which he wrote, John wished to lay stress on the very opposite aspect of faith. For what is characteristic of John's treatment of faith is insistence not so much on the certainty and glory of the future inheritance which it secures, as on the fullness of the present enjoyment of salvation which it brings. There was pressing into the Church a false conception of knowledge, which affected not only the intellectual but the spiritual life. This John met, on the one hand, by deepening the idea of knowledge to the knowledge of experience, and, on the other, by emphasizing the immediate entrance of every believer into the possession of salvation. It is not to be supposed, of course, that he was ready to neglect or deny that out-reaching of faith to the future on which Peter lays such stress: he is zealous that Christians shall know that they are children of God from the moment of believing, and from that instant possessors of the new life of the Spirit; but he does not forget the greater glory of the future, and he knows how to use this Christian hope also as an incitement to holy living (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). Nor are we to suppose that, in his anti-Gnostic insistence on the element of conviction in faith, he would lose sight of that central element of surrendering trust which is the heart of faith in other portions of the Scriptures: he would indeed have believers know what they believe, and who He is in whom they put their trust, and what He has done for them, and is doing, and will do, in and through them; but this is not that they may know these things simply as intellectual propositions, but that they may rest on them in faith and know them in personal experience. Least of all the NT writers could John confine faith to a merely intellectual act: his whole doctrine of faith is rather a protest against the intellectualism of Gnosticism. His fundamental conception of faith differs in nothing from that of the other NT writers; with him, too, it is a trustful appropriation of Christ and surrender of self to His salvation. Eternal life has been manifested by Christ (Jn 14, 1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>), and he, and he only, who has the Son has the life (1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>). But in the conflict in which he was engaged he required to throw the strongest emphasis possible upon the immediate entrance of believers into this life. This insistence had manifold applications to the circumstances of his readers. It had, for example, a negative application to the antinomian tendency of Gnostic teaching, which John does not fail to press (1 Jn 15<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>): 'whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God' (1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>), and 'whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin' (1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>). It had also a positive application to their own encouragement: the simple believer was placed on a plane of life to which no knowledge could attain; the new life received by faith gave the victory over the world; and John boldly challenges experience to point to any who have overcome the world but he that believes that Jesus is the Son of God (1 Jn 5<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>). Accordingly, it is characteristic of John to announce that 'he that believeth hath eternal life' (Jn 3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>47</sup> 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 15 5<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>). He even declares the purpose of his writing to be, in the Gospel, that his readers 'may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, they may have life in his name' (20<sup>31</sup>); and in the First Epistle, that they that believe in the name of the Son of God 'may know that they have eternal life' (1 Jn 5<sup>13</sup>).

III THE BIBLICAL CONCEPTION OF FAITH.—By means of the diversified diversity of emphasis of faith on the several aspects of faith, the outlines of the biblical conception of faith are thrown into very high relief.

The nature of faith we have what is almost a formal definition in the description of it as an 'assurance of things hoped for, a conviction of things not seen' (He 11<sup>1</sup>). It obviously contains in it, therefore, an element of knowledge (He 11<sup>6</sup>), and it as obviously issues in conduct (He 11<sup>8</sup>, cf. 5<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>22</sup>). But it consists neither in assent nor in obedience, but in a reliant trust in the invisible Author of all good (He 11<sup>27</sup>), in which the mind is set upon the things that are above and not on the things that are upon the earth (Col 3<sup>2</sup>, cf. 2 Co 4<sup>18-19</sup>, Mt 6<sup>25</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>). The examples cited in He 11 are themselves enough to show that the faith there commended is not a mere belief in God's existence and justice and goodness, or crediting of His word and promises, but a practical counting of Him as Father (11<sup>1</sup>), with a trust so profound that no trial can shake it (11<sup>35</sup>), and so absolute that it survives the loss of even its own pledge (11<sup>27</sup>). So little is faith in its biblical conception merely a conviction of the understanding, that, when that is called faith, the true idea of faith needs to be built up above this word (Ja 2<sup>14</sup>). It is a movement of the whole inner man (Ro 10<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>), and is set in contrast with an unbelief that is akin, not to ignorance but to disobedience (He 3<sup>18-19</sup>, Jn 3<sup>36</sup>, Ro 11<sup>20</sup> 30 15<sup>31</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, He 4<sup>6</sup> 2, 1 P 1<sup>7</sup> 8 3<sup>1</sup> 20 4<sup>18</sup>, Ac 14<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>), and that grows out of, not lack of information, but that aversion of the heart from God (He 3<sup>12</sup>) which takes pleasure in unrighteousness (2 Th 2<sup>12</sup>), and is so unsparingly exposed by our Lord (Jn 3<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>44</sup> 8<sup>47</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>). In the breach of its idea, it is thus the going out of the heart from itself and its resting on God in confident trust for all good. But the scriptural revelation has to do with, and is directed to the needs of, not man in the abstract, but sinful man; and for sinful man this hearty reliance on God necessarily becomes humble trust in Him for the fundamental need of the sinner—forgiveness of sins and reception into favour. In response to the revelations of His grace and the provisions of His mercy, it commits itself without reserve and with abnegation of all self-dependence, to Him as its sole and sufficient Saviour, and thus, in one act, empties itself of all claim on God and casts itself upon His grace alone for salvation.

It is, accordingly, solely from its object that faith derives its value. This object is the grace, whether conceived of of all life, light, and blessing, on whom man in his creaturely weakness is entirely dependent, or, whenever sin and the eternal welfare of the soul are in view, as the Author of salvation in whom alone the hope of unworthy man can be placed. This one object of saving faith never varies from the beginning to the end of the scriptural revelation; though, naturally, there is an immense difference between its earlier and later stages in fulness of knowledge as to the nature of the redemptive work by which the salvation intrusted to God shall be accomplished; and as naturally there occurs a very great variety of forms of statement in which trust in the God of salvation receives expression. Already, however, at the gate of Eden, the God in whom the trust of our first parents is reposed is the God of the promise of the retrieval of the injury the serpent had wrought from that beginning of knowledge the progress is steady, until, what is implied in the promise having become express in the work of redemption, the trust of sinners is placed in the God who was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). Such a faith, again, could not fail to embrace with humble confidence all the gracious promises of the God of salvation, from which indeed it draws its life and strength; nor could it fail to lay hold with strong conviction on all those revealed truths which constitute, indeed, in the Gospel, in which it has been called upon to persist throughout the ages, the very grounds in view of which it has been able to rest upon Him with steadfast trust. These truths, in which the 'Gospel' or glad-tidings to God's people has been from time to time embodied, run all the way from such simple facts as that it was the very God of their fathers that had appeared unto Moses for their deliverance (Ex 4<sup>2</sup>), to such stupendous facts, lying at the root of the very work of salvation itself, as that He is the Christ, the Son of God sent of God to save the world (Jn 6<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>21</sup> 12<sup>42</sup> 13<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 17<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>31</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>15</sup>), that God has raised Him from the dead (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>), and that as His children we shall live with Him (Ro 6<sup>8</sup>). But in believing this variously presented Gospel, faith has ever terminated with trustful reliance, not on the promise but on the Promiser,—not on the propositions which declare God's grace and willingness to save, or Christ's divine nature and power, or the reality and perfection of His saving work, but on the Saviour upon whom, because of these great facts, it could securely rest as on One able to save to the uttermost. Jesus Christ, God the Redeemer, is accordingly the one object of saving faith, presented to its embrace at first implicitly and in promise, and ever more and more openly until at last it is entirely explicit and we read that 'a man is not justified save through faith in Jesus Christ' (Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). If, with even greater explicitness still, faith is sometimes said to rest upon some element in the saving work of Christ, as, for example, upon His blood or His righteousness (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>), obviously such a singling out of the very thing in His work on which faith takes hold, in no way derogates from its repose upon Him, and Him only, as the sole and sufficient Saviour.

The saving power of faith resides thus not in itself, but in the Almighty Saviour on whom it rests. It is never on account of its formal nature as a psychic act that faith is conceived in Scripture to be saving,—as if this frame of mind or attitude of heart were itself a virtue with claims on God for reward, or at least especially pleasing to Him (either in its nature or as an act of obedience) and thus predisposing Him to favour, or as if it brought the soul into an attitude of sympathy or of sympathy with God, or opened a channel of communication from Him. It is not faith that saves, but faith in Jesus Christ: faith in any other saviour, or in this or that philosophy or human conceit (Col 2<sup>18</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), or in any other gospel than that of Jesus Christ and Him as crucified (Gal 1<sup>8</sup>), brings not salvation but a curse. It is not, strictly speaking, even faith in Christ that saves, but Christ that saves through faith. The saving power resides exclusively, not in the act of faith or the attitude of faith or the nature of faith, but in the object of faith; and in this the whole biblical representation centres, so that we could not more radically misconceive it than by transferring to faith even the smallest fraction of that saving energy which is attributed in the Scriptures solely to Christ Himself. This purely mediatory function of faith is very clearly indicated in the regimens in which it stands, which are so simple in their nature. It is most commonly joined to the verb of means or instrument (Ac 15<sup>7</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, Ro 3<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup>, He 11<sup>3</sup>, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 17, 20, 21, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31); and the relationship intended is further explained by the use to express it of the preposition ἐν (Ro 1<sup>17</sup> 17 3<sup>28</sup>, 39 4<sup>16</sup>, 16 5<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>30</sup>, 32 10<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>, 18 37, 8, 9, 11, 12, 27, 28 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>38</sup>, Ja 2<sup>24</sup>) and διὰ (with the genitive, never with the accusative, Ro 3<sup>22</sup>, 25, 30, 2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>, 28 3<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, He 6<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>23</sup>, 29, 1 P 1<sup>5</sup>),—the fundamental idea of the former construction being that of instrumentality and of the latter that of mediation or instrumentality, though they are used together in the same context, apparently with no variation of meaning (Ro 3<sup>28</sup>, 28, 30, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). It is not necessary to discover an essentially different implication in the exceptional usage of the ἐν (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>) and καρὰ (He 11<sup>7</sup>, 18), in this connexion: ἐν is apparently to be taken in a quasi-temporal sense, 'on faith,' giving the occasion of the divine act, and καρὰ very similarly in the sense of conformity, 'in conformity with faith.' Not infrequently we meet also with a construction with the preposition ἐν which properly designates the sphere, but which in passages like Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Col 2<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> appears to pass over into the conception of instrumentality.

So little indeed is faith conceived as containing in itself the energy or ground of salvation, that it is consistently represented as, in its origin, itself a gratuity from God in the prosecution of His saving work. It comes, not of one's own strength or virtue, but only to those who are chosen of God for the purpose (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>), and hence is His gift (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>, cf. 2<sup>29</sup>, Ph 1<sup>29</sup>), through Christ (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>29</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup>, cf. He 12<sup>2</sup>), by the Spirit (2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>, Gal 5<sup>5</sup>), by means of the preached word (Ro 10<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>2</sup>); and as it is thus obtained from God (2 P 1<sup>1</sup>, Jude 3, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>), thanks are to be returned to God for it (Col 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). Thus, even here all boasting is excluded, and salvation is conceived in all its elements as the pure product of unalloyed grace, issuing not from, but in, good works (Eph 2<sup>8-12</sup>). The place of faith in the process of salvation, as biblically conceived, could scarcely, therefore, be better described than by the use of the scholastic term 'instrumental cause.' Not in one portion of the Scriptures alone, but throughout their whole extent, it is conceived as a boon from above which comes to men, no doubt through the channels of their own activities, but not as if it were an effect of their energies, but rather, as it has been finely phrased, as a gift which God lays in the lap of the soul. 'With the heart,' indeed, 'man believeth unto righteousness'; but this be-

‘Where you are liberal of your loves and counsels,
Be sure you be not loose ; for those you make friends,
And give your hearts to, when they once perceive
The least rub in your fortunes, fall away
Like water from you.’

Again, Henry VIII. III. iii. 209—

'And as for Clarence, as my letters tell me,
He's very likely now to fall from him'

J. HASTINGS.

FALL (παράπτωμα, a word used of Adam's transgression in Wis 10<sup>1</sup>, though not restricted to this anywhere in OT or NT).—Few chapters of the Bible have affected religious speculation more continuously and more deeply than the chapter which records the Fall and the weakness of primeval man. It is out of place here to discuss all the topics which arise out of Gn 3, as to do so would be to write a treatise on Christian Theology. We can only consider—(i.) the character of the record, and its relation to other accounts of man's primitive state, which have come down to us from early times; (ii.) the influence of the story of Paradise and the Fall upon Hebrew belief as to man's destiny and his condition in the sight of God; (iii.) the inferences drawn by the NT writers, and notably by St. Paul, from the story of Adam's sin, read in the light of Christ's redemption. It will be impossible to give more than the briefest summary (iv.) of the interpretations of St Paul's doctrine of the Fall which have most widely affected Christian thought; but something must be said, in conclusion, (v.) of the bearing of modern theories of the origin and development of man upon the general doctrine of the Fall explained in Scripture and received by the Church.

i. We briefly recapitulate the leading points of the narrative in Gn 2-3, which forms the first section in Gn incorporated from the source described by critics as the Prophetic Code (J). Adam and Eve, the parents of the human family, are represented as living in innocence and peace in a fair garden where sin had not entered, and where death had no power, for in its midst stood the Tree of Life, of which they were permitted freely to eat. The fruit of one tree alone, the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, was forbidden to them; and death was declared to be the penalty of disobedience. But their happy condition of purity and of fellowship with God did not remain undisturbed. The serpent seduced the woman to disobey the divine command; she, in turn, tempted her husband to his fall. And then came upon the guilty pair the consciousness of sin and the fear of the divine wrath, which they vainly tried to evade by excuses for their fault. The voice of God is heard, pronouncing a curse upon the serpent, and declaring a perpetual strife between it and mankind: the man and the woman, for their sin, are for ever subjected to pain in the fulfilment of their destiny, the woman in her childbearing, the man in his daily labour for daily bread. They are both expelled from Eden, and the Cherubim guard its gates against them, lest, eating of the tree of life, they should live for ever. The picture, however, is lightened by one ray of hope; for the seed of the serpent shall not finally prevail over the seed of the woman. 'It shall bruise thy head,' though 'thou shalt bruise his heel.'

Traditions of a state of primeval innocence, of man's fall from his pristine purity, and of the consequent entrance of death into the world, have, it is said, been gathered by travellers from races far removed from Hebrew literature or its sources.* Striking parallels to Gn 3 are to be found in the Zoroastrian legends as to the beginning of man's career. Yima, the first man, is said to have passed his days in a primeval paradise. But after a time he committed sin, was cast out of Paradise, and delivered up to the serpent (identified with an evil spirit), who finally brought about his death. A later version of the story is told in connexion with the first pair Masha and Mashyana. The lying spirit grew bold, and, presenting himself a second time, brought them trouble, which they ate. As a punishment, of the hundred privileges they formerly enjoyed only one was left to them.* Few of the parallel stories that are adduced are, however, so exactly recorded as these; and we are inclined to believe that the similarities to the Bible narrative are often overstated. The fact that many people in many lands have sought to explain the existing disorders in the world as the consequence of man's lapse from a paradisaical state is deeply significant, and we shall return to it again. But the tenacity of the legends in which such belief is embodied are not, as a rule, interesting save to the curious student of folk-lore, and they throw little light upon Scripture. It is to Assyria and the East that we naturally look for illumination. And it has been pointed out that the mythology of Babylonia and Assyria presents some curious parallels to the story of the serpent in the garden of which we read in Gn 3. On Assyrian inscriptions are found the names Diglat=Hiddekel, and Bura=Euphrates, in connexion with the word Idinu or 'field,' which is identified with Eden. Coniferous sacred trees appear frequently on Assyrian reliefs and Bab. representations of a similar character. On a Bab. stone cylinder in the British Museum, two figures are depicted with a serpent behind their hands stretched out towards it. And the serpent figure is also found on the Chaldean tablets in which the evil serpent, Tiamat, is overthrown by Merodach. (See COSMOGONY, p. 505.) If the third Creation Tablet were not so extremely difficult to decipher as it is reported to be partly in consequence of its fragmentary condition, it is probable that we should be able to trace in the story which it records even more striking similarities to the Scripture narrative. But Oriental scholars are not as yet entirely in agreement as to the translation of some of the more interesting portions of it; and the inferences that may be derived from the passage now to be cited must therefore be regarded as somewhat uncertain. The following is the rendering of Boscawen †:—

* See Baring Gould's Legends of OT Characters, i. 26-39, and the references there given.

'In sin one with the other in compact joins,
The serpent and the woman, den of the God,
His slake they destroyed;
The sweet juice when nigh to the body,
Great is their sin. Themselves they exalted;
To Merodach their Redeemer he appointed their fate.'

If this translation be trustworthy, we have here something very like the biblical story of the forbidden fruit; but the rendering given by Pinches differs in some significant particulars. We recall, for our warning, that an inscription interpreted by Geo. Smith as a Bab. version of the story of the Fall turned out, when closely examined by Oppert, to be a hymn to the Creator.‡ Making all due allowances, however, for uncertainty of translation, it seems probable, when we bear in mind the affinity of the earlier Creation Tablets to Gn 1, as well as the other points of contact with * Compare Lenormant's Histoire Ancienne de l'Orient, i. 30 ff.

† There is a photograph of this in Boscawen's Bible and the Monuments, p. 82. It is to be borne in mind that there is nothing to suggest that the figures are not both males. And, as Schrader (KAT p. 37) points out, a specific feature of the Bible narrative, viz. that the woman gave the fruit to the man, is not here.

‡ Bible and Oriental Record, iv. 251. Another translation by Pinches is given at p. 82. See also Bible and Monuments, p. 65, 101, and Davis, op. cit. p. 65, who questions the accuracy of Boscawen's rendering, and urges that we have here no true parallel to the Genesis narrative. See, for original, Delitzsch, Assyrische Lesestücke, p. 91.

the story of Eden to which we have adverted, that a legend of the fall of man, resembling in external features the account of Gn 3, was widely spread in . . . . . Indeed, in another passage cited by Roseawen we . . . . . of the victory over the serpent of Gn 3<sup>15</sup>—

‘Tiamat, whom he had bound, then turned backward:

So . . . . .

The north wind bore it away to secret places.’*

There is nothing to surprise or to embarrass faith in the fact—if it be a fact—that traditional beliefs about the origins of human history should have been utilized in a particular form by the compiler of the Pentateuch or by the Prophetic Code. It must be remembered that the period with which we are dealing is strictly pre-historic, and also that legendary history is not . . . . . false or misleading. The truly remarkable circumstance is, that the early narratives in Gn are free from the extravagant and grotesque mythological accretions which generally gather round ancient beliefs among primitive peoples; and that every touch in these narratives as we have them conveys a deep religious truth. The ‘inspiration of selection’ is a phenomenon which every candid student of Scripture must recognize; and nowhere is its presence more manifest than in the first pages of OT, which present the early history of man in a form that can be understood by the simplest, and yet may be studied with spiritual benefit by the wisest of mankind.

We believe, then, that we have in the biblical record of the Fall a purified form of legendary narrative concerning man’s early history which had wide currency among Semitic peoples. In an uncritical age it was interpreted literally, and it has been counted historical for many generations by the majority of those, whether Jews or Christians, who accept the authority of the OT. But another method of interpretation, viz. the allegorical, had many adherents. Thus, of the account of the Fall, Philo asserts: ἔστι δὲ ταῦτα οὐ πλάσματα μύθων, οὐδὲ τὸ ποιητικὸν καὶ σοφιστικὸν χαίρει γένος, ἀλλὰ δειγμάτων τύπων ἐν ἀλληγορίᾳ παρακαλοῦντων κατὰ τὰς δι’ ὑπονοῶν ἀποδόσεις (De mundi opificio, § 56), i.e. ‘These things are not mere fabulous myths, but rather types shadowing forth some allegorical truth.’ And, accordingly, he explains that Adam represents the rational and Eve the sensuous part of man, the serpent being the symbol of pleasure. The Christian teachers of Alexandria, Clement and Origen, favoured this allegorical mode of interpretation; but Tertullian and Irenæus defended the literal truth of the narrative, as also did Augustine, who did not, however, reject the typical significance of OT history; and through the scholastic philosophy it passed into the dogmatic theology of the Reformation. But the opinion that, however the story was intended to be taken by the compiler of the Bk. of Genesis, it might be interpreted as a parable of spiritual truth, has been defended by great names in every age of the Church.†

There are, then, these several methods of interpretation—(1) that the narrative of the Fall is literal history; (2) that it is a legend, which conveys truth under mythological disguise; (3) that it is, and was only intended to be, an allegory. The first and third can hardly be adopted in the present condition of exegesis, and it is probable that the second view of the narrative is that which is now most generally accepted by those who have studied the subject. That the biblical form of the legend should represent the facts as they actually took place more closely than the parallel stories which have been collected from the literature of the ancient world, is not surprising to any believer in the unique character of Scripture; but it is not to be forgotten that it is the great religious truths which underlie the narrative, that are of real importance, and these are brought out in the Bk. of Genesis in a quite unique fashion.

ii. The allusions in OT to the story of Gn 3 are few and uncertain. If the rendering of the RV may be pressed, there are indeed two undoubted references to the Fall, viz., ‘If like Adam I covered my transgressions’ (Job 31<sup>33</sup>), and, ‘But they like Adam have transgressed the covenant’ (Hos 6<sup>7</sup>). But it seems that, at least in the former passage, ἵσως should be rendered ‘after the manner of men,’ and this rendering would also be admissible in Hos 6<sup>7</sup>; so that we have to look elsewhere for allusions to the Paradise narrative on which stress may be laid. The ‘garden of Eden’ is mentioned several times by the prophets of the Captivity (Ezk 28<sup>13</sup> 31<sup>9</sup>, Is 51<sup>3</sup>, cf. Jl 2<sup>3</sup>); and the Bk. of Proverbs . . . . . mentions a ‘tree of life’ (see esp. Ps 90<sup>8</sup> and Ec 12<sup>7</sup> have been supposed to take up the . . . . . of Gn 3<sup>19</sup>. It is possible also that we have . . . . . of the curse upon the serpent (Gn 3<sup>14</sup>) in Mic 7<sup>17</sup> . . . . . ‘lick the dust like a serpent,’ and in Is 65<sup>25</sup> ‘Dust shall be the serpent’s meat,’ though the latter . . . . . may be derived from Micah. The conception of a personal tempter of mankind appears in the story of Job and also in 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup> (see also Zec 3<sup>1</sup>); but it is not until a later period that we come upon any . . . . . of ‘Satan’ or the ‘Adversary,’ . . . . . the first trace of such being Wis 2<sup>24</sup>. Cf. also Rev 12<sup>9</sup> and Ro 16<sup>20</sup> ‘The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly,’ which manifestly has reference to Gn 3<sup>15</sup>.*

So far, then, as the language of OT is concerned, we have not convincing evidence that the story of the Fall as given in Gn 3 was much in the thoughts of the sacred writers. But were we to conclude, therefore, that the doctrine of a Fall formed no part of their religious beliefs, we should be seriously mistaken. If there is one idea which is throughout conspicuous in OT, it is the idea of sin. No other nation of antiquity was possessed with so intense a consciousness of the wickedness of mankind, and of the sin of man as an offence against God. ‘Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me’ (Ps 51<sup>5</sup>). ‘There is none that doeth good, no, not one’ (Ps 14<sup>3</sup>). These and many similar passages express the abiding sense of the Hebrew race, that man, as he is, is not in the condition which his Creator purposed for him. The contrast between such a conception of man and that, e.g., present to the mind of a Greek, who viewed man as in his normal, healthy state, is only to be accounted for by a belief such as that which is presupposed and taught in the story of the Fall.

That this belief was, as a matter of fact, definitely, if not consistently, connected with the Paradise narrative in the later ages of Hebrew national life, is proved by the testimony of the books called Apocrypha and the literature of the Roman period. This testimony is so important that it will be well to present it in some detail.

(a) It is unnecessary to multiply passages which speak of the depravity of human nature; but 2 Es 4<sup>11</sup> ‘How can he that is already worn out with the corrupted world understand incorruption?’ is significant. Cf. also 2 Es 7<sup>68</sup>.

(b) This depravity was traced to Adam’s fall. The classical passage is 2 Es 3<sup>21-22</sup>. The seer has * Bible and the Monuments, p. 90.

† See an interesting note in Coleridge’s Aids to Reflection, p. 271 (ed. Bohm).

* It may be observed that the temptation of the Second Adam by the devil (Mt 4, Lk 4) explains beyond doubt who was understood by the serpent which tempted the first Adam.

been the creation of Adam, his dwelling in the garden, the one commandment which he transgressed, and the consequent entrance of death into the world. He goes on: 'For the first Adam, bearing a wicked heart, transgressed, and was overcome; and not he only, but all they also that are born of him. Thus disease was made permanent; and the law was in the heart of the people; and the wickedness of the root; so the wickedness was away, and that which was wicked abode still.' Again: 'A grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning; and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time!' (2 Es 4<sup>30</sup>). And again: 'Thou Adam, what hast thou done? for though it was thou that sinned, the evil is not fallen on thee alone, but upon all of us that come of thee' (2 Es 7<sup>118</sup>). In this late book are recognized the moral consequences of Adam's sin; in the much earlier work of Ben-Sira there is an allusion to the curse of Gn 3<sup>19</sup> 'Great travail is created for every man, and a heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam' (Sir 40<sup>1</sup>).

(c) That sin came through the woman is explicitly stated in Sir 25<sup>1</sup> 'From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her we all die.'

(d) That man's seduction was due to the serpent, now for the first time in Jewish literature identified with Satan, is alluded to in Wis 2<sup>24</sup> 'By the envy of the devil death entered into the world.'

(e) The connexion between death and sin is not so clearly conceived, and there was, consequently, no consistent doctrine on the subject; but the generally prevailing view seems to have been that of 2 Es 3<sup>1</sup> 'Critic him thou gavest thy one commandment: which he transgressed, and immediately thou appointedst death for him and in his generations.' Cf. also Wis 2<sup>24</sup>, Sir 25<sup>24</sup>. The same view is found in the Apocalypse of Baruch (xvii. 3, xxiii. 4) and in the Book of Enoch (xviii. 4).

(f) Side by side with passages such as these we have others not less significant, which assert the personal responsibility of the sinner. E.g. 'They that are born of him did evil, in all things doing as Adam and all his generations had done: for they also bare a wicked heart' (2 Es 3<sup>25</sup>). Cf. also 2 Es 8<sup>9</sup> and 9<sup>11</sup>, and, above all, Apoc. Baruch liv. 19: 'Non est ergo Adam causa, nisi animæ suæ tantum; nos uero unusquisque fuit animæ suæ Adam.'

It might be urged that 2 Es is a very late book, perhaps belonging to Christian times; but, at all events, that the author of the chapters from which our quotations are drawn was a non-Christian Jew is tolerably certain. And thus we may use the book in support of our conclusion that the Jews, at least from the Captivity onward, conceived of the sin of Adam as having left a permanent trace from the effects of which all mankind were suffering and to suffer.

iii. When we come to the NT, and especially to the Pauline Epistles, we find that this doctrine of the effects of Adam's fall receives at once explanation and relief in the facts of the Incarnation and the Atonement. If we take the points in the order followed in the last section, we see (a) that the universal depravity of mankind is everywhere presupposed, and is the basis of the argument of the Ep. to the Romans. To (b) we shall return again, and only cite here 1 Co 15<sup>22</sup> 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.' (c) finds illustration in two passages: 'the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness' (2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>), and 'Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression' (1 Ti 2<sup>14</sup>). (d) St. Paul refers to the 'bruising of Satan' in Ro 16<sup>20</sup>; and the devil is spoken of as 'a murderer from the beginning' in Jn 8<sup>44</sup>. Cf. also 1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>. We then come to (e), as to which the classical passage in NT is Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>. A commentary on these difficult verses cannot be written here; but certain broad principles laid down by St. Paul, who is undoubtedly following and interpreting the narrative in Gn 3, can hardly be mistaken.* That through one man sin entered into the world is his starting-point. Death came through sin (cf. Ro 6<sup>23</sup> and Ja 1<sup>15</sup>); and hence death is the common lot of man, first, because of his own personal sin; and, secondly, because it is part of the inheritance which Adam has transmitted to his descendants. At the same time, St. Paul is careful to insist (f) that man's personal responsibility for his own acts, and for his own acts alone, remains unimpaired. He does not supply any theory by which the two contradictory tendencies of man's inherited tendency to evil and his free will may be reconciled; but he leaves them side by side as equally parts of the doctrine which it has been given him to teach. And he goes on to show that the distinctive feature of the gospel is that 'if by the trespass of the one the many died, much more did the grace of God, and the gift by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many.' Thus the theology of St. Paul is inextricably bound up with the doctrine of the Fall. The whole point of the comparison and contrast of the first and second Adam is lost, if the destinies of the human race were not deeply affected by a backward step at the beginnings of human history, if it be not true that man's growth in holiness may be described as a recovery effected through grace.

iv. The interpretations of St. Paul's language which have from time to time been accepted by Christians are various; and they depend in part on the view that is taken as to the state of un-fallen man, and the divine intention for him. It would be agreed by most theologians that, to use the language of the Church, the 'original righteousness' of which Adam was deprived, was, although in part natural, yet in part supernatural. That is to say, he was created as divinely endowed with a righteousness, without any such bias towards evil as we experience in ourselves. This is what constituted the unique perversity and heinousness of the first sin, and it is because of this that his sin is counted a 'fall' from a higher spiritual condition. His sin had a disturbing influence on the whole future development of the race, but the character of the disturbance has been differently estimated in different schools of thought. Speaking broadly the Greek view was simply that the 'original righteousness' of the race was lost; the effect of Adam's sin was a privatio, an impoverishment of human nature which yet left the power of the will unimpaired. But the Latin writers who followed Augustine took a darker view of the consequences of the Fall. It is, for them, a depravatio nature; the human will is disabled; there is left a bias towards evil which can be conquered only by grace. And this is, undoubtedly, nearer to the language of Scripture than the former mode of representing the facts; but it was not always remembered, contra, in Augustinian theology that the 'image of God' remained in man even after the Fall (Gn 9<sup>6</sup>). It is therefore contrary to Scripture to represent man as wholly corrupt. And a deep * See Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 165 ff.

* For St. Paul's argument, as also for the witness of the Apocrypha to the doctrine of man's corruption, see Sanday Headlam, Romans (ch. v.)

and serious question arises here as to the relation between the Fall and the Incarnation. It may well be, as the Scotists teach, that it is unjustifiable to represent the human race as which man may find in Christ as an after-thought in the divine counsels. The Incarnation may have been, for anything we can tell, the predestined climax of the development of the humanity of human sin. Bearing these considerations in mind we return to Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>, and the various theories which have been proposed in explanation. They may be classified thus—*

(a) It is urged that St. Paul's language requires us to conceive of the human race as in Adam potentially, in the same sense as the oak is in the acorn. Hence, for what he did, we may be counted responsible. The race, not the individual, is the true unit; it is with this unit that God deals. Thus, e.g., David sinned in numbering Israel, but his people were the sufferers from the divine punishment. The words of our Lord in Lk 13<sup>2-4</sup> suggest to us that there is such a thing as national responsibility, apart from the guilt of individuals. Most apposite of all, Levi is said to have paid tithes 'through Abraham' (He 7<sup>9, 10</sup>). And in this conception of the solidarity of mankind there is, beyond question, a profound truth which is becoming more intelligently and sincerely accepted as the social teaching of the Incarnation is being opened out. 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive' (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>), are words which point to the unity of the human race as the root of the universality both of sin and of redemption. But we must be careful not to state this so as to do violence to our God-given sense of justice. This is the fault, e.g., of teaching like that of Jonathan Edwards, who—on a psychological no less than a physical unity between Adam and his posterity. Ultimately based, as in Augustine, on a mistranslation of Ro 5<sup>12</sup> (in quo as the rendering of ἐφ' ᾧ) and on the adoption in the Vulg. of the word imputare, familiar from its use in the courts of Roman law, this teaching may readily become either ultra-mystical or ultra-rationalistic. It becomes ultra-mystical, if the unity of the human race be so spoken of as to conceal the all-important fact that it is only for a person that morality has any intelligible meaning. It becomes ultra-rationalistic, when the phrases 'imputation of sin' and the correlative 'imputation of righteousness' are used as if sin and righteousness were transferable from one person to another. Sin is predicable only of a person, not of human nature; and it is of Ezekiel, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die', that we need ever keep in view. St. Paul does not teach that we are accomplices in Adam's sin or partakers of his guilt without a co-operation of our own will, although it be at the same time awfully true that we inherit from him a degraded nature. The abiding truth in the interpretation given by Augustine of St. Paul's teaching as to the Fall, is the truth of the unity of mankind. In this Adam is τίπος τοῦ μέλλοντος.

(b) Again, the effect of Adam's fall upon his posterity has been explained by speaking of Adam as representative of the race. 'The covenant was made with Adam as a public person, not with himself only, but for his posterity.' But the question arises, How could Adam, in justice, bind his posterity to a covenant of which they were not cognizant? A federal compact of this sort could only bind us, if we had empowered Adam to act on our behalf. And if it be urged that in Adam's case we should have done the same as he, and therefore may justly be punished for what he did, it may be replied that this is a gratuitous assumption, which goes perilously near to depriving the original transgression of moral blame by representing it as inevitable. Here is an important consideration which must not be overlooked. All profitable speculation on the subject of the Fall must recognize frankly its voluntary character. Adam was not necessitated to act as he did; otherwise his action would not involve moral responsibility.

(c) We come, then, to the view which is at once most widely accepted and most consonant to all the facts. It is, in essence, the view expounded by John of Damascus: 'We inherit from our first parents a degraded nature, so degraded that it is for us much harder to overcome sin than it was for Adam. For this inherited depravity of nature we are not responsible; we have inherited it in spite of ourselves. Hence the world is in a 'state of ruin,' and can be remedied only through grace. But we are not, therefore, guilty; guilt is incurred only when the evil is voluntarily embraced, when we take up Adam's sin by repeating it, as it were, in our own persons. The rule of Augustine, Peccatum pena peccati, continually receives verification. Coleridge has pressed this view somewhat further. 'It belongs,' he says, 'to the very essence of the doctrine that in respect of original sin every man is the adequate representative of all men' (Aids to Reflection, p. 194). And he holds that Adam's fall is a typical experience repeated afresh in every son of Adam. Mutato nomine, sed fabula narratur. The corruption, he urges, 'must be self-originated.' There is an important sense in which this is true; but it is not the whole truth. It is deficient in recognition of the far-reaching character of the first sin. We are not at all in the same spiritual condition as that of the first man; we do not enter on the conflict with evil on the same terms. Our whole attitude to God is different from that of Adam, although we be still 'sons of God.' As the schoolmen put it, in the case of Adam the person corrupted the nature; with us it is the nature which corrupts the person. Man is still free, but man is sick with a sickness which is displeasing to the All-pure; and for healing of this sickness only a 'new birth' by God will suffice. As our Lord taught in the Sermon on the Mount (cf. also Mt 15<sup>19</sup>), the real seat of sin is within, the heart is the seat of the moral life (cf. Ps 78<sup>37</sup>, Pr 4<sup>23</sup>), although the translation of thought into act involves a fresh and distinct step in responsibility.* The advocates of the more rigorous Augustinian doctrine have been accustomed to designate this view as semi-Pelagianism; but it is free from the essential fault of the teaching of Pelagius, on which we say a final word.

(d) Pelagius is represented as having held that the infant enters on life crippled in no appreciable degree by any inherited infirmity or waywardness of the will. He begins the world with powers sufficient to cope with the machinations of the evil one. And thus, in so far as he does wrong, it is his own fault; in so far as he does right, it is deserving of praise. Pelagius and his followers underestimated the influence of Adam's fall on human nature at large. That this nature as corrupt and the seat of sin must be of itself and when unregenerate displeasing to the All-holy, they did not perceive with clearness. And though men, happily, do not always push their opinions to their logical conclusions, the result of such teaching as this would be the denial of any need of grace or of redemption.†

v. We pass on to the question, How far is the * See for a fuller classification, Schaff in Lange's Romans (Eng. tr. p. 191).

* See Hort's Life and Letters, ii. 330 f.; see also i. 78

† See Neander's Church History, iv. 331 ff.

doctrine of the Fall affected by modern theories as to the evolution of the human species from lower and less developed types? It has been too often hastily assumed that the belief in the continuity of animal forms is inconsistent with belief in any special prerogative of man, and is still more incompatible with a doctrine which represents his history as having been retrogressive at one point. But neither of these positions can be established.

The doctrine of the evolution of species is not yet to be counted as more than an extremely probable hypothesis, by which the phenomena of life and growth become intelligible. Many details are, as yet, very obscure, and the laws of inheritance have not by any means been clearly and fully expounded. See HEREDITY. And the application of this doctrine to the descent of man is beset with peculiar difficulties, which cannot be said, as yet, to have been solved. But we are, nevertheless, content in this article to treat of the subject of man's early history in the light of this wonderful law. Evolution may not be the final word of science as to the laws of growth; but it expresses well the results to which investigation has so far attained. We conceive, then, of primeval man as a creature descended from brute ancestors, some of whom he closely resembled in instinct and habit as well as in structure. But there was one marked difference. In him there was present the faculty of self-consciousness; he was conscious of a reason which can make provision for a foreseen future, and of a will which is not necessarily determined by the strongest physical desire. Man is made in the image of God, although his bodily lineage be that of the ape-like creatures whom he sees round him. If we may illustrate the facts of his growth by a mathematical illustration, we shall say that the curve of his progress is a continuous curve, upon which he has come to a critical point. At this critical point the curvature seems to change its character; in other words, the man finds himself possessed of faculties which are not, so far as he can judge, the direct product of his former history. They are, to use at once the simplest and the truest words, the gift of God. There may be, therefore, absolute and visible continuity between the bodily form of the man and of the higher apes; but continuity cannot be so exactly traced in his mental development. There has been a μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος, however it has come about. Henceforth he is not only an animal, but a man. If it be said that it is not scientific to postulate a salvus of this kind, it may be asked, Why not? The law of continuity is not a fetish before which we are called to prostrate ourselves; it is nothing more than a convenient working hypothesis, which we find it necessary to desert in this instance, as in others where it will not serve our purpose. And, indeed, it is by no means certain that to the Supreme Mind there is here apparent any breach of continuity whatever. The law may be obeyed, in fact, though the sequence may not be within our observation.

A creature thus emerging from a lower animal condition, even though endowed with the divine gifts of self-conscious reason and free will, would not, indeed, be perfect. He would be, at the earliest stage of a new period of growth, already raised above the ape, but still far removed from the civilization of modern life. But then we remark that the account of Genesis nowhere describes the first man as perfect. When South said that 'Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise,'* he was not drawing his picture from Scripture. Neither OT nor NT speak of Adam as perfect, though they speak of him as innocent and pure (cf. Ec 7<sup>29</sup>). And this was perceived by early Christian commentators. Theophilus of Antioch says that God placed Adam in Paradise διδοὺς αὐτῷ ἀφορμὴν προκοπῆς ὅπως αὐξάνων καὶ τέλειος γενόμενος, κ.τ.λ. (Ad Autol. ii. 24); and Clement of Alexandria states (Strom. vi. 12. 96) that Adam 'was not made perfect in respect of his constitution, but in a fit condition to receive virtue.'† This relation to God has been well described as not a state of perfection or a mere disposition, but 'a living commencement which contained within itself the possibility of a progressive development and a fulfilment of the vocation of man.'‡

Such a state of things is so far removed from anything of which we have experience that we find ourselves constantly at fault in the effort to imagine or to describe it. But we must, at least, suppose that there have been a condition in which man obeyed the law of that nature to which he had attained; the ideas 'right' and 'wrong' hardly presented themselves to his mind with full meaning, for 'the knowledge of good and evil' was not yet his. It may well have been that the image of God was a gift only germinally bestowed and gradually realized. Man did not come all at once into his splendid inheritance. In the Paradise narrative he is depicted as still at an early stage in his history. He is represented as living a life of communion with God, conscious, as it would seem, that he 'ought' to obey the laws of God, which, as yet, were presented in the simplest and most elementary form; but the consciousness of moral obligation could only be half realized where the knowledge of evil was not present. So far there is no conflict in the story which would conflict with the facts of science, whether physical or mental. In his primitive condition man would have been able to recognize only the simplest moral commands. He was forbidden to taste of the fruit of 'the tree of the knowledge of good and evil': for so perilous an experience he was not prepared. And, in the absence of temptation from without, it was perhaps possible that this state of purity should have continued. The man's nature, though not developed to perfection, though not strong with the discipline which time and experience bring, was perfectly balanced; and in obeying its dictates he would obey the dictates of his Creator.

How into such a world could evil enter? That is the question which has vexed philosophy from generation to generation. It is a question to which no final or complete answer has been given. But the record of revelation at least puts the difficulty one step further back; it points to the region where the solution is to be sought. In the Bible the fall of the angels precedes the fall of man (Jude<sup>9</sup>). Temptation came into human life through the machination of a spirit of evil distinct from man. The invitation to sin came from the serpent in the garden, and it took the form of a suggested violation of the command known to be divine. Sin is not an indigenous product, but is brought in ab extra, somewhat as it has been suggested that life was first brought to the earth in a meteoric stone. According to the Bible, the origin of evil is to be sought outside human nature.

We are not now in a region where science has anything to tell us. We have only the brief phrases of Scripture as our guide. And it will be observed that we cannot say positively that the temptation would not have been self-suggested, as the man grew in faculty and in strength, had there been no malign influence external to himself.

* See Gibson, Thirty-Nine Articles, p. 368.

† Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, § 78.

* Sermon on Gn 127.

We do not know, and cannot know. What is told is this. The man was in a state of innocence and purity and the suggestion to sin came, as a matter of fact, in the first instance from a personal agency of evil outside the domain of his own will.

Here, then, is ignorance of evil. The first refusal of evil, no less than its acceptance, would in a measure involve a knowledge of evil. An apostolic writer speaks of the révelés, or perfect man, as one 'who by reason of use has his senses exercised to discern good and evil' (He 5<sup>14</sup>). True, there would be no personal realization of evil were it not consciously embraced. But its existence must henceforward be definitely conceived. And we may notice that whether man yielded to the temptation or overcame it, in any case he would have advanced a step in knowledge. To yield was a spiritual fall; to resist would have been a spiritual rise. But in any case the new experience would be an intellectual rise. This is a principle which has formed the starting-point of some remarkable speculations as to the Fall both in mediæval and modern times. The philosopher Erigena seems to have had a confused notion of this truth when he taught that sin was the fall of human nature. The Fall as the necessary state of nature to that of culture. The necessity of evil is a prominent feature in the Hegelian philosophy, according to which the life of the world is conceived as inevitably developing itself through antagonism and conflict. This is the Divina Commedia of human history, the perpetual tragedy of life. And theologians have pointed out that in Scripture itself the origin of the arts of civilization and of peace is traced to fallen and not to unfallen man. Tubal-cain, 'the forger of every cutting instrument in brass and iron,' and Jubal the father of musicians, are the descendants of Cain (Gn 4<sup>21-22</sup>). The truth which seems to underlie speculations such as these is that man would not begin to progress rapidly, in an intellectual point of view, until he became conscious of the resistance to his energies which evil presents. But this consciousness would not have been less intense had he overcome the temptation which assailed him instead of yielding to it. It is only the man who has successfully battled with evil that is conscious of its full strength, for upon him alone has it spent all its powers. And thus to assert that sin was relatively necessary for the development of human nature, is to confuse the yielding to temptation with the experience of it. Had man been strong when evil presented itself, we know not to what heights of intellectual, as of spiritual excellence, the race might not have now attained. In this view only is it true that the first temptation marks the 'beginning and the foundation of the development of mind, the birth of man's intellectual nature.'

We find, then, that the doctrine of the Fall, when subjected to examination, is in no way inconsistent with the theory of the evolution of man from lower types, and his growth 'from strength to strength' as the centuries have gone by. There has been a continuous intellectual development. When the pre-Adamite ancestor of our family was fitted to receive the divine gift of reason, it was granted to him. Like Christ, Adam came in the fulness of time, when all things were ready. Up to this point the evolution had been unconscious; henceforward it was to be conscious, and partly assisted by voluntary effort.

* See Matheson, Can the Old Faith live with the New, p 219 ff., where the argument of this paragraph is developed at length.

And the first experience of evil, explicitly recognized as evil, would afford a fresh starting-point for his growth. For such experience of evil, as has been said, would in any event—whether it was conquered or the conqueror—involve a rise in the intellectual scale. Had it been overcome, as it might have been overcome (for the act of Adam is represented as one of free choice), there would have been a rise in the spiritual scale as well. But in the event there was intellectual growth, accompanied by a descent to a lower spiritual level, from which it would be impossible for man to rise without the aid of divine grace. And so the Incarnation and the Atonement mark in the history of mankind a crisis as real, and introduce a force as potent, as when God created man in His own image.

Such a view of man's progress is in the strictest harmony alike with the Bible and with the teaching of modern science. For it is to be remembered that what science teaches us is that the history of man has been a history of development, but it does not and could not teach that this development has proceeded along the best conceivable lines.* It is no postulate of modern science that this is the best of all possible worlds. But the Christian doctrine, that man as he presents himself to us in history and in life, though his education through the centuries has been divinely ordered, is not in the condition which was the divine intention for him, is a doctrine which receives verification from daily observation. The divine will has been thwarted, so to speak, by the perversity of the human will. And this has been recognized as the key to the problem of evil by men of all races and creeds. For what is the spectacle which the world of men presents? Newman has described it well in a splendid passage of his Discourse (ch. v.): 'To consider the world in its history, its breadth, its various history, the many races of man, their starts, their fortunes, their mutual alienation, their conflicts; and then their ways, habits, governments, forms of worship; their enterprises, their aimless courses, their random achievements and their impotent conclusion of long and broken tokens so faint and broken of a superintending design, the blind evolution of what turn out to be great powers or truths, the progress of things, as if from the beginning not towards final causes, the shortness of man, his far-reaching aims, his short duration, the curtain hung over his futurity, the disappointments of life, the defeat of good, the success of evil, physical pain, mental anguish, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading idolatries, the corruptions, the dreary, hopeless irreligion, that condition of the whole race, so fearfully yet exactly described in the apostle's words, "having no hope and without God in the world,"—all this is a vision to dizzy and appal; and inflicts upon the mind the sense of a profound mystery, which is absolutely beyond human solution. What shall be said to this heart-piercing, reason-bewildering fact? I can only answer, that either there is no Creator, or this living society of men is in a true sense discarded from His presence.' The 'outcast man' is, in short, the Great Exception. While every other living thing is striving for its good, man alone is found choosing what he knows to be for his hurt. And so to the believer in God his own experience confirms the eternal truth of the doctrine of the Fall. As Pascal says, 'De sorte que l'homme est plus inconceivable sans ce mystère, que ce mystère n'est inconcevable à l'homme.' That doctrine is indeed a datum of revelation; but it harmonizes well with what we know of ourselves and of others. There has been somewhere a 'mysterious' in the history of man, who was at the first created 'very good.' And the teaching of St. Paul about sin, stated in terms of the story of Gn 3, but based on the broad ground of observation and experience, gives, as we have seen, the rationale of this fact, and brings it into line with the revelation of the gospel. There are two points on which it is necessary to add a few words.

* See Gore, Lux Mundi, pp. 535, 536, and the passage there cited from Aubrey Moore's Evolution and the Christian Faith. The change which took place at the Fall was a change in the moral region; but it could not be without its effect elsewhere. Even the physical world becomes confused with the government of man to God.

(1) St. Paul, in 1 Cor. 15:27 and 3:18, states that death came through sin (Ro 5:12-14). It is tolerably plain that by 'death' he means physical death, although it has been interpreted of the death of the soul (see Sanday, in loc.). And he here seems to come into collision with natural science, which teaches that death must have been known upon the earth long before the human race appeared. For ages before the creation of man, death in the case of the lower animals must have been a necessary concomitant and condition of life. It is not apparent, however, that this touches St. Paul's argument; for he is speaking of the death of man. And in the case of man it may well be that had he remained faithful to the law of his being, as communicated to him by his Creator, death would have had no dominion over him. As has been said already, of the condition of primeval man we have little information; it was so utterly unlike anything of which we have experience that confident statements would be out of place. But, at all events, the death of a being made in the image of God is a different order entirely different from the death of a brute. Death is the portion of the latter; it is part of the divine intention for him. Not so, for man. For him there is a further destiny in store. And his sin, as it involves alienation from God, involves the withdrawal of that higher life which has been the assurance of immortality. We do not assert of Adam the non posse mori, but the posse non mori, as long as his fellowship with God, the source of life, was unbroken. But sin reduced him to the state of a lower animal, and thus man became the prey of death. It may well be that, as has been surmised by many of the profoundest of Christian philosophers, there is some intimate connexion between moral evil and physical decay for a composite being such as Scripture represents man to be. And in the Fall of Adam his whole race were thus involved; death passed upon them, not indeed as a punishment for something which a remote ancestor had done, but as the inevitable consequence of the sin of the head of the race. They inherit a degraded nature, which is subject to the laws of physical dissolution as is the nature of a beast. But 'man's normal condition, according to the OT, is not mortality, with the possibility of attaining immortality by a later gift; but life in God's fellowship, with the possibility of losing it and falling into a condition of an existence which is not life.'* It is not by any means clear that it is within the power of natural science to negative this view.

(2) What may prove a more serious difficulty arises in connexion with the origin of the human race from a single pair, which seems to be presupposed in St. Paul's exposition of the parallelism between Adam and Christ. True, the unity of the race is not disproved by science; and it is believed by many on purely scientific grounds to be more probable than the hypothesis that mankind are descended from several pairs. But if the latter doctrine should command at any time the assent of the scientific world, it would be necessary to modify in some degree what has been said. This article has been written on the assumption that there is nothing contradictory to science in the doctrine of the unity of the human race as descended from common parents. This is certainly the doctrine expounded by St. Paul. But it is a matter which comes within the province of science; and should it ever be disproved, it would be necessary to admit that the apostle was using an illustration not scientifically apt in all respects. It must be observed, however, that in essentials nothing would have to be changed. The great truths, that sin began with the beginning of our race, that its baneful influence has been transmitted from generation to generation, that it is as a disease spread as mankind, that it cannot be eradicated without a gift of grace, are unaffected whether 'Adam' be taken as the name of a single individual, or as a term descriptive of the forefathers of the human species. The universality of sin is a sufficient indication that human nature has been corrupted at its base, whether by the fall of one or of several; and it would still remain true that 'as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive.' So much it has been deemed necessary to say, although at present the balance of evidence seems distinctly to favour the doctrine that mankind are descended from one common stock, and so to confirm the analogy drawn out by St. Paul. See also ADAM, ATONEMENT, JUSTIFICATION, HEREDITY, PARADISE, SACRIFICE, SIN.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the books already mentioned, the following may be consulted with profit: Byle, Early History of Genesis; Orr, Christian View of God and the World; Laidlaw, The Bible; Müller, Christian Doctrine of Sin. The subject is treated in all treatises on systematic theology. J. H. BERNARD.

FALLOW-DEER.—This word occurs in the AV among the clean animals (Dt 14<sup>5</sup>), and in the list of game furnished for Solomon's daily table (1 K 4<sup>28</sup>). In each list 'ayyāl, zēbī, and yahmūr occur in the same order. The first is correctly translated, both in AV and RV, hart (see HART). The second is incorrectly tr. in AV roe-buck, and correctly in RV gazelle (see GAZELLE). The third is incorrectly tr. in AV fallow-deer, and, we think, correctly in RV roe-buck (see ROEBUCK).

G. E. POST.

FALSE WITNESS.—See LYING, OATH.

FAME.—The Gr. word φήμη (from φημι, to declare, say) was used for a divine voice, oracle, and then for a report or common saying. The Lat. word fama, beginning, where φήμη left off, with rumour or report, added to that the meaning of reputation or renown. The Eng. word 'fame,' though it once had all the meaning of Lat. fama, now retains only the sense of renown or celebrity. Thus in modern Eng. 'fame' is never a fair equivalent for φήμη.

That in 1811 'fame' had the meaning (1) of report, and (2) also of renown, is certain. Thus: (1) Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, 1531 (Croft's ed. ii. 291), says, 'all Greece was in great fear for the fame that was sprad of the commynge of the Persians with an infinite armye.' So Tindale's tr. of Mt 24<sup>6</sup> (ed. of 1534) is, 'Ye shall heare of warres, and of the fame of warres' (Gr. ἀκούεις; Wyc. 'openyouns'; Tind. 1526 'noyse'; Cran. 'tidinges'; Rhem. 'bruites'; Gen., Bish., AV, RV 'rumours'). And Bacon (Adv. of Learning, II. xxiii. 19) says, 'General fame is light, and the opinions conceived by superiors or equals are deceitful; for to such men are more masked; verior fama e domesticis emanat.' Again (2) in Shaks. (Troilus and Cressida, III. iii. 228), Achilles says—

'I see my reputation is at stake;
My fame is shrewdly gored';

* Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, p. 220 and in Henry V. III. ii. 13, Pistol sings 'And sword and shield, In bloody field, With win immortal fame'; to which the Boy replies, 'Would I were in an ale-house in London! I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety.'

In AV both meanings appear, but the former most frequently. The only manifest examples of the meaning 'renown' are 1 K 4<sup>31</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>27</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>, Zeph 3<sup>10</sup>, where the Heb. is shēm 'a name.' When the Heb. is shēma' (Nu 14<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>1</sup>, Job 28<sup>22</sup>, Is 66<sup>19</sup>), shōma' (Jos 6<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>, Jer 6<sup>24</sup>), or shēmā'ah (1 K 10<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>6</sup>), the meaning is not very different from that of the Heb. words are properly 'hearing'; and in Job 28<sup>22</sup> (RV 'rumour') as well as in Jer 6<sup>24</sup> that is manifestly the sense. It is evident also that in the only remaining OT passage, Gn 45<sup>15</sup> (where the Heb. is kol, lit. 'voice'), the sense is report. In NT that sense is probably the only one that occurs. The Gr. words are (1) φήμη, Mt 9<sup>36</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14</sup>, the only examples of the word, which is nearly as rare in LXX (Pr 16<sup>2</sup> [for shēmā'ah], 2 Mac 4<sup>23</sup>, 3 Mac 3<sup>2</sup>, 4 Mac 4<sup>23</sup>), with the verb διαφημίζω, Mt 9<sup>41</sup> (διαφημίζοντες αὐτόν, 'they . . . spread abroad his fame'; Wyc. 1380 'thei . . . defameden hym,' 1388 'thei . . . diffameden hym,' from Vulg. diffamaverunt eum). (2) ἀκοή, lit. 'hearing,' Mt 4<sup>24</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>23</sup> (RV always 'report'). (3) ἤχος, 'echo,' Lk 4<sup>27</sup> the only occurrence of this meaning (RV 'rumour'). (4) λόγος, 'word,' Lk 5<sup>15</sup> (RV 'report'), which has this meaning also in Mt 28<sup>10</sup>, Jn 21<sup>23</sup> (EV 'saying'). In Apoc., on the other hand, we find only 1 Mac 3<sup>24</sup>, both with the mod. sense of renown (Gr. δογμα, 'name').

RV adds Jer 50<sup>43</sup> (Heb. shēma') for AV 'report.' 'Fame' is the Wyclifite tr<sup>2</sup> of 1388 here, 'report' having come from the Geneva Bible of 1560.

J. HASTINGS.

FAMILIAR.—'Familiar spirit' is the tr. in EV of Heb. šālā wherever it occurs (except Job 32<sup>19</sup> where in plu. it means 'skin-bottles,' EV 'bottles,' RVm 'wine skins'), on which see Driver on Dt 18<sup>11</sup> and art. DEMON; also Van Hoonacker, 'Divination by Ob.,' J. T. S. 1898, Jan. 1898. 'Familiar' has in this its sense of the Lat. familiaris, belonging to one and so to oneself, ready to serve one as a famulus or servant. The oldest example in Oxf. Eng. Dict. is Stow, Chron. (1565) 107, 'A familiar spirit which hee had . . . in likeness of a Catte.' But it is found in Geneva Bible of 1560, 1 S 28<sup>7</sup> 8 etc., whence it passed into AV. Similar phrases seem to be older, as Prose Legends in Anglia, viii. 146 (14—), 'Hir famylier aungel thet hadde hir in keypyng'; and Capgrave, Chron. 25 (1460), 'That same familiar devel.'

In Jer 20<sup>10</sup> we find the subst. 'familiaris' (Lat. familiāres), 'All my familiars watched for my halting,' for which RV gives 'familiar friends' as the same Heb. is tr. in Ps 41<sup>9</sup> AV and RV.

The Heb. is lit. 'man (or men) of my peace.' It occurs also Jer 35<sup>2</sup>, Ob 7. The most instructive occurrence is no doubt Ps 41<sup>9</sup>, and the meaning is 'acquaintances, those to whom I am attached, those with whom I have a special attachment to me by a covenant.'

Illustrations of the subst. 'familiaris' are Knox, Hist. 38, 'they would chop their familiars on the cheek with it [the New Testament]'; and Hos 10<sup>14</sup> Cov. 'All thy stronge cities shall be layed waite, euen as Salmana was destroyed with his familiars.'

J. HASTINGS.

FAMILY.—i. SCOPE, TERMS, AND DATA.—The term family is used in many different senses: (a) For larger or smaller groups of persons connected by blood or marriage, from the family in the narrowest sense—a man with his wives and children, and sometimes his mother—to the widest aggregate of kinsfolk between whom the descent is traced—the clan, tribe, nation, or even the human race. (b) In a looser sense for communities living in close and permanent intercourse, from the family of dependants as well as kinsfolk, including persons not of the main stock. (c) In various fig. senses with which we are not concerned here. OT recognizes and connects the groups denoted by family in (a) and (b), but has no single term for them; still less has it any term corresponding to the Eng. family. House, approaches most closely to the range of meaning of family in (a) and (b); in Gn 7<sup>1</sup> Noah with his wife and sons and daughters-in-law are called his house; we have also the house of David 2 S 3<sup>1</sup>, of Levi (i.e. tribe) Nu 17<sup>3</sup>, of Israel (i.e. the nation) Ex 16<sup>31</sup>. In P and Ch בית, RV fathers' house, is a technical term for a subdivision of a tribe. The origin of these terms in the concrete dwelling connects them with (b), cf. similar use of לח tent, in Ps 78<sup>37</sup> 83<sup>6</sup>. So also בית, EV family, is explained (Ges., Fuerst) as 'originally a union, obsolete בית to join, but Buhl connects with Arab bayt, to pour out, and with בית is strictly a bayt, and is used in P and late writings (Nu 2, etc.) for the largest division of a tribe; but its meanings also range from the clan to the tribe (Jg 13<sup>1</sup>) and the nation (Jer 33<sup>24</sup>). Other terms are derived from the physical tie between kinsfolk, and connect with (a), זרע seed (Gn 12<sup>7</sup>), עצם bone (Gn 29<sup>14</sup>), בשר flesh (Gn 29<sup>14</sup>), בשר flesh (Lv 18<sup>2</sup>), with its derivative בשר (Lv 18<sup>17</sup>), in the sense of blood-relation; the compounds of בשר bear, beget, בשר offspring (Gn 48<sup>8</sup>), kinsfolk (Gn 31<sup>8</sup>), בשר clans (Nu 1<sup>10</sup>). Also, young children collectively are בשר, בשר take quick short steps. בשר (Ezk 11<sup>15</sup>) is a misreading (Cornill, etc. i.l.).

This brief statement as to terms shows how the family was bound up with all the social and political arrangements of Israel. Hence it is difficult to draw any clear line of division between the family and other social and political groups, whose institutions are expressed in terms of the family, and derived in fact or theory from it. Moreover, it is often maintained that the idea of the family originated in a social group larger than and different from that consisting of a single man with his dependent women and children. If this is in any measure true, the relations between the family (in the narrower modern sense) and the larger social groups will be still more complicated. The family will be confined, as far as possible, to the family proper, and the larger social groups will be dealt with in the art. TRIBE; but it will be necessary to make some allusion to the relations of the family to the clan, etc.

The data for our subject are the narratives of the family life, esp. of the patriarchs, of Ruth, of David, and of Tobit; the laws dealing with the family; and the various allusions to the subject. OT narratives are, of course, valid authorities for the manners of the times in which they originated, whatever view may be held as to their historicity. Unfortunately, however, both narratives and—in a less degree—laws mostly treat of royal, noble, or wealthy families and their slaves, and we have little direct information as to the poorer free Israelites. Doubtless, the same general principles governed family life amongst all classes, and the wealthy families and their dependants constituted a large portion of the population; but we have always to mind that the familiar OT pictures are concerned chiefly with certain classes, and that for other cases we must allow for the effect of inferior rank and smaller means.

ii. MEMBER.—The members of a Heb. family or household included some or all of the following:

the man, as supreme head of the household; his mother, if residing with him after the death of his father; his wives; his concubines; the wives' children; the concubines' children; children of other women, e.g. Jephthah (Jg 11<sup>1</sup>); daughters-in-law; sons-in-law, for example, Jacob with Laban; other free Isr. relatives, friends, or dependants; gerim or resident foreigners. 'The stranger that is within thy gates' (Lev 19:34); male and female slaves, Isr. and foreign, home-born and purchased. Thus the ancient Heb. was larger than the modern family; polygamy increased the number of women and children dependent on a single man; married sons and their families often remained in their father's household; the insecurity of individual resident aliens, etc., led to households.

(a) Husband's Mother.—חַמּוֹת hāmōth, AV and RV mother-in-law. In Mic 7<sup>6</sup> (quoted Mt 10<sup>25</sup>, Lk 12<sup>53</sup>) the hāmōth is perhaps the wife of the living head of the household; in Ru, Naomi, herself a widow, is the hāmōth of widows. But the hāmōth attained special importance and dignity when, after the death of her husband, her son became the head of the family. She was then the most important and influential woman in the household; a man had many wives, only one mother; he had been trained in deference and obedience to his mother; his wives were his property, and absolutely subject to his authority. They had often been selected by his mother, e.g. Ishmael's wife by Hagar (Gn 21<sup>12</sup>, cf. 2 Es 9<sup>47</sup>). In the history of the families best known to us—the royal houses of Isr. and Judah—there are numerous indications of the exalted position of the mother of the reigning king. She bears the title מְלִיצָה melitzah, mistress. Her name is regularly given in the de-scribing an accession, while nothing is said about the wives. Maacah, Jezebel, Athaliah, and Nehushta (2 K 24<sup>18, 22, 24</sup>, cf. Jer 22<sup>24</sup>, Jer 40<sup>1</sup>) are as exercising great influence in the reigns of their sons. The analogy of modern Eastern life fully warrants us in taking the position of the queen-mother as representative of that of the mother of the head of any ordinary family. Sometimes a widow herself appears as head of a household, e.g. Micah's mother (Jg 17<sup>12</sup>), Naomi in Ru, the Shunammite (2 K 8<sup>1-6</sup>), Tobit's grandmother (To 1<sup>8</sup>); cf. also the position of the mother of our Lord during His ministry.

(b) Husband, Wives and Concubines.—The generic terms אִישׁ, אִשָּׁה man, אִשָּׁה woman, are commonly used for husband and wife, as in most languages. This usage reflects the fundamental nature of sexual character. In spite of the similarity of the two words, Oxf. Heb. Lex. speaks of 'the impossibility of deriving אִשָּׁה and אִשָּׁה from the same root'; consequently, all deductions based on the reference of the two words to the same root are without any true foundation. The husband is אִישׁ master, as supreme over his wives, who are slaves acquired by capture in war (Dt 21<sup>10-14</sup>), or by purchase (Gn 34<sup>15</sup>, Ex 22<sup>16</sup>, Dt 22<sup>29</sup>, Ru 4<sup>10</sup>). It would be misleading to apply the term 'freewoman' to any Israelitess, except perhaps to a widow. Even in the Mishna, 'women, slaves, and children' are constantly grouped together, e.g. Berāchoth, iii. 3, and 'a woman is always under the authority of her father until she is placed under the authority of her husband,' Ketuboth, iv. 3. The wife as in subjection to the ba'al is be'ulah (Is 54<sup>1</sup>). The rights of a husband over his wives were limited by affection and custom, by the terms of the marriage covenant or contract (Gn 31<sup>49, 50</sup>, To 7<sup>14</sup>), by the influence of the wife's family, also by certain specific laws. The marital supremacy involved the right of divorce at the husband's discretion. This is laid down in Dt 24<sup>1</sup>, which, however, imposes certain vague and obscure conditions, probably intended to discourage capricious divorce (Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 346). Is 50<sup>1</sup>, Jer 3<sup>8</sup> show that it was usual to give the divorced woman כְּטָר כִּימָר 'a bill of divorce,' doubtless that she might be able to resist any attempt on his part to reclaim his rights over her, a divorced woman being in a sense an emancipated slave. Dt forbids a man to divorce his wife, if he has fully charged her with unchastity before marriage (22<sup>13</sup>), or if he himself seduced her and had been compelled to marry her in consequence (22<sup>28, 29</sup>). These enactments and the protest in Mal 2<sup>16</sup> show the frequency of divorce. A wife could leave her husband (Benzinger, 341). Other limitations of the husband's rights were that he might not marry a sister of one of his living wives (Lev 18<sup>17</sup>); if a man hears his wife make a vow and does not disallow it at once, he may not do so afterwards (Nu 30<sup>11</sup>). Even if a woman has been purchased from her parents as a concubine (אִשָּׁה) and he does not wish to retain her, he may not sell her to strangers; he must either let her kinsfolk buy her back, or betroth her to one of his sons. If he takes another wife or concubine, he must either maintain the first in her full rights, or let her go free without payment (Ex 21<sup>7-11</sup>). Even a captive who has been taken to wife may not be sold as a slave, but if sent away must be dismissed free of payment (Dt 21<sup>10-14</sup>). Similarly, in modern Arabia it is held halal to sell a concubine. The rights of a wife necessarily include those of a concubine.

No very clear information is given as to the relative status of wives and concubines. אִשָּׁה woman, is sometimes used as a general term for a wife or concubine (Gn 30<sup>4</sup>); sometimes for wife as distinguished from concubine (1 K 11<sup>5</sup>). The words אִשָּׁה (in Hex., chiefly ED), אִשָּׁה (in Hex., chiefly JP), and אִשָּׁה, seem to be practically synonymous when used of concubines. In households where the status of a very female slave was—with few exceptions—the disposal of the master (Benzinger, 162), and where the relative status of the women depended chiefly on his favour, definite and nicely graduated distinctions were impossible. Amongst modern Mohammedans, a man may cohabit with any of his female slaves who is a Mohammedan, a Christian, or a Jewess; and, conversely, he cannot have as a slave a woman whom he acknowledges to be within the prohibited degrees of marriage (Lane, Arabian Nights, i. 55, 56). The only definite advantage claimed by wives over concubines is that their children should inherit a larger share, or even the whole, of their father's property, e.g. Sarah's claim for Isaac (Gn 21<sup>10</sup>). Nevertheless the wife, because her position was the result of her husband's favour, and was often guaranteed by powerful relatives, would often enjoy superior consideration, and exercise a greater influence. Sarah, Rachel, and Leah had slave-girls, שִׁפְחָהוֹת (shēphāhōth), who were their own property; and when these became concubines, they were still under the authority of their mistresses. Polygamy is both recognized by the law and described in the history; nearly all the kings and judges of whom we have particulars have a large harem. Acc. to Josephus (Jrpho, 134), even in his time Jewish teachers permitted each man to have four or five wives (cf. Jos. Ant. xvii. i. 2; Mishna, Kedushin, ii. 7, etc.). But considerations of expense and the approximately equal numbers of the two sexes place narrow limits on polygamy. Nowack (Heb. Arch. i. 159) points out that Abraham and Elkanah have two wives, that אִשָּׁה 'adversary' is a technical term for one of two wives, and that Dt 21<sup>15</sup> speaks of two wives, one beloved, the other hated. He thinks that such bigamy would be very common. In the nature of the case, etc. of the etc. have been etc. the cases of Adam (Gn 2:24-25), Noah and his sons (6:18 7:13 8:18), Lot (19:15), Isaac, and Joseph. Probably, the monogamy of these patriarchs is narrated as an example. The family etc. out of polygamy are sufficiently etc. the familiar examples of Sarah and Hagar, Rachel and Leah, Hannah and Peninnah, and the family history of David (cf. Sir 37:1 26:7 where ἀντιφύλον = πῦρ). On the other hand, Heb. family life must be judged from the point of view of the ancient East, and not from that of the modern West. From the former, there was nothing immoral in polygamy, and the status of wives and concubines was neither regarded by others nor felt by themselves to be humiliating. The acrostic on the Capable Woman, ʿesheth hayil (Pr 31:10-31), testifies to the honourable position of the faithful wife.

We have little information as to the marriages of slaves; apparently, the tie between them was not very binding. A couple who had come into a master's possession as a married couple were to be released together at the end of six years; but if, after a man became a slave, his master married him to another slave, and children were born, the man either went away alone, or remained a slave for the sake of his family (cf. MARRIAGE, WOMAN).

(c) Parents and Children.—The etc. of etc. father, etc. mother, are quite etc.; they are common to most Sem. languages, are apparently connected with the terms for father and mother in the Aryan and other families of languages, and are probably older than the trilateral roots. etc. son and its etc. have been somewhat improbably connected with etc. to build; they too, also, are probably older than the trilateral roots. The father was supreme over the children; he could dispose of the daughter in marriage (Gn 29), [but (Lv 19:20) he might not make her a prostitute], and arrange his son's marriage (Gn 24), or sell his children as slaves (Ex 21:7)—where, however, the father is forbidden to sell his daughter to a stranger (Neh 5:5). The power of life and death is attested by the proposed sacrifice of Isaac, the case of Jephthah's daughter, and the practice of sacrificing children to Molech (Lv 18:21 20:2-5, 2 K 23:10, Jer 32:35). The utmost respect and obedience to both father and mother are insisted on in Ex 20:12, Lv 19:3, Dt 5:16, Pr 1:8 30:12 23:25 30:17, cf. Ezk 22:7, Mic 7:4. Similarly, Ex 21:17, Lv 20:9 direct that any one smiting or cursing father or mother shall be put to death; Dt 27:16 invokes a curse upon any one who is disrespectful to father or mother. Pr 13:24 etc. insist on the duty of strict domestic discipline, though doubtless the 'rod' may be understood as including other chastisement besides corporal punishment (cf. Pr 17:10). Dt 21:18-21 directs that a stubborn and rebellious son, a glutton and a drunkard, is to be stoned to death by his fellow-citizens, on the testimony of his father and mother given before the elders. Such laws really imposed limits on the authority of the father; he must not himself put his son to death, but must procure his punishment by a public legal process. The constant co-operation of father and mother in such passages practically places the mother on the same level with the father with regard to the children. Indeed, polygamy makes each mother much more important to her own children than their father is. In a polygamous family, each mother and her children form a sub-family, —Jacob's wives and concubines have separate tents (Gn 31:33), —the management of which is in the hands of the mother. Hence the early education and training of children was mostly given by the mother. Children were named by the mother, e.g. Jacob's sons (Gn 29, 30); sometimes also by the father, e.g. Ishmael (Gn 16:15), Isaac (Gn 21:3). The long period of suckling —infants were not weaned till the second or third year—must have constituted an added bond between mother and children. The etc. instruction appointed in Ex 12:21-27 13:8, etc. 11:13 would probably be given by the mother. The sayings of king Lemuel (Pr 31:1-9) were taught him by his mother. On the other hand, Pr constantly refers to the māsār (RV 'instruction') of the father, as well as to the tôrâh (RVm 'teaching') of the mother (1:8). Acc. to the rank and wealth of the family, the care of etc. would devolve in whole or in part on female slaves. Rebekah (Gn 24:69) and Joash ben-Ahaziah (2 K 11:2) had each a foster-mother mēneket (RV 'nurse'), though Rebekah, at any rate, had a mother living. Mephibosheth ben-Jonathan had an ʿemeneth (RV 'nurse,' 2 S 4:4). The grandmother, on either side, would, by all analogy, have much to say about the training of the children; Naomi became the ʿemeneth of Ruth's baby (Ru 4:16). We also have the masculine ʿomēn (RV 'nursing father,' Nu 11:12, Is 49:23). From the analogy of the guardians of the sons of Ahab (2 K 10:5), and of Nathan (2 S 12:3), this would etc. have been a kind of tutor or παῖδαγωγός etc. for children are first mentioned in Josephus (Ant. xv. x. 5) and Mishna (Shab. i. 3). Acc. to Talm. Jerus. (Kethub. viii. 11) the first school for children was established by Simeon ben-Shetach, a century before Christ (Stapfer, 141); acc. to Talm. Bab. Baba Bathra (Nowack, i. 172), a system of schools in every town was established by Jesus ben-Gamla, who became high priest in A.D. 64. In such schools reading and writing would etc.; any other instruction would mainly etc. committing Scripture, etc., to memory, by repeating passages after the teacher.

(d) Brothers and Sisters.—The circumstances of Israelite life—the need of labour to till the soil, and of warriors to defend the homestead from the raids of neighbouring tribes, rendered a large family a great blessing (Ps 127:5). The natural checks—war, famine, and pestilence—prevented all danger of etc. The labour of girls in the household, the price that might be obtained for them as wives or concubines, and the alliances with powerful neighbours that might result from their marriages, gave a certain value to daughters; but the Isr. father's chief desire was for sons; it was the first-born sons who were sacred to J' (Ex 22:29). The physical token—circumcision—of the national covenant with J' is such as can be borne only by males; a mother is unclean for 14 days after bearing a daughter, but only for 7 after the birth of a son. Daughters are very rarely mentioned by name.

Each sub-family of full brothers and sisters, the children of one mother, had interests of its own, which clashed with those of the other sub-families. Domestic friction was specially strong in the numerous smaller households where there were two wives, e.g. Hannah and Peninnah [cf. the term ḥayil (Dt 21:15-17), and for two wives in a large household, Sarah and Hagar]. The relative status of the sub-families depended on the family relationships of the mother, the favour shown her by her husband, and in some measure on her being wife or concubine. We have already seen that claims were sometimes made that the children of a wife should oust those of a concubine from all or part of their share of the family inheritance. But these claims are not sustained by any legal ordinance or even by any general custom. The sons of Jacob's concubines rank as ancestors of tribes. It is true that they are reckoned in a sense as children of their mothers' mistresses, but the same was true of Ishmael, who was excluded from the seed of the promise. There was no difference of legitimacy in our sense between the sons of wives and concubines; even Jephthah, the son of a zōnāh or prostitute, is brought up in his father's house, and his expulsion is evidently regarded as an act of unjust violence (Jg 11<sup>7</sup>) (Benzinger, 148, 135). A man's acknowledged children without regard to the status of their mother. The bastard, mamzēr (Dt 23<sup>2</sup> [EV<sup>2</sup>], Zec 9<sup>6</sup>), is generally regarded as the offspring of incest or adultery (Dillm. and Driver). However, mamzēr may include children of whose fathers were unknown or did not acknowledge them.

In earlier times polygamous sub-families were so distinct that brothers married half-sisters, e.g. Abraham and Sarah (Gn 20<sup>12</sup>). In 2 S 13<sup>13</sup> Tamar thinks that David would certainly sanction her marriage with her half-brother. Such unions are, however, forbidden by Lv 18<sup>7</sup>.

The same causes which rendered the mother more important to her children than the father, often rendered the brothers the special guardians of their full sisters, e.g. Laban of Rebekah, Simeon and Levi of Dinah (Gn 34), Absalom of Tamar. So, children often maintained a close connexion with their mother's family, Jacob (Gn 27<sup>43</sup>), Abimelech ben-Gideon (Jg 9<sup>1</sup>), Absalom (2 S 3<sup>3</sup>, 13<sup>37</sup>).

The sons were the heirs, but in the absence of sons the daughters might inherit, and after the daughters other male relatives in order of kinship (Nu 27<sup>1-11</sup>). A special birthright and a larger share of the inheritance were given to the first-born, both in the history (Gn 49<sup>3</sup>) and the law (Ex 22<sup>29</sup>); but the bēkkōrāh, or right of the first-born, was not purely a matter of priority of birth, it might be sold, e.g. by Esau to Jacob, or bestowed on a younger son by a partial father, Dt 21<sup>17</sup>—which forbids such a practice. Side by side, however, with the first-born, the younger son constantly appears as the object of favour, both from God and his parents, e.g. Abraham, Isaac, Bethuel, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim, Moses, David, Solomon (cf. HEIR).

(e) Married Children, Daughters-in-law, Sons-in-law.—A married son would remain part of the father's family, though not necessarily of his household, while the father lived. He would still be in some measure subject to his authority. The patriarchs were married men with families when Isr. went down into Egypt, but Jacob was still the head of the family (cf. Job 1). So the daughter-in-law joined her husband's family and came under the authority of her father-in-law (To 10<sup>12</sup>), to whom she was subject even after her husband's death, e.g. Judah and Tamar (Gn 38). If her father-in-law was dead, she belonged to her brother-in-law or husband's next-of-kin (Dt 25<sup>5</sup>, Ru 3<sup>18</sup>), or might remain with her mother-in-law (Ru 1<sup>6</sup>). Sometimes, however, a man joined his wife's family, at any rate for a time, and fell under the authority of his father-in-law, e.g. Jacob (Gn 29-31), Moses (Ex 20<sup>12-13</sup>, cf. Gn 21<sup>5</sup>; see § v.).

(f) Other free Dependents.—Doubtless, more distant relatives, cousins, etc., friends and free servants, would sometimes form part of the family in the narrower sense; but we have hardly any information on the subject. Little is said as to hired servants; probably they were hired only for short periods, and did not form part of the employer's family. Micah's Levite, indeed, was hired to be a priest permanently at a regular stipend, 'and the young man was unto him as one of his sons' (Jg 17<sup>11</sup>). The resident alien, gēr (RV 'stranger'), śōshābēh (RV 'stranger' or 'sojourner'), is constantly referred to, and is commended to the good offices of the Israelites. The gēr is mentioned in close connexion with the other dependent members of the household (Ex 20<sup>10</sup>, Lv 25<sup>9</sup>). He seems to have placed himself under the protection of the family rather than the clan; he probably rendered some services in return for protection and sustenance, and may often have been a hired servant; he was evidently a familiar figure. The gēr was united to his hosts by close ties. His legal status and personal safety depended upon their protection, and they were bound by the sacred law of Eastern hospitality to care for him as one of their own kin. He was entitled to the Sabbath rest (Ex 20<sup>10</sup>), and to eat the passover if he became circumcised (Ex 12<sup>48</sup>). See GER, STRANGER.

(g) Slaves.—The slave was substantially one of the family. The master's authority over him did not differ essentially from that over wives and children, and the wife was purchased like the slave. Conversely, a female slave might become a concubine, and a male might marry his master's daughter (1 Ch 29<sup>35</sup>), or become his heir (Gn 15<sup>8</sup>). Slaves were circumcised and ate the passover. The yēlīdēh bayīth, or home-born slave, would have the closest, and the purchased Isr. slave, who had to be released at the end of six years, the loosest ties to his master's family. We gather, however, from Jer 34<sup>14</sup> that the custom of releasing Isr. slaves was not strictly observed. See SLAVE.

iii. MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITY.—In primitive times the family, in a narrower or wider sense, was the efficient social organization; and such functions of modern government as were discharged at all were represented by the mutual claims and duties of kinsfolk. Many laws and customs of Isr. are a legacy from this primitive system. In ancient times the only protection for life or property lay in men's willingness to defend and avenge their kinsmen. This right and duty is still recognized in OT; the next-of-kin, gō'ēl, must punish his kinsman's murderer, marry his widow if the deceased was childless, and may inherit his property. See GOEL, and section on Levirate Marriage under MARRIAGE. One would suppose that this strong sense of family duty would have led kinsfolk to provide for destitute relatives. But men were often obliged to sell themselves or their children for slaves, and widows and orphans are constantly spoken of as poor, helpless, and oppressed. Doubtless, the ordinary calamities—war, dearth, famine, pestilence, invasion—would often ruin whole clans at the same time; but it is also clear that family feeling was no adequate substitute for legal provision for the poor.

iv. FAMILY RELIGION.—As the nation had its religious symbol of circumcision, its sanctuaries, sacrifices, priests, and festivals, so the family had its special sacra. According to Benzinger, 137, and Nowack, 154, following Stade, etc., the Israelite family was essentially a society bound together by common religious observances. Gefühlsverwandtschaft. Thus, in the patriarchal period, the patriarchs, as head of the family, were to offer sacrifices; similarly, the passover was a family rite, observed in the home, often, of course, temporary. In 1 S 20<sup>29</sup> we read of clan-sacrifice, zebah mish-pāhāh, at Bethlehem. The family burying-place is sacred (Gn 23). Benzinger and Nowack see in the cutting off of the hair and the self-mutilation forbidden in Dt 14<sup>16</sup>, Lv 19<sup>27-28</sup>, remains of ancient ancestor worship; cf. the practice of necromancy (1 S 28). Teraphim are usually understood to have been images or symbols of ancestors. In later times the instruction directed to be given in Dt 6 would be matter for the family; and the regulations as to ceremonial cleanness solely on the produce of their herds and flocks, but from the earliest historic times have used corn for food, and have cultivated corn for themselves, either in conjunction with neighbouring villages or by means of slave labour. There is a scanty herbage at all times over a great portion of this wilderness, and in January and everywhere, and the flood November, December, and March there are dense mists and water. These mists depend upon the direction of the wind, and alternate with intense droughts. As the summer advances the pasture is confined principally to the broad water-courses, which give good herbage for many weeks: as the drought increases from water. These nomads and their flocks are of the most hardy nature and can live for many hours or even for days on the border-land or in the desert, and a very little extra scarcity brings on such want and privations that they, with their flocks, either move on to more favoured localities or die.

Egypt has always been remarkable for its extreme fertility, and is well watered everywhere (Gn 13<sup>10</sup>). It is not directly dependent on rainfall, the annual flooding of the river Nile inundating nearly the whole land and making the cultivation of the soil, as a general rule, a yearly certainty: a land where 'thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs' (Dt 11<sup>10</sup>). These inundations are caused by the rainfall over the districts where the Nile rises, and they fail at rare intervals. This exposes the land to drought, and famine ensues from want of corn, and in a minor degree the pasturage also fails.

The extraordinary fertility of the Promised Land is constantly alluded to in the Bible: 'a land of hill and valley, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven' (Dt 11<sup>11</sup>). 'I will give the rain of your land in its season, the former rain, and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil' (v. 14). Its soil is of a very rich description, and formerly clothed the hillsides in terraces, though now, for the most part, it lies at the bottom of the valleys. Although Pal. has been dependent mainly on its rainfall, its streams have been utilized largely for irrigation purposes in the plains and in the Jordan Valley, and on the banks of the Jordan itself the rich soil is subject to inundations in the spring (Jos 3<sup>15</sup>).

The first famines mentioned in the Bible are those which occurred in the times of Abraham and Isaac (Gn 12<sup>10</sup> 26<sup>1</sup>). In the first case, Abraham went down into Egypt to sojourn there; in the second case, Isaac was about to do the same, but, being warned by God, went to Gerar to reside with Abimelech, king of the Philistines. It may be assumed that these famines were only partial in their extent.

The famine which took place in the time of Jacob was one of great extent, as it included Syria, Egypt, and the sources of the Nile, and was one of great severity and long duration; it is recorded that 'there was famine in all lands' (Gn 41<sup>54</sup>). It lasted seven years, and was remarkable as having been preceded by seven years of plenty, which being foretold by Joseph, the Egypt. Government was enabled to gather up sufficient corn, not only to buy up all the lands and cattle of the Egyptians and to supply the people, but also to sell corn to foreigners. 'And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because the famine was sore in all the earth' (Gn 41<sup>57</sup>). It is to be noted, however, that this is a famine restricted to want of corn, and that there is no indication that there was great want of pasturage. The sons of Jacob were able to take their asses to and from Egypt without difficulty. Waggoners were sent to bring up Jacob and his households. 'And their father Israel said unto them, If it be so now, do this; take of the choice fruits of the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spicery, and myrrh, nuts and almonds' (Gn 43<sup>11</sup>). 'And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt' (Gn 46<sup>6</sup>).

Famines are mentioned in the time of the judges (Ru 1<sup>1</sup>), and in the time of king David (2 S 21<sup>1</sup>), but it is not until the time of Elijah that any account is given of the failure of the pasturage and springs. 'There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word' (1 K 17<sup>1</sup>). 'And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go through the land, unto all the fountains of water, and unto all the brooks: peradventure we may find grass and save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts' (18<sup>5</sup>). Amongst the signs of the end in Jesus' eschatological discourse are 'famines in divers places' (Mt 24<sup>7</sup>, Mk 13<sup>8</sup>, Lk 21<sup>11</sup>). For the famine referred to in Ac 11<sup>28</sup>, see CLAUDIUS.

ii. A graphic description of destruction of crops by hail is given Ex 9<sup>23</sup>. 31. 32. 'The LORD sent thunder and hail, and fire ran down unto the earth; and the LORD rained hail upon the land of Egypt.' 'And the flax and the barley were smitten, for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was balled. But the wheat and the spelt were not smitten; for they were not grown up.' The unusual occurrence of thunder and rain in the time of wheat harvest is accentuated in 1 S 12<sup>18</sup>.

iii. The effect of the destruction of crops by plagues of locusts is depicted Ex 10<sup>15</sup>. 'For they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left; and there remained not any green thing, either tree or herb of the field, through all the land of Egypt.' Again, Jl 1<sup>4</sup>. 'That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the canker-worm eaten; and that which the canker-worm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten.' (See Driver, ad loc.)

iv. The most terrible results of famine related in the Bible are due to the hand of man; and this was well recognized by king David. 'And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the LORD; for his mercies are great: and let me not fall into the hand of man' (2 S 24<sup>14</sup>). 'And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy ground, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee corn, wine, or oil, the increase of thy kine, or the young of thy flock, until he have caused thee to perish' (Dt 28<sup>21</sup>). 'And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons, and of thy daughters, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall straiten thee' (v. 23). 'And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver' (2 K 6<sup>25</sup>). 'And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow' (v. 28).

Josephus, in his Antiquities and Wars of the Jews, gives several accounts of the horrible atrocities which took place during the famines in besieged cities, but in no account does he give such distressing details as in the story of the last siege of Jerus. by Titus, in which he sums up that 'neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries' (Wars, v. x. 5). This account of Josephus is considered to be a description of the fulfilment of the prophecy by our Lord (Mt 24<sup>2</sup>), 'For then shall be great tribulation, such as hath not been since the beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be,' and is the history of the last famine connected with the Bible.

In the Bible there is no allusion to horrors and privations due to famine such as occur periodically in the world at the present time in the overcrowded portions of China and India.

C. WARREN.

FAMISH.—Occurring but four times in all, 'famish' is thrice used transitively. Zeph 2<sup>11</sup> 'he will famish all the gods of the earth' (מָהַר, lit. as AVm 'will make lean'); Gn 41<sup>25</sup> 'And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread' (וַיִּשְׁתָּאֲוּ); Is 5<sup>13</sup> 'their honourable men are famished' (כְּבוֹדָם קָטַן, lit. as AVm and RVm, 'their glory are men of famine,' but the reading is doubtful, see esp. Driver on Dt 32<sup>24</sup>). This transitive use of 'famish' may be illustrated by Coverdale's tr. of Jl 1<sup>20</sup> 'the shepe are famished away,' and Shaks. Tam. of Shrew, iv. iii. 3—

'What, did he marry me to famish me?'

Tit. Andron. v. iii. 179—

'Set him breast-deep in earth, and famish him';

and Milton, PL xii. 78—

'Thin air

Above the clouds will pine his entrails gross,
And famish him of breath, if not of bread.'

The intrans. occurrence is Pr 10<sup>8</sup> 'The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish.' The Heb., translated 'suffer to famish,' is the same (though in Hiphil) as in Gn 41<sup>25</sup>, and scarcely means more than 'suffer to be lean'; so that the statement loses some of its force in the translation, if it does not even lose all its point.

J. HASTINGS.

FAN, FANNER.—Fan is used both as verb and as substantive. 1. As verb (Heb. מָהַר in Qal) Is 41<sup>18</sup> 'Thou shalt fan them [the mountains and hills], and the wind shall carry them away'; Jer 4<sup>11</sup> for purifying; 15<sup>7</sup> for chastisement; and (same Heb. in Piel) Jer 51<sup>2</sup>. Amer. RV has 'winnow' throughout. 2. As subst. 'a winnowing-machine,' Is 30<sup>24</sup>, Jer 15<sup>7</sup> (מִכְנֶסֶת); Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup> (πύλος). Fanner occurs only in Jer 51<sup>2</sup> 'I will send unto Babylon fanners, that shall fan her, and shall empty her land.' The Heb. of the Massoretic pointing (מִנְחָרִים) means 'sifters,' and so RV after Ewald and others. But the VSS (LXX. Pesh. Targ. Vulg.) point the Heb. differently (מִנְחָרִים), and gain the word-play. Cheyne thinks the prophet possibly intended to suggest both meanings. The Eng. tr. may be traced from the Vulg. ventilatores, through Cov. 'fanners,' whom Geneva, Bishops', Douay, and AV all follow. So also Luther (Wortler), and Rothstein in Kautsch; and the French translators Ostervald and Segond (van-neurs). See AGRICULTURE.

J. HASTINGS.

FANCY is used as a verb absolutely in Sir 34<sup>7</sup> 'And the heart fancieth, as a woman's heart in travail' (φαντάζεται; a verb which occurs elsewhere in LXX only Wis 6<sup>16</sup>, 'showeth herself,' and in NT only He 12<sup>21</sup> τὸ φανταζόμενον, AV 'the sight,' RV 'the appearance'). The previous Eng. Versions from Wyc. have 'fantasie' as a subst. (Douay 'phantasie'), AV is the first to use the verb, and to spell 'fancy.'* The Oxf. Eng. Dict. gives only one example of 'fancy' used absolutely, Locke (1698) 'we rather fancie than know.'

J. HASTINGS.

FAR.—1. 'Far' is often used in AV as an adj. qualifying 'country,' as Is 8<sup>9</sup> 'all ye of far countries' (כָּל-אֶרֶץ-רָחוֹק); Zec 10<sup>9</sup> 'they shall remember me in far countries' (בְּאֶרֶץ-רָחוֹק). Twice it

* On the spelling Trench (Study of Words, 301) may be quoted: "When 'fancy' was spelt 'phantasy,' as by Sylvester, in his translation of Du Bartas, and other scholarly writers of the 17th cent., no one could doubt of its identity with 'phantasy,' as no Greek scholar could miss its relation with φαντασία."

qualifies other substantives, Dt 29<sup>22</sup> 'a far land' (אֶרֶץ רָחוֹק); Mk 13<sup>34</sup> 'a man taking a far journey' (ἀνθρώπος ἀποδύμενος, RV 'sojourning in another country'). Modern usage would probably require 'distant,' as Aldis Wright suggests. Certainly as an adj. 'far' was once used more freely than it is now: thus, Bp. Barlowe, Dialogue (1531), ed. of 1897, p. 35, 'Now to compare these fruites unto the actes of these Lutheran factyons, ye shall fynde a farie difference.' In Mt 21<sup>33</sup> 25<sup>14</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9</sup>, where the Greek is ἀποδύμεω and AV has 'go into a far country,' RV more accurately translates 'go into another country.' But the same Greek is rendered by AV 'took his journey' in Mt 25<sup>15</sup>, by RV 'went on his journey'; and in Lk 15<sup>13</sup>, where the Greek is more fully ἀπεδήμησεν εἰς χώραν μακράν, AV renders 'took his journey unto a far country,' and RV retains.

2. Notice the phrases: (a) thus far, Jer 48<sup>47</sup> 'Thus far is the judgment of Moab,' 51<sup>64</sup> 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah' (both מִכְנֶסֶת), and Lk 22<sup>1</sup> 'Suffer ye thus far' (ἐως τούτου). (b) So far forth—'to such an extent,' 1 Es 1<sup>52</sup> (ἐως οὗ). (c) Be it far from or far be it from. This phrase, which comes from Wyclif (esp. ed. 1388) after Vulg. absit hoc, occurs eight times in AV of OT as the translation of hálálah, a substantive formed from hálal, to profane, with locative suffix, therefore lit. ad profanum! to the unholy! The passages are Gn 18<sup>25 bis</sup>, 1 S 23<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>15</sup>, 2 S 20<sup>20 bis</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>, Job 34<sup>10</sup>. [Elsewhere the same Heb. expression occurs Gn 44<sup>17</sup>, Jos 22<sup>26</sup> 24<sup>15</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>45</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, Job 27<sup>5</sup>, where it is tr. 'God forbid' (AV and RV); also (combined with מִהֵרָה) 1 S 24<sup>6</sup> 26<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>18</sup> 'the Lord forbid'; and (combined with אֲלֵהֶם) 1 Ch 11<sup>19</sup> 'My God forbid!'] In Apoc. the same Eng. phrase is found, 1 Mac 13<sup>5</sup> 'be it far from me' (μὴ μοι γένοιτο), and in NT Mt 16<sup>22</sup> 'Be it far from thee, Lord' (Ἄεός σοι, where θεός γένοιτο is understood, as RVm 'God have mercy on thee').

The Lord is 'far from the wicked' (Pr 15<sup>29</sup>), but He is 'nigh unto all them that call upon him' (Ps 145<sup>18</sup>); so the Psalmists frequently cry, 'Be not far from me' (22<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 27<sup>9</sup> 35<sup>22</sup> 38<sup>21</sup> 71<sup>15</sup>), for in His presence is fulness of joy (Ps 16<sup>11</sup>). St. Paul taught the Athenians that He is 'not far from us' (Ac 17<sup>27</sup>), yet it is by the blood of Christ that we are 'made nigh' (Eph 2<sup>13</sup>), so that we are encouraged and enabled to 'draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith' (He 10<sup>22</sup>).

J. HASTINGS.

FARE, FAREWELL.—To 'fare,' from Anglo-Saxon faran (Ger. fahren, Gr. πορεύομαι), is to 'travel,' to 'go,' as Spenser, FG l. x. 63—

'But let me here for aye in peace remaine,
Or straight way on that last long voyage fare.'

Then comes the verb 'fare' on 'well or ill,' as 1 S 17<sup>18</sup> 'look on' (מִבְּרִיתִי fare' (מִבְּרִיתִי), lit. 'visit thy brethren [and inquire] as to their wellbeing' [cf. Gn 37<sup>14</sup>, 2 S 11<sup>7</sup>]; Cov. 'loke how thy brethren do,' Wyc. 'thi britheren thou shalt visite, if thei right doon'); Sir 32<sup>8</sup> 'A stubborn heart shall fare evil at the last' (κακωθήσεται, RV 'fare ill'); 32<sup>24</sup> 'he that trusteth in him shall fare never the worse' (οὐκ ἐλαττωθήσεται, RV 'shall suffer no loss'); 2 Mac 9<sup>20</sup> 'If ye and your children fare well'; 11<sup>28</sup> 'If ye fare well' (both ἐπρωσθε). The perf. pass. of the Greek verb found in the two last-quoted passages (ἐπρωσθαι) was used in the imperative sing. (ἐπρωσο) or plu. (ἐπρωσθε) as a formula for closing a letter, lit. 'be strong, prosper.' This formula is accordingly expressed by the word farewell in English. In Ac 15<sup>26</sup>, where the verb is plu., the older form is retained in AV and RV 'fare ye well'; but in 23<sup>30</sup>, where the verb is sing., AV has 'Farewell' (RV with most edd. omits). Once 'farewell' is the tr. of χαίρειν, 2 Co 13<sup>11</sup> 'Finally, brethren, farewell' (RVm 'rejoice' or 'be Christe'; H. Smith, Sermons (1592), 'Fashion thyself to Paul.' In NT there are two examples of this meaning: 1 Th 3<sup>21</sup> 'Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body' (σύνμορφος; RV 'that it may be conformed to the body of his glory'); 1 P 1<sup>14</sup> 'not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts' (παρακαταλίποντες). J. HASTINGS.

FAST.—1. Fast is frequently used in AV both as adj. and adv. in the sense of firm, secure, as Ps 38<sup>2</sup> 'thine arrows stick fast in me'; Ps 65<sup>6</sup> 'Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains'; Pr 4<sup>13</sup> 'Take hold of instruction'; 2 Es 2<sup>15</sup> 'Mother, embrace thy children, and bring them up with gladness, make their feet as fast as a pillar' (confirma pedes eorum, RV 'stablish their feet'); Ac 16<sup>24</sup> 'Who . . . thrust them down into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks' (σφαλισάτο). Cf. Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite (Skeat's Student's ed. p. 117)—

'Almighty God, of trouthe sovereyn,
As in a tempest is a roten mast.'

2. In reference to sleep, sound, as Jg 4<sup>21</sup> 'he was fast asleep and weary' (RV 'in a deep sleep'; see RVm and Moore, in loc.). 3. Close, near, only Ru 2<sup>28, 21, 24</sup>, as 2<sup>28</sup> 'abide here fast by my maidens.' Cf. Milton, PL ii. 725—

'the snaky sorceress that sat
Fast by Hell-gate, and kept the fatal key.'

In every case 'fast' is used as a verb or adj. used in the original; there is never a separate word for it in the Hebrew or the Greek.

J. HASTINGS.

FASTING.—Often described in OT (esp. in P, where it is practically a technica' term) by phrase 'to afflict the soul' (עָנָה לַנְּפִשׁ (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7, 30</sup>; Ps 35<sup>13</sup>, Is 58<sup>3, 5, 10</sup>), tr. by LXX in the passages in Nu by κακοῦν τὴν ψυχὴν, in the others by ταπεινῶν τὴν ψυχὴν, for which see also Jth 4<sup>9</sup>, and which may be assumed to have this precise reference, and not a more general one at Sir 24<sup>7, 17</sup>. The phrase does not denote primarily spiritual humiliation, even as the proper accompaniment of fasting. It has a physical meaning. This will be perceived if the material sense in which 'soul' was in early times used be remembered (cf. for a similar expression Ps 69<sup>1</sup>). The more literal terms עָנָה 'to fast', עָנָה 'fasting', are also common in OT. In NT the words are νηστεύειν and νηστεία.

(A) IN THE OT.—1. The practice of fasting (a) in the times before the Captivity.—The one regular fast, the institution of which is ascribed to this period, is that of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7, 30</sup>; Jer 36<sup>2</sup>). But there are many examples of fasts on special occasions, dictated by the sense of having transgressed, or of calamity, present or future. Such a fast is inspired by Samuel (1 S 7<sup>6</sup>); joined by Jehoiakim and the princes (Jer 36<sup>2</sup>); hypocritically by Jezebel (1 K 21<sup>12</sup>). In like manner individuals are moved to fast—David when his child is smitten with sickness (2 S 12<sup>15, 21-23</sup>), Ahab on hearing his doom (1 K 21<sup>27</sup>). The abstinence from food or drink for forty days by Moses on the Mount (Ex 34<sup>28</sup>), and by Elijah (1 K 19<sup>8</sup>), seem to be recorded rather as extraordinary or miraculous occurrences than as fasts purposely undertaken.

(b) After the Captivity.—Additional regular fasts now appear, the memorials of the times of bitter shame and calamity through which the nation had passed. Four are enumerated in Zec 8<sup>19</sup>, cf. 7<sup>3, 5</sup>. (a) 'The fast of the fourth month' (Tammuz). On the 9th of this month, the Chal-

dæans broke into the city (Jer 39<sup>4</sup> and 52<sup>6, 7</sup>). According to Talm. tradition the fast in question was observed on the 17th, on which day the breaking of the tables of the law by Moses is said to have occurred, and also the cessation of the daily offering in consequence of the famine during the siege by the Chaldeans. It was held also that later the day was further desecrated through the burning of the law by Antiochus Epiphanes (in Talm. called Apostemus), and his introduction of an idol into the Holy Place. (β) 'The fast of the fifth month' (Ab). The destruction of the temple took place according to 2 K 25<sup>3</sup> on the 7th, according to Jer 52<sup>12</sup> on the 10th of this month. The 9th was, however, the day which was observed, at all events according to the Talmud. The destruction of the second temple is said to have taken place on the same day; and the announcement was believed to have been made on this day also to the generation of Isr. who came out of Egypt that they should not enter Canaan. (γ) 'The fast of the seventh month' (Tisri). This fast is in commemoration of Atonement; and the government left in Jerusalem under Gedaliah took place in this month through his assassination (2 K 25<sup>23</sup>). This, acc. to Talm. tradition, was on the 3rd of Tisri. (δ) 'The fast of the tenth month' (Tebet). On the 10th of this month the siege by Nebuch. began (2 K 25<sup>1</sup>, Jer 52<sup>4</sup>). The reference in Ezk 24<sup>1, 2</sup> shows how the habit of marking it by a fast might arise.

From the Talm. we learn that, in the times for which it can be taken as evidence of the practice to which the prophet refers, the 9th of Ab was regarded as by far the most important fast, and that it was then universally binding. It was also held that it always held this position, and that people ask only (7<sup>8</sup>) whether they should fast on this day in the answer of God through the prophet, first one other day (7<sup>9</sup>), then all four of the fasts that had been mentioned in the sequence of their calamities (8<sup>13</sup>). It is probable that the three not referred to in the people's question were not regarded as of equal importance, and therefore not felt to be onerous. The Talm. names them all, because the principles on which he insisted applied to all equally. According to the Talmud those three were, after they had ceased to be kept, reintroduced subsequently to the destruction of the second temple; and it was taught that they need be observed only at times when the Jews were oppressed or were suffering calamities (cf. B. M. Pharisæische Volkssitten und Rituale, p. 45 ff.). Jewish interpreters seem to have regarded the fast of the 9th of Ab as a commemoration from the restoration and the destruction of the second temple (Bruck, ib.).

We may perhaps find a trace of the institution of one other regular fast in OT—in the Bk. of Esther. That book explains the origin of the Feast of Purim, and in Rabbinic times the celebration of that feast was accompanied by a fast in commemoration of the fasting of Esther, Mordecai, and the people (4<sup>1-13, 15-17</sup>). There may be an allusion to this part of the commemoration in 9<sup>21</sup> end.

Naturally, there is no lack in the period from the Captivity onwards of instances of fasts on special occasions. Of such as the whole people joined in we have, in addition to the one in Est just referred to, Ezr 8<sup>21-23</sup>, Neh 9<sup>1</sup>; and as examples of fasts by individuals, Neh 14, Dn 9<sup>3</sup>. The references to fasting in the Apoc. are not so numerous as might have been expected, and do not throw much additional light upon the history of the practice (To 12<sup>3</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>47</sup>, 2 Mac 13<sup>12</sup>).

2. The manner of observing fasts.—There can be little doubt that, in accordance with usual Oriental practice, fasting involved complete abstinence from food. The period for the Day of Atonement was 'from even till even' (Lv 23<sup>32</sup>). No work was to be done (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7</sup>). There are allusions also to the use of sackcloth and ashes (Dn 9<sup>3</sup>, Jon 3<sup>6</sup> etc.). Abstinence of another kind was also required, referred to in 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup> (TR): various passages of OT might be quoted in confirmation, though none were connected with fasts. It is spoken of in Talmud.

* For the question whether the observance of the Day of Atonement was known in pre-exilic times, see p. 199<sup>b</sup> of this vol.

3. The purpose of fasting.—W. R. Smith observes (RS, p. 434), 'The usage of religious fasting is commonly taken as a sign of sorrow, the worshippers being so distressed at the alienation of their god that they cannot eat; but there are very strong reasons for believing that in the strict Oriental form, in which total abstinence from meat and drink is prescribed, is nothing more than a mental eating of holy flesh.' It is difficult, however, to discover traces of this view in OT. There we find fasting employed simply as a sign of distress (1 S 31<sup>13</sup>), or with the evident object of winning divine wrath, or winning divine commendation. Its suitability cannot well be explained on the ground that it is often a natural effect of grief, and may therefore be employed as a sign of it. In its use as a mute expression of sorrow without confession for sin, or appeal for heavenly aid in distress. A superstitious idea of its efficacy was, no doubt, often entertained; but the particular form of error which the prophets found it necessary to condemn was the ordinary one of the formalist, who fails to perceive that his external observances can have no value when dis severed from purity and righteousness of life (Is 58<sup>7</sup>, Jer 14<sup>10-12</sup>, Zec 7, 8).

(B) IN THE NT.—1. The Jewish practice.—There is an allusion in Ac 27<sup>9</sup> to 'the Fast,' which was so par excellence, i.e. the Day of Atonement. But the chief point which we learn from NT is that by this time frequent additional fasts had become customary with those in Judaism who desired to lead a specially religious life, e.g. Anna (Lk 2<sup>37</sup>). Again, the Pharisee in the parable says, 'I fast twice in the week' (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>). The allusion is to the two weekly fast-days, Thursday and Monday, on the former of which days Moses was said to have gone up into the Mount, and on the latter to have come down from it. Mention is made of them frequently in the Talmud. There is also an interesting reference to them in the Didache 8<sup>1</sup>, where Christians are bidden not to fast with the hypocrites on the second and fifth days of the week, but on the fourth and on Friday. Further, the question asked of Jesus by the disciples of John and of the Pharisees (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>), reveals the interesting fact that teachers who had gathered about them bands of scholars, used to give to their disciples special rules on the subject.

2. The teaching of Jesus.—There are two passages only, but those significant ones. (a) That in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup>). Our Lord's whole aim here appears to be to secure perfect purity and simplicity of intention, a 'fasting unto God' (cf. Zec 7<sup>9</sup>), in the fullest and deepest sense. This would be the most effectual cure for every error, practical or even intellectual (comp. His teaching on almsgiving and prayer, Mt 6<sup>1-18</sup>, and see art. on former).

(b) His answer to the question of the disciples of John and of the Pharisees (Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33-39</sup>). This answer throws light on His whole method and aim. To understand it we must bear in mind the question which called it forth. There is no reason to believe that either our Lord or His disciples failed to keep any day of fasting which was generally observed by religious members of the class of artisans and small tradesmen in Galilee, such as the Day of Atonement. But He had imposed upon them no frequent additional fasts. He defends them from the stricture passed on them, and in so doing replies to the criticism of His own teaching, which was implied, by the Pharisees, the principles on which He acted. He was not from prescribing forms, not that He condemned them as mischievous or useless, but because it would have been the wrong end at which to begin. The course which He adopted was alone fitting, in view of the far-reaching change of character and thought which He designed to effect.

The precise force of the distinction which Jesus drew between the days while the bridegroom was present and those when he should be removed, deserves to be marked. The time of His presence on earth was a time of grace, a time of the restoration of all things. In the time of His absence, the restoration of all things would be continued in Messiah's Kingdom, but it would be the Jewish mind. The language of the Gospel is thus, as it is interesting to note, Jesus added emphasis to the claim to be the Messiah, which He made in referring to Himself as the bridegroom, by what He said to the unsuitability of requiring fasts from His disciples then. We may believe also that He would them afterwards to look back to the time that they were in the joy of His presence. But His clear prevision of the promise was not yet at hand, and that a period of sadness and trial would intervene before it, is not less remarkable, and His words unquestionably imply that there would be a place for fasting in the coming dispensation. Further, the inference which has frequently been drawn from them by Protestant commentators, that in the Jewish practice of fasting, practised only when dictated by the occasion, and hence that it was to be a matter of individual spread and exception, seems to be justified; for He characterizes it as between two whole periods.

On the other hand, in the line of conduct, to which He plainly shows that He intended questions of outward observance to be judged with reference to new principles which He inculcated, and that He left them to be decided by His Church under the guidance of the Spirit Who should come in His name (but see Hort, Jud. Chr. p. 24).

This intention was shown alike by what He did and did not conform to in the religious usages around Him. We have noticed that the keeping of the law of Moses was not in question on the occasion under consideration. But in point of fact His attitude to that law, the respect for it which He enforced, His silence as to its approach to the same principle as the non-imposition of new forms. He intended the rites of the Mosaic law to be set aside or changed only as the result of a new spiritual growth.

3. The practice of the early Church.—The chief instances are before solemn appointments (Ac 13<sup>2</sup>, 14<sup>23</sup>). St Paul alludes to his fasts (2 Co 6<sup>5</sup>, 11<sup>27</sup>). It is somewhat difficult, however, to decide whether he is speaking of voluntary or involuntary ones. Perhaps both are included. The connexion of words seems rather to suggest voluntary fasts in the former passage, and involuntary ones in the latter. In places TR has an allusion to fasting where it is wanting according to the best evidence (Mt 17<sup>21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, Ac 10<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>9</sup>). This corruption of the text may have been due to the increasing value which was set on fasting in the Christian Church with the lapse of time. See further, FEASTS AND FASTS.

In the Oxyrhynchus fragment discovered by Grenfell and Hunt, the 2nd Logion contains the words ἐὰν μὴ ὑποστῇτε τὸν κόσμον, οὐ μὴ ἔρχηται ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ. The construction and the meaning of the saying are both difficult: Harnack (Die zuerst entdeckten Sprüche Jesu, 8ff.) contends for a metaphorical sense of the word 'fast' (voluntary or involuntary) on the sense of this Logion we may refer to Grenfell and Hunt's edition (p. 107), J. R. (Edinburgh), Sept 1897, (21st Aug 1897), Swete (Lit. Times, Sept 1897, p. 540 f.).

V. H. STANTON.

FAT.—See FOOD and SACRIFICE.

FAT.—As a verb 'fat' is now nearly displaced by 'fatten.' It occurs in Sir 26<sup>18</sup> 'The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fat his bones' (παραεί, RV 'fatten'); and the ptp. 'fatted' in 1 K 4<sup>23</sup> ('fatted fowl,' Heb. כָּרִי, see FOWLS), Jer 46<sup>21</sup> ('fatted bullocks,' RV 'calves of the stall'), Lk 15<sup>23, 27, 30</sup>; to which RV adds 1 S 28<sup>24</sup> 'a fatted calf' (AV 'a fat calf').

J. HASTINGS.

FAT.—Fat, meaning a large vessel for holding liquids, has been displaced by 'vat' in literary beautiful and well favoured' (יפה קראָה, lit. 'fair to be seen.' So evilfavouredness, Dt 17<sup>17</sup> (עַל רָעָה, lit. 'evil thing').

In Jos 11<sup>20</sup> favour means scarcely more than mercy, 'for it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, and that he might destroy them utterly, and they might have no favour' (יְהוָה: in Ezr 9<sup>8</sup> the meaning is the same, but EV give 'grace'; everywhere else the Heb. word means 'intreaty'. Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 298, 'And they, which by that lawe were condemned, were put to dethe without any fauour.' J. HASTINGS.

FAVOUR.—The interest of the biblical use of this word resides chiefly in its relation to the term grace. It has not, like that term, obtained any doctrine. While χάρις in the LXX (Vulg. revalling equivalent, it is used only six times in NT to tr. that word (see also Lk 1<sup>28</sup> χαριτωμένη, 'highly favoured'; marg. 'gracious'. Much graced'). Grace, in fact, favour, implies much more. And it comes as a free gift ('Gratia, nisi gratis sit, non est gratia'), while favour may be won or deserved. To obtain favour is to please, to show favour is to please.

In OT the word, however, hardly perceptible. The instinct of the translators led them, it is true, to avoid the adjective 'favourable' as a rendering of רַחֵם ('gracious') used only of God (with the one possible exception of Ps 112<sup>4</sup>. See Cheyne, The Book of Psalms, in loc.), but the verb רָחַם and its other derivatives are often represented by 'favour.' Thus רָחַם, 38 times rendered 'grace,' is 26 times tr'd 'favour.' Nor is the sense of strength-giving help, so prominent in the former word, altogether absent from the latter. (See Ps 51<sup>2</sup> 'with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.')

Eight other Heb. roots, implying kindness, goodwill, pity, are represented in the AV by 'favour.' The most frequent of these is רָחַם, rendered 15 times 'favour.' For רָחַם, 'kindness, favour' is employed only 3 times.

The LXX vary much more than the Eng. tr., the idea of pity pronouncing itself in ελεος, while that of goodwill comes out in εὐδοκία, θέλημα, πρόσωπον (προ). So in the Vulg. we find misericordia, voluntas, vultus. A. S. AGLEN.

FEAR.—For the theology of Fear see next article. Some obsolete or archaic uses deserve notice.

1. Following the Heb. idiom, 'my fear,' 'thy fear,' etc., stands for the 'fear of me,' 'of thee,' etc.: Ex 23<sup>27</sup> 'I will send my fear before thee' (יִרְאָה, RV 'my terror'); Job 9<sup>34</sup> 'let not his fear terrify me' (יִרְאָה, RV 'his terror'); Jer 21<sup>9</sup> 'my fear is not in thee' (יִרְאָה). Similarly Ps 90<sup>11</sup> 'even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath' (יִרְאָה, RV 'according to the fear that is due unto thee,' so Perowne; Del.* Cheyne, 'the fear of thee,' with the same meaning; De Witt, 'But who has yet learned the power of Thine anger, And Thy wrath as measured by the reverence due Thee?'); Is 63<sup>17</sup> 'O LORD, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways, and hardened our heart from thy fear?' (יִרְאָה, so RV; Del. 'so that we fear thee not,' evidently the genitive of the object; Orelli, 'that it fears not thee'); Mt 11<sup>18</sup> 'if I be a master, where is my fear?' (יִרְאָה). Earlier VSS contained this idiom yet oftener, as Gn 9<sup>2</sup> Wyc. (1382) 'youre fear and youre tremblyng be upon alle the beestis of erthe' (1388 'youre drede and tremblyng,' AV 'the fear of you and the dread of you'). 2. After another Heb. idiom

'fear' is used for the object of fear, that which is feared: Gn 31<sup>42</sup> 'the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac' (יִרְאָה, RV 'Fear,' as a proper name: יִרְאָה to יִרְאָה is to miss the idiom, of which Symonds (Notes on the Text of Gen.) gives examples from Pesh. Targ. etc.), so v.<sup>53</sup>, Ps 31<sup>11</sup> 'I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially fear to mine acquaintance'; Ps 112<sup>1</sup> 'flee from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit' (יִרְאָה); Ps 53<sup>6</sup> 'There were they in great fear, where no fear* was' (יִרְאָה); Pr 1<sup>28</sup> 'I will mock when your fear cometh' (יִרְאָה); Is 8<sup>12, 13</sup> 'neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of Hosts himself; and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread' (יִרְאָה); Ps 34<sup>4</sup> 'I sought the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears' (יִרְאָה); Pr 10<sup>24</sup> 'The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him' (יִרְאָה); Is 66<sup>4</sup> 'I also will choose their delusions, and bring their fears upon them' (יִרְאָה). Cf. Pr 10<sup>29</sup> Cov. 'The waye of the LORDE geueth a corage vnto ye godly, but it is a feare for wicked doers'; Herbert, The Temple, 120, l. 29—

'Call in thy death's-head there, tie up thy fears.'

3. There are two kinds of fear, a 'slavish feare, and a sonlike feare' (Hieron, Works, i. 130). The latter is now used only of our relation to God. But it was formerly applied to the reverence due to any superior, as Ro 13<sup>7</sup> 'Render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear.' Cf. Knox, Hist. 194, 'we deny neither Toll, Tribute, nor fear, to her [the Queen Regent] nor her officers.' Ascham (Towson's, B. fol. 35, ed. 1545) says that a priest should have 'a bodye ful of manlye authoritie to fear ill men.' 4. The article being formerly used freely with abstract nouns, we find 'a fear,' Ezk 30<sup>18</sup> 'I will put a fear in the land of Egypt' (יִרְאָה, RV retains); Ad. Est 15<sup>3</sup> 'in a fear' (ἀγῶνισμός, RV 'in an agony').

In the quotation from Ascham above, the verb to fear is used in the active sense of put fear into, terrify. This meaning, though it occurs but once in AV, is common in the earlier VSS and in Eng. writers of the time.

Thus Lv 26<sup>36</sup> Wyc. 'the fear of a strange land shall be on you'; Dn 4<sup>11</sup> Cov. 'O Balthazar let me not be afraid of thee, for I may not seeme as it were to feare you with letters' (so Wyc.). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, l. 247, 'the good husbando, whan he hath sowen his grounde, setteth up corderes, or thredes, which some call shales, some blanchers, or other shewes, to feare awaye birds, which he foreseth redy to deuoure and hurte his corne.' So Froux, Actes and Mon. 1.436 (ed. 1583), 'A wonderful and terrible earthquake fell thorough out England: wherupon diuers of the subgrages beinge tured by the strange and wonderfull demonstration, doubting what it should meane, they fled to leaue of from their determinate purpose'; 1. ii. 25—

'For all that here on earth we dreadfull hold,
Be but as bugs to fearen babes withall,
Compared to the creatures in the seas enthrall.'

More, Utopia (Rob. tra. Lumby's ed. p. 145, l. 25), expresses his fear of the natives: 'They also which do not agree with us, nor speak against us, nor receive us, say: Scripture is "a comfort in adversity that we despair not, and feareth us in prosperity, that we sin not"; and Expositions, 148, 'fearing you with the bug of excommunication.' From Shaks. take Tam. of Shrew, i. ii. 205—

'Have I not in a pitched battle heard
Loud larums, neighing steeds, and trumpet's clang?
And do you tell me of a woman's tongue,
That gives not half so great a blow to hear
As will a chestnut in a farmer's fire?
Tush! tush! fear boys with bugs.'

* Earle (Psalter of 1539, p. 201) says that in this example 'fear' is used in the ancient sense of FEAR, sudden alarm, shock of danger. But that sense seems to have been dropped very early, long before the days of Coverdale, who first uses 'fear' here (Wyclif as usual having 'dread'), and the Heb. is the same as in the other passages quoted above.

* The suffix, says Delitzsch, is either the genitive of the subject, i.e. according to Thy fearfulness (יִרְאָה), as in Ezk 11<sup>18</sup>; or of the object, 'acc. to the fear that is due unto thee.' The latter way of taking it is more natural in itself (cf. v. 8, Ex 20<sup>20</sup>, Dt 2<sup>25</sup>), and here characterizes the knowledge that is so rarely found as a knowledge that is determined by the fear of God and truly religious Devices quoted from Ba 'an' A. C. S., 'K' 'hat we fear

He feareth where the neuter and active senses of the word are found together.

The example in AV is Wis 17<sup>9</sup> 'For though no terrible thing did fear them; yet being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear' (ἐφόβει, RV 'affrighted'). A Heb. idiom is expressed in the phrase 'fear before,' which occurs 1 Ch 16<sup>30</sup>, Ps 96<sup>9</sup>, Ec 8<sup>12, 13</sup>, Hag 1<sup>12</sup>. Thus Ps 96<sup>9</sup> 'O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: fear before him, all the earth' (יִירָא, RV 'tremble before him'). The verb is used in a grammatical misconception in Is 57<sup>11</sup> 'And of whom hast thou been afraid or feared,' which is rectified in RV 'And of whom hast thou been afraid and in fear?'

Fearful in older Eng. meant 'greatly fearing' as well as 'greatly to be feared.' Both senses are used in AV and retained in RV. 1. Dt 20<sup>8</sup> 'What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted?' (אָרֵר); Jg 7<sup>3</sup> 'fearful and afraid' (אָרֵר); Is 35<sup>4</sup> 'Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not' (אָרֵר, lit. 'hasty of heart,' as RVm); Mt 8<sup>28</sup> 'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?' (δελός; so Mk 4<sup>40</sup>, Rev 21<sup>8</sup> [all]); Sir 2<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>18</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>38</sup>, 2 Mac 8<sup>13</sup>. Cf. Adams, II Peter, 55, 'If thou lovest God, thou wilt be fearful to offend him, careful to please him'; and Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xxiii. 740—

'On the shore, far-off, he caus'd to raise A dove whose top they tied a fearful dove by th' foot,
Whose top they tied a fearful dove by th' foot,

2. Ex 15<sup>11</sup> 'Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?' (אָרֵר אֱלֹהִים, lit. 'feared [in] praises'; usually understood 'to be feared even when praised'; Kalisch, 'awful in praises,—the qualities which are mentioned in praising Him fill the mind with awe and reverence'; in Kautzsch, Du furchtbarer in Ruhmes- thaten, 'fearful in deeds of praise'; the last, or Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'terrible in attributes that call for praise,' being best); Dt 28<sup>28</sup> 'that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD' (אָרֵר); Lk 21<sup>11</sup> 'fearful sights' (ΤΡΟΦΗΓΗΤΑ, edd. φόβηθρα, RV 'terrors'); He 10<sup>37</sup> 'a certain fearful looking for of judgment' (φόβος; so v. 31, but in 12<sup>21</sup> 'terrible,' RV 'fearful': φ. is always used of that which inspires fear); 2 Es 8<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>15</sup>, 2 Mac 1<sup>24</sup>. Cf. Melvill, Diary (Wod. p. 271), 'The ministerie of Mr. Robert Bruce was verie steadable and mightie that veir, and divers yeirs following, maist comfortable to the guid and godly, and maist feirfull to the enemies.' 'Awful' and 'dreadful' have both meanings also.

Fearfully is found only in Ps 139<sup>14</sup> 'I am fearfully and wonderfully made' (אָרֵר וְנִפְלְאוֹת, Del. "'I am wonderfully come into being under fearful circumstances," i.e. circumstances that excite a shudder, sc. of astonishment'; Cheyne, 'graced so fearfully and wonderfully').

Fearfulness is in the earlier VSS both the meanings of fearful, as Ezk 30<sup>13</sup> Cov. 'a fearfulness will I send into the Egyptians land'; 2 Mac 15<sup>28</sup> Cov. 'sende now also thy good angell before us (o LORDE of heavens) in the fearfulness and drede of thy mightie arme.' But in AV 'fearfulness' means always the feeling of fear, apprehension, timidity: Ps 55<sup>5</sup>, Is 33<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>4</sup>, 2 Es 5<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>40</sup> 15<sup>37</sup>.

* See Davidson, Syntax, § 71, Rem. 2.

† See Cheyne's whole note (Book of Psalms, p. 352); it is particularly good. He says, 'Hitzig considers such a burst of admiration inappropriate to the case of human birth. But why? Take the production of a human hand. Why should not a sensitive poet thrill, like Browning's heroine (James Lee's Wife, viii.), at—

"The beauty in this—how free, how fine To fear almost?"

RV adds Wis 17<sup>8</sup> 'These were themselves sick with a ludicrous fearfulness' (καταγέλαστον εὐλάβειαν, AV 'fear worthy to be laughed at').

J. HASTINGS.

FEAR.—As in Eng., so in Heb. and in Gr. the same words are used to express emotions of fear which differ widely in their ethical character. At one end of the scale we have the fear of the LORD, which is the beginning of wisdom (Ps 111<sup>10</sup>) and the whole duty of man (Ec 12<sup>13</sup>); at the other end that fear of pain, shame, or death, which is craven, servile, and selfish, and which is often rebuked in Scripture. But it is impossible to draw any sharp line between the two kinds of fear, for in the imperfection of human character one motive shades off into another. Once even, by a bold anthropomorphism, God Himself is said to fear in the lower sense of the word (Dt 32<sup>27</sup>, see Driver's note).

The fear which is merely self-regarding ought not to exist in a rational being who knows that God is his Father and understands enough to trust Him. Perfect love casteth out fear (1 Jn 4<sup>18</sup>). But man, as he is, fears the forces of nature, which he does not understand or cannot control, because he does not trust God's providence. And he fears his fellow-man, because he is aware that brotherly instincts have grown weak with the sense of the loss of God's Fatherhood. 'Thus conscience doth make cowards of us all.' When Adam fell, he was afraid because he was naked (Gn 3<sup>10</sup>), and he felt he could no longer face God: thus fear of God took its rise in the violation of peaceful fellowship with Him. Similarly, Cain violates human fellowship, and fears man because he is an outlaw and God's curse is upon him (Gn 4<sup>12-14</sup>). Fear is thus the natural consequence of misdoing (Pr 28<sup>1</sup>), and, accordingly, is sometimes expressly said to be inflicted as a punishment (Lv 26<sup>17</sup>, Dt 28<sup>25, 26</sup>). The effect of selfish fear is to unman the coward, he loses spirit (Jos 2<sup>11</sup>); for the same phrase used in a higher sense, see 1 K 10<sup>5</sup>: such men are to be rejected from active service in the army, lest the infection of their timidity spread (Dt 20<sup>8</sup>, Jg 7<sup>3</sup>). Courage is especially needed in a prophet (Jer 1<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 3<sup>9</sup>). Fear is to be overcome by faith in God (Ps 112<sup>8</sup>). In Rev 21<sup>8</sup> the fearful are numbered with the unbelieving among the most grievous sinners.

The nobler fear has no thought of danger to self, so that the fear of God is the very opposite to the fear of man (Is 8<sup>12, 13</sup>, Mt 10<sup>28</sup>); but it arises from the sense of the nearness of some higher and holier being. Thus the beasts fear man (Gn 9<sup>2</sup>), and man fears angels and spirits, and, above all, God. To fear the LORD (the phrase occurs far more often with J' than with Elohim) means rather to feel awe of what He is, than fear of what He might do. It is fear of a Person (J' is God's personal name), of His character, dignity, and holiness, rather than of His power or works. The fear of the LORD is to hate evil (Pr 8<sup>13</sup>). Fear in the better sense of the word is the mainspring of religion, and 'to fear' is constantly used as signifying 'to worship,' whether the object be the true God or the gods of the heathen (e.g. 2 K 17<sup>38, 39</sup>). Thus, too, Jacob, when dealing with Laban, calls J' the Fear of his father Isaac (Gn 31<sup>42, 53</sup>), that is, the object of his worship and religious awe. This kind of fear is so far removed from the lower sort, that it is one of the distinguishing qualities given by God's Spirit to the Messianic King (Is 11<sup>2, 3</sup>, the spirit of the fear of the LORD), and the prayers of the Incarnate Son were heard because of His godly fear (He 5<sup>7</sup>).

But men are only gradually trained to the level of this holy and disinterested fear. They often have to be taught to fear God at all, even in the lower sense; and this lesson is enforced by divine punishments (1 S 12<sup>18</sup>), just as civil punishments teach men the authority of the law through fear (Dt 13<sup>4</sup>). It is possible to trace the conception of fear taught in the Law at Sinai the people fear the fire (Ex 20<sup>18-20</sup>); but at Horeb the prophet is taught to look for God in the still small voice rather than in the fire and tempest (1 K 19<sup>12</sup>); and Ezekiel is told not to crouch before God, but to stand upon his feet when God speaks to him (Ezk 2<sup>1</sup>). So in the NT boldness towards God is inculcated as much as fear, Christ having opened up the way of access for all who are united to Him: see Eph 3<sup>12</sup>, He 4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>17</sup> (cf. Ro 8<sup>15</sup> contrast bet. spirit of bondage and of adoption). But Christ does not encourage the idea that it is as yet possible to supersede the motive even of selfish fear; He gives grave warning of the consequences that will follow sin, and, while He tells His 'friends' not to fear men, He bids them emphatically to fear Him who hath power to cast into hell (Lk 12<sup>4-5</sup>).

In Ac 'one that feareth God' is often used technically to mean a proselyte, even though uncircumcised (Ac 10<sup>2</sup>). This is also the meaning of the word σεβόμενος, one that worshipped, translated 'devout.' See COURAGE, REVERENCE.

W. O. BURROWS.

FEASTS AND FASTS.—It will be convenient to divide this article* into four parts—

- I. The Institution of the Sabbath.
- II. The Passover, Pentecost, and the Minor Festivals.
- III. The Fast of the Day of Atonement and the Minor Fasts.
- IV. The Fast of the Day of Atonement and the Minor Fasts.

I. FEASTS CONNECTED WITH THE INSTITUTION OF THE SABBATH.

(1) The Sabbath. (2) The New Moon. (3) The Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day of the Sabbatical month. (4) The Sabbatical year. (5) The Jubilee year.

The sacred number 7 dominates the cycle of religious observances. Every 7th day was a Sabbath. Every 7th month was a sacred month. Every 7th year was a Sabbatical year. After 7 times 7 was the year of Jubilee. The Feast of the Passover, with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, began 14 days (2×7) after the beginning of the month, and lasted 7 days. The Feast of Pentecost was 7 times 7 days after the Feast of the Passover. The Feast of Tabernacles began 14 days (2×7) after the beginning of the month and lasted 7 days. The 7th month was marked by (1) Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day. (2) Feast of Atonement on the 10th day. (3) Feast of Tabernacles from the 15th day to the 21st. The days of 'Holy Convocation' were 7 in number—2 at the Passover, 1 at Pentecost, 1 at the Feast of Trumpets, 1 at the Day of Atonement, 1 at the Feast of Tabernacles, and 1 on the day following, the 8th day. (Willis, Worship of the Old Covenant, pp. 190, 191).

(1) The Sabbath, שבת, שבת, שבת.—In Am 8<sup>5</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>22-23</sup>, Is 1<sup>13</sup>, Hos 2<sup>11</sup> it is connected with the New moon. Probably the Sabbath was originally regulated by the phases of the moon, and thus occurred on the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days of the month, the new moon being reckoned as the first Sabbath. 'Among the Assyrians the first twenty-eight days of every month were divided into four weeks of seven days each, the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days respectively being Sabbaths, and there was a general prohibition of work on these days' (George Smith, Assyrian Eponym Canon, 19f., quoted by Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 112, and Schultz, OT Theol. i. 204, who also mentions the primitive Delphic custom of giving oracles on the 7th day as the day dedicated to Apollo). Schultz also points out that it is a mistake to derive the name Sabbath from the planet Saturn, which the Rabbis call 'Shabbti,' and thus to bring the Sabbath holiday into connexion with the Chaldean worship of the planets. 'The naming of the days after certain planets can hardly be so old as the Sabbath'.

For the Sabbath law see Ex 16<sup>23-30</sup> (P and J), 20<sup>8</sup> (E), 23<sup>12</sup> (J), 31<sup>13-16</sup> (J), 34<sup>21</sup> (JE), 35<sup>2</sup> (P), Lv 19<sup>8</sup> (H), 23<sup>3</sup> (P), 26<sup>2</sup> (H), Nu 15<sup>32-36</sup> (P), 28<sup>9-10</sup> (P), Dt 5<sup>12-15</sup>. In Ex 20<sup>8</sup> (E) it is to commemorate God's seventh day of rest at the creation. In Dt 5<sup>12-15</sup> it commemorates the redemption of Israel from Egypt. On the Sabbath the daily morning and evening sacrifice—the 'continual sacrifice'—of a lamb as a burnt-offering was doubled. There is no evidence of Sabbath observance in the days of the Patriarchs. There is little evidence of Sabbath observance before the time of the Exile (Jer 17<sup>20-27</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>12, 13, 16, 20</sup>, Is 56<sup>2-6</sup> 58<sup>13</sup>). Greater strictness marks the post-exilic period (Neh 8<sup>9-12</sup> 10<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>15-22</sup>). For the 39 kinds of work prohibited by the Rabbis on the Sabbath, and for many other actions and employments which cannot be summed up under any of them which were also forbidden, see Schurer, HJP II. ii. 96-105, cf. 1 Mac 2<sup>24-28</sup>, 3<sup>40-42</sup>, 2 Mac 5<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>26-28</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>31</sup>, Mt 12<sup>9-13</sup>, Mk 3<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>6-10</sup> 13<sup>10-17</sup> 14<sup>1-6</sup>, Jn 5<sup>1-18</sup> 9<sup>14-16</sup>. Sabbath observance was punishable with death (Nu 15<sup>32-36</sup> (P), 31<sup>13-16</sup> (J)), cf. Ex 16<sup>5</sup> (J), where the Manna ceases on the Sabbath, and Ex 35<sup>3</sup> (P), where no fire is to be lighted. According to the testimony of Josephus, the high priest, although legally bound to officiate only on the Day of Atonement, yet actually officiated, as a rule, every Sabbath day, and on the occasion of the New Moon or other festivals in the course of the year (Jos. BJ v. 7).

(2) The New Moon (1) חֹדֶשׁ, (2) חֹדֶשׁ, (3) חֹדֶשׁ, (4) חֹדֶשׁ, חודש, חודש.—Closely associated with the Sabbath (see above). 'When under the influence of the Chaldean method of dividing time, the course of the moon with its four phases was adopted as the unit of time measurement, the new moon and the 7th day were reckoned as the chief divisions of time, and the 7 days' (Schultz, OT Theol. i. 204). It would appear that the prophets were in the habit of gathering the people around them, and perhaps of granting inquirers and suppliants an audience at new moons and on Sabbaths. At every new moon the number of burnt-offerings was largely increased; and in addition a kid of the goats was to be offered for a sin-offering (Ex 40<sup>29</sup> (P), Nu 10<sup>10</sup> (P) 28<sup>11-15</sup> (P) 29<sup>6</sup> (P), 1 S 20<sup>6, 29</sup>, 1 Ch 23<sup>31</sup>, 2 Ch 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 29<sup>17</sup>, Ps 81<sup>3, 4</sup>, Is 1<sup>13, 14</sup>, Hos 2<sup>11</sup>, 1 Es 5<sup>32, 33, 37</sup>, 8<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>16</sup>, 17, 37, 1 Mac 10<sup>64</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>).

(3) The Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day of the Sabbatical month, תְּשׁוּבָה וְיִמְיָה, תְּשׁוּבָה וְיִמְיָה.—The 7th month—Tisri—was the sacred month. On the new moon of the 7th month—the Feast of Trumpets—additional burnt-offerings were sacrificed (Nu 29<sup>1-6</sup> (P), Lv 23<sup>24, 25</sup> (P)).

(4) The Sabbatical Year, שְׁנַת שְׁבַע שָׁנִים, שְׁנַת שְׁבַע שָׁנִים.—The Sabbatical year represented a still further consecration of time to God. The land was to keep a Sabbath. The fields were neither to be tilled nor reaped. 'Nature is to be set free, as it were, from the service which mankind exacts from her, and to be left entirely to herself. Only what she voluntarily offers is to be taken, and that not for any selfish purpose' (Schultz, OT Theol. i. 363). Hebrew slaves were to be set free unless they wished to remain in service (Ex 21<sup>2-6</sup> (J)). A harvest was to be given gratis to the poor of the people (Ex 23<sup>10, 11</sup>). The release from debt is prescribed (Dt 15<sup>1-6</sup>). In Ex 23 (J) the arrangement is made for man; it is a limitation for the common good of private rights of property in land,—in fact, for the benefit of the landless, who in the 7th year are to have the usufruct of the soil; in Lv 25 (H) the arrangement is for the sake of the land,—that it may rest, if not on the 7th day, at least on the 7th year; and for the sake of the Sabbath,—that it may extend its supremacy over nature also (cf. Prolegomena, 118). At the F. of Tabernacles at the commencement of the Sabbatical year, the whole law was read in the hearing of the people (Neh 8<sup>13-18</sup>). The 70 years' captivity and the land's desolation were regarded as making up for the unobserved Sabbaths of the land (Camb. Comp. to the Bible, p. 412) (2 Ch 36<sup>21</sup>, Jer 34<sup>14-22</sup>). After the return from exile Nehemiah bound the Jews by a covenant to keep them (Neh 10<sup>31</sup>).

* The article is general. Fuller details will be found under the articles on the separate Feasts and Fasts. See also the article FASTING.

(5) The Year of Jubilee יובל, ἀφεσις, יובל, ἐνιαυτός ἀφεσις σμαρτία (Lv 25<sup>3-5</sup> 27<sup>17-24</sup>).—Peculiar to P. As the Sabbatical year corresponded with the 7th day, so the year of Jubilee corresponded with the 50th, i.e. Pentecost. 'As the fiftieth day after the seven Sabbath days is celebrated as a closing festival of the forty-nine days' period, so is the fiftieth year after the seven Sabbatic years, as rounding off the larger interval; the seven Sabbath years are, in fact, like the seven days, which are usually the closing of a period, have, in the circumstances, a particular resemblance to the Sabbatic work, a particular resemblance to the Sabbatic years which interrupt the ordinary work together. Jubilee is thus an annual festival superimposed upon the years of fallow, regarded as harvest Sabbaths after the analogy of Pentecost' (Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 119). There were two main elements in the Jubilee—the emancipation of the Hebrew slave, and the return of mortgaged property to its hereditary owner. Cf. 2 Ch 36<sup>21</sup>, Jer 34<sup>14, 15, 17</sup>, Ezk 46<sup>17</sup>, Is 61<sup>1, 2</sup> 63<sup>4</sup>, Lk 4<sup>18-21</sup>. But in Jer the term יובל used in Lv 25<sup>10</sup> is applied only to the 7th year. The year of Jubilee was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet on the Day of Atonement (Lv 25<sup>9</sup>).

II. THE GREAT HISTORICAL FESTIVALS.†—As the new moon and the Sabbath were lunar feasts, the Passover (with the Feast of Unleavened Bread), Pentecost, and Tabernacles were solar festivals, i.e. festivals which followed the seasons of the year. 'Three times in the year shalt thou hold pilgrimage unto me, three times in the year shall all thy men appear before J', the God of Israel' (Ex 23<sup>14, 17</sup> (J), 34<sup>23</sup> (JE), Dt 16<sup>16</sup>).

(1) The Passover פסח, πάσχα. The Feast of Unleavened Bread מצות מצות, ἐσθίη τῶν ἀζύμων.—The Passover, though followed by the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Mazzôth), was distinct from it both in its origin and in its observance. In Ex 12 and 13 two narratives are combined. Ex 12<sup>1-13</sup> (P) refer to the Passover, 12<sup>14-20</sup> (P) refer to the seven days' F. of Mazzôth, 12<sup>21-27</sup> (JE) refer to the Passover, 12<sup>28-30</sup> (P) refer to the Passover, 13<sup>3-10</sup> (JE) refer to Mazzôth (Driver, LOT, 25). Josephus distinguishes the Passover from the F. of Mazzôth (Ant. III. x. 5), 'The F. of Unleavened Bread succeeds that of the Passover, and falls on the fifteenth day of the month, and continues seven days' (cf. Lv 23<sup>5, 6</sup> (P), Nu 28<sup>16, 17</sup> (P)). But in Mk 14<sup>12, 13</sup>, Lk 22<sup>1</sup> they are 'The Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles do. It is celebrated as a direct result of the F. of Unleavened Bread that the Passover is celebrated on the evening before the latter feast begins' (Schultz, OT Theol. vol. i. p. 364) (Lv 23<sup>5-8</sup> (P) 10<sup>14</sup> (H), Nu 9<sup>2-14</sup> (P) 28<sup>16-25</sup> (P) 33<sup>3</sup> (P), Dt 16<sup>1-8, 10</sup> (H)).

between the feast of the first month and the feast of the seventh month should be noticed. The tenth day of the first month, for the offering of the Lamb, is parallel to the tenth day of the seventh month, the Day of Atonement. The Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month and the seven days' F. of Mazzôth are parallel to the eight days of the F. of Tabernacles. The Passover, which was a sacrificial feast (Ex 12<sup>27</sup>), was observed on the fourteenth day of the first month, Abib (the month of ears, because in it the ears of wheat first appear), later Nisan (Est 3<sup>7</sup>, Neh 2<sup>1</sup>). The Feast of Unleavened Bread was the opening as Pentecost was the closing festivity of the seven weeks' 'joy of harvest' (Dt 16<sup>9</sup>, Lv 23<sup>10</sup> (H)). Passover and Mazzôth must be distinguished. Wellhausen (Prolegomena, 87 ff.) has shown how the Passover points back to the sacrifice of the firstlings (Ex 34<sup>18</sup> (JE) 13<sup>12</sup> (JE), Dt 15<sup>19</sup>, 16<sup>1</sup>). It is because J' smote the firstborn of Egypt and spared those of Israel that the latter thenceforward are held sacred to Him. Because Pharaoh refuses to allow the Hebrews to offer to their God the firstlings of cattle that are His due, J' seizes from him the firstborn of men. On the origin of the Paschal ritual and its connexion with Arabian and other customs, see W. R. Smith, ES, 227, 230, 344, 345, 406, 431, 464, 465; Schultz, OT Theol. i. p. 364; Cobb, Origines Judaicae, 138. 'In the three great festivals we can plainly discern relics of the customs which preceded their legal institution. In the first (the Passover) we can distinguish the earlier belief, out of which the offering of the firstlings of the flock sprang, from the enactments which are proper to the institution of the Passover.' Cf. also for the feasts generally W. R. Smith, The Patriarchs of Israel, new ed. pp. 56, 334 ff., where he clearly, and Wellhausen, 'proves that the chief occasions of worship in Israel (Mazzôth, Pentecost, and Tabernacles) were the agricultural feasts, just as among the Canaanites and other ancient nations. The real starting-point for a study of Jewish sacred feasts is Gn 4<sup>2d</sup> (J), 'Abel was a shepherd, and Cain was a husbandman. And in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord; and Abel also brought an offering of the firstlings of his sheep.' 'It is,' says Wellhausen (Proleg. p. 89), 'out of the simplest, most natural, and most wide-spread offerings, those of the first-fruits of the flock, herd, and field, the occasions for which recur regularly with the seasons of the year, that the annual festival took their rise. The Passover corresponds with the firstlings of Abel the shepherd, the other three (Mazzôth, Pentecost, and Tabernacles) with the fruits presented by Cain the husbandman; apart from this difference, in essence and foundation they are all precisely alike.' Thus the Passover in its origin must be distinguished from the three agricultural feasts. It was a sacrificial feast, and had nothing to do with the harvest. The name 'sacrifice' is applied to it (Ex 12<sup>27</sup> (JE) 34<sup>25</sup> (J)). In Nu 9<sup>7-12</sup> (P) it is a kôban or offering (קרבן). Like the peace-offerings, the chief part of it was eaten by the worshippers;

* יובל in Lv 25<sup>10</sup> refers to the 'liberty' of Sabbatical year, in Jer 34<sup>15, 17</sup> to the liberty of slaves in 7th year of service, in Ezk 46<sup>17</sup> prob. to Jubilee. In Is 61<sup>1</sup> its use is figurative.

† The distinctive feature of these feasts is that they are not merely religious festivals like those of the 'sacred seasons' (מזמור), but imply, like the Arab hajj (same word), a pilgrimage to a sanctuary (see Driver, Deut. 188 ff.).

* 'Not only in the Jahwistic but also in the Deuteronomic legislation the festivals rest upon agriculture, the basis at once of life and of religion' (Proleg. p. 91).

like the sin-offerings, there was an element of atonement in it (2 Ch 30<sup>16</sup> 35<sup>11</sup> refer to the sprinkling of the blood of the Passover); like the burnt-offerings, it was whole—no bone of it was broken; it was roast with fire—anything left was burnt with fire. In the two accounts of the Passover in Ex 12, several points are omitted in the first, e.g. the lamb, and the manner in which it was to be eaten; fresh points are added in the second, e.g. the basin, and that none were to leave their houses till the morning.

On each of the seven days of the F. of Mazzôth, which followed the Passover, 2 young bullocks and 1 ram and 7 lambs of the first year were offered as burnt-offerings, with their meal and drink-offerings, together with a goat for a sin-offering and the continual, i.e. daily burnt-offering (Nu 28<sup>19-25</sup> (P)). On the second day of Mazzôth—Abib (Nisan) 16th—a sheaf of the new corn was offered as a wave-offering, together with a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering (Lev 23<sup>10-14</sup> (H)). The first and last day of the month—15th and 21st days of the month—were days of 'holy convocation,' in which no servile work might be done (Lv 23<sup>7</sup> (P)).

There are few references to the Passover in OT (Nu 9 (P), Jos 5<sup>10-12</sup> (P), 2 Ch 30. 35, Ezr 6<sup>19</sup>, 1 Es 1<sup>1</sup>. 6. 8. 9. 12. 17. 19. 20. 21. 22. 7<sup>10. 12</sup>). In NT see Mt 26<sup>2</sup>. 17. 18. 19, Mk 14<sup>1</sup>. 12. 14. 16, Lk 22<sup>1</sup>. 7. 8. 11. 12. 15, Jn 2<sup>13</sup>. 23. 6<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>55</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>23. 39</sup> 19<sup>14</sup>, Ac 12<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, He 11<sup>28</sup>. Later Jewish ordinances distinguish between the so-called 'Egyptian Passover,' that is, as it was enjoined for the first night of its celebration, and the 'permanent Passover,' as it was to be observed by Israel after their possession of the land of promise (Edersheim, Bible History, vol. ii.). On the later additions to the Paschal ceremonial, e.g. the recitation of the history of redemption, the four cups, the Hallel (Ps 113-118), the Chagigah, etc., see Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services at the Time of Jesus Christ, chs. xi. xii.; and for the Feast of Unleavened Bread, see ch. xiii. of the same.

(2) The Feast of Pentecost.—(i.) שבועות, ה' עומר, ἑβδομαῖος, the Feast of Weeks (Ex 34<sup>22</sup> (JE), Dt 16<sup>10</sup>); (ii.) חג הקציר, ה' עומר, ἑορτή θερισμοῦ, the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> (J)); (iii.) יום תבואתם, ה' חמשה עשר, the Day of Firstfruits (Nu 28<sup>26</sup> (P); cf. Ex 22<sup>29</sup> (J) 23<sup>19</sup> (J) 34<sup>26</sup> (JE)). Fifty days after the offering of the Paschal wave-sheaf, the Feast of Pentecost, or Weeks, or Harvest, was kept on or about the 8th of Sivan, the third month. It lasted a single day (Dt 16<sup>9-12</sup>). The day was a day of 'holy convocation' (Lv 23<sup>21</sup> (P)). The feast marked the completion of the corn harvest, and according to the later Jews it commemorated the giving of the law (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xiii. p. 225). It closed the New Year holiday season. The sacrifices were similar to those offered on the seven days of the F. of Mazzôth (Nu 28<sup>26-31</sup> (P)). The characteristic of the feast was the offering and waving of two leavened loaves of wheaten flour, together with a sin-offering, burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings (Lv 23<sup>15-20</sup> (H)). As a wave-sheaf was offered at Mazzôth, which marked the commencement of harvest, as the consecration of the firstfruits, so two wave-loaves were offered at Pentecost, which marked the completion of the corn harvest. The feast is not referred to in OT, but see 2 Mac 12<sup>32</sup>, Ac 2<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup> (cf. Edersheim, The Temple, pp. 225-231).

(3) The Feast of Tabernacles.—סוכות, ה' עומר, σκηνών, F. of Tabernacles or Booths (Lv 23<sup>34</sup>, Dt 16<sup>13</sup>); חג האסיף, ה' עומר, ἑορτή συναγωγῆς (Ex 23<sup>16</sup>), ἑορτή συναγωγῆς (Ex 34<sup>22</sup>), the F. of Ingathering. This feast was observed from the 15th to the 22nd of Tisri (the seventh month), following closely upon the Fast on the 10th day of the month—the Day of Atonement. It marked the completion of the harvest of fruit, oil, and wine, and historically it commemorated the wanderings in the wilderness. It was the harvest-home at the close of the year, when people came 'from the villages and towns to the fruit gardens to live in booths, and enjoy a holiday' (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> (J) 34<sup>22</sup> (JE), Nu 29<sup>38-40</sup> (P), Dt 16<sup>13-15</sup> 31<sup>10-13</sup>). The sacrifices at this feast were far more numerous than at any other. On each of the seven days 1 kid of the goats was offered as a sin-offering, and 2 rams and 14 lambs as a burnt-offering. Also 70 bullocks were offered on the seven days, beginning with 13 on the first day and diminishing by one each day until on the 7th day 7 were offered (Nu 29<sup>12-34</sup>). After the seven days a solemn day of 'holy convocation' was observed ('the last day, that great day of the feast,' Jn 7<sup>37</sup>), which marked the conclusion, not only of the Feast of Tabernacles, but of the whole cycle of the festival year. On this day 1 bullock, 1 ram, and 7 lambs were offered as a burnt-offering, and 1 goat for a sin-offering (Nu 29<sup>35-38</sup>). The feast is alluded to in 1 K 8<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ch 5<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>38</sup>, Ezr 3<sup>4</sup>, Neh 8<sup>14-18</sup>, Zec 14<sup>16-19</sup>, Jn 7<sup>1-10</sup>. On the later ceremonies connected with the feast, e.g. the procession to Siloam to fetch water and its solemn libation at the altar (Jn 7<sup>37</sup>), the singing of the Hallel (Ps 113-118), the daily processions round the altar, and the sevenfold repetition on the seventh day (Ps 118<sup>25</sup>), the lighting of the four great golden candelabra in the court of the women (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>), the singing of Ps 105. 29. 50. 94. 81. 82, and the public reading of the law on the first day of the week in the 3rd year, see Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xiv. pp. 232-249; Westcott on St. John, notes on ch. 7<sup>37</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>. [On the daily service, which formed the substratum of the entire worship of the Temple, the morning and evening sacrifices which were offered on every Sabbath and every festival day, see Schürer, HJP ii. 273-299.]

III. THE MINOR FESTIVALS.—(1) The Feast of Purim (פּוּרִים, φουρπα).—In 2 Mac 15<sup>38</sup> it is called ἡ Μαρδοχαίου ἡμέρα, 'Mordecai's Day.' It is said to have been instituted by Mordecai to commemorate the overthrow of Haman and the failure of his plots against the Jews (Est 3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>15-32</sup>). It was held on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (the twelfth month). The 13th of Adar—the day of Nicanor—originally a feast to commemorate his death (1 Mac 7<sup>40</sup>, 2 Mac 15<sup>38</sup>), at a later time became a fast—the Fast of Esther—in preparation for the Feast of Purim, which was of a very joyous character. De Lagarde (followed by Schultz, OT Theol. p. 431, and Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. vol. xx. p. 115) thinks that the feast which dates from the Persian period is itself of Persian origin, Purim being derived from the Persian Pardigān, Pārdiyan the φουρπα of the Greek recensions of Esther pointing to a form φουρπα instead of Purim.

Edersheim identifies the F. of Purim with the unnamed feast in Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, 'for no other feast could have intervened between December (Jn 4<sup>35</sup>) and the Passover (Jn 6<sup>4</sup>), except that of the "Dedication of the Temple," and that is specially designated as such (Jn 10<sup>22</sup>) and not simply as a Feast of the Jews' (The Temple, etc., p. 291). On the evening of the 13th of Adar the whole Book (Megillah or Roll) of Esther was read at the synagogue service, to keep the memory of the great deliverance by Esther alive, 'the children raising their loudest and angriest cries at every mention of the name of Haman, the congregation stamping on the floor, with Eastern demonstrativeness, and imprecating from every voice the curse, "Let his name be blotted out, the name of the wicked shall rot." Year by year in the Nazareth synagogue Jesus must have seen and heard all this, and how the reader tried to read in one breath the verses in which Haman and his sons are jointly mentioned, to show that they were hanged together' (Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ, i. 226). Edersheim (The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 229) speaks of the 'good cheer and boisterous enjoyments' of the Feast of Purim, some of its customs 'almost reminding us of our fifth of November.'

(2) The Feast of the Dedication of the Temple (החג, חנוכה, éykaina, 1 Mac 4<sup>21-23</sup>, 2 Mac 10<sup>64</sup>; φάρα, Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 7).—It was instituted by Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 164, when the temple which had been desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes was once more dedicated to the service of J". . . . . on the 25th of Chislew (the ninth month), and lasted for eight days. 'All through the land the people assembled in their synagogues, carrying branches of palm and other trees in their hands, and held jubilant services. No fast or mourning could commence during the feast, and a blaze of lamps, lanterns, and torches illuminated every house, within and without, each evening. In Jerusalem the temple itself was thus lighted up. The young of every household heard the stirring deeds of the Maccabees, to rouse them to noble emulation, and with these were linked the story of the heroic Judith and the Assyrian Holofernes' (Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ, vol. i. p. 225). It will be noticed that in four particulars the Feast of the Dedication resembled the Feast of Tabernacles, (1) in its duration of eight days; (2) in the chanting of the Hallel (Pss 113-118); (3) in the practice of carrying palm branches; (4) in the illumination of the temple. Edersheim, in The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 227 f., thinks that the first three particulars were derived from the Feast of the Tabernacles, and that the last (the temple illumination) passed from the Feast of the Dedication into the observances of the Feast of Tabernacles. The date of the Feast of the Dedication, the 25th of Chislew, some hold to have been adopted by the ancient Church as that of the birth of our blessed Lord—Christmas—the dedication of the true temple, which was the body of Jesus (Jn 2<sup>10</sup>) (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., p. 293, and 'Christmas a Festival of Jewish Origin' in The Leisure Hour for Dec. 1873). The F. of the Dedication is mentioned in Jn 10<sup>22</sup>.

(3) The Feast of Wood Offering or of the Wood-carriers, ξύλοφορίαν (Jos. BJ, II. xvii. 6), on the 15th of Abib—being the last of the nine occasions on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple (cf. Neh 10<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>).

The Feast of the Reading of the Law (1 Es 9<sup>50</sup>, Neh 8<sup>9</sup>); The Feast of Nicanor on the 13th of Adar (1 Mac 7<sup>49</sup>); The Feast of the Captured Fortress on the 23rd of Iyyar (the second month) (1 Mac 13<sup>50-52</sup>); and The Feast of Baskets, evidently 'never attained to any real prominence' (see Schultz, OT Theol. i. 311, 312, 313, The Temple, etc., 295 f., on the Feast of Wood Offering).

IV. FASTS.—(1) The Day of Atonement.—יום כיפור, hēmera éxilasmou, lit. Day of the Coverings or Atonements (Lv 16 (P) and 23<sup>7-32</sup> (H), Ex 30<sup>10</sup> (P), Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup> (P)). It was the only fast day prescribed by the law (Lv 23<sup>7</sup> (H)). In the Talmud it is called 'The Day' (יום); in the NT it is called 'the fast,' ἡ νηστεία (Ac 27<sup>9</sup>). The sacrifices were threefold: (1) the ordinary daily sacrifices; (2) the special expiatory sacrifices of the day; (3) the festive sacrifices (Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup>). The characteristic feature of the day was the offering of the sin-offering of atonement by the high priest alone (Lv 16<sup>33</sup>)—not in his gorgeous official dress, but in the simple white linen robes of purity and consecration (Lv 16<sup>4</sup> 23<sup>31</sup> 23<sup>7-32</sup>, Nu 29<sup>7</sup>).

The order of proceedings is given in Lv 16. In vv. 3-10 we have the general outline, in vv. 11-28 the details, which were as follows: (1) The killing of the bullock by the high priest as a sin-offering for himself and his house; (2) the burning of incense in the 'holy of holies' by the high priest; (3) the casting of the 'scapegoat' (éribema) with the sin-offering; (4) the casting of the 'scapegoat' for J", one for Azazel (חַזַּק, Philo, 'The one goat is given to "the evil spirit," and the lot which it received is "the evil spirit" prophecy "sent away" far away . . . . . a personal being, in opposition to J", the personal name of God.' Schultz, 'Some powerful being to whom the animal is sent and to whom it is sent with the now forgiven guilt of the reconciled people. . . . This being must be conceived of as strange and unholy. . . . An Aramaic name for an unclean and ungodlike power, which has its abode in the wilderness, in the accursed land outside the sacred bounds of the camp.' Watson in Camb. Comp. to the Bible, 'Azazel, the completely separate one, the evil spirit (called as dwelling in the desert). See AZAZEL. (5) The killing of the goat of the 'sin-offering' by the high priest; (6) the killing of the mercy-seat with the blood of the sin-offering; (7) the sprinkling of the blood of the sin-offering on the golden altar of incense and before it seven times; (8) atonement for the court and altar of burnt-offering; (9) confession of sin over the live goat, and his dismissal into the wilderness to Azazel; (10) resumption by the high priest of the gorgeous robes of his office; (11) the offering of burnt-offering and burning the fat of the sin-offerings; (12) the burning of the sin-offerings without the altar. The chief purpose of the Day of Atonement was to preserve the holiness of the sanctuary as a fit place of meeting between God and man. There were five subjects of atonement: (1) The Holy Sanctuary (i.e. the Holy of Holies); (2) the Temple (the Holy Place); (3) the altar; (4) the priest; (5) all the congregation.

It is significant that there is no mention of the Day of Atonement until Sir 50<sup>68</sup>. Zec 3<sup>9</sup> is doubtful. In Ne 8 it might have been expected. Neh 7<sup>73b</sup>-9<sup>38</sup> records (1) the observance of the Feast of Trumpets on the first day of the seventh month of the year B.C. 444; (2) the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, including the reading of the books of the law day by day, from the 15th to the 22nd of the same month; (3) the observance of a day of general fasting and prayer on the 24th day of the same month. Either the 24th day was observed in place of the Day of Atonement on the 10th day, or the latter had not yet been appointed. It is difficult to avoid the latter conclusion. 'This testimonium e silentio is enough; down to that date (B.C. 444) the great day of the Priestly code (now introduced for the first time) had not existed' (Wellhausen, Prolegomena p. 111). For the references in the NT see Ro 3<sup>25</sup> (λασθήριον, ἡμέρα). He 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>14-16</sup> 5<sup>1-10</sup> 6<sup>18</sup> 7<sup>22-28</sup> 8<sup>1-6</sup> 9<sup>11-15</sup> 13<sup>10-12</sup> 1 Jn 2<sup>1-2</sup> (ἡμέρας) (Willis, Worship of the Old Covenant, pp. 201-214; Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xvi. pp. 263-288). See further, ATONEMENT (DAY OF).

(2) Other Fasts.—The Day of Atonement was the only fast day prescribed by the law. But we read of individual and national fasts in Jg 20<sup>26</sup>, 1 S 7<sup>6</sup> 31<sup>13</sup>, 2 S 12<sup>16</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>12</sup> 27, Jon 3<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>6</sup>, Jer 14<sup>18</sup> 36<sup>6</sup>, La 2<sup>10</sup>, Jl 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>12</sup>, Is 58<sup>3-7</sup>, Neh 9<sup>18</sup>, Est 4<sup>16</sup>, Dn 10<sup>3</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>47</sup>. Two passages in Zec call for comment,

SYNOPSIS OF FEASTS AND FASTS

| Group.  | Feast or Fast.                            | Exodus.  | Leviticus.                                      | Numbers.   | Deuteronomy.                               | References outside Pentateuch.  | References in New Test.  |
|---|---|--|---|--|--|---|--|
| I.Connected with the Institution of the Sabbath. | 1. Sabbath . . .                          | 16 <sup>23-30</sup> 20 <sup>8</sup>23 <sup>12</sup> 31 <sup>1-16</sup>34 <sup>21</sup> 35 <sup>2</sup> | 19 <sup>3</sup> 23 <sup>3</sup> 26 <sup>2</sup> | 15 <sup>32</sup> 36 <sup>28</sup> 10                       | 51 <sup>2-15</sup>                         | 1 S 20 <sup>5</sup> 6, 2 K 4 <sup>23</sup> 11 <sup>5-7</sup> ,Neh 8 <sup>9</sup> 131 (104) 131 <sup>5-22</sup> ,Is 51 <sup>2-4</sup> 55 <sup>12</sup> , Jer17 <sup>20</sup> 27, Ezk 20 <sup>12</sup> 16,Hos 2 <sup>13</sup> , Am 8 <sup>5</sup> | Mt 12 <sup>9-13</sup> , Mk 3 <sup>15</sup> , Lk1 <sup>16</sup> ,..   |
|   | 2. New Moon . .                           | 40 <sup>2</sup> 17   | ..  | 10 <sup>10</sup> 28 <sup>11-14</sup>31 29 <sup>6</sup> | ..   | 1 S 20 <sup>5</sup> , Ps 81 <sup>3</sup> 4, Is113 <sup>14</sup> , Am 8 <sup>5</sup> , 1 Mac10 <sup>34</sup>   | Col 2 <sup>16</sup> .  |
|   | 3. Sabbatical Month,Feast of Trumpets | ..   | 23 <sup>24</sup> 25                             | 29 <sup>1-6</sup>  | ..   | Neh 8 <sup>9-10</sup>   | ..   |
|   | 4. Sabbatical Year .                      | 23 <sup>10</sup> 11  | 25 <sup>1-7</sup> 30 2226 <sup>32-35</sup>  | ..   | 15 <sup>1-11</sup>31 <sup>9-13</sup>   | 2 Ch 36 <sup>21</sup> , Neh 10 <sup>31</sup> ,Jer 34 <sup>14</sup> , 1 Mac 6 <sup>53</sup>  | ..   |
|   | 5. Jubilee Year . .                       | ..   | 25 <sup>8-55</sup> 27 <sup>17-24</sup>          | ..   | ..   | Is 61 <sup>1</sup> 2 63 <sup>4</sup> , Jer 34 <sup>8</sup>14 15. 17 (?), Ezk 46 <sup>17</sup>   | Lk 41 <sup>8-21</sup> , Rev 21 <sup>1-5</sup> .  |
| II.Three Historical Feasts.                      | 1. Passover andMazzôth                | 12 18 <sup>1-10</sup>23 <sup>14-17</sup>34 <sup>18</sup> 25  | 23 <sup>5-14</sup>                              | 9 <sup>214</sup> 23 <sup>16-25</sup>33 <sup>3</sup>    | 16 <sup>1-8</sup> 16                       | Jos 5 <sup>9</sup> 10, 2 K 23 <sup>21</sup> 23,2 Ch 30, 35, Ezr 6 <sup>19</sup> ,Ezk 45 <sup>21</sup>   | Mt 26 <sup>1</sup> 2, Mk 14 <sup>1</sup> 2,14 16, Lk 24 <sup>1</sup> 22 <sup>1</sup> 7 8,11 13 15, Jn 21 <sup>3</sup> 64115 <sup>5</sup> 12 <sup>1</sup> 13 <sup>1</sup> 18 <sup>28</sup> 39191 <sup>4</sup> , Acts 12 <sup>4</sup> , 1 Co5 <sup>8-9</sup> . |
|   | 2. Pentecost . .                          | 22 <sup>29</sup> 23 <sup>16</sup> 1934 <sup>22</sup> 26  | 23 <sup>10-21</sup>                             | 23 <sup>26-31</sup>  | 16 <sup>9-12</sup>                         | 2 Mac 12 <sup>32</sup>  | Ac 21 20 <sup>18</sup> , 1 Co 16 <sup>3</sup> .  |
|   | 3. Tabernacles . .                        | 23 <sup>16</sup> 34 <sup>22</sup>  | 23 <sup>34-36</sup> 39-44                       | 29 <sup>12-40</sup>  | 16 <sup>13-15</sup>31 <sup>10-13</sup> | 1 K 8 <sup>2</sup> 12 <sup>32</sup> , 2 Ch 5 <sup>3</sup> 7 <sup>8</sup> ,Ezr 3 <sup>4</sup> 81 <sup>4-7</sup> , Zec1 <sup>4</sup> 16 <sup>19</sup>   | Jn 7 <sup>1-10</sup> 21.   |
| III.Minor Feasts.                                | 1. Purim . . .                            | ..   | ..  | ..   | ..   | Est 9 <sup>15-32</sup> , 1 Mac 7 <sup>48</sup> ,2 Mac 15 <sup>38</sup>  | Jn 5 <sup>1</sup> (?).   |
|   | 2. Dedication or Lights                   | ..   | ..  | ..   | ..   | 1 Mac 4 <sup>52-56</sup> , 2 Mac10 <sup>6</sup> 7   | Jn 10 <sup>22</sup> .  |
| IV.Fast.   | Day of Atonement .                        | 30 <sup>10</sup>   | 16. 23 <sup>27-32</sup>                         | 29 <sup>7-11</sup>   | ..   | Zec 3 <sup>9</sup> (?), Sir 50 <sup>5</sup> 5 <sup>5</sup>  | Ac 27 <sup>9</sup> 11, 2 Co 6 <sup>14</sup> 161 <sup>1</sup> , 2 <sup>1</sup> 2 <sup>1</sup> 2 <sup>1</sup> 3 <sup>1</sup>911-15.  |

7<sup>3-5</sup> and 8<sup>19</sup>. In 7<sup>3-5</sup> Zechariah, in answer to an inquiry put to him by the men of Bethel about fasting, declares that J<sup>h</sup> demands no fasts, but only observance of His moral commands. Two fasts had been in observance in the 5th and 7th months for seventy years,—the fast of the 5th month (9th Abib), in memory of the destruction of the city and temple by fire (2 K 25<sup>8</sup>); and the fast of the 7th month (2nd Tisri), in memory of the murder of Gedaliah and the annihilation of all that remained of the Jewish state (Jer 41). In ch. 8 he pictures the Messianic future, when the fast days will become seasons of gladness and cheerful feasts. He adds to 7<sup>3-5</sup> two other fasts: the fast of the 4th month (17th Tammuz), in memory of the capture of Jerusalem (Jer 39<sup>2</sup>), and the fast of the 10th month (10th Tebeth), in memory of the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25<sup>1</sup>). Zechariah knows nothing of 'the Fast'—the Day of Atonement. Later fasts 'came into a position co-ordinate with the feasts, and became a stated and very important element of the ordinary worship' (Wellhausen, Prolego- mena, 112). Fasting degenerated into formalism and self-righteousness. In the NT cf. Mt 6<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>1</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup> 18<sup>12</sup>, Ac 27<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>27</sup>. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the system of fasts received such an impulse that it was necessary to draw up a list of the days on which fasting was forbidden. The present Jewish calendar contains twenty-two fast-days, besides the Day of Atonement, the Fast of Esther, and the four fasts of Zec 8<sup>19</sup> (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., pp. 297-301).

LITERATURE.—Edersheim, The Temple: its Services, 144-300, The Life and Times of Jesus; Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ; Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 83-120; Schultz, OT Theology, i. 189, 196 202, 359-369 372, 402. On the 370 words to find an exhaustive list of German literature on the Sacred Seasons, Vol. ii. 87-100; Willis, The Worship of the Old Testament, 190-214; W. R. Smith, The Prophecy of Isaiah, rev. ed. with introd. and notes by Prof. Cheyne, 33, 56, 331. OT JLC 3, 240, 269, RSZ 221, 227, 245, 280, 311, 396, 403, 410, 434 472, 464; Cobb, 137-139, Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 397, 401, criticism of Wellhausen, Schure, 1204 (1204), Watson, Cambridge Companion to the Bible, 411-417, Driver, Amos, 16, 43 f., 55; Trumbull, E. ELMER HARDING.

The following important articles, among others, may be expected in the Second Volume:—

|                    |  |                              |   |
|--------------------|--|------------------------------|---|
| FIRST-FRUITS . . . | Professor A. S. Peake.                                   | HOLY SPIRIT . . .            | Professor H. B. Swete.                    |
| FLOOD . . . . .    | Mr. F. H. Woods.   | HOSEA . . . . .              | Professor A. B. Davidson.                 |
| FOOD . . . . .     | Professor A. Macalister.                                 | HOUSE . . . . .              | Sir Charles Warren.                       |
| FOOL . . . . .     | Professor Geerhardus Vos.                                | HYMN . . . . .               | Professor Walter Lock.                    |
| FOREIGNER . . .    | Mr. John A. Selbie.                                      | IDOLATRY . . .               | Professor W. P. Paterson.                 |
| FORGIVENESS . .    | Mr. J. F. Bethune-Baker.                                 | INCARNATION . .              | Principal R. L. Ottley.                   |
| FRINGES . . . .    | Professor A. R. S. Kennedy.                              | ISAIAH . . . . .             | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GABBATHA . . .     | Professor Eb. Nestle.                                    | ISRAEL . . . . .             | Professor H. E. Ryle.                     |
| GAD . . . . .      | Professor W. H. Bennett.                                 | ITURÆA . . . . .             | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GADARA . . . .     | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JACOB . . . . .              | Professor H. E. Ryle.                     |
| GALATIA . . . .    | Professor W. M. Ramsay.                                  | JAMES . . . . .              | Professor J. B. Mayor.                    |
| GALATIANS (EP.)    | Professor Marcus Dods.                                   | JEHU . . . . .               | Principal Owen C. Whitehouse              |
| GALILEE . . . .    | Dr. Selah Merrill.                                       | JEREMIAH . . .               | Professor A. B. Davidson.                 |
| GAMES . . . . .    | Dr. Thomas Nicol.  | JERICO . . . . .             | Dr. F. J. Bliss.                          |
| GATE . . . . .     | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JERUSALEM . . .              | Lieut.-Col. Conder.                       |
| GENEALOGY . . .    | Professor Ed. L. Curtis andProfessor B. W. Bacon.    | JESUS CHRIST . .             | Professor W. Sanday.                      |
| GENESIS . . . .    | Professor H. E. Ryle.                                    | JEW . . . . .                | Mr. A. Lukyn Williams.                    |
| GEOLOGY . . . .    | Professor Edward Hull.                                   | JOB . . . . .                | Professor W. T. Davison.                  |
| GETHSEMANE . .     | Lieut.-Col. Conder.                                      | JOEL . . . . .               | Professor G. G. Cameron.                  |
| GIANT . . . . .    | Professor Willis J. Beecher.                             | JOHN (BAPTIST)               | Mr. Bebb.                                 |
| GILEAD . . . . .   | Professor Driver, Dr. Merrill,and Professor Bennett. | JOHN . . . . .               | The late Principal Reynolds.              |
| GILGAL . . . . .   | Dr. F. J. Bliss.   | JOHN (EPP.) . .              | Professor Salmond.                        |
| GLORY . . . . .    | Mr. G. Buchanan Gray andProfessor Massie.            | JONAH . . . . .              | Professor Ed. König.                      |
| GOD . . . . .      | Professor A. B. Davidson andProfessor W. Sanday.     | JORDAN . . . . .             | Sir Charles Warren.                       |
| GOLGOTHA . . .     | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JOSHUA . . . . .             | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GOSPELS . . . .    | Professor V. H. Stanton.                                 | JUBILEE . . . . .            | Mr. G. Harford-Battersby.                 |
| GRACE . . . . .    | Principal A. Stewart.                                    | JUBILEES (BK.) .             | Mr. A. C. Headlam.                        |
| HABAKKUK . . .     | Professor S. R. Driver.                                  | JUDÆA . . . . .              | Sir Charles Wilson.                       |
| HADES . . . . .    | Professor S. D. F. Salmond.                              | JUDAS ISCARIOT               | Dr. A. Plummer.                           |
| HAGGAI . . . . .   | Mr. G. A. Cooke.   | JUDGES . . . . .             | Mr. G. A. Cooke.                          |
| HAMATH . . . . .   | Professor W. Max Müller.                                 | JUSTIFICATION .              | Principal D. W. Simon                     |
| HEBREWS (EP.) .    | Professor A. B. Bruce.                                   | KINGDOM OF GOD               | Professor J. Orr.                         |
| HEROD . . . . .    | Mr. A. C. Headlam.                                       | KINGS . . . . .              | Mr. C. F. Burney.                         |
| HEXATEUCH . . .    | Mr. F. H. Woods.   | LAMENTATIONS .               | Mr. J. A. Selbie.                         |
| HINNOM . . . . .   | Sir Charles Warren                                       | LANGUAGE OFTHE OLD TEST. | Professor D. S. Margoliouth               |
| HITTITES . . . .   | Professor A. H. Sayce.                                   | LANGUAGE OFTHE NEW TEST. | Professor J. H. Thayer.                   |
| HOLINESS . . . .   | Professor John Skinner andProfessor G. B. Stevens.   | LATIN VERSIONS               | Dr. H. A. A. Kennedy.                     |
|                    |  | LAW . . . . .                | Professor Driver and ProfessorDenney. |
|                    |  | LEPROSY . . . .              | Professor Macalister.                     |

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

136 484

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY